After dinner they sat in a corner of the lounge, Duvernay smoking his cheroot, handsome in his white clothes, Alix the sunburned jeune fille. They talked of Amelia and thought about her. Neither of them knew the circumstances of life in upper Canada in the early 1820's; the letters gave them glimpses, more interesting for not being understood. They speculated about the little family cast away on an island in the great forest, Amelia with her prickly husband, her two little boys, her daughter Anne whom she adored.

"You remember the figures on the back of one of the letters, which puzzled us?"

"You have deciphered them?" asked Colonel Duvernay.

"I think they are measurements for a dress. The odd thing is, they are mine too."

It was strange to think that she and a great-great-grandmother were as like as two peas. It brought her quite close. When Amelia wrote of clearing the land, she saw it vividly. "It is the great stumps which give trouble; they resist most stubbornly as if they were possessed by a devil." Alix formed a mental image of the clearing in the forest; she saw Amelia working there, she suffered in herself the heat of the Canadian sun, felt the taste of sweat and dust on her lips.

Colonel Duvernay said, "There is nothing so civilizing as interest in another life—even that of a sea urchin. But I feel that the little Amelia is doomed."

They were not experienced farmers, the clearing had not prospered. Some calamity had occurred and the husband had gone off to find employment elsewhere. "We have sunk into such destitution as your gentle heart cannot imagine. Anne and I tilled the land as well as we were able, but the grain was blighted, there was nothing left but a few roots and potatoes. Our hens dropped one by one from the cold and in desperation we gathered the needles of pine and spruce and boiled them, hoping there was some strength to be got from them.

"You would not know me, Sabra, so much I am altered. I am old before my time. I do not know what I should have done without my Anne. I thank God for her every day. She is watching over me as I write; she wears a ragged coat, she is made slight by heavy work and ill food, but her looks are full of love and there is no task she will not attempt for us. If anything happens to me—the thought breaks upon my rest and brings me to my knees—I pray you will send for her. Find some way to aid my darling and I shall rest content."

Anne had been brought back to Scotland after her mother's death to be brought up by Sabra's people, and at eighteen she had made a runaway marriage with Alcide Bertholet, who was rich. And after a long, eventful life she was buried in the cemetery at Antimes in the Bertholet plot under an arch of stone angels. All the Bertholet children knew that arch well; they played games about it.

What a jump, Alix reflected, from the backwoods of upper Canada to the boulevards of Paris and the elegance of the château at Beauvais. How much would she remember? Would she dream about the dark forest and the foam-flecked rivers? And of Amelia?

"One sees," said Colonel Duvernay, "that Amelia was a sort of heroine. And heroines should not die alone, unnoticed, in the wilderness. You have a duty to this little ancestress, Alix. You must find her grave and lay a flower upon it to show that she is remembered."

That August on the island in Canada was a time of waiting. Each day began in morning coolness and bloomed into the hot, strong afternoon. Each day was like the one before, as if, though the pages of the calendar were turning, time stood still.

The old boathouse lay like an amphibian, half in the water, half on the bank. Wallis came out on the balcony and leaned there looking down into the pool. He and Roger had furnished the boathouse with odds and ends and made it their own place. Roger came every summer; they had had many councils here about their future. This spring they had graduated from the University of Toronto and this fall Wallis expected to do postgraduate work in history.

He looked at his watch. Roger was coming on the four-o'clock train.

He finished dressing and walked along the path by the river. The stones of the captain's house looked mellow in the afternoon light. It sat there solidly on its lawn, the home his great-great-grandfather, Capt. William Glendinning, had built in the year 1823.

His aunt, Jo Glendinning, came to the door. "Wallis, it's almost traintime."

"I'm just going."

He backed the car out and turned onto the gravel-and-daisy road which ran the length of the island. It had been a crown grant to an officer, six hundred acres; now it was mostly flat arable fields fringed with bush. Besides the captain's place there were two farms, both still owned and worked by the captain's descendants. Three Glendinnings had fought in the War Between the States and afterward settled there. Others had taken part in the three Western migrations. In the summer when the relatives came back to visit, bringing their children, the island was a lively place.

The train pulled into the station at Carleton Place and Roger got off. He had fawn-colored hair and a fawn-colored skin and he wore an expensive tailored flannel suit. He looked well brought up and rather serious, and this amused Wallis.

They drove back to the island along the Almonte Highway. On either side there were pastures with elms and black-and-white cows.

"Last time I passed here the cows were in the same place," said Roger. "Same cows, probably."

"Any news?"

"Nothing from the Air Force, if that's what you mean."

They crossed the wooden bridge over the Mississippi.

"Stop the car," said Roger.

Wallis let the car come to a stop on the rise before Malcolm's gate. From here they could see a good part of the island. Once he had stopped the car here and given Roger a lecture on the origins and undoubted worth of the Glendinnings. Roger never forgot, and each year he added a few notes of his own.

"Gentlemen and fellow anthropologists," he said, "we have before us the native heath of the Glendinnings. Because they live on an island, because they are a stiff-necked bunch anyway, they have preserved many characteristics of the pioneer days. You will note that the three homes of the island have not changed in a hundred years except in the kitchens and the agricultural tools. The parlors have not changed—grim is the word for the Glendinning parlors. Grim is also the word for their religion. Regarding their attitude to sex ——"

"Take it easy, boy."

Roger put on a prim look. "Sex is for farm animals."

Wallis drove on, thinking that he might have offered a few notes on Roger's home in Rosedale, Toronto. The Beckons were rather rich. His father was an executive of a big store, kind but fussy and humorless; his mother was earnest and worthy, interested in church music and somewhat of a pain in the neck. Yet here was Roger, with a spring of natural gaiety.

Aunt Jo came to the gate to meet them. "We'll have tea right away," she said. She believed that anyone who had made the journey from Toronto must be revived by tea at once. "We'll have it on the lawn."

Paula, Wallis' young sister, handsome and rosy, came out carrying the tea tray. "Hi, Roger."

"Hello, Paula."

They had tea under the tall Lombardy poplar. Swallows skimmed on the river, the opposite bank flowed in a green slope to the sky. The island was a peaceful place.

"What are you being so quiet about?" Paula wanted to know.

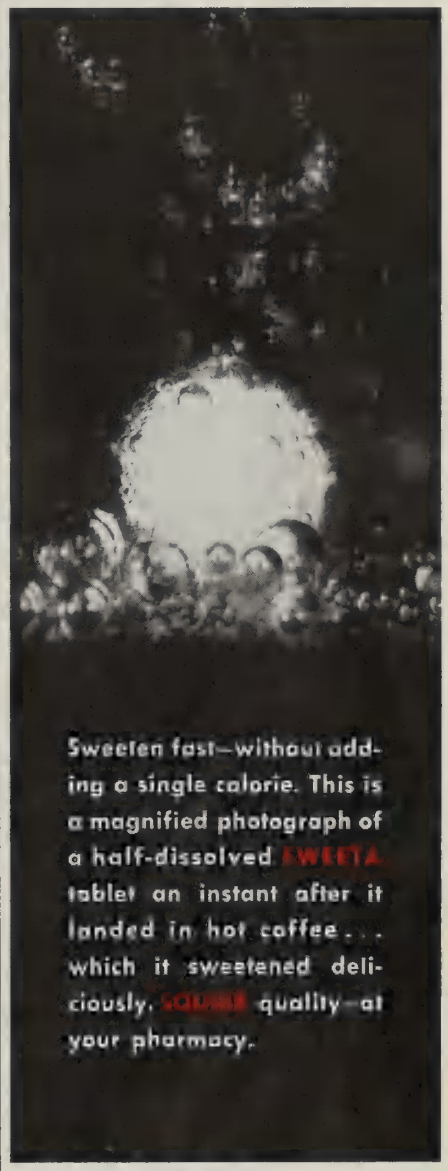
"I was thinking of the first time I came here."

Aunt Jo had shown him all over the captain's house. It was plain that she loved every stick and stone of it; she was proud that it had the prestige of a historical site. "It was built like this, like a fort," she said, "with walls three feet thick and shutters inside and out, because they never knew what would come down the river at them—Indians or Americans."

"Sure the Americans never came near us," said Paula.

"They never got across the St. Lawrence!" cried Aunt Jo in triumph, putting the Americans in their place. She led the way upstairs. "This was the first house in these parts to have a stairway. They usually didn't have an upstairs because they couldn't heat it."

Roger thought the upstairs with the blue plaster and the rounded doorways was attractive. It had a curious old-new arrangement. Around the bedrooms ran an attic space, like a storage wall. It was crammed with the detritus of the past.



"Someday we'll clean it all out," said Aunt Jo. She led the way downstairs again. "Now for the big treat—the secret room!"

"Is there a secret room?"

"The captain had it put in while he was building. And it was a lucky thing he did, because they hid him there the time the rebels came to hang him. And once when the Indians came, Amelia hid her children in it."

"Hello, baby sitter!"

"Who was Amelia?"

"Wallis' best girl," said Paula pertly.

"I wish I could find one like her," said Wallis.

"She was the captain's first wife, poor thing," said Aunt Jo. "She died in 1829."

The entrance was through a cupboard. Roger pushed back the panel in the side and mounted two stone steps and found himself in a hollow in the fireplace wall. There was nothing there but an old stool. He sat down on it, wondering how it would feel to be a mother and to shut your children in this dark place, not knowing if there would be anyone left alive to release them.

For a moment he felt it vividly, as if some wisp of that fear still clung to the stones.

There was a place like an island in the meadow, grown up with plum and cherry trees, and here was Amelia's stone. Wallis often sat there and thought about her.

Her coloring, they said, was fair and lively, her hair copper and gold. She was of medium height and sturdy and she loved to dance. He pictured her in his mind as a bare-armed, smiling girl in a brown dress.

He did not care about his great-great-grandfather the captain, who had been a good soldier but a poor pioneer. It was Amelia who interested him; it was because of her he wished to become a historian.

The island was lively with visitors, the captain's house overflowing. A sort of bloom came on the summer. Their days began in lazy breakfasts in the stone kitchen and morning idleness along the river. There was plenty for them to do. They swam and picnicked, they got up milking contests among the visitors, they rode the sweet-smelling loads of late alfalfa.

Wallis and Roger were in the boathouse changing for another swim.

"This is the best summer yet," said Roger.

"You said that last year."

"We've found the combination—each year better than the one before."

They went out on the balcony. The pool at this time of year was really too shallow for diving; nevertheless, Roger stepped up on the railing for extra height.

Watching him, Wallis thought that no one would ever understand Roger until one understood this curious thing. From the first he had a passion for air and motion; it had made him a champion gymnast. He might be flippant about many things, but not about this. On the bar, on the rings he never permitted himself to show any fear, any sloppiness or lack of control. He would go on and study law as his parents wished, he would doubtless become a serious, sober citizen and this private dream would have to die—this dream of flying through the air on the high trapeze, of falling and floating and, with grace and precision, catching and rising again.

He stood an instant, gauging the depth of the water, then he soared out, seemed to hang, snapped over in a one-and-a-half somersault, scooped into and out of the water in a shallow arc—a pleasure to see.

Wallis climbed up on the railing and turned his back on the pool. He did not like back dives much—he was looking for an omen. If I do a good one, and war comes, I'll be lucky. He sprang. The world turned over his head—boathouse, the tops of the willows, the blue sky. He unrolled—for a moment there was a most agreeable sensation of falling in perfect balance—he hit the water too straight and shot straight down to the bottom. He swam to the ramp and crawled out.

"I've cut my foot, blast it."

That was the trouble with omens—they came out mixed.

Aunt Jo sent Wallis to town to buy ice cream and when he was there he got an Ottawa newspaper. The date was August twenty-fourth and there was a story in it which shook the world.

He brought it back to Roger in the boathouse. "I guess this means we're for it."

Roger read it, stretched out in an old straw chair on the balcony. Russia and Germany had signed a nonaggression pact. Then he looked all around him in a sort of amazement. The river brimmed with evening reflections. On the other side the cows stood in the shade of the willows, ruminating. In the sky flocks of starlings rose and wheeled and poured like smoke. Everywhere was peace.

The summer was drawing to a close. There was a final barn dance at Malcolm and Minna's, neighbors and cousins. The squares were formed; the girls' skirts flared as they were swung to the old tunes. Wallis found himself pierced by a feeling as sharp as the sound of the fiddles, a sense of valedictory. He had been at a hundred such dances, but tonight everything was different. He danced with the girls he had grown up with, the girl of his first crush when he had been too shy to tell her about it, the girls he had gone with in high school. They brought back the memories of old times and skating parties, and all the prickly, too sensitive, uncomfortable business of growing up.

At intermission he strolled with a summer visitor in the orchard. There were other couples walking there, cooling off, getting their shoes soaked in the dew. He stopped before a big old apple tree. "Have you climbed the wishing tree?"

"This is the first I've heard of a wishing tree."

"Let me introduce you. Joyce, this is the wishing tree. Tree, this is Joyce. You're supposed to climb up and sit in the crotch and make a wish."

"Here goes," she said, "I'm a fool for wishes." She climbed up and sat in the crotch, he came up behind her. The boughs swayed, the light fell dappled through the leaves.

"Close your eyes and wish."

She guessed what was coming—she opened her eyes and, smiling, turned her head so that his lips just brushed the corner of her mouth.

"You made it up, didn't you?"

"Things have come to a pretty pass, if we can't make up a story for a pretty girl."

"Now I make another wish—to get down without breaking my neck."

He dropped to the ground, she came down to a low bough, he reached up and lifted her down. They stood together, his hands still under her arms, the light falling on her soft young face, and again he was pierced by a sense of bittersweet. She was part of something he was leaving. He might have married this girl, for she was a laughing girl, and it would be easy to fall in love with her and they might have lived fifty years together. Now he knew only her name and how she looked under an apple tree—and a year from now he would not even remember her name.

"I hope you get your wish."

"Perhaps I did," she said, smiling.

The Home Waltz had been played, the yard was full of people calling good-bys and slamming car doors. Roger and Paula yelled at him that they were taking a gang to the boathouse for a swim; he said not to wait for him, he would walk through the fields.

He took the long way round by the edge of the river. In the back pasture he came upon the beef herd lying down, every head turned his way, motionless like a field of red boulders. He came to the river meadow which was like an old mezzotint with the stubble showing in shades of gray and five strawstacks catching the silver light.

It was a long time since he had climbed a strawstack. He climbed one now and made a hollow in the top and lay there, staring at the sky and remembering the mood of the spring. There had been the long grind of examinations, then convocation with its procession, its exhortation. He had knelt before the chancellor, a hood was put over his head and a voice said in Latin that he was admitted to the university. Afterward, when he had taken off his gown and hood, it seemed the natural thing to apply for a commission in the Air Force.

He turned on his elbow to look over the fields. He knew what was happening—he was saying good-by to the island. He had spent his boyhood here; every foot of land had its associations. He remembered the river and the berry patches, the delicious sense of release when the holidays came. Hot prickly Sundays and walking home from Sunday school and the road smelling of dust and daisies. The winter woods at night when he used to hunt rabbit and fox with his .22. A January day and the woods across the river faint and blue, the color of cold and distance. His studious pursuit of Amelia and his daydreams about her in the quiet of his room.

The sliver of moon sank into the horizon. A wild duck got up from the rushes and went whistling over his head. Why, he wondered, was the flight of a wild duck against a gray sky so sad?

At Rockcliffe, on the steps of the administration building, Roger was waiting.

"Provisional Pilot Officer Glendinning, I presume. O.K., here we go."

With their arms overflowing with equipment they were shown to a room with double-decker beds. There were two other P.P.O.'s

CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

What the mother sings to the cradle goes all the way down to the grave.

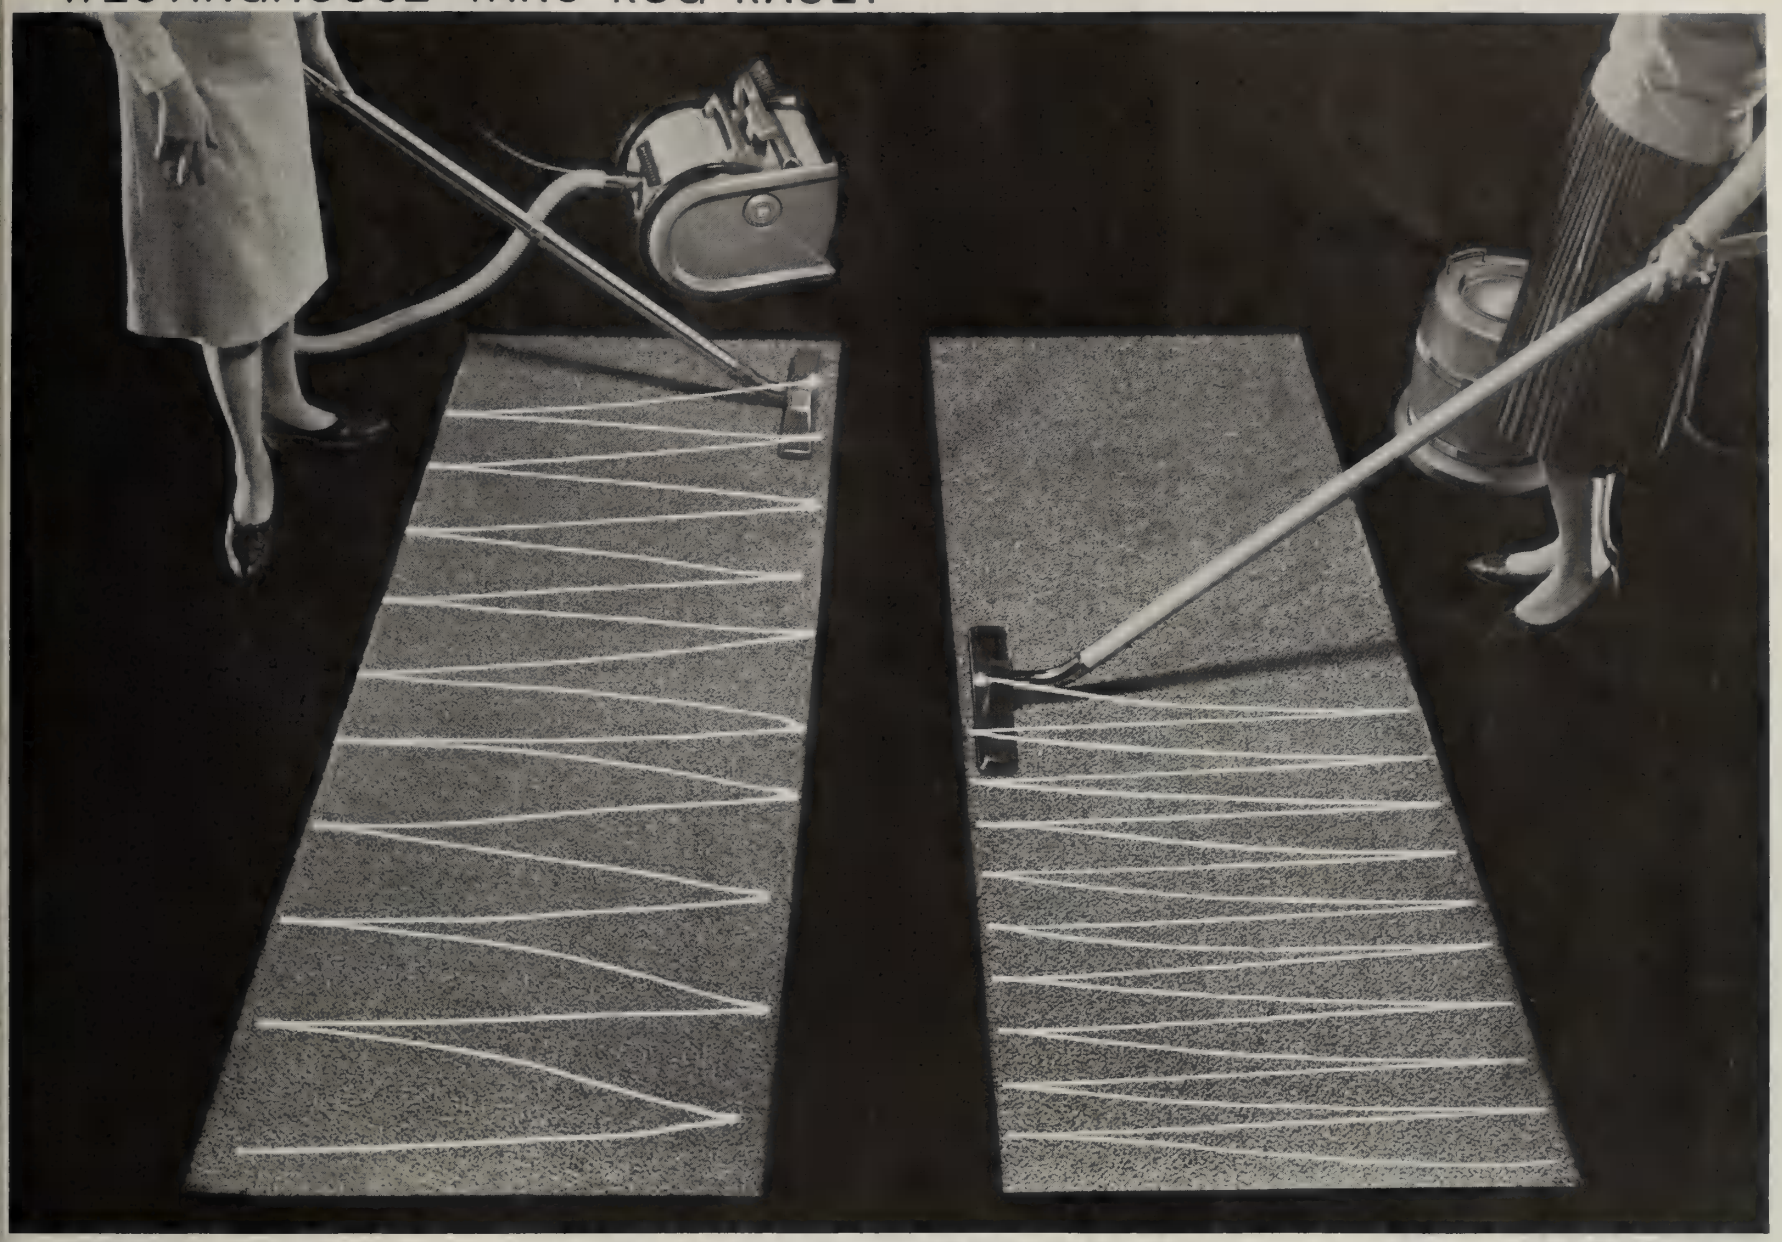
HENRY WARD BEECHER

Now! Quick as 1, 2, 3
VANiSH toilet bowl care!

1. POP IT OPEN!
New plastic lid pops off instantly... easily!

2. POUR IT IN!
Bubble-action whisks away stains... freshens air!

3. PAT YOURSELF ...on the back!
Relax while VANiSH does the work!



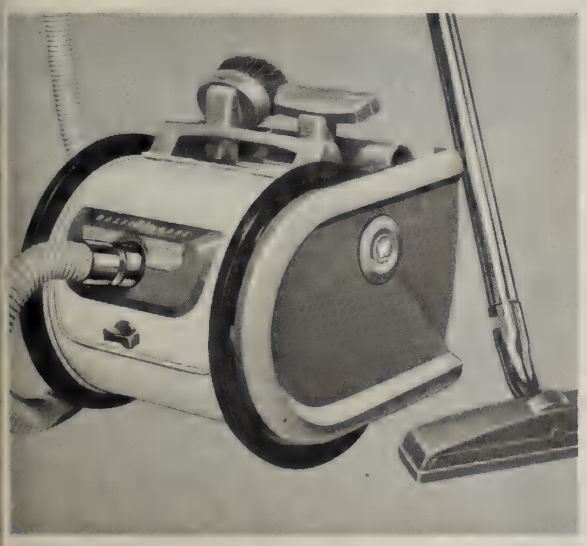
Bubbling-action beats them all!

Never again use old-fashioned all-purpose cleaners in your toilet bowl. Use VANiSH, made just for the job! Banish worry, work, mops, mess, odor! Keep your bathroom fresh as a daisy, hospital-clean! VANiSH is available in Regular or King Size... Look for the beautiful pink and blue package at your grocers!

Cleans toilet bowls as it freshens bathroom air

JUDSON DUNAWAY CORP., DOVER, N. H.

WESTINGHOUSE WINS RUG RACE!



WESTINGHOUSE MOBILE SPEED CLEANER picks up dirt so fast that hard-to-clean twist rug is cleaned in a few, quick strokes. Light bulb attached to nozzle records each stroke—proving it took far less work to do the job!

NEXT-BEST CLEANER TESTED on identical rug took same amount of strokes but only got this far—because considerable restroking was necessary. Path of light shows much wasted time and effort.

New Westinghouse Mobile Speed Cleaner

PICKS UP MORE DIRT FASTER

than other canister cleaners

HERE'S ACTUAL PROOF that the amazing new Westinghouse Mobile Speed Cleaner runs circles around others . . . picks up more dirt . . . in far less time. With greater pick-up power, every stroke cleans completely . . . no need to repeat strokes over and over again. Think of all the work that'll save you! Big wheels roll anywhere —over scatter rugs, door sills, even up stairs.

Unlike other cleaners, it carries its own tools in a built-in rack. Exclusive Toss-Away® Filter Bag disconnects automatically when ready for disposal. Smart two-tone beige styling. See it in action at your Westinghouse dealer's today. Complete with full set of attachments.

FIVE-YEAR GUARANTEE

Model MC-1 $69.95

EQUALLY POWERFUL is the new Westinghouse Speed Cleaner. Floor-N-Rug Tool goes right up to baseboard. Exclusive Reel-Away Cord Storage. Charcoal and white. Full set of attachments.

FIVE-YEAR GUARANTEE

Model SC-8 $54.95

THE SHAPE OF TOMORROW

YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse

Real Butter—
the natural flavor
to use with nature's foods

u're sure the flavor's right—with real butte

(Flavor that makes eating more fun)

re, because you taste the flavor magic real butter know real butter turns good food into great food.
natural food, churned from 100% pure cream, htful flavor all its own. Hot foods especially:
ast, biscuits, eggs, meats, seafood . . . taste ith real butter. Real butter is flavor magic—equal it!

Just like milk, real butter belongs on your family table

AMERICAN DAIRY
ASSOCIATION • Chicago
Representing the dairy farmers in your area

mo Show" on NBC-TV

© 1959 AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 130

there. The one on the top bed was Bob Burnaby, skinny and gangling, with a homesick look.

"Where you fellows from? I'm from Richmond."

The one lying on the lower bunk was tough and composed with thick rusty hair, hair like a chrysanthemum. Elliot Hayden, Trinity School, Trinity College, the son of a county judge—called Boomer because of his big voice.

"You needn't be in any hurry," he said. "We've been here two days and nobody's taken any notice of us."

"That won't do. We came here to fly airplanes," said Wallis.

"They won't let you near an airplane. They have their own way of doing things in the Air Force and it's a mighty peculiar way."

"I worked in the bank there," said Burnaby. "Bank of Nova Scotia. You guys ever been in Richmond?"

"He can't find anybody who even heard of the place," said Boomer.

"I've heard of it," said Wallis. "I come from Glen Isle, only about eighteen miles away."

Burnaby brightened up at once. "I guess things aren't going to be so bad, fellows."

There were twelve P.P.O.'s. They were kept waiting about, drilling, taking lectures. One day they were told to fall in with all their equipment. They were excited.

"This is it, boys! This is where we take off!"

A bus rolled into the yard, they piled their luggage and got in. "First time I ever got into a bus not knowing where it's going," said Roger.

"Hey, driver, where are we going?"

"London."

London! They were dumfounded.

"Keep your shirt on, kiddy," said the driver. "London, Ontario."

Actually it was Lambeth, a village outside London, where No. 5 Elementary Training School had been hurriedly improvised. There were a grass field, some light aircraft of the London Fying School, a girl secretary and a civilian instructor.

There was a morning at Lambeth Wallis would never forget. He was alone on a cross-country test. The sky was a limitless blue, the earth a map of colored rectangles; he was suddenly keenly aware of the great river of the air. He was exhilarated, as if he had been made free of another element. He put the nose of the Fleet trainer down and dived and pulled out and up and rolled it off the top of the loop. He put it through every trick—rolling, stalling and falling. He crossed some sort of frontier that morning—he felt that he could fly anything, that there was nothing he would not try to fly.

They completed fifty hours of flying and one morning the inspectors from Trenton were there, without notice, to give them their tests. It was a critical day. Their performance during the tests would decide whether they were to be accepted as pilots—or rejected.

As it turned out, they all did very well. Roger, when he was keyed up, reached a remarkable degree of co-ordination, a state which impelled him toward the difficult and dangerous. Boomer flew exactly as he had flown the day before, unruffled and competent. Burnaby startled his examiner by a series of wild bounces—he recovered and got his tail down and looked at the officer with a pleading expression.

That night the P.P.O.'s, no longer provisional, gave themselves a graduation party. They drank beer and sang, and dangled Burnaby out the window by his ankles to cure him of his fear of heights. When this did not cure him at once, they pretended to drop him and caught him in a blanket.

It had been fine, bland October weather at Lambeth. They had loafed on the grass, kidding one another. They lived together in a farmhouse where they were treated as members of the family. They set booby traps for one another, they had car races on the grass field. They had had a wonderful time—young men training to take on the Luftwaffe.

From Lambeth they were shot into the service flying schools. They became part of the blue-gray stream, pushing on one another's heels, with too much to learn and too little time. Drilling, cramming, falling asleep over their books, up at dawn to fly. Then there was a parade at Trenton, when, having completed 170 hours in Fleets, Harvards, Ansons and Lysanders, they were given their wings. And each made his private vows according to his nature.

Wallis and Roger walked down Whitehall. They felt they were walking in history. "Look, the Horse Guards." The Cenotaph. Parliament Square. There before the House of Lords in the rich gloom, Richard rode with his bent sword. They went on to Westminster Bridge. The Houses of Parliament stretched a magnificent flank along the river. On the right bank something glimmered like a white cliff. They did not talk, they would not have admitted it, but they were moved: this was part of their heritage—the storybook England.

They recrossed the square and came into St. James's Park. A girl in a trench coat, with one arm in a white sling, was walking toward them, carrying her helmet. They gave her a snappy salute.

She stopped, surprised. "Oh—thank you! But it wasn't anything special—I fell over some rubble."

She looked tired, but she was astonishingly pretty. She had merry brown eyes and hair richly dark, almost foreign-looking. But her voice was the most English thing they had ever heard. They stood looking at one another and the park was full of sunrise.

"We've seen the Embankment," said Wallis. "And now we've seen you."

"Big day for us," said Roger.

The honor of a country depends much more on removing its faults than on boasting of its qualities. IMAZZIN

"You're practically the first Londoner we've seen. Do you mind if we kiss you?"

"It's awfully generous of you." She took them in—their bright new wings, their shoulder flashes with "Canada" on them. "Welcome to London," she said, and kissed them both.

She went on, but turned around again, smiling. "I often cross the park at this time," she said.

Roger, quiet Roger, suddenly let out a whoop. "City of London, we are here!"

In the spring of 1941, Wallis got leave and went to Scotland to see the house where Amelia was born. But he found nothing of Amelia: the house was in a stranger's hands now—Sabra's line had died out. Only in the brick-walled garden did he feel a link with the past—this was the garden Amelia had been homesick for, among the stumps of Beckwith.

Mrs. Forget, the owner, would not let him go without tea. "I remember when we took the house, the attic was full of family things. Pictures and letters—heaps of stuff. I think most of it was sent to France. Alix might know; she went to school here."

"Alix?"

"Alix Leslie. She's in London now. Her mother was Allison Bertholet, who married one of the Leslie boys. When he was killed, she went back to France."

He had not tried to keep track of his European cousins, but he surmised that Allison and Alix would be descendants of Anne—whom they thought of in Canada as the lost one, because she had been taken back to Scotland after her mother's death.

"We heard that Allison was killed in France last spring, she was machine-gunned in the road. . . . More tea?"

"Thank you, I must be getting along." At the gate he paused. "You said Alix was in London?"

"Yes. I don't know her address, but she is with the Ministry of Information. She's quite clever, you know; she speaks five languages."

"Well, good-by, Mrs. Forget. Thanks for everything."

His train did not get to London until six. The Ministry of Information probably put up the shutters at five—but there was a chance. He stepped into a call box, the bronze clang of the falling pennies nearly deafened him.

"Miss Alix Leslie, please."

"Sorry, she's gone home."

"Where's home?"

The voice became official. "Sorry, we are not allowed to give out such information."

"Listen," he said, "a fine Ministry of Information this is. I come all the way from Canada to ask you a civil question—and you won't tell me. Listen, if you're as nice as your voice, you'll help me. I've only a few hours and I have to find her. She's my cousin."

The girl laughed. "I am very sorry—we are not allowed to give the information you requested. But if you ask at twenty-six Barham Gardens, Kensington, they might know."

"Thanks, thanks a million."

"Pip-pip," said the girl.

He had dinner. When he came out again, it was beginning to rain; he turned up the collar of his coat and swung aboard a bus. He got down somewhere along Brompton Road and walked along in the darkness. He sensed the bulk of the houses on either side, he could not see them. He found that he was walking quickly, in anticipation. He was going to meet a girl, a cousin and a stranger, someone who had a drop of Amelia's blood.

An air-raid siren began to sound. Well, that was to be expected—it was the sort of night Jerry would come over. He came upon a blue arrow pointing the way to a shelter. He had no wish to go into it—the raiders were flying blind above the clouds, their bombs would be dropped at random. The air was quivering with the vibrations of the sirens; now people passed him running.

He went on. The darkness seemed to be drawing back, he smelled leaves and grass, he was on the edge of some sort of square. In the occasional cast-down flicker of a torch he saw a group of people under the plane trees. They were talking among themselves, they paid no attention to him. A searchlight rayed about and bounced on the underside of a cloud.

"That's done it!" said a voice in disgust. "Now they'll have something to shoot at."

He went up the porch steps. As he hesitated there someone opened the door of No. 26 and came through the blackout curtain.

"Oh, come in quickly," she said. It was a small white-haired lady in a mackintosh.

"Excuse me—can you tell me where I can find Miss Leslie?"

"Alix? Now where is her post? Oh, I know—she has the roof. Straight up three flights, then there is a sort of ladderway and a frightful little door. Mind you don't fall off."

He mounted the stairs and the ladderway, and went through the frightful little door into open air and darkness. He stood still waiting for his eyes to grow used to it. "Alix?" he said to the darkness.

"Yes. Who is this?"

"I'm your cousin Wallis Glendinning from Canada." He said it with satisfaction, he was pleased with the moment.

"Oh. Do be careful—it's so easy to fall off. How do you do, cousin? Give me your hand." A hand took his sleeve and then his hand and pulled him down to a seat beside her. "It's awfully sooty up here."

"Isn't this rather an exposed place?"

"I like roof watching. I suppose I would rather be killed outright than buried in rubble. How did you find me?"

"A girl in your office. Mrs. Forget in Stirling told me you worked in the Ministry of Information."

"You went to Stirling?"

"Sure. I wanted to see Amelia's house. I hoped to find something of her there. But there was nothing."

"I have some of her letters, you know."

"Have you?" He was impressed.

The light from the distant fires had grown, they could see the sea of roofs. From above there came faintly the sound of unsynchronized motors. A mile away something burst into a tower of flame. It was not a bad raid. The fires were soon under control. The sirens sounded "Raiders passed" on a descending

For Collectors of Americana

THUMBACK SIDE CHAIR

As a skillful reproduction of the antique Thumback originally made in New England, this graceful, and delightfully gold stenciled little Windsor will increase in value through the years.

X40-1D

SALEM ROCKER

69-6DC

The original Salem Rocker is highly prized by collectors as an outstanding example of creative American cabinetwork of the early 1800's. You will enjoy the contemporary comfort of this authentic reproduction with its high Windsor back, deftly curved spindles, broad rolled seat, and well-set rockers.

WINDSOR ARM CHAIR

An archer's bow back with seven supporting spindles, vase-shaped outspread legs, and shaped seat, identify this handsome chair as an authentic copy of the earliest Colonial Windsors made in America.

2036-5

PAUL REVERE CHAIR

Named after the fine antique Fan-Back Windsor in the Paul Revere house in Boston. A beautiful reproduction—with the charm of the original, plus modern sturdiness.

X61-1D

These reproductions and others at better furniture and department stores

Since 1857

Nichols & Stone

The Home of Windsor Chairs

How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair. Pages of helpful ideas, interesting illustrations, and complete historical information.

NICHOLS & STONE CO.
Box 34, Gardner, Mass.

Please send me your 32-page booklet "How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair." Enclosed is 25c in coin.

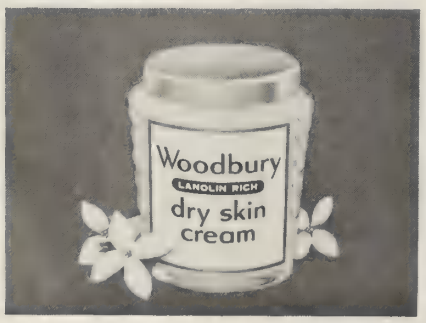
Name_____

Street_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

New deep moisturizing discovery

Stops Dry Skin Problems in these 5 "Danger Zones"



★ Frown lines!
★ Crow's feet!
★ Flaky patches!
★ Expression lines!
★ Crepey throat!

Now flood precious moisture deeper into your dry-lined skin. Age-revealing "danger zones" become less apparent as your skin drinks in the rich benefits of Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. Skin looks, feels smoother.

Woodbury's new deeper moisturizing and deeper softening ingredients help smooth and freshen skin where the look of age strikes! Its remarkable blend of skin softeners and rich, beauty-giving lanolin penetrates deeper than ever before!

Woodbury Dry Skin Cream is a moisturizing cleanser as well as a superb skin softener. Use it for seven days. See "danger zones" become "beauty zones" or your money back! 25¢ to $1.

WOODBURY LANOLIN RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

scale—a cheerful note, either because of its cadence or of its significance. Murmurs of talk and snatches of laughter came up from the square.

"I expect they're having a cup of tea," she said. "As long as the tea holds out, London will."

She led him downstairs to her rooms. "I'm afraid I can't offer you anything to drink but cocoa. Would you like some cocoa?"

He remained silent, looking at her with great interest. She was bundled up in an old black sweater, her hair was tousled. It was a lovely color, more gold than brown. She was not tall, but lissome. She had hazel eyes, very clear, rather grave.

"You have Amelia's hair," he said.

She lighted the gas ring and busied herself making cocoa.

"I don't know much about her European descendants. What happened to Anne after she was taken back to Scotland?"

"She made a runaway match with a Frenchman. The Bertholets were very gay and very rich, they had connections everywhere. Anne's son married Alexei Radetski, a celebrated Hungarian beauty, and they named one of their daughters Allison in honor of the Scottish cousins. When she was in her twenties, Allison, who was my mother, came to Scotland to visit the cousins and fell in love and married here. And so to me—Alix Radetski Bertholet Leslie—the end of the line. Are there many Glendinnings?"

"Lashings of them. You have cousins in Medicine Hat and Rochester, New York, U.S.A."

"It sounds so improbable," Alix said. "Tell me about Amelia's house in Canada."

"Well, it's still there, you know; it's a sort of focal point for the family. People come back every year, they bring their kids to see the secret room. It's on an island, you know ——"

A wave of homesickness for the island swept him—he heard the clatter the wheels made on its log bridge, he saw its fields and woods, the lacy riffles, the willows leaning to their reflections in the river. He tried to picture it for her, the words poured out of him ——

A sort of spasm had shaken her—she had almost yawned. There were smudges of fatigue under her eyes.

He jumped up, conscience-stricken. She had probably had very little sleep for consecutive nights. "I'm sorry—I'm keeping you up." In his eagerness to be gone, he snatched up his coat and knocked over a table of painting materials. When she stooped to pick them up, he stooped, too, and bumped into her. He blushed, he was embarrassed, he was behaving like a country cousin.

"Good night. Thank you very much for letting me roof-watch."

He shook her hand and ran.

Colby, where they were sent to learn about night flying, was a wizard show. It was a satellite field, with a grassy oval and camouflaged blister hangars. It had not lost its country air. Squadron 406 lived in a fine Edwardian house with a dining room overlooking a sunken garden where they played volleyball. It was like living in a fraternity house again—the same bang-and-clatter, a set of standing jokes.

Boomer continued to keep himself in a state of neatness; he carried himself with the aplomb of an air marshal. The service had put a little polish on Burnaby, but he was still the small-town type—simple, sociable, cordial, inquisitive, scandalized and thrilled. When he seemed heading for trouble over too many drinks or a Lonely Heart, Boomer sat on him firmly: "Think of Main Street, Richmond, Ontario, and keep your shirt on."

In 406 morale was high. Their conceit was to be madly wizard in the air, to use RAF slang, never to show surprise or alarm at women or drinks. And to get to London at every opportunity. Roger came in one night from London and spilled Wallis on the floor, bedclothes and all.

"What's the matter with you—are you tight?"

Roger climbed upon the bureau and took a swan dive onto his bed.

"All right, Herr Oberstleutnant, let's see you fly on one wing."

Roger made a spectacular try. He dashed about the room, picking up speed, he took off, windmilling with one arm, and landed with a crash that jarred the building. He lay there looking at the ceiling. "'Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul!'"

"What happened in London?"

"You remember the girl in the park?"

"What girl in what park?"

"The girl we met in St. James's Park the first morning. Her name is Caroline Brooke and she's a sergeant in civil defense. She was crossing the park at six o'clock in the morning just as she said—but it's only on certain days. That's why I missed her."

"You mean you've been getting up at six o'clock to look for her?"

"Yes. She came along and I said, 'What a lot of sleep you've cost me.' And she said, 'Oh, well, come along and have breakfast.' So I did. They live in that great red block of flats near the river, Westminster Place or something. And she took me on an air raid."

"Never mind the raid. Go on about the girl."

"Her father is a sort of swell—a senior civil servant. Her mother is the nicest sort of English. The boy is in the army somewhere, they don't know where. She drives a heavy rescue truck. She took me around to her post and introduced me to her pals—they're all cockneys. The warning went when I was there, they lent me a tin hat and a gas cape and I went out with the truck. It wasn't much of a raid—but the corner of a house had been knocked off and they had to dig down into the rubble looking for survivors. All the time the wall was swaying like a curtain. They shouldn't let girls go into places like that."

"How does she feel?"

"She wouldn't change places with anyone in the world. She is very pro-London."

I dare no more fret than I dare curse and swear.
JOHN WESLEY

Roger and Caroline went through the park and along Birdcage Walk. It was an ordinary English summer day, but they walked in a splendid climate of their own. They were falling in love and they knew it. They loitered, enjoying every moment, not wanting this time to run too quickly.

"What is that curious edifice?"

"Wellington Barracks."

"Where the duke lives, I presume. Caroline ——"

"What?"

"Nothing. Just Caroline. I like to say it."

"There are hundreds and thousands of Carolines."

"Yours is a special one—it has a sound of bells. It should be written in musical notes."

"Very well. Hereafter I shall sign myself with a crotchet and a quaver."

He and Caroline would go someplace to dine, then afterward to the Savoy, or to the Normandy or Hackett's, or places whose names he never knew or forgot.

They were dancing; they danced well together. "You are English, you say. You are most untypical, you know. Your eyes came over with the Armada."

She rolled her Spanish-type eyes to the right, to the left—and crossed them.

"And you dance too well."

"I like that! How do you think English girls dance?"

Another couple whammed into them.

"Each little English girl alive is born into the world keeping English time—hop, hop, crash."

"Roger."

"What?"

"Nothing, I like to say it. Roger, oink-oink ——"

"Silly ass."

Usually at the end of the night she wished to visit the Embankment. They leaned there watching the water shine, a soldier and a girl, among other soldiers, other girls.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 136

LOOK AT BOTH—AND YOU'LL BUY GAS!

See the new

ROPER Gas Range with

Automatic TOP BURNER
Automatic ROTISSERIE
Automatic ROAST CONTROL

for a faster, cleaner, cooler way to cook!

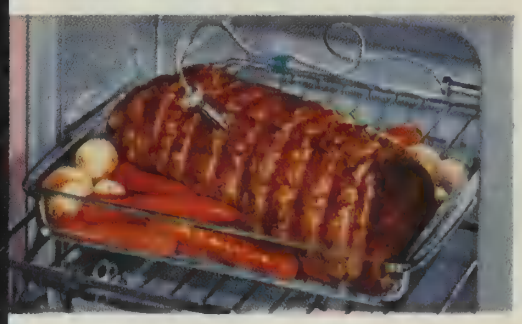
PRODUCT OF GEO. D. ROPER CORP., KANKAKEE, ILL. CABINETS BY REPUBLIC STEEL KITCHENS.



AUTOMATIC! Roper's Burner-with-a-Brain does pot-watching for you. Top burner heat control raises and lowers flame to keep pan at proper cooking temperature. Food can't scorch or boil over. And this amazing top burner also automatically keeps food warm and tender until time to serve.

AUTOMATIC! Roper's Rotomatic Rotisserie turns automatically, bastes food as it cooks. Use the center spit alone for large roasts . . . all three spits for broiled spring chickens, shish-kabob. It's great for entertaining, a wonderful way to enjoy party-cooking "picnic-style" every season of the year.

AUTOMATIC! Roper's Roast Minder takes the guesswork out of meat cookery. Just put the thermometer in the roast and plug it in. Then the oven takes over, turns itself off when the roast is done exactly to your taste. You can even check its progress on a range-top indicator.

FASTER! Burners give high heat in an instant—there's no warm-up wait with Gas! You get perfect control of cooking temperature, too—not just three, five, seven or nine heat levels, but any temperature you want from zero on up. No wonder cooking is faster, easier with Gas.

CLEANER! Gas burns clean—no smoke, no soot. Pots and pans stay shiny; walls keep clean longer. And a modern Gas range is easy to care for, too, because every inch is a cinch to clean. Burners lift out for easy sudsing; oven linings and broilers are easy to wash.

COOLER! No hot spots in the kitchen when you cook with Gas. Heat's off the instant you turn off the burner. Oven windows let you check "doneness" without opening the door. Even broilers cook cool. You can keep the door closed, keep heat in. AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

ONLY GAS does so much more...for so much less!

The NEXT most-important "gold band" in your life!

IT'S MIRRO gold band WATERLESS COOKWARE
THE FINEST ALUMINUM

"With this ring I thee wed," was the never-to-be-forgotten formula that brought you your first most-important "gold band." Now, bringing added pleasure and purpose, comes MIRRO Waterless Cookware . . . so distinctively known by its brilliant "gold band" on each knob.

With these practical pieces, of thick, food-friendly aluminum, you'll do robust, hearty meals the waterless way . . . no old-fashioned drowning of food flavors in too much water. And, between meals, you'll proudly display your precious new pots and pans for all the world to see . . . sure signs that you've earned the degree of "Graduate Wife"! Just say "MIRRO Gold Band Waterless Cookware, please."

Dependable FUEL SAVER in cover signals when to turn heat low, saving fuel and avoiding shrinkage. Unique cover closure forms a tight Vapor-Seal, retaining minerals and vitamins.

your best buy...

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

MIRRO
THE FINEST ALUMINUM

Covered Fry Pan 10⅜" $7.50 | Combination Pan 3-qt. $7.95 | Dutch Oven 5-qt. $7.95 | Strainer Pan 3-qt. $6.50 | Sauce Pan 1-qt. $3.95, 2-qt. $5.95 | Matching Percolator 6-cup $4.95, 8-cup $5.45

Prices slightly higher in West.

MIRRO ALUMINUM COMPANY • MANITOWOC, WIS. • World's Largest Manufacturer of Aluminum Cooking Utensils

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 134

"You love this place, don't you?"

"We've always been Londoners, since the time of the first Charles. I'm a city sparrow and this is my city. . . . London with its stones and bones—may it have mine."

They came to Lychmoor one August morning: twelve Canadians—six pilots, six sergeant navigators. It was a grass field, brown and spongy. Hangars and workshops stood up thickly like factories. Damaged aircraft stood all about, parked anywhere, and encroaching upon the perimeter track was a motley collection of trucks and road engines. They stared—they had never seen a flying field like this.

Wallis felt a cold touch of apprehension.

"What's the matter?" asked Roger. "You no like?"

"I no like."

The provost sergeant appeared. "Hofficer in charge of the party to report to the station commander."

"Flight Lieutenant Glendinning, sir. Reporting from Colby."

Group Captain Crutchley was a small man with a large head, a moon face and a bristling mustache. He looked at Wallis with a supercilious stare and Wallis felt the shock of the stranger who finds himself disliked, not for anything he has done but for what he is.

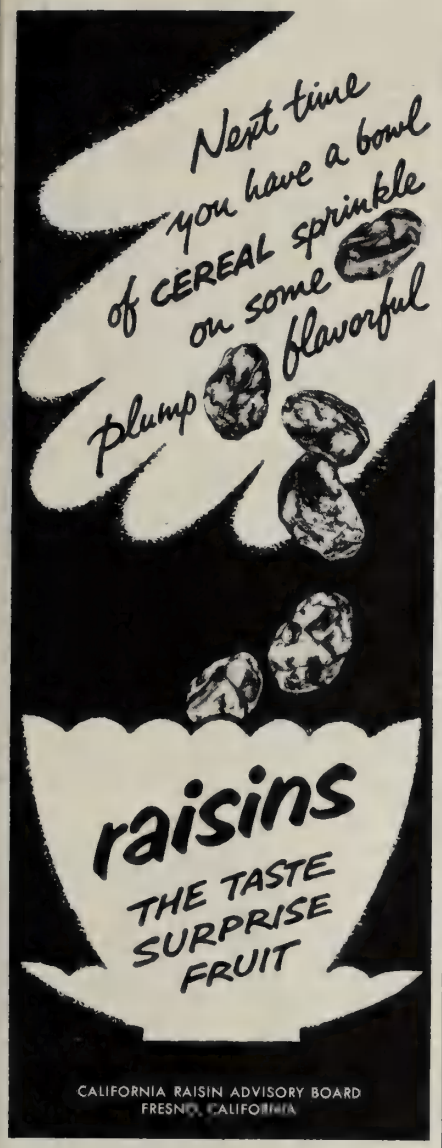
"Ah, yes, Colby—one of the newer establishments. You will find things different here—here we have a few rules. You and your brother officers will be expected at all times to dress and comport yourselves like gentlemen. Your first duty will be to make yourself acquainted with the standing orders of this station. Is that clear?"

"Yes, sir."

Afterward he was able to understand Lychmoor but not to forgive it. It had been set down in a desolate place, it was ugly beyond necessity, it represented the service mind at its most rigid. It was not a flying field so much as an institution devoted to the idea of discipline. There were few games and fewer amenities—Group Captain Crutchley did not believe in amenities for the other ranks.

The new squadron began to take shape. People were arriving—among them Squadron Leader Hyssop, the acting C.O., and Squadron Leader Dale, who had B flight and the Canadians. "I'm the biggest fraud in the service," said Dale pleasantly. "I don't know a thing about military routine—if it looks cross, I salute it. You, Rivard, and you, Glendinning, will have to do most of the training."

Candy Easter Eggs



STUART

For pure enchantment: delicious fondant eggs with a bittersweet-chocolate or pastel-candy coating.

Could the Easter bunny himself turn out a more elegant array of decorated eggs? With this recipe—the inspiration of Mrs. Ardis Shoemaker, of Tyrone, Pennsylvania—you may be his accomplice, confecting them simply and inexpensively at home.

FONDANT EGGS: Mix together 6 tablespoons instant mashed potato prepared according to package directions, 2 tablespoons butter, 1½ teaspoons peppermint extract, ¼ teaspoon salt. Add ⅔ box of confectioners' sugar—about 2⅔ cups. Blend well. Add the remainder of the box of sugar gradually. If mixture becomes too stiff, work in the sugar on a board. Pat mixture into a ball. Chill well. (This is very important.) Pinch pieces from chilled ball in size desired and shape into eggs. Flatten the bottom of each slightly. Place on wax paper on a tray and chill. Cover eggs with dipping chocolate, using directions on package. Or dip in standard fondant, melted and tinted with food coloring. Drain on a wire rack. Chill until set. Then decorate with ornamental frosting.

FOR NUT OR COCONUT EGGS: Flavor with almond extract in place of peppermint. After sugar is added, work in 1 cup chopped nuts or 1 cup finely chopped coconut.

A bad time was about to begin, a time which would put an end to most of their boyishness, and yet it began hopefully. Hyssop and Dale were first-class people, the pilots were keen, and there was a rumor that they were to get the new De Havilland fighter-bomber, the Mosquito.

Their new aircraft began to arrive. Instead of the Mosquitoes they had hoped for, they were Beaufighters, equipped with cathode-ray tubes for "seeing" at night. They had a high wing loading; with the extra equipment, they were unstable fore and aft. Their first flights were nerve-racking efforts to get up, fly level and get down again.

Hyssop had an interview with the station commander.

"Sir, we are having trouble with our night landings."

"What's the matter?"

"Lack of room, sir, mostly. I feel that the approaches are unnecessarily impeded. Road vehicles left on the perimeter where they have no business to be. That sort of thing."

"That is the province of the ground-control officer. You know space is at a premium here—I won't interfere. What's the matter with your pilots?"

"We are flying Beaus, sir. They weigh ten tons loaded and they come squashing down at eight miles an hour. Very difficult to control near the ground and on it. We should be happier if those rifle pits were filled in and those ghastly little huts along the edge were demolished."

Group Captain Crutchley bristled. "Those rifle pits were dug—by order—for the RAF regiment. Those ghastly little huts, as you term them, were devised by me as safe places to store ammunition and explosives. In the future, Hyssop, I shall be glad if you will confine yourself to matters within your jurisdiction."

A few days later, Hyssop was transferred.

Exercises in night interception proceeded. They wandered the blind sky trying to track other aircraft by instrument. They got lost, they found themselves, they got down somehow. In the matter of casualties, they had amazing luck, but the feeling of tension grew—everyone knew it was only a matter of time.

Their good luck came to an end, as it was bound to do. Ericksen and Carteret went to hospital when their aircraft crashed into a road engine left on the perimeter. Tucker and Pringle flew their aircraft into the ground and were killed. Markley and Kerr lost their lives on the eastern approach. They lost Mike Crandall, Bob Early, Sid Fleury and Willy White in a shocking accident. They had been practicing interceptions in the dusk and they collided in mid-air.

"They're going to throw us all away," said Burnaby bitterly.

They had just come back from the funeral. Wallis had lain down, as he was, on his cot; he knew now he was tired to the danger point. Last night he had found himself flying at 600 feet with no recollection of coming down from patrol height.

"You, Wallis, and you, Boomer, may make it. The rest of us have had it." Burnaby was no longer recognizable as the friendly small-town type. He was taut and twitchy, his eyes had a tendency to stare.

"Oh, rot!" said Boomer. "It's these funerals. They upset everybody."

"I came over here to shoot Germans. The people I'd like to shoot are right here on this station. Good old sadistic Provost Sergeant Wilsher, and good old night fighter Group Captain Crutchley."

"Crutchley must be worth nearly a squadron—to the Germans," said Roger.

"I'll tell you how I'm going to die," said Burnaby. "I'll be coming in over the village—I'll throttle back and one engine will cut out. The Beau will roll over on its back—and that'll be it."

Wallis had just fallen asleep when a torch shone in his face. He winced away from the light.

"Wanted at the watch office, sir."

He rolled out automatically, grabbing his cap and torch. He ran across the dark field.

The watch office was lighted by only small points of light here and there. The controller sat at his table before his microphone. From the speaker on the wall poured a frightened babble of words.

"It's Twistleton—he's panicked," said the controller. "I can't speak to him—he reported his instruments are shot ——"

The voice came pouring from the wall transmitter, shameless in fear. "Lychmoor—Lychmoor—can't you hear me? I'm in trouble—answer me—answer me ——"

Wallis grabbed the microphone. "Twiss, this is Glendinning. We're receiving you loud and clear, we're receiving you. We'll get you down—you're not far away. Don't try to home—fly straight and level. If you can see a star or a beacon, steer by it. Keep her straight and level. Over to you, Twiss."

"Hello, Glendinning, hello, Glendinning!" The voice was making a great effort to be calm. "I'm in trouble. Instruments unserviceable. Air-speed indicator not constant, compass wheeling. She's pitching—will I jump? Tell me, should I jump?"

"Twiss, don't jump—you're not far from the field. I can hear your engines. Just hang on, boy, we'll get you help. Just try to keep her level."

His navigator, Warrant Officer Warre, came in.

"Jimmy, get our aircraft started. . . . Listen, Twiss, we're coming to get you. Do you understand? Over."

"Yes, what will I do?"

"Try to hold her in a ten-degree turn—don't hurry it. Have your sergeant keep switching off and on your lights. Further instruction from the air. Leave radio at receive. Understood?"

They rose through the ground haze, the station gave them interception bearings. They might have flown around for hours, but they had luck, they spotted the flashing lights almost at once.

"Here we are, Twiss. Don't answer—we're coming up on your right-hand wing. You will see our lights. Over."

"I see you now."

He led Twiss around on the homing course. Both aircraft were flying straight and level. "Doing fine," said Wallis. "There's the station dead ahead. I'm going in ahead of you, follow my taillight, make sure it stays in the same place. At two hundred feet I'm pulling up and out of your way—just let her sink—keep the same angle—let the lights come up to you and get that stick back—and you're down."

They led the other Beaufighter into the landing pattern, then pulled up and went round again. They saw Twistleton's lights cross the field, then they lost him.

"Did he look all right?"

Instead of loving your enemies, treat your friends a little better.

EDGAR WATSON HOWE

"Sure was high-tailing it," said Jimmy.

They landed. The other Beau seemed to have disappeared. Then they saw a knot of excitement away off to the side of the field, among the buildings. They rushed over in the jeep and there in the car park stood the Beau looking huge with a little saloon car between its wheels. It looked like a great cat with a mouse. Twistleton and his sergeant had fallen out and were jumping about and hitting each other and laughing hysterically.

The Beau had landed too fast, overrun the perimeter track, skimmed along a line of parked aircraft without touching one. Then it had swerved, broken through a guardrail and pranged the only car in the park.

At any other station Twistleton would have got off with a dressing down and a bill for the damage to the car, but this was at Lychmoor, where there was no good will and every molehill was made into a mountain. The station adjutant was instructed to call a Board of Inquiry.

Wallis was called to give his evidence.

"Mr. Glendinning, you have heard the statement of Pilot Officer Twistleton that he considered his instruments to be unserviceable. You have heard the evidence of the crew chief who tested them later and found them in order. Can you shed any light on this discrepancy?"

"Instruments often go unserviceable for short periods in the air, sir."

"For what reason? Apart from mechanical failure, which seems to be ruled out here."

"Air turbulence. Sudden maneuvers."

"You were flying that night. Was the air, in fact, turbulent?"

"No, sir."

"Then you suggest that instrument failure might have been due to sudden maneuvers?"

"It is a possibility, sir."

"By the way, I see that you logged your—ah—flight as an equipment test. Did you, in fact, test any equipment?"

"No, sir."

"Then why did you describe it as an equipment test?"

"I have no answer to that, sir."

"I point out that whatever your motives were, it caused you to make a false entry in an official document. However, I think we can leave that to your commanding officer. Any further questions, gentlemen?"

The finding of the board was simply that the accident was due to pilot error—there was no suggestion of disciplinary action. The station commander, having made his point and played his game of cat-and-mouse, was content to let the mouse go.

As soon as he was released from the board room, Wallis had gone to his quarters and written out his request for transfer. After the findings of the board had been promulgated, the squadron C.O. sent for him.

"I'm going to ask you to withdraw your request. I have three or four pilots in this squadron who will make it or break it, and you are one of them. I should add that personally I should be sorry to see you go. Well?"

The C.O. was not an easy man to know. He had been plucked from a desert fighting squadron just as he was making his reputation; he must have been livid with chagrin and disappointment, but he never showed his feelings about it.

The good ones always had you. "I withdraw it, sir."

The C.O. tore it up and dropped it into the basket.

"What a chump you are, Glendinning," he said, indicating that the official interview was over. "You know what we are trying to do here. We are trying to develop a technique of enemy interception at night. So—we are going to get on with it and people will be killed and people like Twistleton will be hurt. There never was a worth-while job done without masses of people getting in the way."

"I don't mind a war, sir. It's Crutchley's war I don't like."

"No one pretends discipline is fun. It made Crutchley—it also made the service. And don't you forget it."

He lifted a handful of papers from his basket.

"And what have we here? A mass of bumff from the M.O. Seems that one of my flight leaders, who should be setting a good example to the troops, has not had his shots."

"Those shots mean a loss of forty-eight hours' flying time. I can't spare it, sir."

"You are going to spare it now. You are herewith suspended from flying duties for seven days. And by a striking coincidence, you are now starting seven days' leave. Get those shots and off you go."

When he got to London, he phoned Alix. "I have some leave. Will you come out with me?"

"I'd like to. Where shall I meet you?"

"Wherever you like." He said the first place that came into his head. "The Savoy?"

He waited for her in the lounge of the hotel. He was restless, not in a good mood. He prowled around, too tense to sit, watching the English at their affairs. So this was where they were keeping the army. Some of them looked very distinguished in their red tabs—and why shouldn't they? They lived well and kept out of the weather. Well, it was their island. As far as he was concerned, they were welcome to it.

"Hello." Alix was beside him. "You were fathoms deep."

He was taken by surprise. He had expected the girl on the roof, a simple small girl with tousled hair. Now dressed for dinner, she was very smart, very Bertholet-Radetski. In the restaurant, she talked on, socially competent, about food, English food, war food. She studied the wine list. He ordered Scotch and he noticed that it had an odd metallic taste, as if there was something wrong with the soda.

The orchestra was playing familiar American tunes. He knew that he danced well; as they drifted about the floor as easily as smoke, he looked at the other couples and asked himself why the English upper classes bothered to go through the motions. "Listen, that is a South American rhythm. There should be a law forbidding the English to dance to it."

"What is the matter?" she asked. "You have hardly eaten anything. You are quite the best dancer I have ever danced with, but you seem to get no pleasure out of it. Would you like to go?"

"Perhaps we'd better." He realized now that this was more than a black mood—he was feeling very odd. The surroundings were alternately blurred and clear, as if his eyes were not focusing properly; he felt on the verge of being sick.

There was one thing about the Savoy—you could always get a taxi. But it was a time of petrol shortage and the driver made a difficulty about driving to Kensington. Wallis felt an angry, violent impulse to jerk him out of his cab and hit him. He thrust a pound note at him and told him brusquely to get on with it. They drove in silence, she in her corner, he in his.

They were in the square. He jumped out and sudden movement finished him. He felt the earth rising up at him. . . .

He came back to consciousness and found himself sitting against the sand bin. He could smell the leaves on the plane trees. The taxi had gone.

"It was those shots," he said.

"What shots?"

"I had to take them this morning." The M.O. had said there would be a reaction; it seemed a long time ago. He got up cautiously. "I'm very sorry."

"It's two flights up—can you walk that far?"

When they got to her rooms he saw himself in the mirror; he was pale and his eyes looked like two holes burned in a blanket. She made him a cup of tea.

"The buses stop at midnight."

"A walk will do me good."

"You aren't very sensible, are you? You are cold and you are sweating. I'll make a bed on the sofa and you can stay here."

She came in when he was in bed. "Good night," she said and turned off the light.

"Come here, please." In the dark he found her hand; she let him take it without willingness. He guessed she was not pleased—she probably did not like men who passed out and went to sleep on her sofa.

"I'm sorry I spoiled your evening. Spoiled mine too. It wasn't only the shots. I'm at a bad place ——"

But what could he say of Lychmoor—and Twistleton, probably dead drunk somewhere—and the malice that kills? Nothing that she would understand.

"Good night."

He slept until noon and wakened to find the sun pouring in the window.

"Morning," she said. "I hope you're feeling better." She was moving around, setting a tray. She was wearing her old black sweater.

"It's a pity it's Sunday and the shops are closed. Otherwise we might go shopping and buy you a sweater."

"Really!"

"Cousin."

"Oh, very well, cousin."

It was the English Sunday-morning breakfast of the war—tea and tomatoes, bacon and toast. "Now you must do something about that beard while I wash up."

He came back, very spruce, shaved and brushed. He was six feet tall, he had the figure of an athlete.

"What is it?" he asked because she looked at him.

"I was curious about Amelia's great-great-grandson," she told him. "Shall we go down to the square?"

The iron railings which had protected it were gone, and the flower beds neglected. But there were grass and leaves and sunlight. They sat down on a bench.

"Once I had a collie. And he got pneumonia and he had to wear a sweater and his was smarter than yours."

She let out a sudden snort of laughter like a child. After that, things were better between them.

"Now what—do you have to go back to Lychmoor?"

"Not for a week. I'm grounded."

"Why?"

"Fatigue."

"You aren't very sensible, are you? You might have said, 'I don't feel very well and I'm filled with various injections.' And we could have sat down quietly somewhere."

"Then I wouldn't have slept on your sofa. I'm glad I did everything wrong." He tilted his face to the sun and closed his eyes.

"How are you going to spend your leave?"

"Where would you go if you had a week's leave?"

She thought about it. "I should go to Exeter and take a walk on the moors."

"All right, let's do that. Will you come with me?" He turned his head to look at her. "It would be a wonderful thing for me."

"Not for a week. But for the afternoon."

They went to Wimbledon Common and wandered through the glades. They sat down among the bracken and he stretched out and she thought he had fallen asleep. A flight of Spitfires passed very high and he said, "The daylight boys."

*...get curtains of HATHAWAY DACRON† with THREADLOCK

Here's the marquisette curtain you can practically build your home around! Threadlock is the new wonder weave that gives curtains of Hathaway Dacron marquisette the longest life possible. It locks every thread in place as no other weave can do . . . locks in delicate beauty, long life and easy care. And wait till you wash it! It comes clean in tub or machine . . . returns smoothly to action with little or no ironing. See Hathaway Dacron with Threadlock and you'll see what we mean!

a 'self controlled' fabric by

BERKSHIRE BH HATHAWAY

"Do you like flying at night?"

"At first you hate it, then it has a fascination. You get the curious feeling that you are held in a void while the earth turns below you."

"Is it dangerous?"

"Last week we lost two pilots and two navigators," he told her. "This week we will lose two more."

"But that's shocking!"

"Cheap at the price, if night interception can be made to work." He rolled over on his elbow and studied her face until her color rose. "You have the loveliest tints in your skin."

"I know how I look—like an apple."

"And when you are displeased, you glower. At least, you try to. I admire you very much, cousin."

"Thank you, cousin; you should see me when I'm a Scotch terrier." She rose and picked up her mackintosh. "Time to be going. What will you do about your leave?"

"I have it all planned. Monday night I'll ask Alix to go to a movie. Tuesday night I'll ask Alix to go to a concert. Wednesday night I'll ask Alix to go wining and dining ——"

She looked at him somewhat troubled. "I might have a few days off ——"

His face lit up, he clapped his hands on her shoulders. "Atta baby!" Then he pulled his upper lip down and said woodenly, "Good show. Saved my life. Must try to show decent composure."

"Listen, please ——"

"I know. Terms. I want you—on any terms. I say, Leslie, old girl, we're going to have fun!"

She had not been to Exeter before; she found it charming. Its old tranquil buildings still stood. She made the mistake of buying Wallis a guidebook—in ten minutes he had read it from cover to cover and was quoting it glibly and unreliably. "'Isca Damnoniorum occupied the site in ancient times. There were two sisters—Isca and Tisca. . . . William of Orange landed here in 1688. Complained of the whiska.'"

"Well, how was I to know? I thought Canadians always wanted to improve their minds."

They rambled inconsequentially. They found Horse Lane and the canal; they came upon the ruins of a Norman castle and the old town wall. They stayed at the Royal Clarence, which was filled with army people and visiting wives.

At night they walked in the Close. There was misty moonlight; the cathedral seemed to float free in elation against the sky. The men who had built it had believed in the glory of Almighty God.

"You can see they were tremendously excited about it," she said.

"Take my arm, old boy," he said. "There's a heavy dew, you might trip on it. How do you stand on Leofric?"

"Where I have always stood. In complete ignorance."

"The Chapter House contains the famous Exeter Book given by Leofric to the cathedral. . . . So much for Leofric. Did you notice the couple in the pub—he was wearing brown corduroys, she had a splash of powder on her nose, she couldn't keep her eyes off him?"

"It's a difficult time for love."

"Don't you believe it. This is the climate love thrives in. Everyone raised a notch in pitch, a bit more perceptive, more willing to love."

They walked up and down.

"I really know very little about you," he said. "I know of course you are a great girl on a roof—calm as an apple and as brave as a lion. I know that you weigh about eight stone—and I take exception to that way of putting it. Only the English would say that about a small girl full of refined thoughts. Why can't they just say, 'She's a nice kid, she weighs about twelve ounces,' instead of spreading it round that she's as solid as rocks?"

They had adjoining rooms; they said good night in the hall.

She undressed and washed and attended to the blackout. For a moment she stood looking out over the city, then she jumped in between the sheets. There was a scratching at her door.

"Who is it?"

"Me," he said. "Please."

She opened the door. He stood there in his dressing gown, his hair brushed, looking hopeful.

"There's a mouse in my room. I don't like to put him out—he might not be able to get another room, and he seems a very decent sort. I wonder if I could come in with you."

"I'm afraid not. But you can put him in here; I rather like mice."

"Good night, Leslie, old chap."

"Good night, Glendinning, old boy."

They took the bus to Torquay and now it was she who benefited by the change. Here were Spanish pines and palm trees and stone steps curving up to mossy gardens—a thousand things to remind her of another time and another world. She was glad that she had brought her paints. Everywhere there were color and form and texture, and the earth was dappled. The shadows of the clouds sailed across the hillsides; the light made her tipsy.

"Look, Glendinning, look! Don't sit there like a lump! Look there! And there!"

The moors around Okehampton were yellow with the gorse. They were stared at by black-faced sheep, otherwise they seemed to have the world to themselves. She set up her easel and painted, there was never time enough; she always wanted a few minutes more. If she stayed up later than ten she found herself yawning fit to crack her jaws. And she slept dreamlessly, she simply fell into unconsciousness.

She left her door unlocked now; she knew he would find some excuse to come in. She reckoned he would never run out of excuses. Now she got into bed and left the window and the blackout to him. He scratched and came in.

"A serious situation has arisen."

"Hand me that little pot, please, Wallis." She put on cold cream. "Let me think—there is a large commercial in your bed?"

"Much more serious—a distinguished statesman. He was incognito, also in despair. 'Glendinning,' he said to me, 'I'm simply in despair. I must have a good night's rest—the fate of the nation depends on it—and they have mislaid my bed.' I said, 'Have mine, sir,' and he said, 'Glendinning, you are a noble fellow'—and in he popped."

"Noble—but alas, bedless."

"Surely I can count on the co-operation of other loyal subjects."

"Very well. I will share my bed with you. You may have the top blanket. Take it with you."

"Good night, Leslie, old thing."

"Good night, Glendinning, old chap."

There was one day as vivid as a jewel.

They took a bus which happened along—it was going to Clovelly. A lane turning off the road looked inviting—they asked the driver to throw their bags off at the depot and got down. The lane dwindled to a cart track on the grass. They had made a rule: when you found a track on the grass you must follow it. It led them to a forest of oak trees, very old and very silent. The floor was of bracken and the light slanted down through the aisles in gold and brown. Then through the trees they saw the sea—most perfectly blue. They went on and came out on the summit of a cliff and there before them was the Bristol Channel and a toy vessel towing a balloon with a toy Wellington circling overhead.

They sat down, and when she had looked her fill she poked him. "You're not paying attention. Look!"

"I see."

"Not properly. When you look like that, like a red Indian, I know you are hiding something. You might as well tell me."

He turned to see her face. He remembered the first time he had seen it, with tousled hair and smudges of fatigue. Now it was vivid, with fine brows raised over her hazel eyes.

"I'm in love with you."

Her expression turned to dismay.

"I'm in love with you. It's a very odd feeling. I knew I was on the verge. Then a moment ago, when you saw the sea and your heart sprang right into your eyes ——"

This was monstrous—she felt as if the roof had fallen in on her. She burst out in vexation, "Wallis, this is horrible!"

He was quite cheerful. "Here's this guy, he's in love with a dame. Horrible."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 143

ON THE TIP OF THE TONGUE

By SUZANNE DOUGLASS

There is no nourishment in verbs,
Nouns don't have much flavor;
Prepositions are quite flat;
Pronouns have no savor.

Adjectives have little spice;
Adverbs haven't any.
Words are pretty tasteless things;
I know, I've eaten many.

There's nothing accidental about the fashion-frosted fit and walking comfort of Foot Saver Shoes. Every pair is painstakingly designed to be fittingly yours Foot Saver's exclusive Shortback® last insures snug heel fit, yet permits caressing foot freedom.

For free Spring Style Booklet and name of nearest Foot Saver dealer write: 33 West Cherry Street, Columbus 15, Ohio

Footsaver Shoes for men are manufactured by Commonwealth Shoe and Leather Co., Whitman, Mass.

Soap dries your skin, but

DOVE creams your skin while you wash

New bath and toilet bar is one-quarter cleansing cream.

BRAND-NEW FORMULA! DOVE is a completely new formula—DOVE creams your skin while you wash. No more of that dry feeling you get after using soap.

RAINWATER-MILD! DOVE has none of the harsh alkalinity of soap. You could wash with mild DOVE twenty times a day—no matter how sensitive your skin!

LATHERS IN HARD WATER! DOVE gives you rich lather, even in hard water. And never leaves a bathtub ring.

CLEANS DEEP INTO PORES. Deeper than any cream, any soap, any liquid cleanser. Lifts out every trace of grime or stale make-up! Leaves your skin so clean.

NEW SHAPE. DOVE is sculptured to fit your hand.

MORE CREAM THAN ANY SOAP. One-quarter of every bar of DOVE is rich cleansing cream.

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll like DOVE for your face, your hands, all of you—or we'll give you back every penny you paid.

Won't you have a try-on of Avon colognes. You'll love them!

"Avon Calling" means a scene like this, in the comfort and privacy of your own living room, with your Avon Representative inviting you to have a cologne try-on.

The person who enjoys the cologne you wear more than anyone in the world is you. Try wearing an Avon cologne every minute of every day—and night—and see what a lift it will give you! People around you will like it, too. And whether you prefer to spray it on or splash it on, there's a wide variety of enchanting Avon fragrances that will make you very happy. Your Avon Representative invites you to have a try-on of several colognes so you can choose the ones you like best. Expect her to call soon!

IF YOU WISH AN AVON REPRESENTATIVE TO CALL, PLEASE CONSULT YOUR PHONE DIRECTORY.

AVON cosmetics

RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVAILABLE ONLY THROUGH YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE WHO CALLS AT YOUR HOME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

"Even if it were true—I can't do anything bout it. I won't tell you why—I can't love ou."

"Well, who asked you to?" he said easily. Love—at this stage—is a very rewarding exerience. . . . Somebody has been up and round polishing things, everything is shining ke fish scales. . . . What happened to you?"

"I won't talk about it."

"Are you experienced in love?"

"I am quite hard. I have been hurt enough. am not going to hurt anyone—or be hurt gain."

"I suppose you are experienced. I'm not," told her. "But I doubt if experience would elp me much. It doesn't need experience to t drowned."

"It's not worth the fish scales."

"Sure it is—it's the timing that bothers me. m in a very shaky business. I need all my its about me. Now my head will be full of ctures—Alix painting, Alix putting on cold eam ——"

They came to the end of the breakwater. he gulls made sailing shapes against the sky. he gray water rose and fell and brought the old, clean breath of the sea.

"You know, I was half in love with you bere I saw you. Because of Amelia. The night met you, before I saw you—walking along in e streets in the blackout—I felt a sort of ation. As if something had gone ahead of e and come back and reported, 'Oh, boy, e's wonderful!' As soon as I saw you I knew ou were of the same stuff as Amelia."

"I should like to go back to London. I on't want you to come with me."

To make the London connection, she found she would have to take an early bus. That evening after she had packed, she tapped on his door. "I will be gone before you are up. I have come to say good-by."

"Come in. Now that you are here, we can light the fire." It was laid with twigs and pine cones, it burst out roaring and snapping. Outside they could hear the wind beginning to blow, and a sound of motors.

"This is a pretty room," she said.

"Everything for lovers. Firelight—and the wind outside."

She came slowly to where he was sitting. "Thank you for the mouse and the jokes. Good-by, Wallis. You can kiss me if you want."

He pulled her down on his knees. "Ninestone Alix."

"Why do you keep harping on my weight in that ridiculous way? I'm quite normal."

"We haven't much time. Just tonight. How long does it take to move a French Scotty?"

"It's bad luck, Wallis—heart like a stone."

"In that case it may take a little longer. All the arts of love must be compressed. Only a few moments to make verses for you. 'Alix, thy beauty is to me like those Nicean barks of yore ——'"

"I must go."

"You don't mind my borrowing? All lovers borrow. 'Alix Muller on a summer's day —— tee-legged, tow-legged, bow-legged Alix ——'"

He brought her mouth to his and kissed her.

Alix had been dining with Wing Commander Adrian Foulkes. He had known her family, he had been very good to her when she came to London. He was older than she, with formal manners and pale precise features. With his habits and tastes he should have derived from a long line of scholars; instead, he was a scion of hard-drinking, fox-hunting squires. He was in the Intelligence; he had authority; Alix gathered that his modest rank was part of his camouflage.

He had asked her some time ago to be his mistress—formally, making the matter as clear as if it were a marriage settlement. She would have her own place, furnished with beautiful objects; she could keep her job, if she wished, she could do as she liked, but he wanted to share part of her life. "I wish I could make you an offer of marriage, but you know that that is out of the question."

She knew Laurette, his wife, and anyone knowing the history of that disastrous marriage could not but feel sympathy for him. She had not evaded the issue, she had simply postponed the decision.

"They are giving me a new job." He rarely mentioned his work; she was surprised that he spoke of it now. "We need recruits. I wonder if you would care to join us? It would mean—eventually—joining the Women's Auxiliary Air Force."

"I thought you didn't approve of women in the services."

"I don't, but we need some like you. Rather desperately."

But the thought of the pigeonholes of the Air Ministry repelled her. "I think I should stay where I am."

Roger waylaid Caroline in St. James's Park. He stepped from behind a tree and said "Boo!" She jumped with pleasure.

"How long have you got?"

"Two hours."

"Two whole hours! What shall we do?"

"I have a plan. I'd like to sit here and look at you."

They sat in the park chairs. He gave a sigh and stretched out.

"You look tired."

"Not much sleep up our way. . . . Caro."

"What?"

"Nothing. Caro with a crotchet and a quaver. I didn't know what a crotchet and a quaver were. I looked it up; we say, 'quarter note, eighth note.'"

"Go to sleep, if you want."

"I'm not sleeping, I'm as bright as a button."

"Your head is nodding like a daisy."

"You think because my eyes are shut, I'm sleeping. I fool lots of people that way. Then I make my spring—like a tiger."

"And fall out of bed?"

"All right. I'm in bed and asleep. I'm having a beautiful dream. I've just met Caro in the park—I'm about to ask her a very important question."

"No, you mustn't."

People were sitting in the chairs, people were walking. The western light was bright so that the green of the grass was noticeable and shadows walked with their people—almost a stagy light. The air-raid siren at Westminster started up, crescendo. For a moment the scene remained. The sound waves attacked it, shrill, insistent. A crocodile of children led by a young teacher changed direction and inclined toward the slit trenches. People began to move, without haste or panic. Like veterans.

"Go on," said Caroline. "Ask."

"Will you marry me?"

They sat there hand in hand.

"Why didn't you want me to ask?"

"So much depended on the time and the place. When the siren went, I knew it was the time and place for me. Did I say I would? I'd like to."

Wallis walked along the edge of the field. There were problems pressing on him: problems of personnel, equipment, the problem of Bob Burnaby now growing acute—he had to make up his mind about him ——

He stopped. "Good heavens, where did you spring from?"

Dale was standing there, smiling. He was a group captain now with a show of his own. "I wanted to see my old B flight—and my insubordinate Canadians. But first I want to talk to you. Let's go somewhere out of sight."

They walked up and down behind the flight hut.

"I'm at Ford," said Dale. "Wizard show. I can't tell you what we're doing because it's supposed to be hush-hush. We have Mosquitoes, Spits and long-range Hurricanes. And we're encouraged to have weird ideas. Nobody knows quite what we're up to—so everybody respects us and our priority is colossal. I'm looking for another pilot, a tough egg with a flair. In fact, someone like you. That's why I'm here—do you want the job?"

Here it was, out of the blue, the longed-for escape. He sniffed the clear air of freedom—

NEXT MONTH

EDNA FERBER'S NEW NOVEL BEGINS AS A SERIAL

"The white fox parka with its hood of white wolf was a fitting frame for the girl's brilliant face." This is Chris Storm, heroine of "Ice Palace." The author of "Giant" tells the story of Chris, a girl some people called "too dazzling," and two men who loved her and fought for her.

WHY ARE HUSBANDS UNFAITHFUL?

"Several of us have husbands who must travel for weeks at a time on business," says a letter to Dr. Clifford Adams. "One woman argued that if a husband went astray it could only mean his wife was not affectionate." Doctor Adams replies, citing some "errors of attitude" on the part of wives. "Making Marriage Work."

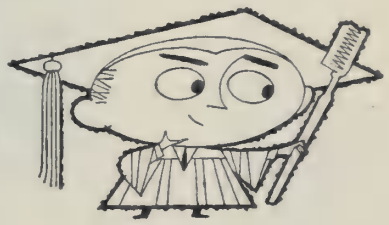
THIS PARTY DINNER COSTS ONLY $1 A PERSON. IT'S DELICIOUS!

Main dish of the "miracle menu" is made with tender layers of veal and ham, baked in a mushroom sauce flavored with orégano. It's easy to prepare and so is the beautiful dessert, Bing Cherry Frost. Margaretta Stevenson tells how to serve eight for less than $10.

ON PAROLE AT THE AGE OF 6. THEN NINE YEARS LATER . . .

Richard, "the holy terror," had an 80-page police record when Policeman Jack Shaw told his wife, "Honey, we've got a new son." The Shaws, of Beaumont, California, with three children and a policeman's salary ($385 monthly) to live on, have taken several troubled children into their home. Next installment of How America Lives.

WHAT'S THE "CHANEL LOOK" IN HAIRDOS?



It's short, brushed up, and with or without bangs—one of seven new styles Dawn Crowell Norman describes and tells how to arrange to put you in fashion . . . prettily.

"GRAB HER," SAID THE EARL, "AND SHOWER KISSES ON HER FACE."

The Fifth Earl of Ickenham only wanted to be helpful when he advised (1) the butler, (2) his nephew, Johnny and (3) pretty Barbara Crowe, career girl, how to solve their romantic difficulties. "Cocktail Time," by P. G. Wodehouse, tells what happened. It's complete, condensed in this issue.

"Spring Trousseau," wardrobe for the bride with photographs in full colors, and four more pages of fashion news, short stories, Dr. Spock's page for mothers and many, many other features, all coming

IN THE APRIL JOURNAL

Can you pass this 1-minute test on

Dental Care?

The results may surprise you!

1. What is the greatest cause of tooth loss after age 35?

a. Decay
b. Gum troubles
c. Accidents

ANS: b. Gum troubles cause 53% of tooth loss after 35 and 37% of all tooth loss.

2. Dentists say your best defense is:

a. An antiseptic mouth wash
b. Antibiotic tooth paste
c. Regular daily care at home

ANS: c. Daily home care is the best way to keep teeth and gums healthy.

3. To brush thoroughly, you should:

a. Use a stiff brush
b. Use a gentle brush on gums as well as teeth
c. Bear down hard

ANS: b. Use the gentle-action Oral B for both teeth and gums. To neglect either means trouble.

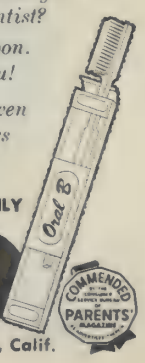
4. Massaging gums with a toothbrush is:

a. Good for your gums
b. Bad for your gums
c. A waste of time

ANS: a. Gentle daily massage with the proper brush is basic for healthy gums.

5. Dentists recommend the specially designed Oral B Toothbrush because:

a. It has softer, finer nylon bristles
b. It protects both teeth and gums
c. It cleans easily and safely



ANS: Score 20 points for a, b, or c. Oral B has all the answers for gum line protection.

TAKE 20 POINTS FOR EACH CORRECT ANSWER

100-80	Exceptionally well-informed on the subject. Take a bow!
80-60	Well above average, but you learned something, didn't you?
60-40	When was the last time you talked with your dentist?
40 or less	See your dentist soon. He has news for you!

How did you do? You'll do even better with an Oral B. Get yours at the nearest drug counter.

IN 3 SIZES FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Oral B

© ORAL B COMPANY, San Jose, Calif.

JOHN

A real gentleman, with an eye for beauty.

MARY

A real beauty, with a flair for fashion.

MOJUD hosiery

The fashion that turns a leg into a legend!

MOJUD®
HOSIERY
division of Chester H. Roth Co., Inc., Licensed Manufacturer ®

WIN A EUROPEAN VACATION FOR TWO in MOJUD'S "FAMOUS PAIRS" GIVEAWAY!
FLY VIA SABENA BELGIAN WORLD AIRLINES...ALL EXPENSES PAID! NOTHING TO BUY...NOTHING TO DO!
HUNDREDS OF OTHER VALUABLE PRIZES! GET ENTRY BLANKS AT YOUR LOCAL MOJUD HOSIERY DEALER.
Contest subject to all Federal, State and Local regulations.

then he knew what he was going to do. "Thanks—but I'm all right here."

Dale looked at him sideways. "Always had the idea you didn't like this place much ——"

"Do me a favor. Take Roger. He's a first-class pilot and there's a reason he should be out of here."

"I'll see what I can do."

"Don't give him a chance to refuse. Make it an order."

Dale's priority was as good as he had promised it to be. A few days later an order came through, bidding Roger report to Ford.

"It's simply unbelievable luck!" said Roger. "Ford is only an hour from London."

"Nice going. And you're out of Crutchley's war. You just have to fight the big one."

The pilots had got into the habit of asking for the emergency floodlights to be turned on when they were landing, for as one pilot put it, every night landing at Lychmoor was an emergency. One night when the floods were on, a high-flying enemy marauder spied them and let go a stick of bombs. A hangar was hit and set on fire.

Group Captain Crutchley issued a new set of blackout regulations, very stringent.

A few nights later Boomer was flying an air test alone. When he was coming in to land, his undercarriage refused to lock down. The sirens screamed the stand-by for an emergency landing, the crash car came to the edge of the field. The Beaufighter touched down, the undercarriage collapsed and it went bounding and smashing along its belly, shooting out showers of sparks.

"All lights!" yelled the flying-control officer. All the lights sprang up white and dazzling. Everyone began to run toward the Beau, and the crash car and the fire-fighting truck dashed out on the field.

The telephone in the control hut rang. It was the station commander, coldly angry.

"What is the meaning of this insane display?"

"Sir, there's an aircraft down on the field ——"

"That is no reason for endangering the station. Turn out the field lights."

The field was suddenly plunged into darkness. The crash car plowed into a group of men. Figures ran about in confusion, their torches winking. The aircraft was farther away than it seemed—suddenly a lick of flame showed where it lay. They reached it—only to be driven back by a blast of flame and searing heat. They saw through the glass of the cockpit Boomer trying to lift himself, raising his hands to the hatch, then turning, sinking and collapsing, like a dummy crisped in the heat.

Burnaby seemed more stunned than grief-stricken. "I always thought old Boomer would make it." He kept muttering that he was sure old Boomer would make it.

For a few days he moved around the station like an automaton. Wallis wanted him to go away, to take leave, but he would not.

"What's the use? I'd always be thinking about it."

Wallis could not rid himself of the feeling that it was all wrong. He could not think of Boomer and Burnaby separately; he had a premonition that Boomer's death had set in motion a sequence that must end in another tragedy. There seemed to be nothing he could do about it. What little was possible, he tried to do.

He told Burnaby, "O.K., you're back on operations. You have Dog Patrol tomorrow night."

"Who is my nav?"

"Ordinarily, your navigator will be Wilkie. But I'm going along this time."

"Going to keep an eye on me? I wonder you're not scared I'll wham you four feet down."

"Sure I'm scared. I'll be quivering like a jelly."

Burnaby laughed. "That makes two of us—I'll be pretty scared myself." But he seemed pleased that Wallis was coming along.

On the next night a fog blew in from the sea and Dog Patrol was scrubbed. Wallis was thankful for the break—he had had a tiring day; he lay down on his cot fully dressed and fell asleep at once.

He wakened with a start, sure that he had heard an aircraft go over. He looked at his watch—it was four o'clock. He rolled off his cot and grabbed his cap and torch. He stopped to look in Burnaby's room—his bed was empty.

He ran across the field. The fog had blown away, the night was dark and almost still. The controller was sitting in the dim watch office, resting his head in his hands.

"Is one of our aircraft up?"

"Patrol-and-search order came through half an hour ago."

"Who?"

"Burnaby and Wilkie. They reported a few minutes ago. They should be back any time."

He went out on the catwalk. The watch-office corporal came and stood beside him. They heard, murmuring, the sound of the Beau's engines. Over the village the navigation lights winked on and off.

"Right on course," said the corporal.

There was a streak of gray across the east. He made out the shape of the aircraft, like a great bat. He found himself gripping the rail, frightened.

The engine noise faded, came again, faded. The Beau dropped down toward them, looking huge, rocking gently. It seemed to be going too fast as it neared the ground—they always did—it was going too fast! Pull up, pull up, for God's sake! The sound of the crash was incredibly loud, like the crack of a big gun. He might have made it, but he hit one of the ammunition huts which the ground control had not got around to demolishing. Burnaby demolished it for them.

Any shrine is better than self-worship.

OLD PROVERB

The deaths of Boomer and Burnaby affected the squadron profoundly. And then—good luck. Their aircraft were moved to Eastmoor, a satellite field a few miles away. It had been a sheep moor; all that space went to their heads—the flying skill of the squadron took an upward bounce—they were slapping their Beaufighters around like Hurricanes.

The squadron had turned its corner. It was now an effective fighting unit.

Wing Commander Foulkes telephoned to ask Alix if she would have lunch with him and meet a friend. He met her in the visitors' room of the Euclid—one of the oldest and dimmest of his London clubs. Hush lay on the place like faded velvet. A girl entered, and as she walked toward them Alix thought, How lovely and how English. She had great dark eyes which she used only for looking; her hair, her skin were exquisite, and she wore—proudly—the bunchy blue serge of the C.D., with a sergeant's stripes.

"There you are," said Foulkes. "Caroline, this is Alix Leslie. Alix, this is Caroline Brooke. . . . Shall we go in?"

They went in, under round Roman arches with snuff-colored hangings, over a parquet floor which creaked, and sat themselves in Italianate chairs at a table which wobbled. A very old waiter tottered up with the wine card.

They offered each other introductory sentences, charged with no more meaning than the wish to be civil. From the recital of names and places, Alix gathered that the Brookes and the Foulkeses were distantly connected.

Caroline spoke of the Foulkes family place. "It was simply Bloodley Hall," she said to Alix. "They were always harrying some wretched animal."

"And being carried down the drive on a shutter," said Wing Commander Foulkes.

"Do you remember the story of Giles, who was invited to join a hunting party in France and he brought along his huntsmen, his grooms, his horses and a full pack of hounds? Imagine being an excitable French hostess and seeing that coming down your drive."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 147

Vitality's slenderizing fit creates new interest in you!

Shaped to hug your narrow heel and to follow the topline of your foot in a single, unbroken line, Vitality's fit is naturally flattering—naturally slenderizing! Your choice of these, and many more, exciting new styles, colors and heel heights! See your Vitality dealer soon!

$10.95 TO $13.95

Vitality Wanderlust Shoes, from $8.95

Shoes are available in colors other than those illustrated.

A. Tess
B. Deanna
C. Helena
D. Gaynor
E. Vance
F. Robina
G. Eunice

Vitality SHOES

Vitality Shoe Company, Division of International Shoe Company, St. Louis 3, Missouri

"so reassuring"

You're so sure of yourself, really sure, with Kotex. The gentle Kotex napkin is the safest, surest kind of protection you can find. Without fail, Kotex absorbs both instantly and completely—gives you perfect fit—won't rub, won't chafe.

Then, discover the new Kotex belt in its smart new package. All Kotex belts now have the new kind of self-locking clasp that molds itself gently to your body, holds the napkin securely.

No wonder more women choose Kotex than all other brands

Memo to Mothers: Every year over 100,000 girls begin to menstruate before they are eleven. So it's not too soon to tell your daughter at ten. Our free booklet "You're A Young Lady Now" helps give the facts she needs to know. Write Miss Jones, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wis.

KOTEX is a trademark of Kimberly-Clark Corporation

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 144

With the fish came a message for Wing Commander Foulkes which called him away.

"The adventure of the gentlemen's club," said Caroline, looking about. "Isn't it pathetic? They go to the trouble of keeping women out for two hundred years and this is what they get."

"There may be certain intangibles. Change everywhere but no change here."

"I wouldn't mind if it were change they were hiding away from—but it's us." She looked around at the high dust-shadowed walls, the drapes with folds as hard as iron. "When I got orders to meet Miss Leslie"—a waiter came to change the plates and she swerved easily to a less personal topic—"and it is a very curious thing that in this war everyone gives me orders. Even my corporal gives me orders—but that's all right, she's a natural-born sergeant. Well, my young man said I must meet the girl and win her confidence. I expect you think this is the most frightful cheek ——"

As she chattered away Alix remarked her great Spanish eyes standing by, calm as cup custards.

"—— because we think he is going to be transferred to Ford."

"Who?"

"Oh dear, it would be too embarrassing if I had the wrong girl. Did you have a great-great-grandmother called Amelia?"

"Yes."

"Then that's all right; I'm talking about Wallis Glendinning. Roger—that's my young man—said to get your phone number and tell you to be ready to spring into action, for we think Wallis is coming to Ford."

"I'm glad. I think he hated Lychmoor."

"They all hated it. It must have been pretty frightful—they never talked about it—I didn't realize it was so bad until I saw the change in Roger afterward. You knew that their friends were killed—two of the boys who had been with them from the beginning?"

"I didn't know."

"They won't talk, you know, they simply make jokes. Have you ever been to Canada?"

"No."

"Nor I. I expect it will be very odd—and empty. Nearest neighbor a day's ride away. I expect I shall get that Empire look; you know, the eyes crinkled from gazing across the wide-open spaces."

Alix laughed. "I expect you will."

"I have to talk the most frightful nonsense to keep my spirits up. About leaving London, you know. Just to say it gives me a sinking feeling."

Alix was called to the phone in her office. "Scramble, Red Section! That's you," said Caroline. "Wallis arrives in Charing Cross; we're going to leap from a pillar and surprise him."

They were there when she arrived. Roger seemed to her a vivid type, fawn-colored and well scrubbed. She liked him because he was excited and did not try to hide it. The train moved in, squirting steam; all its doors opened at once and the platform was thronged. Roger drew them behind a baggage truck; they peered out, scanning the faces of the travelers.

"There he is!"

Among all the uniforms, he was another man in uniform, carrying a suitcase and a dunnage bag. They fell in behind him, arm in arm.

"There he goes—most dangerous crook in London."

"Carry yir beg, sir," piped Caroline.

He wheeled about at once and his face lighted with pleasure so that everyone knew that the surprise was a success. Caroline and Roger pounced on his baggage and lugged it off. Wallis stood looking at Alix, smiling. "How nice you look in your little mackintosh."

Roger and Caroline came back. "We sent your bags to Snowshill, Gloucestershire—in case you ever go there."

"Silly asses."

"Now, then," said Caroline, clapping her hands. "Here we all are! Let's make it a rouser, shall we? I'm a wolf and this is my night to howl!"

Alix looked at her in some surprise. Caroline, under the influence of the Empire, seemed a different girl.

"She's off again. Last time she was Henga and Horsa."

"And a more confused evening I never spent."

"I wasn't in the least confused," she said. "It was all perfectly clear. But before we decide anything, we must think things out."

There followed an interval of getting into and out of taxis. The three of them kept talking all the time talking nonsense. Caroline blew a kiss out the window. "I love these literary evenings," she said.

They went into a bar—a place that Alix had never seen before, very crowded and noisy, and ordered champagne cocktails. They drank to Red Section and to Blue. Caroline offered various suggestions for the evening, which were not well received.

"Well, if you won't go to the cinema, would you like to call on my literary aunt?" she asked.

"This is the first I've heard of any literary aunt," said Roger.

"Then we should think carefully before we commit our forces. On the one hand, we have the cinema; on the other, one aunt."

"We're going the pace, boy."

"Well, about this literary aunt—does she live in Pondicherry Lodge with her throat cut from ear to ear?"

"Her name is Godolphin, as a metra fect, and she lives in the house Jenny Lind lived in."

"Jenny Lind, the Swedish Nightingale?"

"Tell me, how would a Swedish nightingale sound?"

"Like, 'Sven, Sven, come out of the smorgasbord.'"

"More chirp, I think. More jug-jug."

"Let's try."

"Come on, Alix, lend a Parisian trill."

They put their heads together and made the sound of a Swedish nightingale. It came out rather well, they thought.

"Shouldn't we think about eating?"

"Oh, it's all right to think."

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

The Stand-by

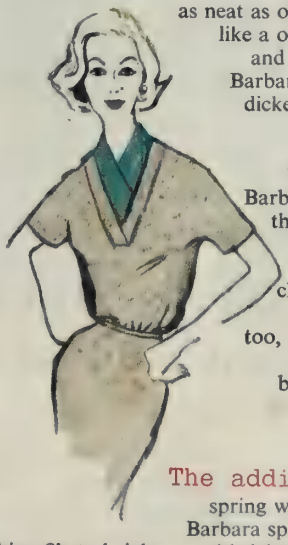
By BET HART

Even before it's March, Barbara J. knows exactly what she wants and needs as her final fill-in for spring. She's sure only because of her past scheming (begun, remember, way back in the beginning of January). Her memo on wardrobe progress in-the-making reads:

Already have . . .
Silk-print separates (for casual wear and informal evenings).
Black pleated skirt, white blouse and beige jersey jacket (really a spring suit).
Needed . . .
A classic daytime dress to wear every day to work, perhaps do overtime on weekends too.

Knowing Barbara, we are sure her investment follows the plan, and even more. It's a dress to count on for wear day in and day out—a true stand-by. The success of this is in the complete simplicity of design and in the fabric—a cotton-and-rayon knitted tweed. Perhaps most important, it need never look the same twice. Barbara can accessorize it according to whim, the mood of her day.

PHOTOGRAPH BY PRIGENT DRESS BY MANDEL



The Investment . . . A spring evening and Barbara arriving home from work looking every bit as neat as on her way at 9 A.M. The beige dress looks like a one-piece, but is really in two—a slim skirt and bloused top that hugs the waistline. Here Barbara wears the dress with its own crisp linen dickey—the white accent a sure sign of spring. Total cost of the "stand-by"? . . . $17.95.

Possibilities Unlimited . . . Barbara likes the all-one-color look. Here she wears her beige jacket from last month over the dress. Accents with her new black patent bag and belt. The color accent: yellow, and only at the neckline.

For a Saturday, Barbara might wear the beige skirt, her white blouse from last month, and her bright cherry cardigan from January. If she's saving the blouse for the next day's wear, she might wear her new white dickey, the sweater buttoned to within three buttons of the top.

SKETCHES BY R. CRANER

The next day (and the one after that too), Barbara might wear the same dress. Instead of the white dickey, her bright turquoise scarf. Here Barbara wears the dress beltless, a pretty silhouette. For a neckline-a-day change, Barbara could wear almost any color scarf (a polka-dot would look well, too, she thinks) in a number of different ways. She could also add a narrow white piqué bias fold around the sleeve and V neckline.

The additions . . . With her spring wardrobe practically complete, Barbara spends a few fashion $'s to heighten and brighten the investment. The first, a shiny black patent belt—a wonderful accent for the beige dress, as well as with her suit from last month: $1.00. The second—a soft hat in the brightest of prints. This one in pink and red roses printed on white. This, too, will go with either one of her new spring basics: $3.95. And third, a black patent bag: $2.95.

HAT BY SOLOMON

	$1.00
	$3.95
	$2.95
Beige dress	$17.95
TOTAL	$25.85

"There'll be sandwiches and cake later on. They always serve them at these literary teas. Is that a tea urn over there—or is it a lady poetess?"

"That's Mrs. Pomeroy."

"The urn, the fern and Mrs. Pomeroy."

"Well, Mrs. Porter and her dorter, they wash their feet in soda worter."

"Never mind her—what about this dolphin in Bloomsbury?"

"If you mean my aunt, she lives in Earl's Court." Caroline looked under the table. "I seem to have someone else's legs."

"I'm rather swimming myself," said Alix. "Could we swim toward some clearer air?"

"Certainly. Off we go to Pondicherry Lodge. Have you got your revolver ready for action, Holmes?"

Outside, the fresh air came as a fine surprise. There were no taxis, but Caroline found a bus. In her clear, lovely voice she named a destination and proffered the fares. The others watched her in admiration.

"Where did she say we were going?" Wallis asked.

"Hops, Hants, Hopplesex."

"I know what would happen to me if I got on a bus and said Hops, Hants, Hopplesex—I'd wind up in Wapping Old Stairs, that's where I'd wind up."

"She went like a breeze about the money, though. 'Here's threepence h'penny—pay the rest on Saturday,' she said."

"It takes nerve to say a thing like that."

They left the bus at a stop which Caroline said was Grosvenor Road and what they needed was a nice walk. She walked ahead with Wallis—bits of their talk came back to Alix, following with Roger.

Roger had taken off his cap and looked at it with distaste. "This thing weighs about ten pounds. I will now tell you the history of Air Force caps. As I see it, they were invented by a character who stood twenty-eight inches high in his bare feet. When he put it on, it came right down to his chest. So he never knew where he was going and thus became an air vice-marshal. And from there it was but a step to the nearest public lavatory. But when they got it off him, he was as bald as a teak."

"As a what?"

"Teak."

Wallis turned around. "What did you say?"

"Teak. Teak."

"What do you think you are—a French clock?"

They sat down on the curb and rested. The roadway curved into blackness pricked by the points of street lights. The tiny headlights of three cars, evenly spaced, wound across it and for a moment the blackout became purest magic—an Oriental screen with a dragon.

Lovely, thought Alix. This was a very strange evening—everything seemed curious and entertaining. She was standing back a little way, detached and approving. This must be the proper dimension of wine—the one which is so hard to find. "The viol, the violet and the vine." The urn, the fern and Mrs. Pomeroy. Outwardly, she felt that she preserved a decorous appearance, that she looked as serious as an owl, but inwardly she enjoyed a happy confusion. Not tipsy, nothing so downright as that; more shimmering—a private dance of light motes.

"Listen ——"

There was a faint murmur to be heard, like a distant indrawn breath—the air-raid sirens. The sound swelled to a banshee chorus; it came toward them and encircled them.

"No, you don't," said Wallis. "I declare a closed season, absolutely!"

The sound of motors could be heard, as if the raiders were coming in pretty low.

"I call that pretty beastly," said Caroline angrily. "Coming over on my night off."

She searched in the roadway and found a stone and threw it.

"Gave him a nasty fright, that did," said Roger.

"Just ignore them and they'll go away," said Wallis. "Anyway, it's time for another drink. Come on, we'll find a place."

They turned in through a gateway in a wall and found themselves in a garden. The place was neglected, leaves strewn on the flower beds. They could see it all clearly in the light of a fire. They sat down on a bench.

"Now for that drink," said Wallis. Alix saw that he had been carrying a bottle all this time. "Only two glasses, though." He pointed the bottle at an imaginary raider and released the wire. It made an encouraging pop. "Got him." He filled the glasses.

The noise increased in volume. There was a rushing of vehicles in the street, shouts of men, a blowing of whistles like yelps of excitement. Something blew up and there was a patter of falling debris among the leaves.

They sat on the bench and took turns sipping the wine. Alix thought she had never tasted anything so cool and delicious.

"There's nothing like a garden," said Caroline in the tones of a hostess making conversation. "I wonder whose this is."

"Sir Mortimer Twombley, I know him by his tracks."

"Pugs, old boy."

"A great calceolaria man."

"I once knew a calceolaria. She was third from the left in ——"

The sustained, descending whistle fell toward them—seemed to be falling on top of them. The whole earth seemed to jump. The sound of the explosion scarcely registered—the shock wave hit with enormous force. It seemed to Alix that she felt for a split second feelers of air on her skin and hair, then she was lifted and turned head over heels. . . . She found herself in the flower bed covered with leaves and earth.

"Are you all right?" asked Caro. She was lying beside her, face and hair muddied.

"Yes, thank you. Are you?"

"I'm all right—but I feel rather odd."

The bomb had hit in the roadway a short distance along. It was a lucky thing they had turned into the garden—the wall had deflected the violence of the burst. Roger was crawling around on his hands and knees looking for his cap.

"Are you all right, Sir Mortimer?" he asked.

Wallis, whom she could not see, made gobbling sounds and Alix raised herself in alarm. Then she understood he was imitating a man who has lost his teeth.

"Losth my stiffth lip. Flew right outh with my plateth."

"Nasty feeling, that, old boy. I'm no good without my stiff lip and my cup of tea. Just hang on, old boy, and we'll have you right as a trivet. Here you are—here's a trivet as good as new. Now if we could only find your pants ——"

"They're all right," said Caroline, "they're being true blue. You know, I had the loveliest feeling—as if I were enclosed in a bubble; everything else was outside. I was floating ——"

"It was a lovely party," said Alix.

In London it was snowing hard. When Wallis got Alix on the phone, she wouldn't think of going out. "I've washed my hair and tied it up in a towel."

"I've never seen you with your hair in a towel."

"It's not worth much, I assure you. Call me tomorrow."

"Tomorrow I'll be far away. Secret mission. Very dangerous."

He found her, as she promised, with her hair tied up. She was pale, she was not feeling well. They spent the evening sitting on the floor before her fireplace.

"Are you really going away?"

"To the Midlands. Bomb-aiming course."

"But you aren't a bomber."

"They have a new notion. They're going to send small aircraft down to drop markers on the target while the heavies scow about above the murk."

She tried to teach him a European card game—so simple, she said, that little Swiss and Austrian children played it in the cradle—but he did not seem to get the hang of it. She kept beating him.

"Not frightfully bright in the Air Force, are they?"

He was content to go on losing—though he did not think he was losing. He thought he was winning, just to be sitting there. It was a pleasure to see a girl dressed for a dull, domestic evening. She wore a blouse and a tartan skirt and white socks, and slippers that kept falling off. She looked, he thought, almost too young to be marriageable; she looked like the younger sister who is so good with the children, not much interested in love because love has not touched her yet. While he played his cards at random he spied upon her, observing that because she was pale her eyes seemed green, that her lashes had a sheen on them, that the hairs of her brow lay in silky lines.

"Really! In Switzerland, they would laugh at you. Teach me a game of yours, then."

He taught her blackjack. She got the idea at once and she had remarkable luck. She won three shillings in no time.

"Wallis, why don't you write to me? I like so much to get letters and I rarely do."

"Now it's letters she wants! I bring you expensive presents ——"

"One sweater ——"

"Flowers ——"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

The woman who helps her neighbor does herself a good turn.

BRENDAN FRANCIS

Get the full treatment

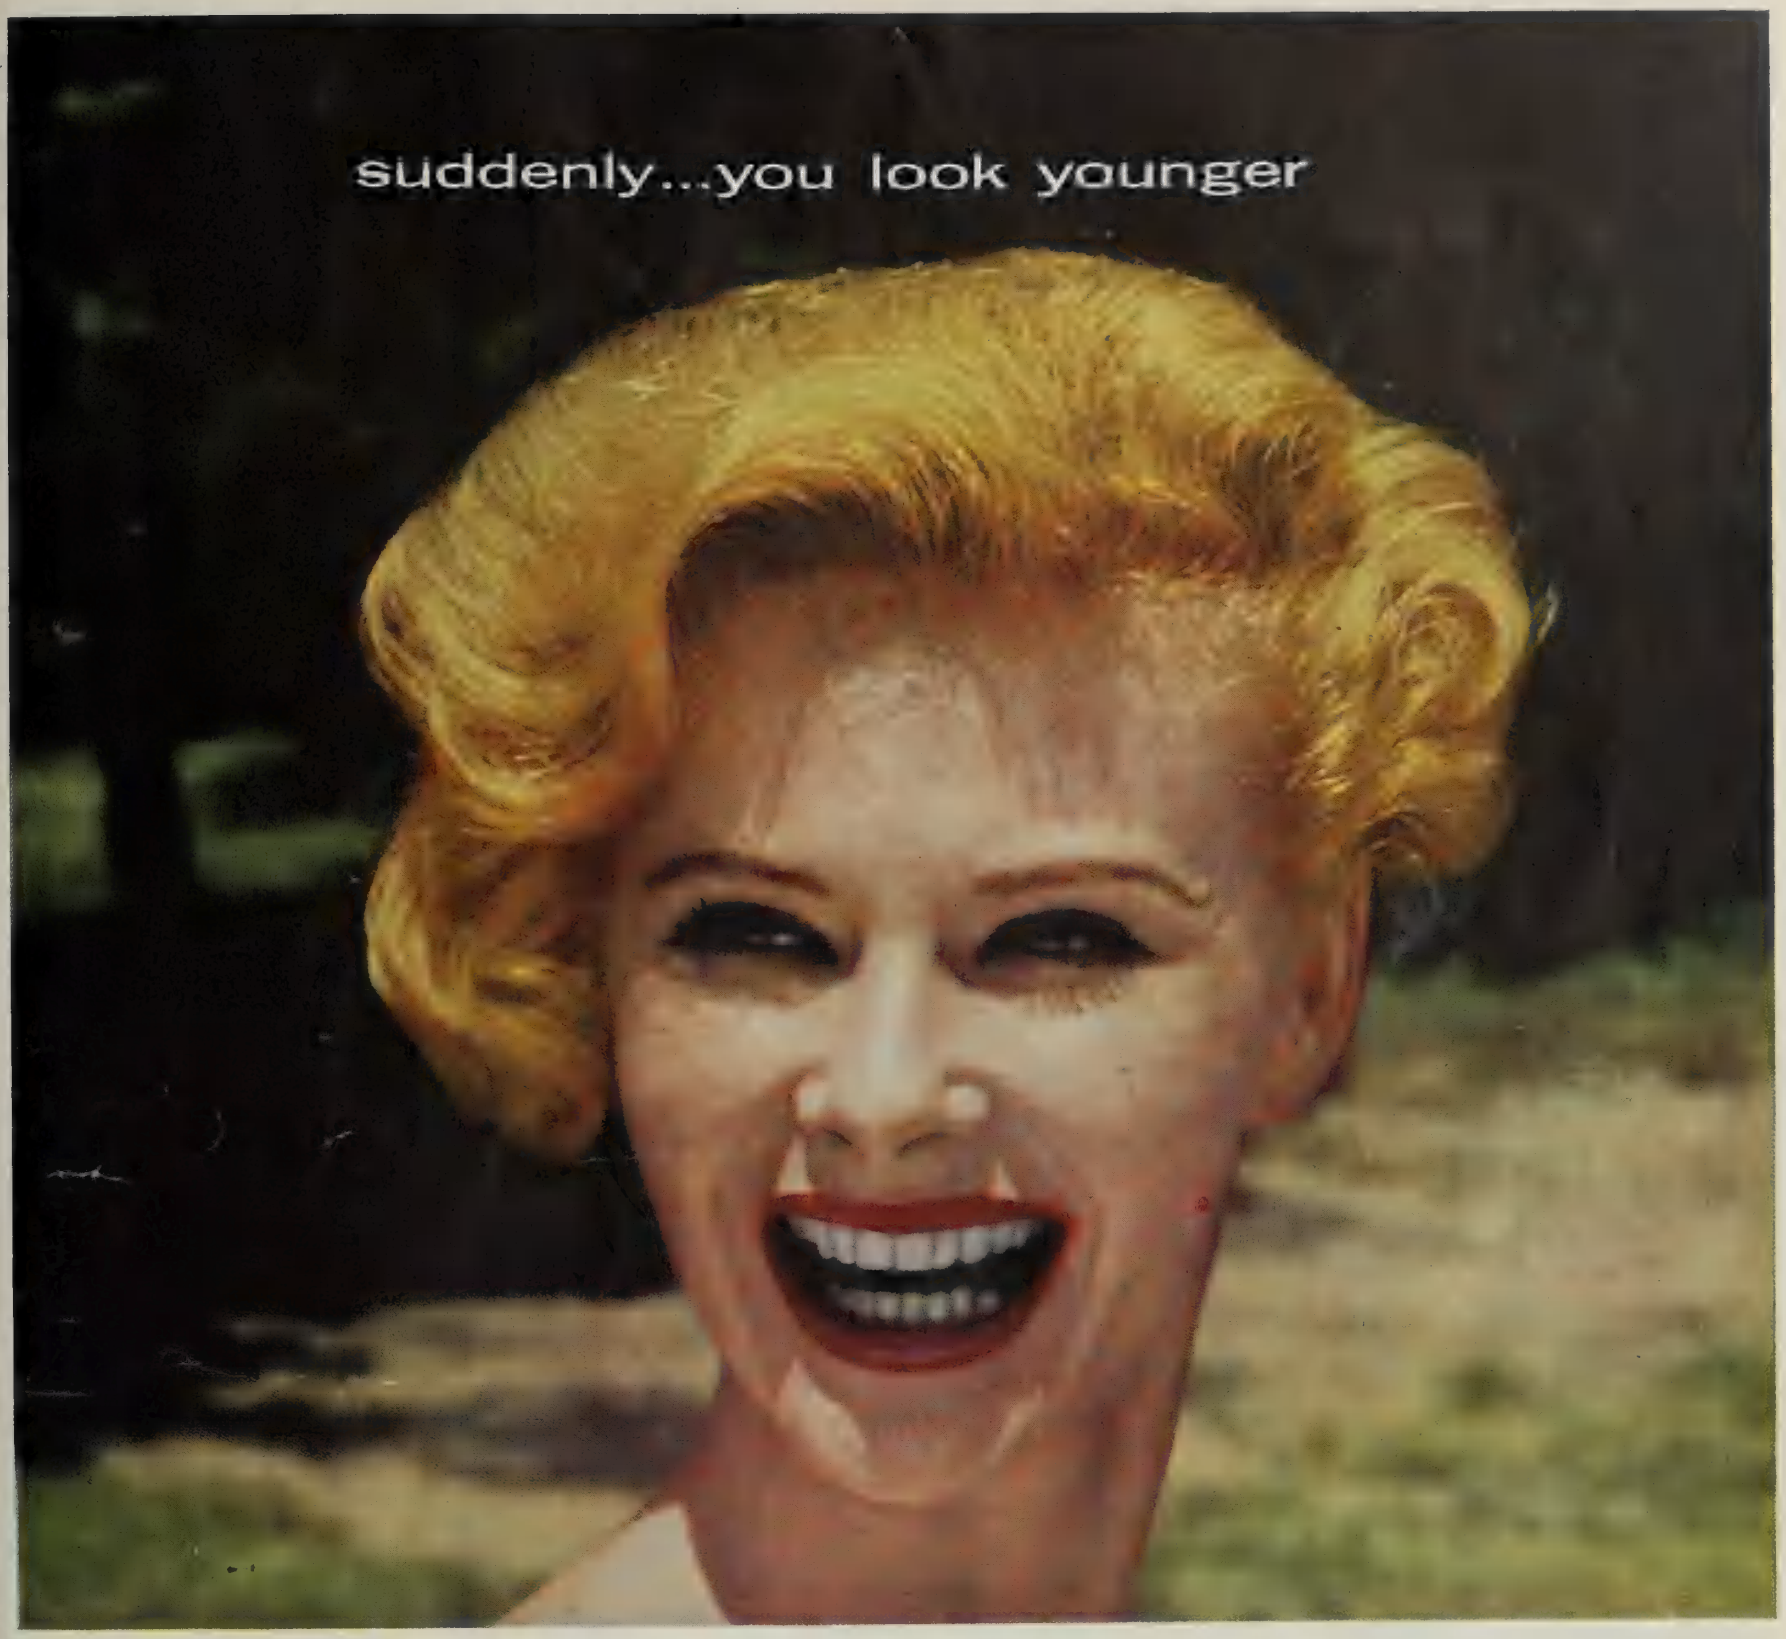
Cuticura brings lovelier skin within 5 days, many doctors report

Softer, smoother, lovelier skin in a few days sounds incredible. But hundreds upon hundreds of doctors report such sensational results. And Cuticura guarantees it—or returns your money. Get the full treatment and see for yourself. That means—

1. Mild, superemollient Cuticura Soap for daily lather-massage. No other soap contains its remarkable skin-softening, skin-smoothing ingredients that do so much, much more for you.

2. Creamy Cuticura Ointment to soften, gently stimulate and improve your skin overnight as it eliminates blackheads, helps relieve dryness and pimples.

3. Greaseless, fast-acting Cuticura Medicated Liquid on trouble spots during the day to cleanse antiseptically—soothe instantly—remove excess oiliness—check blemish-spreading bacteria—speed healing—cool and refresh your skin. At leading drug counters.



Available in Canada

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Cuticura

Cuticura has said for years—
Wishing won't help your skin, Cuticura will!

with

ROUX®

brighter, "happier" haircolor!

So glad she did it! So full of warm sunshine and cool shadow...springtime itself!

How did her haircolor get that way?

It's easy, with Roux. For Roux, America's first family of haircolorings and lighteners, provides a specific product for your specific purpose. Some give lasting color...some, temporary color excitement that's easily shampoo'd out when you wish. Some are used best to color gray hair... others, to brighten dull looking hair. Some will color all your hair... another, touch-up those few off-shade strands.

Want lighter or darker hair? A match of the color nature gave you, or an exciting change? If your haircolor isn't all it should be...

ask your beautician why she prefers ROUX

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 148

"From a barrow. Blackjack." She turned up the jack. "That's another shilling. Don't you think it is dull playing for money?"

"What do you want to play for?"

"Letters."

She won fourteen letters and she was pleased. "So you must start writing at once. And I intend to keep count."

She made cocoa; then she said he had a long journey and it was time for him to go.

"On a night like this, lots of girls would say, 'Do stay, Mr. Glendinning. I shall be quite comfortable on the floor.'"

"I will go down with you."

He drew her through the front door onto the porch. The wind had fallen, the night was clear and cold, the snow lay serene. He drew in his breath sharply with pleasure, picked her up and held her against his chest, feeling the delicious weight of her flesh and bones. But sometimes lovers are vouchsafed a lick of sense. He held her for just a moment, then set her down.

"Forgive me if I run along. Got a lot of letters to write."

Caro and Roger were married on a fine spring day at St. Margaret's, Westminster. Alix was a bridesmaid and Wallis was the best man. Caro made a beautiful bride—so beautiful that a few tears flowed with the wine. After the reception, the young people had a rowdy time chasing the car with the newly wedded couple around the square.

Wallis' friends and their girls got together for a party afterward. It was gay for a time, but it did not last. Wallis and Alix found themselves alone at a big table in a hotel dining room.

"Let's go," he said abruptly.

She knew that he was in a mood—all evening he had been drinking too much. During the drive to Kensington he was silent. Suddenly he broke out:

"There they are—penned up in a room at Claridge's. He's shy, you know. The shyness of girls is nothing with the shyness of a man—no one believes that, but it's true. Let's call him on the phone."

"We can't do that."

"The only ray of hope in an intolerable situation is Caro. Caro is a good kid. Sometimes the English show a grasp of situations like this."

"Also the Latins and the Scandinavians and the Laplanders."

"Everyone but the French-Scotch."

"You are in a mood."

"Why shouldn't I be in a mood! The more I think of it, the more reason I see to be in a mood. And to blazes with you, you Scotch cairngorm."

"No more letters?"

"I don't think you even read them."

"Where are you going now?" she asked. "Are you staying at the Rose?"

"Yes."

"Let the taxi go and I'll walk along with you."

They walked along to the Rose, which was all in darkness. The side door had been left unlocked for him. They mounted through the darkness; the stairway was oak. The Rose was as solid as the English character.

At the top Alix brought her hands together in a gesture of pleasure. Along the corridor outside each door were glass globes, pink as cherry blossoms. His key was in the door; they went in. There was a table with a fringed cloth; in the center of it was a bottle of whisky standing on a note from the landlord. Wallis snatched at the whisky as a drowning man snatches at a life preserver.

She wandered about the room, looking at things.

"This is sweet," she said, using the word thoughtfully. There was a brass bed—a bright burnished piece that had never been out of fashion. It had a spread of stiff linen with a ribbon insert, and a lace cushion between the pillows. There was a sea shell on the floor showing its pink insides, the wallpaper was a gay and gamy riot. There were two chairs of pine, upholstered in winy red and tarnished gold. Everything was old and used and cared for.

About 1910, Alix thought, and the chairs a bit earlier. She thought of the people to match it—the Edwardians who had stayed here, women in camisoles and long knickers, with thoughts of love and duty, and men in mustaches and colored braces and stout hearts. A people simpler and better than we—why do we refuse to acknowledge they were better?

"This is a good place."

But he was too young and ignorant to care about the miracle of a good inn. "Where do they hide the glasses?"

She opened a cabinet door with a touch of her finger, and there they were, in the rack beside the water bottle. She brought them to him.

"Is this what you wanted?"

"What do you mean?"

"To get roaring drunk."

"You know what I want. You."

She raised her eyes and looked at him. Her eyes said, Very well, if you wish it.

The glass made a clatter against the neck of the bottle. He stood there in a sort of dismay. She waited, very pretty in her wedding finery, with that air of belonging only to herself.

"All this because I got mad ——"

"Oh, no." She looked around. "Because of the beautiful bed."

She made the slightest gesture. He came to her, raised her chin and kissed her lips. His hands moved from her shoulders, down to her waist, he held her tightly, squeezing her.

"How can you stand there," he said, still not believing, "and not defend yourself?"

Caro and Roger were having breakfast in bed.

"As I see it, as I get the picture, the whole thing is glorious. If you're not busy, we should have a business meeting."

"What about?"

"Things. Your allowance."

"You mean I get allowance besides all this? Oh, bliss. How much?"

You can't taste the difference, but...

Sucaryl makes it lots easier to cut down calories

CHERRY BAVARIAN CREAM

2 1-lb. cans red sour cherries
1 envelope unflavored gelatin
2 tsp. Sucaryl solution
¼ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ c. nonfat dry milk solids
¼ c. ice water

Drain liquid from cherries, saving ½ c. Soften gelatin in ¼ c. liquid; add Sucaryl, dissolve over hot water. Chop cherries; add remaining ¼ c. liquid, salt, lemon juice. Add gelatin and mix well. Chill until mixture begins to thicken, combine dry milk solids and ice water; beat to texture of whipped cream. Fold into gelatin. Pour into lightly oiled 3-cup mold. Chill. Serves 6.

FREE — Our new cookbook, "Calorie-saving Recipes with Sucaryl," including dozens of new kitchen-tested ideas for desserts, beverages, sauces, dressings. . . 50 wonderful recipes in all! Get your free copy at your drugstore.

Sucaryl simply says you don't have to trim portions to trim calories. No compromising your taste, either . . . any dish sweetened with calorie-free Sucaryl tastes just like its sugar-sweetened twin.

You use Sucaryl practically anywhere you would sugar. In tablet form, to sweeten your coffee, tea or any other drink. Solution, for fruits and cereals, for cooking and baking.

Sucaryl, of course, is for anyone sensibly counting calories, and for those who for any other reason can't use sugar. Low salt diets call for Sucaryl Calcium. Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Ill. and Montreal, Canada. Abbott

Sucaryl®

Non-caloric Sweetener — At Your Drugstore

"We must figure it out—so much for ıch, so much for dinner."

"I generally have a little something at ven and again at four. Do you count them ?"

"We'll have to scheme it out. In the mean-ıe, as this is a serious business meeting, I'm ing to put some of this delicious honey on u and eat you."

"Roger—ow! This is Claridge's Hotel, ondon, England! Roger ——"

Alix was getting lots of letters these days. e had one from Caro. Roger had got his omotion and a transfer; he was with 406 uadron in Devon and Caro was living near e field. "I don't think I was cut out for an r Force wife," she wrote. "It's bad enough t having a proper job to do while Roger is sy, but the very worst is to lie awake at ght listening to the take-offs. They go off th a great buzz, then suddenly the noise dies ay and you wait, shrinking, for the sound a crash. It's just as bad for Roger—he ows that I start worrying if he is a few min-es late, and I suppose he starts worrying too. old him I had to get out of here or go crack-s, and he agrees. I've applied for the Wrens; lot of my friends are in it now and I've a od chance of a posting."

Her next letter was from Southampton, ıere she was sent as a member of the .R.N.S.

Roger and his navigator, Babe Hillborne, ere returning from a long-range reconnais-nce over the Bay of Biscay. "Anything new ı the search?" he asked Hillborne.

There had been a big flap earlier in the day. Sunderland of the Coastal Command had en shot down by an enemy submarine. An r-sea operation had been laid on to look for rvivors, but the Sunderland's position was ot accurately fixed and the search area was a ide one. Roger had altered course to fly ong one edge of it.

One good mother is worth a hundred schoolmasters.

GEORGE HERBERT

Hillborne shoved his headphones back. No signals. Not much hope, is there?"

"No."

"They wouldn't last long, even if they got to their raft. Most of them would be urned."

They passed out of the search area. They ad not expected to find anything, but they ad been vigilant. Now they could relax, look rward to getting home.

Off to the left something caught Roger's at-ntion—a speck had shown for an instant. le throttled back and let the Beaufighter slant own a long slope. The sea became clearer. here was no doubt—it was the life raft from ne flying boat. They sank lower until they ould see four figures in it. They thought the gures moved, waved; then, seen more closely, eemed to be motionless.

"I think they're dead," said Hillborne, with ne glasses.

"Call up base and report."

Roger knew most of the searching aircraft ould be running low on fuel; Coastal Com-nand had called up a destroyer and it might e close. If they could hover over the raft until nother aircraft could relieve them or the de-troyer arrived, the raft could be picked up. Once lost sight of, it would never be found.

"Say we can circle for fifteen minutes." That was stretching the fuel supply to the dan-er point. "Ask them where the destroyer is."

Something in the sea was making a com-notion, like a rock in a current, like an island ising. A black shape, like the back of a whale, vas growing, streaming water. As they recog-ized it for a submarine, men came leaping rom the tower toward the guns.

Roger thought bleakly, This is going to be a ad business. It was probably the same sub-narine that had brought down the Sunder-and—it had remained in the area, now it was rising to get on with the job of recharging its batteries. The Beaufighter was armed only with .303 machine guns which would do no harm to the submarine's hull.

"Report it," he said.

They continued to circle.

"He's going after the raft!" cried Hillborne.

"O.K., Babe, ready for attack."

He dove the Beaufighter toward the sea. As they passed over the raft he had a glimpse of white blind faces. He saw the wink-wink of bursting shells swinging toward him, like a stream from a hose—he saw his tracers threading through a gun crew. Then they were up and over, jinking violently. There was a hole in the fuselage through which cold air was pouring.

Hillborne was badly shaken. "Not so good, was it?"

The horizon was still empty. There were no witnesses but the indifferent sky.

When Hillborne realized that they were going to attack again he was incredulous. "No, no!" He grabbed Roger's shoulder, his mouth working. "Are you going to kill us too?"

They skimmed the wave tops. Roger fired a burst and saw the bullets stitch a line through the water. There was a sharp explosion under the wing root, the aircraft slewed off course. Another shell burst almost under them—the column leaped in his hands. He knew the Beaufighter was not coming out of this one. One engine was smoking; he felt a shock and saw fire running up the side of the fuselage. There was a hill of water over his shoulder; they were running along in the trough, between the waves, then they struck and it was like hitting a wall. The cockpit was full of smoke, the aircraft was sinking. He freed himself, tried to stand and fell down; he kept shouting to Hillborne to get out, but Hillborne sat there, his hands clasping his stomach, his face a mask of shock. . . . They were out of the aircraft in the water, the dinghy had inflated

CONTINUED ON PAGE 153

Which Easter Suit is Brand New...and which one was Sanitone Dry Cleaned 50 times?

Famous Two-Suit Test Proves it Pays to use Quality Dry Cleaning

One of these two identical, brand-new suits was Sanitone Dry Cleaned fifty (50) times. The other was left untouched. Even experts could detect no significant difference either in appearance or in the feel of the fabric. This is dramatic proof that repeated Sanitone dry cleanings do not wear out clothes!

You can always depend on your Sanitone Dry Cleaner to give your garments that brand-new look and feel that keeps you looking your best. Call on him now and avoid the last minute Easter rush. Look in the Yellow Pages of your phone book for the dry cleaner who offers Sanitone Approved Service. Or write today for the name and address of the Sanitone Dry Cleaner nearest you.

See for yourself! The 50-cleanings test was run with swatches cut from the same bolt of material as the suits shown above. See these actual test swatches at your Sanitone Dry Cleaner's today!

Sanitone Dry Cleaning Service

A Division of Emery Industries, Inc. • Carew Tower, Cincinnati, Ohio

Win a lovelier figure

Prizes include all-expense trip to Paris for two and Paris originals, and 151 Complete Courses in famous

slenderella* salons

ENTER Libby's EASY

SLIM-DOWN SWEEPSTAKES

GRAND PRIZE—Win a complete course at Slenderella, the fabulous new slenderizing system . . .

PLUS 2 weeks' trip to Paris for two (expenses paid)—with $1000.00 spending money added . . .

PLUS 2 original ensembles made in Paris.
(Or the Slenderella course plus $5000.00 in cash. See rules)

150 MORE PRIZES: Complete Slenderella course in the salon nearest your home plus $25.00 in cash. (See rules)

JUST FINISH IN 25 WORDS OR LESS THIS STATEMENT:

*"I would like to win a Slenderella course because*_____

_____"

BE A SLENDERELLA CINDERELLA!

Enter Libby's Slim-Down Sweepstakes and win a complete course from Slenderella—the world-famous slenderizing system.

And starting now, drink non-fattening Libby's Tomato Juice—the Slim-Down Cocktail—3 times a day. Never thin or watery, Libby's is the satisfying juice that quenches between-meal hunger. It's the twice-rich tomato juice: rich in flavor . . . rich in vitamins. And all for just 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass!

*Service mark, Slenderella Systems, Inc.

READ THESE EASY RULES:

1. The contest is open to all women 18 years of age or over living in continental limits of the United States, except employees of Libby, McNeill & Libby, Slenderella International and their advertising agents.
2. Write your entry on a plain piece of paper or on the official Libby Slim-Down Sweepstakes entry blank obtainable at grocery stores. Attach a label from any size can of Libby's Tomato Juice to each entry and mail to Libby Contest, P.O. Box 1200, Chicago 77, Illinois.
3. Send as many entries as you like. All entries must be postmarked before midnight, May 31, 1958.
4. THE GRAND PRIZE WINNER will start her Slenderella course in the beautiful new Slenderella Salon in Paris under the direction of Princess Irene Mdivani. The winner will finish her program at the Slenderella Salon in the U.S.A. nearest her home.
5. 150 OTHER WINNERS will each receive a complete Slenderella course in the salon nearest her home plus $25.00 in cash to use toward transportation costs.
6. "Complete Slenderella Course" is defined as: the number of visits to Slenderella required to bring the winner's figure to the proportions required by her proper dress size as determined by the Slenderella figure analysis.
7. Prizes will be awarded to contestants whose entries are considered by the judges most original, unique and apt. There will be duplicate prizes in case of ties. The contest will be judged by R. L. Polk & Company. All entries become the property of Libby, McNeill & Libby.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 151

and was floating, he was trying to get Hillborne into it. Still clasping himself, making a thin inhuman noise, Hillborne resisted. Roger tried to roll him over the side of the dinghy, his face came against the great wound in his back; he saw the white bones of the rib case sticking through a reddish-purple mass. . . .

The dinghy tossed, half full of reddened water. He tried to keep Hillborne's head out of the water; it was an instinctive action: he knew Hillborne was dead. He was glad he was dead, for when he died the screaming stopped. It was very cold. There was nothing in the world but pain and cold.

The destroyer picked him up an hour later.

Roger lived in pain for weeks. An explosive shell had torn a hole in his leg; his thigh and side were burned. Skin had to be taken from the other leg to make a graft. It began to appear that he would never walk properly again.

Something had happened to Roger's spirit. He took little interest in the life around him. Even with Caro, he was a polite stranger. She was heartbroken.

"What is it—what can I do?" she cried to Wallis. "He just sits there like the ghost of a person." She conceived a hatred of the convalescent home with its sterile atmosphere, its professional cheeriness, its brisk acceptance of calamities. It kept her out of his life, it was doing Roger no good at all.

"If only we could get him away somewhere."

"How do you mean?"

"If we could find a cottage somewhere ——"

Caro, Alix and Wallis went house hunting, crowded into Wallis' little English car. They had good reports of the cottages near Redlea—but when they reached them, they did not even get out of the car. The cottages were flimsy shacks surrounded by children and litter.

"I'd die, I'd simply die there!" said Caro.

"Is there not one small reasonable vacant house in the whole south of England?" asked Wallis.

They found Spinney Cottage on the flank of a hill and walked up a grassy lane to it. It had nearly white stucco walls, low eaves, and a row of windows overlooking a flagstoned terrace. Most of the windows were broken and the terrace was overgrown with weeds. A general air of abandonment hung over the scene. They turned around to see the prospect and looked out over a vivid calmness of green fields going down toward the sea.

"This is much better!" cried Caro, taking heart.

"It probably needs a million things," said Wallis dubiously.

"It's got an odd sort of stubborn look," said Alix. "It has character, good or bad."

"Let's have a go at it. Most of the things that need doing, we can do ourselves."

Roger was duly released from the home on temporary convalescent leave. Caro and he came by train, Wallis met them at the railway station with his car. Roger was able to walk on two canes; he looked shockingly shrunken.

It was a dank, dispiriting day; the countryside appeared through a mist of faded greens and grays. They came to the lane leading to the cottage.

"We have to walk from here. We're almost there."

Roger got out awkwardly and balanced himself on his two sticks. Caro moved to him, lest he should topple. "I'm all right," he said shortly.

Wallis went ahead and opened the door quite proudly. They had worked hard to make the cottage livable. Roger came in and stopped short, looked around, and the other two realized with a shock of disappointment that they had been misled by their health and strength, by the fact that they had improved the place out of all knowledge. Now they saw it as he was seeing it—sparsely furnished, smelling of damp and disuse. He gave an uncontrollable shiver, which nearly undid Caro.

Wallis bustled about. "Good hot tea is what we need."

Roger had no appetite and he was clearly badly jangled by the train journey. He went to bed right after tea.

Wallis had to return to the station. Caro walked down the lane with him in the rainy dusk. He knew that she was crying. He put his arm around her.

"Take it easy."

"Will you come for the weekend?"

"Of course. Alix will be here too."

"Don't fail me. I need you."

"We'll be here. We'll have a celebration—we'll have a literary evening."

He met Alix at the railway station on Friday evening. The weather was rainy and squally, working up to a violent storm. She got off the train lugging a rucksack with delicacies and bottles of wine. She wanted to know about Roger's home-coming.

"He was tired and nervous after his first day out. He came in and looked around and didn't like it much and Caro's heart quietly broke."

"Poor Caro."

"Mind you talk nonsense all the time. Between nonsense and Caro's shape, we'll pull him through."

They were blown into Spinney Cottage on a gale of wind which made all the lamps jump. Everything looked peaceful—a fire was burning, the room was pleasant with flowers and candles. Roger was lying on the couch, in uniform. He sat up with a flicker of animation to greet Alix.

Wallis went on into the kitchen. Caro was working at the range, with an apron over her dress. Her face was tragic, she was strained to the breaking point.

"We made a bad mistake. He wants to go back to the home."

"You must give him time. He's in a dark place; we can't follow him, but we can try to coax him out. . . . How did things go otherwise?"

She made a gesture of despair. This house would be the death of her. It was impossible to get hot water—the fireplace smoked—there was nowhere to shop. She had walked to the farm that morning and begged a leg of lamb —— She opened the oven door to look at it. Appetizing odors filled the room.

"Looks good."

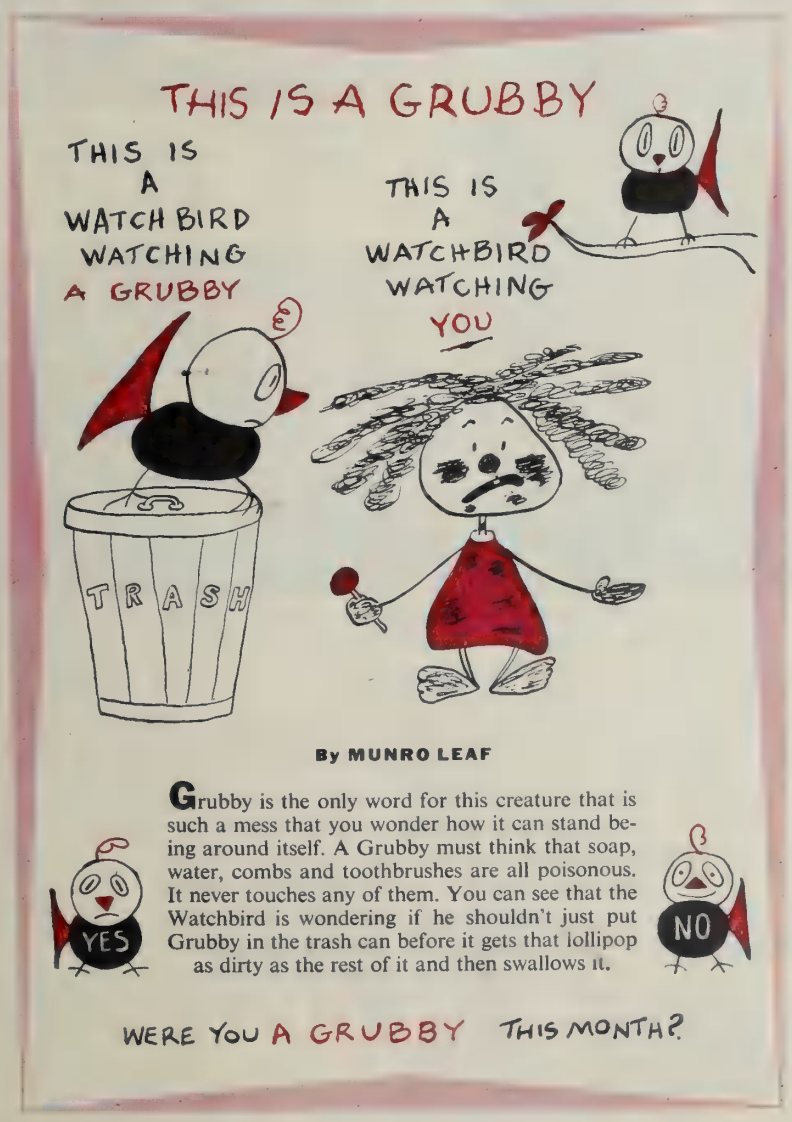
"But it's been hours and hours—I'm almost cooked too!" She looked at the range with smoldering eyes. "I would like to kick it right through the wall!"

"Atta girl. Come and have a drink."

In the living room, Caro accepted a drink and sat down, and for a moment her troubles stood off from her. Roger was always pleased to see Alix—she thought he looked a little better, more like himself. Everybody was talking. She took hope from the moment—they were together, the four of them, please God things might be all right again.

Outside, the storm was rising to a peak. Rain streamed down the windows, the wind rattled them in their frames. Caro felt herself overwhelmed with a premonition of disaster—she felt all her nerve ends quivering. She jumped up.

"Come along! Everybody come along, please. Time to eat!"



Caro came in carrying the platter, rather anxious, a young wife at her first party. She had on a cream-colored blouse, her dark hair was magnificent. She got halfway to the table when there was a close flash of lightning followed by a stunning crack. Something struck the roof a great blow, a cloud of smoke and soot belched from the fireplace and enveloped her. There she stood, as black as a chimney sweep.

For an instant no one moved or spoke. Then Wallis rolled out of his chair, howling; Roger gave a nervous yelp and began to laugh too. Caro looked at her blackened arms, her sooty dress, the ruined roast—and dropped it on the floor. She drew her breath in a sort of sob and left the room in a dignified way. Alix did not laugh; she made to follow Caro, then changed her mind; she picked up the roast and the pieces of platter and carried them to the kitchen and shut the door.

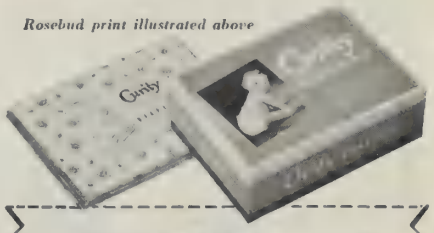
Wallis rolled about the floor till his sides hurt. Roger made rusty hysterical noises like a man who has forgotten how to laugh. They laughed themselves out and stopped.

"Good show," said Wallis, "but rather hard on Caro. Look, Roger, if you have no further

CONTINUED ON PAGE 155

Curity®
DIAPERS

WASH EASIER



DRY FASTER

MORE ABSORBENT

Curity diapers are softer and smoother, even after countless launderings, when washed in quality products like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Don't forget Curity dress up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

Rosebud print illustrated above

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Kendall Mills Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. JA38
Enclosed is (indicate choice):
☐ 50c for Curity ROSEBUD Diaper
☐ 25c for full size Curity Regular Diaper
☐ 75c for both
Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii.

Saucerama!

NEW! 5-MINUTE WONDER SAUCE TASTES SO GOOD SO MANY WAYS

SAUCERAMA'S SO VERSATILE!

Adds new flavor to main dishes, salads, sandwiches, even gravy. And you'll be proud of whatever you make with Saucerama—it's that distinctive! Remember though, Best Foods® Mayonnaise is the secret of its go-with-everything flavor, its rich, creamy smoothness.

SAUCERAMA

½ cup Best Foods Real Mayonnaise
½ cup ketchup ▪ 1 tsp. lemon juice
¼ cup milk ▪ ½ tsp. salt

Blend all other ingredients slowly into Best Foods. Refrigerate until needed. (Saucerama keeps up to 1 week.)

BAKED EGGS: For a quick, easy luncheon, pour Saucerama over sliced hard-cooked eggs and bake in moderate oven 15 min. Serve on toast. Looks good! Tastes better . . . thanks to flavorful Best Foods!

BROILED FISH FILLETS: Tempting, new flavor for fish! Spoon tasty Saucerama generously over each fillet. Broil at least 2½" from heat until Saucerama "puffs" and fish is tender (15 to 20 min.).

TUNA CASSEROLE: Mix 1 can each drained peas, tuna, mushrooms; 2 tbsp. minced onion, ¼ cup pimiento, ¾ cup Saucerama, ⅓ cup mushroom juice, 1 tbsp. flour. Top with 1 cup bread cubes tossed with 1 tbsp. Best Foods Real Mayonnaise. Bake in moderate oven 20 min.

CHICKEN AND GRAVY: Simmer 2½ to 3½ lb. chicken just until tender (30-45 min.) in water to which celery stalks, carrots, onion slice, salt and pepper have been added. Drain and place on rack in roasting pan. Next, mix ½ cup Saucerama and ½ cup chicken stock. Brush over chicken. Bake in moderate oven (375°F) 30 min., brushing twice with Saucerama. Remove chicken. Add remaining Saucerama to pan, blend and heat for gravy.

Food at its tasty best...

...this is the place for BEST FOODS

(It's real whole-egg mayonnaise!)

FOR FREE "SAUCERAMA RECIPES," WRITE TO: P.O. BOX 2083, GRAND CENTRAL STATION, N. Y. 17, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 153

use for her, why not take your revolver and put her out of pain?"

Roger's face changed at once. "If you knew how it felt to be like this ——"

"If you knew how it felt to be like her ——"

Roger hesitated, picked up his sticks and put them aside, then he took them up again, moved stiffly to the bedroom door. He knocked and went in.

They came out. again shortly afterward. Caro had washed and changed her dress. "I bawled and cursed," she said.

Alix had cut away the outside of the roast; inside, the meat was quite edible. They opened a bottle of wine and sat eating and drinking. But there was still a prickling of nerves, a not-quite-comfortable feeling. They were too polite to one another.

Wallis deliberately pricked the bubble. "Caro, whatever happened to that Negro cook?"

She rushed around the table at him. "You cad! You bounder—it's all your fault! Come on, everyone, help me!"

They all fell upon him, the scapegoat. They needed him now badly. Roger and Caro held him flat while Alix tried to pour water into his mouth from a jug. He pulled them all down on top of him; they rolled about, kicking, hitting, roaring and yelping, knocking over furniture. They got his shirt out and tickled his stomach, which he could not endure. He yelled for mercy.

"That ought to learn you, Glendinning," said Caro. Her hair was down and her stockings torn off, but she had a bright-eyed look.

"Did we hurt your leg, Roger?" asked Alix.

"Yes, rather", Roger told her. "But it was just what it needed."

Caro and Roger went off to bed; Alix and Wallis washed the dishes and tidied the room and sat before the fire which was now burning brightly.

"Chimney is pulling like a horse," Wallis said.

"Nearly everything is wrong about this house—but it may be right for us. A form of therapy."

"You should see my loft; it's a form of water therapy."

Wallis had chosen the loft for his sleeping quarters because there was a four-poster bed with a canopy there. He had simply hung his gear on the posts. The naked rafters showed the shape of the roof and the floor was bare boards. The roof leaked; they were leaks of long standing, each had its attendant ewer or basin—there was a busy plashing and dripping.

Alix took a look. "You'd be much more comfortable in another room," she said and left him.

He undressed and washed in rain water and went and scratched at her door.

"Yes?"

He went in. She was sitting before her mirror brushing her hair. She wore a white gown with a golden girdle. He lay down on her bed and watched her at her toilet.

"I love you. I love you wonderfully and truly."

"I love you too," she said.

"How do you love me?"

"The only way I'm allowed to. I love you ho-ho."

The wonder is always how there can be a mean man or an infidel.

WALT WHITMAN

They came to the heart of the summer, to a time they were all to remember. Alix arrived to spend her holidays and Wallis had leave. They were lucky, the war stood off from them.

Their housekeeping was of the sketchiest—Spinney Cottage seemed to resent any serious attempts at housekeeping, they accepted its terms. Every day they decided upon Today's Great Plan—it might be only a swim or a picnic or a foraging expedition, it did not matter in the least. They pottered, they had trifling adventures, they talked nonsense all the time.

Roger and Wallis tried to prepare Caro for life in Canada.

"One thing you will notice is, no prams."

"Then how do they carry their babies?" she asked.

"Papoose boards. Baby is packed in caribou moss, very clean, very sanitary, and rides on mummy's back."

Caro looked at them sideways. "Really?"

"Really," said Wallis. "Up north among the Crees where babies come in sets of five, it's quite a sight to see a Cree mother going along with five little heads sticking out like a bunch of grapes."

Caro said flatly, "I intend to have my babies one at a time and push them in a British pram, the way God intended me to."

Roger had to go back to the hospital for an interim medical examination. He went off alone, pretending that he was not a bundle of nerves. He came back in tearing spirits.

"They were amazed! They were amazed, dumfounded and flabbergasted!"

"What did they say?"

"They said, 'O.K., Beckon, report to your medical board on the twentieth.'"

"Oh, hell!" said Caro.

"Why? You wouldn't have me a peevish invalid."

"Yes, I would—if you are safe. Where will they send you this time?"

He had brought with him a manual of the RCAF with the history of the squadrons and their insignia. "Pick one yourself."

She looked at the names and read them out. "401, Ram—Mors Celerrima Hostibus. 403, Wolf—Stalk & Strike. 406—that's my old squadron—We Kill by Night. 421, Red Indian; 411, Grizzly Bear—like the names that little boys choose for their gangs."

"All right—make up one of your own."

"Well, I will," said Caro. "The important thing is the insignia. The motto must have a literary flavor—we're a literary squadron."

"How about 'Hic Haec Hoc'?"

"How about 'Two cents a day on overdue books'?"

"Oh, dear, we're not as literary as I thought."

"There's something in Stendhal," said Alix: "'The company of the elect and the pursuit of love.'"

"'The Company of the Elect and the Defense of London,'" said Caro. "London must be defended at all costs."

"Well then—'The Pursuit of Love and the Defense of London.'"

They decided on that.

"What about the badge? Will you whip one up, Alix?"

"What would you like?"

"Well, I've always rather wanted to be on a crest," said Caro, "lolling about, holding up a scale or something."

It came out very well, it made them laugh. The central shield carried the Tower of London; Caro, nude and magnificent, tangled in her heraldic sash, held up one side with the expression of one who is doing all the work. Alix, also nude, had let her side go to sit down and make a sketch. The scroll below carried the motto.

"How pleased the Air Ministry will be," said Caro.

"I have a present for you," said Alix.

They were sitting on the knoll behind Spinney Cottage. Before them, England sloped to the Channel, the air was fresh and clear.

It was a brown paper package.

"What is it?"

"Amelia's letters."

He sat up at once and watched her open it. He received it from her carefully, the yellowed, mended pages preserved between stiff covers. He read all the letters, completely engrossed.

Afterward he sat silent, thinking about her.

"How close it brings her. You know, there is nothing in these letters that I have not imagined, yet she seems more real, more actual." He touched with his finger tips the letters Amelia had formed.

"You care about her, don't you?"

"It's because of her I am sitting here, in this spot. It was because of her I came looking for you. Do you think she would be interested to know about her great-great-grandchildren, in a love affair, in a war?"

"Any grandmother would."

He gave the letters back to her to keep.

"But I meant them for you."

"Keep them a little longer. I'll ask you for them after the war is over."

"Promise?" She was kneeling on the grass, looking at him seriously, as if she believed that a promise might keep him from harm.

"I promise."

Alix dined with Adrian Foulkes on her return to London.

"How well you look."

"It was a lovely holiday."

"What did you do?"

"Nothing much. Swam, played foolish games. Oh, yes—we formed a squadron."

"What sort of squadron?"

"An elite squadron. Our motto—'The Pursuit of Love and the Defense of London.'" She smiled, remembering.

"Are you in love with Glendinning?" he asked suddenly.

"Yes—I . . . it's very strange—but yes."

"Are you going to marry him?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"You know why not. I want him to stand in his own fate, I don't want him tangled with mine."

REALEMON Lemon Juice helps take the work out of dozens of Lenten dishes—adds the tang and goodness of lemon juice without all the muss and fuss of squeezing and straining. Using REALEMON is simple . . . it is natural strength lemon juice (not concentrated). "RECONSTITUTED" is your guarantee of uniform strength, uniform flavor, in every drop.

During the cold and flu season, thousands find comfort with REALEMON and Honey, REALEMON and Baking Soda, or REALEMON and Aspirin. Why don't you try these comforting standbys?

A Product and Reg. T.M. of REALEMON-PURITAN CO.
CHICAGO 9, ILL.,
SAN FERNANDO, CALIFORNIA

"I have never heard of a woman holding back for that reason. If he loves you, he is entangled now. In your luck, good or bad. You may get him killed, you may help him win the V.C. You know what I believe—that events spring from people. When people of strength, of passion, stand in a certain relation, they create a field of force around them in which events happen."

"I want him out of my field—I'm one of those Bertholets who have bad luck."

She was called to the phone.

"Alix, it's Roger." His voice sounded thin and faraway. "I'm afraid it's bad news. Wallis didn't return from his last mission."

Foulkes phoned and asked Alix to come to his office. When he rose to meet her, his pale face was full of concern.

"I didn't want to talk about it over the phone. My dear, you must learn to hope. . . . This is the story. Glendinning was one of a force of night fighters sent from Ford in conjunction with a bombing raid. He was flying a Hurricane, his first job was to go to an enemy radio beacon which was being used as a rendezvous for their night fighters. He reported once; no other signal was received from him. The rest of our information comes from Bomber Command. Somewhere over Holland one of their Lancasters was being attacked by two enemy fighters when the fighters were attacked by one of ours. He blew up one enemy fighter and drove off the other—the bomber got clear, but from a distance they saw a fighter going down in flames. It looked like our fighter and they so reported it."

She waited. She drew the fingers of her gloves straight, one by one. "Then he is dead."

"Not necessarily. I talked to his C.O.—Air Commodore Dale. Dale thinks that if the Hurricane blew up there is a chance that Glendinning did it himself. Every aircraft that left Ford that night was equipped with an explosive cartridge which could be set off by the pilot in case he had to bail out. Dale is rathe hopeful. He says Glendinning is a first-clas pilot, very cool and resourceful—he think there is a good chance he will turn up as prisoner of war."

"If there is any news, how soon will i come?"

"My dear, I wish I could tell you, but can't."

She stood at the window looking out at row of stone gables. Only last week, she wa thinking. . . . They had been bicycling, it wa hot, they had sat down on a grass bank. H had a blade of grass; he was blowing on it be tween his hands, trying to make it sound like reed. She had watched him, more like a painte than a lover, to note the pigment of his sweat ing skin, the red of his pursed lips, the way hi eyebrows sprang out before turning aside The bones of his clasped hands, his absorbe look—so much of life. So miraculously alive ——

"Once you said you had a job for me."

When he did not answer, she turned aroun and saw that he was troubled about some thing.

"When I spoke to you, it was a simple matter of joining our organization here. Now I am not sure I want you to apply."

"Why?"

"Elements of danger. If you are accepted, you will be made privy to some rather alarming secrets—and you might possibly be asked to do something rather dangerous. Take a few days to think about it."

"I don't want to think about it. I should like to apply."

"Very well, I'll speak to the director abou you."

A few days later, Wing Commander Foulkes conducted her to an office in Queen Anne's Gate.

"Sir, this is Miss Leslie, whom I spoke about."

"Ah, yes, Miss Leslie, how nice to see you."

They sat down and chatted. The director asked her about her family, her education, her residence on the Continent. After half an hour, he suggested that they might like to go along and see Carver.

Carver was apparently the linguistic expert. He spoke French to her, the French of the market place and the cattle market. Wing Commander Kesten came in a few minutes later and was introduced. He was a man of quite different type, a man of urgency with a hawklike look, capable, she judged, of quick and ruthless decisions.

They questioned her about a wide range of topics, but their interest seemed to hover over the country around Beauvais. They showed her pictures of bridges and villages which she was able to identify. They were patient, they were thorough, they were interminable. She was asked endless questions about life in the château of Beauvais, the people who came there, the neighbors. She was asked to listen to recordings of conversations.

"Do you recognize that voice, Miss Leslie?"

"Yes, I think I do. I think it is the voice of a M. Dubissac."

"He is a bad egg, a collaborator. . . . Miss Leslie, if you were a German officer in charge of an operation near the coast and you wished to store dangerous substances such as fuel or explosives, have you an idea where you might find a place reasonably safe and concealed?"

She reflected. She remembered a journey she had once taken with an old friend. "The caves of St. Leu d'Esserent."

When she saw Wing Commander Foulkes again he had a number of papers for her to sign.

"Everything is in order. You are accepted. To all intents and purposes you are now a member of Operation Crossbow. Have you heard of it?"

"No."

"I'll give you a brief sketch. In December, 1942, we began to receive hints about a new German weapon undergoing trials at Peenemünde. Then in June of this year, from captured documents, we learned that the new weapon was a pilotless aircraft and that its development was well advanced. Enough of the robot aircraft, loaded with explosives, launched without warning, would be worse than the blitz—they could destroy London. Our job here is to ferret out every scrap of information about the aircraft and to devise a way to meet it when the attack comes."

She was given a place in Operation Crossbow. Her work, the translation of enemy documents, had scarcely begun when she was summoned to a meeting with Foulkes and Kesten.

As she opened the door, she was aware of the atmosphere of tension. The tail end of Foulkes' sentence still hung in the air—"practically a death sentence," he had said.

"Ah, Miss Leslie, come in. I'm afraid a situation has arisen. Wing Commander Kesten wants to borrow you. I should explain that it is purely a voluntary matter."

She looked at Kesten. She had guessed from the first that he was a member of a different group.

"The point is, Miss Leslie," he said, "we have information we want to get to a man in occupied territory. We know that he is expected in Antwerp—the plan is that you should meet him there."

"How will I know him?"

"He will know you—we think."

"Then I know him?"

"It is better that you should not be told, in case you are picked up. In any event, you are not to make any move—the approach must come from him."

Alix walked to the square to which she had been directed. It was a busy one with a café on each corner, and a church not far away. At the edge of the sidewalks under the leafless trees there were benches which had not yet been taken away for the winter. It was too damp and chilly to be sitting outdoors, she felt conspicuous, but presently she had company. An old man, probably driven from his room by womenfolk, came and sat and complained of the cold. She pretended that they were together, she read him bits from her newspaper. He was a faultfinding old man, but she was sorry when he left.

At lunchtime, she wanted very much to linger in the crowded café and get warm. Then her conscience drove her out. A sort of numbness settled on her; she did not believe anyone would come. And she must wait here for three days, they said, if necessary.

It was not a face but a voice which she recognized. It startled her; almost she made the mistake of whirling about, but caught herself in time. She glanced over her shoulder. He was with another man who was talking volubly, he was about to pass her and he had not noticed her. She slipped the catch of her bag and let it fall to the pavement. She stooped to recover it and he almost bumped into her; as she rose she looked into his eyes.

How he had changed! And how he had not changed! She must be clever, now she was the leader. He might be watched, the man with him might be an enemy. She walked a little faster. She came to the church, she ran up the steps and went in.

She chose a place in the shadow of a pillar. Now she must wait for him to come to her. The minutes went by. Nothing happened. She became impatient, then she began to despair. He had made no sign, perhaps he had not recognized her. It had been so long ago. She had failed in her mission.

Colonel Duvernay slipped into the pew beside her and bowed his head. "Alix!"

"My dear, my dear!"

"You are trembling."

"I have been waiting since morning."

"You are my package, then?"

"Yes. I must see you. I have a room in an inn near the harbor—Hotel Beaudoin, Number Twelve."

He thought for a moment. "I will be there. About seven. Are you well?"

"Now that I have seen you—very well."

"It is safer if you let me leave first. Give me ten minutes. Soon, my dear child."

At seven there was a scratching at her door, she drew him in quickly. His hair and mustache were quite white, he seemed smaller, but his eyes still blazed with their old yellow fire.

They embraced. He kept hold of her hand. "What a fine surprise! This pays for everything."

They sat close on the bed, talking in low tones. "What a surprise for me! When they said it was someone who knew me, I never dreamed of you." She reproached him. "And it should not be you, my friend; now I will not have an easy moment."

"Do not disturb yourself! I count myself lucky—I am having an extra fling. You have a message for me?"

The ideal wife is one who knows when her husband wants to be forced to do something against his will. SYDNEY J. HARRIS

She drew her sketches from memory, she wrote down the technical data she had memorized, and the list of questions. He took it in, nodding his head, he was matter-of-fact about it. He carelessly stuffed the papers into his pocket.

"More running about," he said.

"But you shouldn't be! At your age, you should be living tranquilly ——"

"Bah for tranquillity! I tell you, each day is better because of the chance that it may be one of the last. It is psychological! Even my arthritis is better."

"Are you still living at Beauvais?"

"Of course. Listen, I will tell you something which will interest you. You know what a post office is? It is a name we give to a place where messages may be left if our chain is broken by arrests or disappearances. And do you know where our post office is at Beauvais? It is a place that you children used to use in your games—do you remember?—you had your own name for it."

"A hiding place? Wait." Her mind went back to Beauvais, the cemetery at Antimes where the Bertholets were buried and where as children they had played their games. "Was it 'Under the Angels'?"

"The very place! Under the tomb of your Great-grandmother Anne. I think she might be pleased if she knew. Now you must tell me all your news."

She gathered her scattered wits. "The most important news is that I have met a cousin—a great-great-grandson of Amelia. He is in the Canadian Air Force. He has asked me to marry him."

"Good! I have a great admiration for that little Amelia. Is this grandson to your liking?"

"Very much so. But I said no. What would I do in Canada?"

His wise old yellow eyes rested on her. "You wish him to ask again!"

"With all my heart! But he is missing."

"But not dead?"

"I live in hope."

"The great thing is to love, to be quickened," he said.

They stood looking at each other, each with the same thought—that they would not see each other again. There were tears in their eyes. She embraced him; she felt how thin and brittle his bones were, the bones of an old man.

"Adieu. I shall never forget you."

"Adieu. In leaving you, I leave that which is good and admirable. I bless you, my dear child, as if you were my own daughter."

"You got back all right?" asked Wing Commander Kesten. His casual tone reduced her adventure to minor importance.

"Quite safely, thank you."

"Next time we will give you a harder one."

Next time! She felt as if she had been painfully turned inside out, her feeling wrought to an intolerable pitch. She would not go through that again for anything.

She was in bed reading when she was called to the phone. It was Adrian Foulkes.

alone . . . with cheese . . . or anything you please you'll taste the difference in Sunshine Hi Ho . . .

the all-'round cracker with that finer flavor

"News," he said. She felt weak, she sank down on the seat. "Good news. He is in Sweden. Can you hear me? It's all right, he's in Sweden."

"Yes, yes, go on!"

"I can't tell you much more—just that he arrived there with two others. Nothing about their condition."

"What will happen?"

"They will feed them for a few days—usually they are starving—and find them clothes. Then when there is room on the diplomatic plane, they'll send them along."

"Will you tell me when?"

"Of course."

"Oh, Adrian, thank you, thank you!"

She hung up the receiver slowly and carefully and went back to her room. There she was smitten with a fearful joy. She felt her heart swelling, actually and physically. She was filled with gratitude, she felt that she must give thanks to someone. She went on her knees beside the bed.

"Amelia," she whispered, "Wallis is safe. He is coming back to me."

Wing Commander Foulkes drove with her to the London airport in his car. He tried to warn her. "He's probably had a rough time, you know. He may need a little time to adjust."

They waited until the courier plane landed; then Foulkes touched her arm. "He's there all right. I'm off. Good luck—take my car."

She hardly heard him, did not notice that he had gone. She was trying to find Wallis among the uniforms. Then she saw him, one of a group of three, all with a curious, uneasy air about them. She ran like a deer.

"Wallis!" She stood in his way.

He was startled. He stared at her, almost with a wild air. His face was darkened by exposure, there was an unkempt look about him. "What are you doing in that uniform?"

She had forgotten that he would not know she was a member of the Women's Air Force. She took his hand, but it was a stranger's hand. "Would you like to go somewhere for supper?"

"Could we go to your place? Do you remember once when I was going on a course to the Midlands, we played some crazy card game? I'd like to play it again."

"Very well."

It was a long drive, she was all pins and needles before they reached Barham Gardens. When they arrived he snapped at her, "And take off that uniform!"

In her bedroom she felt her face burning. He was rude, he was unbearable—she wished he would go back to Sweden. She changed into the clothes she had worn the night they had played cards, white blouse and tartan skirt and white socks. When she came out, he looked at her intently for a moment.

They sat on the floor and played in silence. His hands were swollen and clumsy, his eyebrows were drawn down on his nose in an ill-tempered expression. He played as if his life depended on it and he played just as badly as before.

"Really!" she said, exasperated. "Europe has not improved you one bit!"

That broke the evil spell. He flung his cards into the air and reached for her and dragged her across the cushions.

"My darling, my darling!"

He covered her face with fierce kisses, he would not let her speak. "I wanted to be sure it wasn't all a dream—that it had really happened, that once before I had sat here and played cards with you. There were times when it kept me going. . . . Are you all right?"

"I'm all right—now."

"What honest lashes you have! If your lashes weren't so honest, I'd be lying out in a turnip field."

"Were you frightened?"

"Scared and miserable the whole time. Except for a week I hid on a Danish farm, and then I was scared for the people."

"I wanted you so. I love you."

"It's very nice of you to say so."

"No, no. I mean I love you truly. With all my heart."

"Ho-ho."

She wrenched his head around and flung herself upon him. "How dare you say ho-ho to me! I'll give you ho-ho!"

Alix came upon the notice in the obituary column of the Times: "Laurette Mary Eardley Caterwood, wife of Wing Commander Adrian Foulkes, D.S.O., suddenly at Briony Gate, Ireland ——"

This was totally unexpected—she had thought Laurette was the sort who lived forever, mainly to make things difficult for other people. And now she was gone, this bleached daughter of an old family. She had been disastrous for Adrian, and though he had separated from her, he was still bound by the strong bond of his conscience. Alix wondered how she had died; she had left England to live in Ireland at the beginning of the blitz.

Foulkes was gone for four days. On the day after his return she went to his office at five o'clock and found him at work, very tired and white-looking.

"I saw the notice about Laurette."

"You never liked her, did you?"

"No."

"I suppose it would have been better if she had been strangled at birth. Or exposed on the hillside, as the Greeks exposed a child of ill omen. Her life was the result of a doctrine—that man is born in sin and his nature is sinful. She had been taught that for generations and she believed it. She found malice everywhere she looked, and wrongdoing."

"Let her go. In peace."

"She left peace behind her. It makes such a difference to me. Now I begin to taste the sweetness of being set free. For the first time it is not a sin to want you."

She looked at him, shocked.

"I know, I know. I know you are in love—I won't say any more. Will you bring your young man to dinner one night?"

She took alarm. "Oh, no!"

"I assure you, I would like to see him. I am not more jealous than is reasonable."

"What else could we be but a sort of trap for him?"

"Bring him. To please me."

They dined in Wing Commander Foulkes' apartment, part of a town house once owned by his family. The rooms were graceful, with high ceilings. In the dining room the four great paintings, the Turner, the Constable, the Romney and the Morland, looked down at them sitting there in their drab uniforms.

It was a setting which imposed itself upon the mind of the observer—Wallis saw himself from outside, one of three figures, surrounded by the living excellence of the past. He looked from the Morland to the wine-colored wood of the table, and the silver epergnes. This was very strong stuff, he thought, and his mind went back to a conversation with Alix, who had not wished to come.

"We are rather alike," she had said, "we have seventeenth-century tastes."

"And now that his wife is dead?"

"I think he will ask me to marry him. He has a lovely old house near Lyme Regis—he hopes to go back there one day to his seventeenth-century letters."

"Love among the ruins."

She flashed with anger. "You are a barbarian!"

That evening, as they arrived, on the doorstep, she had turned to him suddenly, as if a wave of premonition had touched her. "Let us not go in. We'll phone from somewhere ——"

"We can't do that," he said.

Wing Commander Foulkes had seemed very glad to see them. He could be very charming when he wished; he had the advantages of distinguished good looks and pleasant formal manners, and the knowledge that he was out of the top drawer.

After dinner, he brought out his collection of miniatures. He showed them as an Englishman shows his treasures, with a depreciating air, yet not able to hide his pleasure in them. Over the likenesses of this famous beauty, that celebrated wit, he told them the stories of his boyhood, of his grandmother's purple Irish acres and worm-eaten old house, of his father's people, the red-coated English squires, stories entwined by the convolvulus of character and eccentricity.

It made Wallis, harking back to his own boyhood, feel naked as a savage. He had only Amelia to compete with this picture gallery. He looked at Alix, intent upon the miniatures. This was a strange way of making love—but it might be effective.

As they rode home, he asked, "Was it so bad?"

She seemed dispirited. "We should not have gone. When we sat round that table, I felt as if some ancient charm were being wound up and we were all in it, all three of us."

Men and armor had moved into the south of England until it seemed that the island must tip under their weight. The ships were gathering in the harbors. The newspapers of the world were full of the coming invasion. The Air Forces were pulling themselves together for a supreme effort. There were the usual on-the-eve changes in operation leaders; Wallis was given command of the City of Westmoreland Squadron of night fighters based on Kenthill.

Roger turned up at Kenthill with all his gear.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 161

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

Something about the idea of a four-day week for their husbands makes mothers of small children inexpressibly thoughtful.

In the fall, a small girl helped to plant some crocus bulbs. Spring came and she observed their sudden blossoming. "I understand better about babies now," she told her mother; "all the time you can't see them, they're there, getting ready to be."

The mother of several sons believes she has an infallible way of knowing when a boy begins to be girl-conscious: he stops working on the inside of his car and begins decorating the outside.

New wives should remember that the flavor of good coffee, just as good writing, can be lost in translation.

The father in our family declares he only worked against himself when he praised one of the daughter's cooking efforts, since it promoted her departure from the family sooner.

An about-to-be-married daughter was offered three items of advice for a smooth-going marriage:

Keep the range and your disposition at medium.

Never attempt more than one new recipe or improvement in a single day.

Finish whatever you begin; let him do the same—including his "late" explanation.

More devastating than unexpected dinner guests is the bedtime pronouncement, "Mamma, I have to take thirty-six cupcakes to school tomorrow."

Boy's comment on book in which the principal character is a girl: "I do not like this book because it is about the kind of people I do not like."

It is quite possible to be refreshed and almost nourished by beautiful china, sparkling glass and polished silver on a table.

Dieting: Putting off until tomorrow the food you can do without today.

Pure-Pak, the modern milk container... available everywhere

Here's a real milk container! No more dribble, no more drip. Pour the exact amount you want, then close the spout—keep milk's good flavor in. Lightweight, shatter-proof . . . just right for your small fry. Stops bottle washing forever. More and more milkmen are delivering all their milk in this handy container.

At your store or—drop a note to your milkman, today!

Pure-Pak
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER

25 MILLION TIMES A DAY, SOMEONE BREAKS THE SEAL ON A FRESH PURE-PAK CARTON

For most every kind of Pain or Ache, BAYER is what millions take because—

BAYER
Brings Fastest Relief

...the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get!

"I use it for cold symptoms!"

"I use it for morning headache!"

"I use it for aching muscles!"

"I use it for neuritic pain!"

Why BAYER Aspirin makes you feel better fast!

Whether you use it for morning headache, or the painful discomforts of colds or Asiatic Flu; aching muscles or the pain of neuritis; Bayer Aspirin brings the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get. For Bayer Aspirin is different from pain relieving tablets which delay relief because they're still whole when they enter your stomach. A Bayer tablet disintegrates on its way to your stomach. Thus, it's ready to go to work instantly —without delay—to make you feel better . . . fast!

FEEL BETTER FAST—with BAYER® ASPIRIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 158

"And what do you think you're doing here?" asked Wallis.

Roger passed over his orders. "Temporary posting. They're going to give me four-oh-six at the end of the month. They asked me where I'd like to go in the meantime and I said here."

Their squadron had nothing to do on D Day. Gossip from Fighter Command trickled in—confusion on ground, sea and air and very few German aircraft making an appearance. At midnight Wallis led his flight of Mosquitoes over the Normandy beaches. That night for him was all anticlimax—an engine overheated, fuses burned out—and when his gun sight went dark, he turned over command to his deputy and went home.

Abruptly the Westmorelands were pulled out of Operation Flower. "Now what?" everyone asked, but no one seemed to know.

"They're pulling out the cream of the day fighters too—Spit Fourteens, Tempests."

"Why? Are they expecting a counterinvasion?"

"This bloody robot bomb, they say."

The first flying bomb had fallen near Gravesend in the early hours of June thirteenth. They continued to fall in a desultory way, at random. The stories in the newspapers were meager, there was not much of a stir about them. The general impression seemed to be that they were more of a nuisance than a menace.

Sunday morning, the eighteenth of June, the air was soft and balmy. Wing Commander Foulkes had business with the Observer Corps near Dover and Alix was going along for the ride. He came along in an open sports car.

"I asked Caro Beckon to come with us, but she thought she should go to church."

"I'd be very glad to have her."

"Drive around by Birdcage Walk; perhaps we'll see her."

The park was beginning to look its best. People were strolling there, enjoying the summer air. They saw Caro walking toward them from the park. She was in uniform and very smart. She came to them, smiling.

"You will never guess what I've been doing. I've been visiting the spot where I got engaged. Over there, where the slit trenches were."

"We are hoping you'll change your mind and come with us," Foulkes said.

For a moment she hesitated. "I'd like to—but I think I'll go and offer up a small prayer. Off you go—have a good day."

She stood, smiling, watching them go. She put out her hand as the car moved and Alix took it in her left. Their hands clasped for the last time. Looking back, Alix saw her cross the road, to be met by an officer of the Guards.

"I'm looking forward to this day," said Foulkes. "I feel rather hopeful today. Probably the effect of the June weather. But still I find cheerfulness breaking in."

They crossed the river by Westminster Bridge; a tall red bus against a blue sky made an agreeable vignette. There was a man standing on the step; suddenly his head jerked back. The faces all around looked upward, changing their expression. There was a noise, growing louder; it came beating back from the buildings in shattering waves—it came from every direction, bewildering ——

Foulkes slammed on the brakes—traffic ground to a halt. They were caught in a cage of sound waves; the waves beat at them, growing louder. Above the sky line of the buildings a winged object came into sight. It was black and rigid, it gave no illusion of flight, it seemed to be falling on them. It passed over the river and plunged down—the roadway jumped with the shock, the bridge vibrated—the explosion came as a trembling roar—the sound of houses falling down.

Time and motion were grotesquely distorted. People began to run, some toward the river, some away from it. A car started up suddenly and banged into a bus. Cars attempted to turn in the roadway, blocking it. Foulkes drove up a side street, reversed and turned. They came back across the bridge.

A heavy shape of smoke hung over the roofs of the buildings. Police had sprung up from somewhere and formed a line across Birdcage Walk. People came running from the park and stopped along the sidewalk; behind them groups were still running. C.D. vehicles were drawing up to the curb.

"Come along," said Foulkes sharply. They left the car and ran, mingling with the Civilian Defense people. They reached the spot where a few minutes before Caro had joined a Guards officer going to church. The building—the Royal Military Chapel—sprawled in ruins.

The bomb had crashed through the roof. The portico had fallen, blocking the entrance. They made their way with the rescue workers through the heaps of rubble into the interior. The pillars had fallen, only one wall remained. Everywhere, except for a small space before the altar, were the piles of ruinous, killing stones.

The air was full of dust and the smell of the hot rubble. Beside the lectern lay a dead officer wearing a uniform of dust. The search for survivors had already begun, they were carrying the dead to the cleared space before the altar. There were to be 121 of them.

They found Caro. Alix knelt beside her. There was no need to ask if she were alive: she, too, wore the uniform of death. Her face, her hair, her clothes were all one tint, as if she were a statue in the dust.

How remote she looked, remote from a world which had destroyed her. Now she was gone from them, too, she had gone beyond their sunny days, their laughter. "May London have my bones," she had said. London had them now.

Friendship is always a sweet responsibility, never an opportunity.

KAHLIL GIBRAN
The Prophet
Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

The flying bombs continued to fall—an average of ninety-seven every twenty-four hours for the next two weeks. The balloon barrage intercepted some, the guns got some, fighter aircraft continued to shoot them down. But not enough. The Air Ministry asked Operation Crossbow if the attack had reached its maximum force. Wing Commander Foulkes gave his opinion that it was still building.

One point increasingly held their attention. A radio monitor had overheard an enemy conversation between a divisional staff officer and the commander of one of the launching sites. The staff officer had evidently passed on orders to increase the rate of firing and the flak officer was protesting angrily that this was impossible until the divisional staff would do something about the roads. Here was evidence of what they had been hoping for. There were fifty trainloads of bombs stored in the German supply dump in the caves of St. Leu d'Esserent, but the air attack preceding the invasion had destroyed the railway system of Northern France. Supplies reaching the launching sites had been cut to a trickle.

German reinforcements were moving by every possible route through Northern France toward the battles in Normandy; from French Resistance groups came a steady stream of information about units on the move. Wing Commander Foulkes, studying these reports, came upon the name of Flak Regiment 155.

They knew a good deal about Flak Regiment 155 at Crossbow, for its commander was in charge of the flying-bomb offensive. Then why, Foulkes asked himself, were units of this regiment moving to the west? A possibility occurred to him. He called in Kesten.

"These people were spotted in Trappes, which is only twenty miles west of Paris. Supposing Regiment One-fifty-five was in charge of a train working up from St. Leu ——"

"Loaded to the guards with flying bombs!"

"Will you put your people on to it? And the Resistance people? We must find that train—if there is one."

A French Resistance group found the train in the yard at Trappes. It was manned by soldiers of Flak Regiment 155 and closely guarded.

"I don't think there's much doubt about it," said Foulkes. "It's from St. Leu."

"We must get this one—absolutely."

The train was kept under constant watch. It moved north; it turned east and came into the Beauvais district. Kesten sent word to Colonel Duvernay and dropped another agent by air with a prearranged schedule for radio messages.

After a nerve-racking wait, Duvernay's messages began to come through. They had spotted the train, they confirmed that it was loaded with airframes and high explosives for the bombs, it appeared to be heading for Amiens. . . . Then it vanished as if into thin air. It was there—it was gone and no one knew where.

"They must find it!" cried Foulkes.

Duvernay's messages came through; the train had been moved to a hidden place. Then another message—the action alert: train was preparing to leave, probably by way of Warlieu. Then silence. The silence prolonged itself—it became a silence of disaster.

An orderly came to tell Alix she was wanted. "We have a messenger," said Foulkes. "And

CONTINUED ON PAGE 163

...MAKES YOUR PUDDINGS

You'll serve pudding often when you discover My-T-Fine. Delicious old-time flavor as-is. Or vary with toppings like cream or coconut, with fruit or nuts.

...MAKES YOUR PIES

Chiffon or cream pies have a delicate air when filled with My-T-Fine. Idea: Bake shell with center divider of pie crust braced with foil. Remove foil, fill each half with a different flavor.

...MAKES YOUR CAKES

Have you sponge cake or ladyfingers on hand? Try layering with My-T-Fine Chocolate Pudding. Refrigerate. Serve when firm for company dinner.

MY-T-FINE MAKES YOUR BEST DESSERTS

P.S. Only My-T-Fine gives you added iron you need daily.

CHOCOLATE • NUT CHOCOLATE • VANILLA • BUTTERSCOTCH • LEMON • INSTANT AND REGULAR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 161

we think he comes from Duvernay. But he won't talk. He asked for you."

"Me?" She was surprised.

"The Special Services found him at the post office. They didn't know what to do about him—they brought him along. A railway signalman. But we haven't been able to get a word out of him about the train."

She followed Foulkes and Kesten. At a table in the corner sat a military policeman, guarding an old man wearing the blue cape and visored cap of a French railway worker.

At a signal the guard withdrew. Kesten spoke to the old man in French. "You have had some soup—good! And we have brought the young lady you asked for—this is Mademoiselle Alix." He said to Alix, "His name is Carnac and he lives in Beauvais."

The old man raised his head and looked at her—the face of a peasant, obstinate, shut, with a great gray mustache curved like the horns of a buffalo. It was also the face of an old man, upset and uprooted. He took in her uniform and dropped his head.

She sat down opposite him. "Please help me, monsieur; I believe that you have something to tell me. Something from Colonel Duvernay, who is my friend."

He gave her that look again, angry, obstinate. "Who is this Duvernay? Is he here?" He looked about, grumbling to himself.

"Please, Monsieur Carnac, I am Alix Leslie, I used to live in Beauvais ——"

"Without doubt!" he said angrily.

"Truly I am. I am the daughter of Madame Allison Leslie, who was born Bertholet, and the granddaughter of Hercule Bertholet."

He shook his head. "You are trying to make a fool of me."

She named a number of the shopkeepers in Beauvais. "Now listen to me—I will tell you the names of the girls who were maids in the château before the war. There was Martine Rajotte, Nicole Simard, Alphonsine Goyette ——"

"And this Alphonsine Goyette, how was she called?"

"Fat Alphonsine."

The old man struck the table a blow with his hand. "You are right—that was Alphonsine—she was a relative of my wife's." He peered at her closely. "I can see that you are honest, mademoiselle, I see that you are a Bertholet. Ah, mademoiselle, I must tell you: Monsieur Duvernay and the others—they shot them in the wood, without any time to prepare themselves. I was there—I was standing there by my signals—Monsieur Duvernay said to me, 'You must find Mademoiselle Alix Bertholet and tell her. To have no regrets'—that is what I was to say—'to have no regrets and to look forward.' It was a terrible thing, mademoiselle!"

"Why did they shoot them—because of the train?"

"Yes, yes, because of the German train! They caught two of them in the wood and the Germans laid a trap—and so they caught Monsieur Duvernay. He told me to bring a message. And so I did. I was right to do it, mademoiselle? Was I right?"

"You have done well, Monsieur Carnac," she told him.

He looked at her closely. "You are grieving?"

"He was my friend."

"Yes, yes—I was there in the wood when it happened."

"Where, Monsieur Carnac?"

"In the old siding where they used to load the logs."

"And the train was there?"

"Of course!" He looked at her in astonishment that she should not know. "Of course, that is where it was hidden."

"It is still there, monsieur?"

"They were making the repairs. Then it will go by Warlieu. Perhaps last night, perhaps tonight ——"

Kesten touched her arm.

She rose and took the old man's hand. "Thank you, Monsieur Carnac, thank you for your message."

"It was a good message?" he asked.

"Yes, it was a good message. I will remember it always. Now I must leave you—they will look after you. Good-by, monsieur."

In the office, the air vice-marshal thanked her very civilly for her help. The conference broke up quickly. There was little time and much to be done. The liaison officer, Fighter Command, came to Foulkes.

"Will you take the briefing, sir?"

"Yes."

"It will be at Kenthill. The City of Westmoreland Squadron."

In the car she asked, "Did you know it would be Wallis?"

"Yes. I asked for the Westmorelands because I expected he would lead them. You know my beliefs. That events spring from people. That people in certain relations to each other form a field of force in which events take place. This night has been preparing for a long time: you and your life at Beauvais, and Duvernay—it was you who brought in Duvernay. Myself in love with you, and Glendinning whom you love. Another leader might or might not find the train, some trifling accident might intervene, he is not in the field. But Glendinning is. If he leads the raid, I think he will find the train. I do not know whether or not he will come back—but I think he will find the train. And that is what matters."

She looked out the window. "What you said was true. I am a Bertholet. Those we love we kill. It is our trade-mark."

Wallis did not know what to think about Roger. The memory of that Sunday was engraved on his memory. It began with the message from Foulkes, which Roger did not seem to be able to understand and which he would not believe. Wallis had driven him to London; with other people, some of them quietly crying, they filed down a corridor, past a line of bodies on carriers. They came to Caro's.

It was a shock. They would not have known her. She was recognizable as Caro, but not their Caro. She had nothing more to do with them. Roger had stood looking down at her, then all at once he began to tremble and his control had shattered. It was as if grief were a knife thrust, a physical pain almost beyond endurance. He whimpered like a child or a dog, he made sounds painful to hear, pressed out of him by pain. He understood nothing of what was said to him. When they tried to give him a sedative, he broke the glass. At last he passed into a quieter stage, he sobbed like a woman, his face in his arms. It went on for hours, he cried himself into a sort of sleep.

Next day he was like something dazed or broken. By the time of the funeral, he had regained his self-control. He went through the conventional motions with a white-faced composure.

He returned at once to Kenthill, he would not take compassionate leave. He wanted work at once, so he was given work. He flew again, seemed to have returned completely to normal. Wallis could not understand it. It was almost as if Caro had never lived.

The phone rang and Wallis answered it. "Glendinning here. . . . Hello, sir. . . . Four aircraft. . . . I'll take Blue Section. . . . No, Beckon is detached as of midnight, I told him to beat it. . . . Any other gen, sir?" He listened, made notes and hung up.

"Now what?" asked Roger.

"Wing is laying on a special raid," Wallis told him. "Four Mosquitoes, mission into France."

"What's the target?"

"Some London Intelligence types are on their way to brief us. All we know is, some flap about a train."

Roger nodded and turned to go. His hand was on the doorknob, he paused. "I wonder—what sort of train?" He came back. "I'd like to go along."

I, BEING WOMAN

By NANCY HUNTER

I, being woman, this much must confess:
If I must be content with something less
Than amber pearls upon the staggering sand
Or azure daisies trembling in my hand,
If this new love like every other one Cannot erase the temporary sun
Or bottle the cold rapture of a star
To hang suspended in my chimney jar,
If there cannot be roses in the air
Whose stillness fills the silence of my stair,
If Love cannot bring summer to my door
I shall resign myself to waiting for
The metamorphosis only you can bring:
The green perfection of a sudden spring.

for DEPENDABLE STORAGE

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER
... he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See the yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

Wallis was writing. "You go along and worry about Four-oh-six."

"I'd like to fly this one with you," said Roger.

"O.K."

Wallis wrote out the tickets for the operation board. Red Section leading, Glendinning and navigator Lyautey; Red Two, pilot Beckon and navigator Warre; Blue Section, pilot Shearer, navigator Moisevich; Blue Two, pilot White, navigator Lawrence.

Waiting in the briefing room with the wing commander, Group Captain Caughney, were Foulkes, Kesten and Alix. Wallis, leading his crews in, almost stopped in surprise. Blue Section looked at her with appreciation—it was not usual to find a woman in the briefing room.

The C.O. introduced Wing Commander Foulkes, who took the briefing.

He pulled down the large-scale map of Northern France and drew a circle with his pointer.

"Your target is somewhere in this area. It is a train, camouflaged as an ordinary passenger train, loaded with explosives and airframes for the flying bomb and headed for the launching sites on the coast. We know that until a few hours ago it was concealed in a siding in the woods near Beauvais; we have good hopes that it is still there, preparing to move under the cover of darkness. We expect it will go northeast by this route. The train includes a number of covered trucks—these almost certainly contain antiaircraft guns. The train is manned by units of Flak Regiment One-fifty-five and you must expect fanatical resistance. Any questions?"

There were none. Foulkes laid down his pointer and waited till the silence made an emphasis.

"This train is important. Many people have taken part in this operation, Frenchmen and Englishmen. We know that seven people have lost their lives so far—three in the line of duty. Others, like Miss Leslie of the Women's Division, have played their essential parts. We have done all we can. Now it is over to you."

Alix waited now on the edge of the field, breathing its open air. It was too dark to see the station, but she felt it all about her. Wallis and Roger came out of the darkness, casually, in bomber jackets and flying boots, and fell into step with her. Walking like this was good—but at the far end of the field their aircraft were waiting.

"I wish it weren't you," she said.

"That's all right, we're in the business."

"Any time you want a train blown up, we're the boys to do it."

"Trains—or anybody you don't like. Boom!"

The van carrying the other pilots and navigators came up behind them with subdued beams. It passed them and slowed.

"That's my bus," said Roger. He held her fingers, she hugged his arm. "So long, Alix."

"Good luck, Roger."

The van went on, the jeep following went slowly by and stopped a little way ahead.

"Time to go," Wallis said.

She could not see his face, he was just a dark figure. A sort of panic swept her, as if he had already gone and left some unknown in his place. She held on to his arm.

"I suppose I've killed you."

"Uh-huh, you're always thinking things like that. You're not the end of a line, you're much too vital."

"Then come back. If you don't come back ——"

"Do you remember," he said, "that holiday in Devon? That was a good time, the time we had the mouse. Good night, old Leslie."

He kissed her, a short hard kiss—no "love," just "good-by"—and went. She saw him, a shadow in the reflected light, getting into the jeep. The jeep accelerated at once. She watched the red light fade into the distance.

Good-by, my love, my only love.

They waited in their aircraft, he and his navigator, Lyautey, on the edge of the field. Lyautey spoke to him, he did not answer.

He wanted to think for a moment of the island, the island which had shaped him. He saw its river gleaming like satin and smelled the hot rank smell of the yellow daisies squatting on the township line. . . . They were on the boathouse balcony, looking down into the pool, and he was climbing up to dive. Roger was turning in the sky, arms spread, ankles together, turning and falling, with a white cloud behind him. Falling through the lazy, sweet, do-nothing afternoon, falling in controlled grace, falling down the invisible curve of the world, with the summer spread all about them, falling forever. Then the water fountained up, water rushing together and lifting a circle of points like a crown, then falling and drawing back—the miracle of a water splash. . . . Again he was standing in the orchard under an apple tree talking to a summer visitor whose name he had forgotten, telling her that this was the wishing tree. She was smiling, her face was the color of moonlight. She was Everygirl in the moonlight.

"Green light," said Lyautey.

"Here we go."

He observed himself, watching from outside. He noted how automatic the control of flight had become. The Mosquitoes skimmed at speed, they rose together as suddenly, as precisely as a flock of birds.

He glanced up. Roger's aircraft flew at his left wing, a little above and behind; Blue Section rose in two steps on his other side. Blue Section were chattering on the radio as usual. Danny and Ken were old hands, nothing impressed them any more. Once over Holland Ken had been bounced by a Focke-Wolfe. "Fellow flew right through the cockpit," he yelled. "Pay no regard," said Danny. It had become a squadron phrase. Complaints about weather, war and women were shrugged off in the same way: "Pay no regard."

"O.K., kids, get off the air," said Wallis.

The sea was below them, not an element in its own right, a mere bottom to the air. Off to the west, the coast of Normandy fulminated under its cloud cover.

"French coast coming up," said Lyautey.

They could not see it, but he had seen it so often that it was engraved in his head. First the thin lines of the beaches, then the tidal rivers with their scoured banks, then the wooded valleys. The land would be veined with men and armor moving to the battle.

"Time to let down," said Lyautey.

They slanted through pools of misty moonlight and came out under the cloud base. How lovely was the earth with its shields of wood and curves of water, the trees rising and breaking into leaves like fountains. How wonderful to be alive without the thought of death—to live with the earth and enjoy it.

"Approaching target area," said Lyautey.

Ah, well, pay no regard.

The flight dropped lower. At two thousand feet they could see fairly clearly. They found a railway line by the shape of its right of way.

"Blue Two to leader. Smoke ahead. About ten miles, hundred and eighty."

"Blue Section, break right. Roger—turning left."

The formation divided and flew on parallel courses. The plume of smoke grew larger—it was moving—there was a locomotive under it. They went down to treetop height, they got a good look at it as it crossed a bridge a few miles away. Passenger cars, with covered trucks, trucks in front of a locomotive which was smoking prodigiously.

"Good old Flak Regiment One-fifty-five down there sure," said Roger.

"It's our baby."

They watched it for a moment, a toy train, loaded with trouble, loaded with significance. All their lives might have been merely a preparation for this moment. He told Lyautey to report to base in Morse. When the signal had been sent, he called in Blue Section and made a wide turn to bring them back to the line at an angle. The train hurried desperately through blocks of woods.

"O.K., I attack the first trucks; Roger, shoot for the engine. Blue Section, choose your trucks. Do not close beyond one hundred yards. Set?"

"Ready, leader." . . . "Ready, leader." . . . "Ready, leader."

For a moment it was a dark worm, innocent, despairing—then it was a snake, its bright tongues quivered at them. Something pallid was rising out of the leading truck.

"Searchlight!" yelled Lyautey.

Wallis jinked and brought his cannons to bear. He held his dive, he saw his shells strike. He pulled up and hard around—from somewhere there was a towering flash of light.

The hard turn put gray veils behind their eyes. "They got Danny," said Lyautey when he could speak.

They could see the wreck of the Mosquito burning in the field.

"Never pulled out of his dive."

"Ken, are you all right? Come in."

Ken was slow in answering, his voice was strained. "We're damaged—we're still flying."

The train stood still. Steam appeared around the locomotive like a pale hood. A few figures ran toward the woods. Smoke thinned and writhed over the fields.

Lyautey made his report. "You got the searchlight with your first bursts. Number Two got the locomotive. Very fierce fire from

CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

I cannot discover that anyone knows enough to say definitely what is and what is not possible.

HENRY FORD

© 1958 THE S.O.S. CO., CHICAGO 38, ILL. • S.O.S. MFG. CO. OF CANADA, LTD., TORONTO, ONT.

Make light work of the pans

S.O.S® cleans as it scours as it shines

Whip through the pans, non-stop. S.O.S. gives you the shining combination: creamy, cleansing soap and a sturdy scouring pad. It cleans, scours, shines—all the help you ever need cleaning pans.

creamy, cleansing soap in every pad

Look what's new from Aunt Jemima!

The soup's on and in these easy lunch-time pancakes!

Soup Cakes! Lunch in 10 shakes

A new idea for nourishing school-day lunches and quick suppers. Delicious chicken soup cakes! Add ½ can cream of chicken soup (you can use mushroom or other cream soups, if you prefer) to ¾ cup milk in shaker. Add egg, liquid shortening and Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix, following directions on box, and shake. Pour out on griddle; bake these hearty soup cakes golden brown. For sauce, dilute remaining soup and heat. Garnish with cranberry-orange relish and serve.

The famous TWO plus one that's NEW

Only Aunt Jemima gives you ALL THREE!

BEATRICE PINSLEY

She's always satisfied most with a BRAND that's made a NAME for itself!

"I MADE IT..." and I make sure that the best materials and workmanship go into any product with my name on it. Naturally, people blame me if my product is unsatisfactory, and they stop buying it. I can't risk turning out anything that may be only 'second-best.'"

"I SOLD IT..." recommended it because the name it has made for itself tells me it's one of the best, most up-to-date products in its field. In fact, a good brand name is the best guarantee my customers can have when they buy. And for me, too . . . I know they'll buy it again."

"I BOUGHT IT..." because it's an advertised brand I can trust completely. I just won't risk my family's welfare on some product I don't know anything about—even when they say it's 'just as good.' I feel safer, somehow, when I stick to a brand I know I can depend on."

THE BRANDS YOU SEE ADVERTISED IN THIS MAGAZINE ARE NAMES YOU CAN TRUST!
They stand firmly behind every product and claim they make.
BRAND NAMES FOUNDATION, INC. • 437 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 164

rear trucks; they caught Blue Section coming in."

"Hello, Roger."

"Here, leader."

"Rear end this time. Ken, shoot for the midsection. Go."

He knew from the first it was all wrong. The moon lighted them with a hard clear light, the Mosquitoes showed up huge and dark. All his night-fighter instincts rebelled. From the corner of his eye he saw a flash where no flash should be.

"Break!" he yelled, rolling over and away.

Roger rolled off and away as nimble as a Spitfire.

Blue Two was slow in breaking off. They saw a stream of shells hammering into its belly; suddenly it went up in a great pouf as a tank exploded—it crashed into a field beyond the wood.

"Hello, Roger."

"Here, Wallis." He sounded quite cool.

"I've just enough shells for one more pass—we've got to get him this time. You fake a pass from above, come in high. I'm coming in on the ground." He felt his voice growing thick—this was turning out to be a bloody bad show.

"Suggest I come in with you," said Roger.

"You stay up there, draw his fire."

"Don't worry, we'll get him," said Roger, drawling. Wallis knew why Roger kept talking: he was talking against the violent recklessness beginning to burn in him. Wallis felt it held in check momentarily as he went on, deliberately. "Old One-fifty-five will never get away with this—smoking in a non-smoking carriage ——"

There was a fiery light all about them, reaching even into the cockpit. They looked down in amazement. The moonlit plain was gone: fire was taking great jumps across it, now clumps of trees were going up like torches—exploding ammunition from the burning Mosquito had set the woods on fire. The train had disappeared, they could see only fire and billowing smoke.

Roger's voice came in his ear, quick and light. "That's done it! He can't see. Coming down!"

Wallis turned back and pushed the Mosquito over the cliff. The bulge of the earth loomed to meet them, under it the train was hidden. It was like falling into a mountain range of smoke and fire; defiles opened and closed in blankness and billowing. The earth rushed at them with its hardness, its trees, its stones preparing the blow which would lance the shattered bones through the pierced flesh. An arch of tracers rose and fell in fiery spray; he swung toward it, opening fire. The wind blew a great hole in the smoke and held in its frame was a lurid landscape. There was the train fiercely lighted with the woods behind it on fire, with shadows racing all about it like an army running back and forth, and a line of shells bursting right across it. They were so close, the danger was so clear, that time extended within itself, like a slow unfolding, and they knew what was going to happen.

"Pull up! It's on fire!"

"Roger, pull up—you've got it!"

He had a glimpse of the other Mosquito, still firing, bursting out of the murk above the wood. It hung there, like a huge bat, lit by rosy flames. It continued to hang there, the flames were fixed, the shadows stayed, everything was deprived of motion while the senses cringed away from the great blow. Wallis was pulling up and hard around and gravity was crushing them, draining the blood, pulling the flesh from the cheeks. A yellow light bloomed, growing brighter and higher, and shadows jumped about the aircraft. There was a great jolt—the column kicked out of his hands, the Mosquito rolled over, it was threshing about in the treetops.

There was one slow tick of time when, feeling himself to be lost, he felt the aircraft rolling like a boat in water and saw the outline of a wing and the crown of a tree beyond it and thought, like someone else thinking, that the tree was higher than the wing, that they must strike the ground.

They pulled out of it and rose out of the valley of the old watercourse which had saved them, with Lyautey hanging unconscious in his straps.

The train had disintegrated. It lay about in the fields in burning fragments. There was no other aircraft in sight. They flew around calling.

"Roger, can you hear me? Come in.... Come in, Roger."

They flew around, searching and calling. There was no answer. They knew there never would be an answer.

He wrote the letters he had to write, to Roger's parents and others. He packed his belongings, as he had packed the belongings of all his friends, and sent them back to Canada.

There were deaths that were just deaths—and there were deaths that changed everything. In his mother's room at Rosedale there were photographs of Roger—one showed a solemn little boy of eight, one showed him at Y.M.C.A. summer camp, skinny and sun-bleached. And one taken at graduation which showed him grave in his gown and hood, with the world before him—which Roger disliked and always turned upside down. So many Rogers. . . .

He was walking down the platform at Charing Cross and someone called and he turned and there was Roger, looking pleased. With Caro beside him. "Carry yir beg, sir?" And they had seized his bag and lugged it off and pretended to send it to Snowshill.

They stood before him as gay as larks. Death had added a dimension—it had given them duration. They were complete now, and changeless. No more pain. He saw them clearly in their bright bubble calling to him, making jokes. The bubble was floating away; they remained in it, secure and changeless.

It was a comfort to write Alix: "Other people knew them, too, but we knew them at their best. Some of their brightness is in our minds. We will be the ones who will remember them longest. This is the only immortality, a remembered brightness. And when our brains die and fall to dust, that will be the end of them too."

Alix was on her way to lunch at the Euclid Club and she was taking a remarkably roundabout route to Carlton Terrace. She felt very roundabout this sunny morning. She sauntered, she took time to admire this old London drawing its first breaths of peace.

She had a cable from Wallis in her pocket. He was in command of an RCAF station at

CONTINUED ON PAGE 168

NEXT MONTH

● It all began when Pongo Twistleton's Uncle Fred, the fifth Earl of Ickenham, knocked off pompous Beefy Bastable's top hat with a Brazil nut. Uncle Fred was quite correct in thinking that Beefy needed his top hat knocked off—it would make a better, deeper, more lovable man of him—but even as astute a man as Uncle Fred could not have envisioned all that happened as a result: a best-selling novel, a Hollywood contract, blackmail, a stolen letter that would prove all, chases and stealthy searches and utter confusion, with Uncle Fred merrily egging on the whole thing and incidentally straightening out a dozen tangled love affairs, including that of Beefy himself.

COCKTAIL TIME
By P. G. WODEHOUSE

complete in the April JOURNAL, condensed from the novel soon to be published by Simon & Schuster

Your harvest of real Italian flavor...

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® Spaghetti Sauces

The tastiest sauces that ever topped spaghetti — Chef's real Italian-style Sauces! Plump, sun-ripened tomatoes are simmered with meat or mushrooms... seasoned with Italian spices... all ready to brighten every dish. Sauce with mushrooms is just perfect for meatless meals.

Now available in Canada

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 166

Rockcliffe. Where Rockcliffe was she had not a notion, but she inclined to think that wherever it was, he was giving it some bad moments. His cable began "Wicked obstinate creature ——"

There was a cable office not two hundred yards away in the Strand. Very convenient if she wanted to send a reply. "Have just received your message on my way to lunch with Adrian." That should make him writhe.

His cable had said: "Wicked obstinate creature please come love."

She leaned on the smooth rim of the fountain. It was delicious to be out of uniform—"delicious" was her word for it. It was delicious to be dressed again in too little, to feel the sun through her linen suit, right through her nonregulation underwear, to her nonregulation skin. She had never felt comfortable in uniform; she knew she would never really be a member of the armed forces, not though she served a hundred years.

She had a future to think about now, with the Office of Works. The Office of Works was grabbing all the artists it could lay hands on for the job of bringing out of their hiding places the nation's collections of art. What fun it would be, unpacking old masterpieces, meeting old friends again, seeing how they had come through the war.

But on the other hand, there was this meeting with Adrian to which she was wending her roundabout way. Adrian wanted his answer. There was Adrian lurking in that cast-iron club of his, wanting an answer; there was Wallis raging and roaring on the other side of the ocean wanting his answer. And there was the Office of Works waiting politely in its little office for its.

And here was the cable office, and Mercury with his tin hat and his winged heels. What fun it would be to go in and send a lot of telegrams.

She went in, she joined the line of people chewing their pencils and furrowing their brows. But they were obviously in anxiety searching for the words that would unlock fortune's door while she was merely enjoying herself. She took a pad of forms and wrote, experimentally.

DEAR OFFICE OF WORKS: I ACCEPT. WORKER LESLIE.

Very good, very sensible.

She wrote another: DEAR ADRIAN, I ACCEPT. TENTATIVELY. ALIX.

H'm. I don't know—what do you think, Lora Mercury?

She took another blank. Group Captain Wallis Glendinning, Rockcliffe, Canada: What cheek calling me wicked and obstinate when it is you who are as unreasonable as a, well, very unreasonable. Besides, whatever would I do in Canada?

Holding her pencil, she found herself thinking of a water color which had hung in her room at Beauvais, a punt moored in the river under a willow tree, which Amelia had made. That Amelia whose life had touched hers; whose house she would like to see; on whose grave it was her duty to lay a flower.

Her fingers wrote of their own will: COMING. Clearly these were the right words, arriving of their own accord. She felt a delicious sensation, a rising, thrilling, jocund happiness, as if she were a grapevine in the spring sun. COMING LOVE HO-HO ALIX. END roasting pan, breast side up, and roast in a moderate oven, 350° F., 25 minutes to the pound or until tender and golden brown. Baste frequently with the drippings that collect in the pan. When done, take bird up on a platter. Remove all fat in the pan except 2 tablespoons. Then make a gravy by adding to the drippings ½ cup heavy cream, ¼ cup giblet broth, ½ teaspoon each salt, pepper, curry powder and grated orange rind. Don't give the giblets to the cat—chopped and mixed with a well-seasoned risotto, they make a delicious luncheon dish. Makes 4–6 servings.

A BIRD IN THE PAN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 127

Roasters, due to slightly advancing age, require longer cooking than fryers, but, if properly cooked, come out as tender as a love song. Of course the venerable and respected way to serve them is roasted in the oven and brought to table crisp and brown, corpulent with savory stuffing—as pretty a sight as was ever seen. But another way, equally good, is to pot-roast them. Done this way, they are moist brown miracles, their sides bulge with stuffing and they have their very own gravy.

WHOLE STUFFED CHICKEN—POT-ROASTED: Wash and drain ½ pound fresh spinach. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and cook, covered, in only the water that clings to the leaves, until just wilted. Drain and coarsely chop. Set aside. In a skillet, melt 1 tablespoon butter. Add ½ pound finely chopped mushrooms, ½ cup chopped parsley, 1 clove garlic, crushed, and 1 teaspoon basil. Sauté for about 5 minutes. Mix into the spinach and add ⅔ cup dry fine French-bread crumbs. Season with 1 teaspoon salt and a little pepper. Cook for another 5 minutes and then set aside to cool. Wash and singe a 3½-pound roasting chicken. When the stuffing is cooled, stir in 1 slightly beaten egg and ⅓ cup grated Romano cheese. Fill the bird with this. Skewer or lace the bird shut. Salt and pepper the bird and lightly dredge with flour. Melt 2 tablespoons butter and 2 tablespoons olive oil in a Dutch oven. Brown the chicken on all sides. Remove from the kettle. Add ½ cup chopped onion, 1 teaspoon basil and 1 crushed clove garlic. Sauté 5 minutes. Pour in ½ cup chicken broth—or, if you prefer, ⅓ cup brandy and ⅓ cup sauterne. Also add ½ cup tomato juice, ¼ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon black pepper. Cook this together for 5 minutes. Add the chicken. Cover the pot. Place in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 1 to 1½ hours. Baste with the sauce several times during baking. Skim off any excess fat on the top of the gravy. Add a little extra water if necessary. Serve this as a sauce for the stuffing. END

Now... sprinkles as you iron!

New General Electric Spray, Steam and Dry Iron— $19.95*

This amazing new iron actually shortens your ironing day!

You just press a button on the handle and your sprinkling is done for you—as you iron! Saves predampening heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics that no ordinary iron can ever properly moisten. You pre-dampen only your very largest pieces.

This new General Electric Iron gives you Controlled steam. Never too much, never too little. Exclusive Even-Flow system gives a steadier flow of steam, lets you iron longer on one filling! Changes to a dry iron in an instant, too.

Visualizer Fabric-dial selects right temperature for every fabric.

It's so easy to use, and it comes complete with a mineral filter for perfect operation in hard or soft water areas. See it now at your General Electric dealer's. General Electric Co., Portable Appliance Dept., Bridgeport 2, Conn.

And look for the standard (G-E) Steam and Dry Iron!

$16.95*

With Even-Flow system that gives you just the right amount of steam. Lets you press like a tailor without a damp cloth.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

*Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade Price

IS MORALITY "NORMAL"?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 20

establish thereby what is going on at the time and among the groups studied. They ascertain thereby what is typical and their followers (and often they themselves) then establish the typical as normal. But no society, if it wishes to retain its vitality, can uncritically accept the typical as normal. A culture establishes normalities and then does everything possible to normalize public behavior in the direction of general well-being.

The late Doctor Kinsey made studies that established a vast incidence of sexual perversion and promiscuity among the persons he interviewed—an incidence so prevalent as to appear typical. We may here leave out of account the shortcomings of the method in a field so intimate, the limitations of the research to a self-selected group, and its confinement to a small proportion of the population. Suppose the Kinsey studies did accurately report conditions in general. Suppose the condition is typical. Does that make it normal?

Some commentators on the reports made that equation, arguing that since this is the way people are, this is normal; legal penalties and feelings of guilt should be abolished.

I should say, rather, that if prevailing conditions are actually portrayed, everything possible should be done to create a new normality. For widespread concupiscence and sexual perversion have time and again been symptoms of degenerating civilizations.

Personal and group behavior is enormously influenced by what people, especially youth, are encouraged to admire and emulate. The "function" of heroes is that their lives embody standards which then appear to be "normal" for all. During the London blitz I remarked to newspaper friends the superb behavior of the British people. They told me, "They did not, initially, behave so well. There was a great deal of panic, and egotism, as each sought to save himself."

"What changed this?" I inquired.

"We helped, I think, a lot," I was told. "We made it a policy to report only acts of courage and helpfulness. When people thought that everybody but themselves was behaving well, they behaved well too."

Observe whom and what a people admire and you will know what they will become.

If they admire only worldly success, interpreting it in terms of income ostentatiously spent and flashy publicity, they will never know contentment or peace, and will suffer from many moral and emotional derangements.

What people at any time consider normal and according to which they pattern their lives reflects prevailing standards.

But standards do not evolve of themselves. They are a conscious, cultural creation. They have always been set by a minority of the natural leaders of the community who first of all set them for themselves. People of the highest intellectual and moral integrity exist today inside and outside educational institutions. But their example must compete against a continual barrage of publicity, recording the comings and goings, deeds and views of persons whose lives are conspicuous for the absence of any standards whatever while, apparently on the thesis that crime and misdemeanors are more newsworthy than good acts, part of the press presents a picture to ourselves and the world of downright depravity. Press, radio, comics, TV and the movies probably exert a greater influence upon the young than home, church or school, and their very voluminousness precludes, with rare exceptions, superior quality.

This is especially true of TV, whose demand for scripts is more voracious than can be met by available talent, since it grinds out its dramas and shows continually. Hence the repetitiousness of its themes, their tawdry sentimentality, forced wit and heavy humor, their sensationalism and constant recording of violence—violence being the easiest stuff out of which to create hack drama.

But still education must seek to guide the young. How?

I have written before in this space about the oversexuality among young people, which has, as far as I know, no parallel elsewhere. Every great civilization has always protected its young girls from too early sexual experience, whether or not that experience is consummated in the actual sexual act. People with ordinary horse sense expect sexual play to be consummated because that is its purpose and natural end. Yet it is now considered quite "normal" provided it "does not go too far"—provided, that is to say, that it does not reach a normal conclusion!

ON THE JOB
...for you

Of course it reaches its normal conclusion in unnumbered cases. The results are abortions, shotgun marriages concluded before full maturity, unwanted children, first babies given away for adoption, later divorces, and the breakup of homes that were never seriously intended.

It is all very well to speak of "safe contraceptives." None is absolutely trustworthy, the safest won't be fitted by reputable physicians to young girls, and consummated petting is not intended or provided for.

Once girls were told quite candidly by their mothers, and even by wise women teachers, what they could expect from allowing sexual play. "Nice" girls did not indulge in it and they set the standard of "normality" and got the best boy friends too.

Really, one could learn something from cattle breeders, who preach no moral lessons to cows but keep their heifers, until fully mature, out of the bull pasture! They do so because the progeny of precocious conceptions are usually weak and the cows often "spoiled." An aborted cow goes to the hooks for meat. But a good cow is worth several hundred dollars. Our daughters, some of them, are apparently less valuable.

Callousness toward others is only the opposite of consideration. Consideration is largely cultivated through manners, and a home or school that does not demand mannerly behavior will contribute to the subhuman manners of the "subway crowd" who make public travel in some of our great cities a horror. Manners may not be indicative of real, inner consideration, but we do tend to feel the way that we act.

And as for finding new moral values for a changing world, no one ever has surpassed, or ever will surpass, the Golden Rule: to do as you would be done by, as a person, a group, a nation. The Golden Rule, incidentally, is not a Christian invention. It is enunciated in all the great religions.

That it is an ideal continually falling short in practice does not cancel its validity. I should say it was not less but more valid in the atomic age, when hatred and ill will can exterminate a large part of mankind.

Civilizations are made by ideals, and ideals are embodied in their moral systems and practices. They are the strongest bulwark of survival. END

15¢ OFF ON NuSOFT® FABRIC SOFTENER

NEW LAUNDRY RINSE MAKES WASH SOFTER, FLUFFIER!

✻ MAKES ALL WASHABLES SOFT AND FLUFFY ✻ CUTS IRONING TIME IN HALF
✻ MAKES ALL LINGERIE STATIC-FREE
✻ FOR ALL WASHING MACHINES—HAND LAUNDRY, TOO
✻ WORKS WONDERS FOR INDOOR DRYING
✻ COSTS SO LITTLE BECAUSE IT'S CONCENTRATED

TRY AMAZING NuSOFT NOW AND SAVE! FREE COUPON! Cut along dotted line and take to your grocer!

Clip neatly to assure fast service at your grocer's

FREE COUPON

15¢ 15¢ 15¢ 15¢

This coupon is WORTH 15¢ toward the purchase of one bottle of NuSOFT—fabric softener

TO DEALER: For prompt redemption, mail this coupon to NuSOFT, Nielsen Coupon Clearing House, Clinton, Iowa, within 90 days after the May 1, 1958, expiration date. The Corn Products Sales Company has arranged for redemption at 15¢ plus 2¢ for handling provided you and the consumer have complied with the terms of the offer. Consumer must pay sales tax, if any...limit one coupon to a customer. This coupon is redeemable only by retail dealers handling NuSOFT. Invoices proving purchase of sufficient stock of NuSOFT to cover coupons presented for redemption must be shown upon request. Coupon void if taxed, prohibited or restricted by law. Good only in U.S.A. Cash value 1/20 of 1¢.

This offer expires May 1, 1958

NEW O-CEDAR "76" SPONGE MOP

- Keeps hands dry
- Presses out more water
- Gets floors drier . . . quicker

Newly designed wrap-around squeezer with easy-leverage handle completely envelopes the sponge at the edges.

new low price $3.95 famous 5 year guarantee

Smartly streamlined, this new sponge mop has all of these popular O-Cedar features – "wonder-working angle" of the sponge for sure-grip scrubbing action...all metal parts completely chrome plated...light in weight, yet sturdy in construction. Sponge refills for any 76 sponge mop available everywhere only $1.49.

50 YEARS OF QUALITY O cedar
O-CEDAR
Chicago, Illinois—Division of
AMERICAN-MARIETTA COMPANY
A-M

SWISS STEAK, SAVORY AND TENDER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 97

takes time. Peel about 2 dozen pearl onions and cook so they are done with the meat. Sauté the mushroom caps in a little butter. Just before serving, remove the meat to a board and slice into serving pieces, cutting always across its grain (this helps to make the meat more tender too). Lay meat slices in a serving casserole. Thicken the gravy (removing any extra fat that is on the surface first). Stir in 1 cup commercial sour cream. Pour the gravy around the meat. Drain the onions and toss in melted butter. Spoon them around the edge of the casserole and decorate with sprinkles of paprika. Lay the mushroom caps in and around the meat. Makes 8 servings.

Time for tomatoes. Most tomatoes need sun and time on the vine. But you can ripen the shipped green tomatoes of winter at home. Buy those not packaged in cellophane and keep them tenderly unrefrigerated until bright red, juicy and sweet. Good tomatoes have a special virtue. They lend their own flavor and absorb that of other foods in the baking pan—in this case, tender eggplant zestfully seasoned with curry.

TOMATOES STUFFED WITH CURRIED EGGPLANT

Remove the bud ends of 8 rosy-red tomatoes, cutting deeply enough to remove the buds completely. Cut a thin slice off the top of each. Then scoop out the insides, leaving the outer ¼" of the tomato intact. Sauté 1 large onion, cut into rings, in 2 tablespoons butter. Add the tomato pulp and simmer until the tomato is softened. Peel a medium-sized eggplant and dice into ¼" to ½" cubes. Add to the tomato pulp. Season with 4 teaspoons curry powder, ½ teaspoon orégano, about 1½ teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate. Tasting is the only way you can tell if the flavor is just right. Cook, stirring gently, until the eggplant is tender and the sauce is thickened. Sprinkle the insides of the tomato cups with salt and pepper and fill with the hot eggplant mixture. Place in a casserole. Top with buttered bread crumbs and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 to 35 minutes or until the tomatoes are tender and the crumbs browned. Makes 8 servings.

Thought for the salad bowl. For our salad we have selected a pair of greens—water cress and the tender hearts of romaine—sliced radishes, a handful of toasted slivered almonds and about ¼ pound green beans cut into short lengths, cooked and cooled. Use French dressing for the tossing.

The miracle of bread. If you've never made a loaf of bread by your own hand, you've missed the warm deep satisfaction working with dough gives. As you knead it, the rhythm of the push, turn . . . push, turn . . . push, turn is calming. Watching the satiny, smooth dough rise before you, you'll discover what women thousands of years ago knew about the sanctity of bread. Every yeast bread gives off a warm, rich fragrance as it bakes. And especially our herb bread. That's why we suggest you reheat it before serving. What a wonderful way to sharpen the appetites of hungry guests.

HERB BREAD

Have your kitchen warm to start with. Soften 2 packages dry yeast in ¼ cup warm water. Scald 1 cup milk. Measure ¼ cup sugar, ¼ cup shortening and 2 teaspoons salt into a mixing bowl, then add the milk and cool to lukewarm. Add 2 cups sifted flour to make a thick batter and mix well. Stir in the softened yeast, and 2 eggs. Crumble ¼ teaspoon each dried basil, dried thyme and dried orégano. Add to batter with ½ teaspoon nutmeg. Beat well. Add 2½ to 3 cups more flour until a soft dough is formed. Turn out on a lightly floured board or pastry cloth. Knead about 5 minutes or until dough is smooth and satiny. To knead: Press ball of dough flat, fold over on itself toward you. Push away from you with the heel of your hand. Turn dough ¼ turn, fold and push again. Repeat in a rocking motion. Place dough in a greased bowl. Brush with melted butter or other shortening. Cover and let rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk—about 1½ to 2 hours. When light, punch down.

Divide dough into 2 equal portions and shape each into a smooth ball. Let rest 10 minutes. Shape into loaves. Place in greased 9"x5"x3" bread pans. Let rise until doubled, about 1 hour. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 35 to 40 minutes. Makes 2 loaves.

Finally, fruit and cookies. There's no better way to round out a hearty meal than with cool bowls of tart, spicy fruit—fruit naturally tart, fruit seasoned with a spicy sauce. Choose bright red apples, team them with Tokay grapes. Add another favorite frozen or in-season fruit and top with our very special sauce.

SPICY CHESTNUT FRUIT SAUCE

Heat 1 tablespoon butter in a skillet. Slice a 5½-ounce can water chestnuts and add to the melted butter. Stir until butter is absorbed and chestnuts lightly browned. Remove from the heat.

In a large saucepan mix 1 No. 2 can pineapple juice with enough water added to make 3 cups, a 6-ounce can tangerine-juice concentrate, undiluted, and 2 sticks cinnamon. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer for 5 minutes. Meanwhile, mix ½ cup sugar, ¼ cup cornstarch, ¼ teaspoon ground ginger and ⅛ teaspoon salt in a bowl. Blend thoroughly.

Pour a little of the hot fruit juices into the cornstarch mixture. Stir until smooth. Return cornstarch mixture to fruit juices and cook, stirring until clear and thickened. Remove from heat. Add 2 tablespoons lemon juice, 2 teaspoons grated lemon rind and 1 tablespoon butter. Cool sauce at room temperature.

When the sauce is cool, remove the cinnamon sticks. Chill. Just before serving, add the sautéed water chestnuts. The water chestnuts aren't essential, but they add a wonderfully crisp texture to the rather mellow fruit. Makes about 3 cups. Keeps well in the refrigerator for about one week.

In a crystal bowl arrange any combination of fruits you like: thin slivers of apple (leave the peel on) fence in watermelon and honeydew-melon balls (these come frozen), frozen strawberries and green seedless grapes or red Tokay. Or you might substitute diced pears for the melon.

Fruit desserts call for a bit of sweet. Nothing so rich or elegant as cake. Just a two-bite conceit. Crunchy filbert macaroons, for instance. Delicate—but sweet—morsels, these.

FILBERT MACAROONS

Beat 3 egg whites and ⅛ teaspoon salt until very soft peaks form. Gradually add 1⅓ cups brown sugar, 2 tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition. Continue beating until the sugar is dissolved, about 15 to 20 minutes. If you haven't an electric mixer, stop in between beatings—it's a lot of arm work. It won't hurt the meringue to let it rest a bit too. Fold in ½ pound finely ground, toasted and shelled filberts. Flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla. Drop by teaspoonfuls into ½ cup sugar and transfer carefully onto lightly greased baking sheets. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 8 minutes. Makes 75 macaroons.

No last-minute jitters with this Swiss-steak dinner. The bread, fruit sauce and cookies can be made ahead of time. The steak simmers itself so you'll have lots of time to prepare the tomatoes, cut up the fruit, arrange the table, crisp and toss the salad.

Easy on you, easy on your budget—that's Swiss Steak, Savory and Tender. But what a delight to your guests! END

ONE FLUID QUART

KRAFT

MAYONNAISE

Kitchen Fresh

KRAFT FOODS

NATIONAL DAIRY PRODUCTS CORP. • CHICAGO, ILL.

For a dressing that's wonderful on tossed fruit salads, blend ¼ cup orange juice and 1 tsp. grated rind with 1 cup of Kraft Mayonnaise

Easy way to give salads your personal touch

Just blend KRAFT MAYONNAISE with orange juice, chicken broth, cucumber ...or whatever your fancy suggests. Presto...a brand new dressing!

Velvet texture Kraft Mayonnaise is the smoothest, easiest-mixing mayonnaise you ever tried. Creamier, fluffier, it's specially made to blend with other ingredients...never curdles or separates.

Kraft's is true mayonnaise, made with lots of eggs and extra egg yolks, too. But it takes more than eggs to make mayonnaise mix like Kraft's. Only Kraft's own blend of oils and special beating process can give such velvet texture.

Get a jar today and have fun creating your own dressings. Easy does it, with velvet texture Kraft's!

No other mayonnaise mixes like velvet-texture Kraft's!

We Pay You 20¢ for Not Working!

No dishwashing with Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix... there's a mixing bag and baking pan in every package. Try it and get 20¢ refund.

We pay you 5¢ each for not washing:

Mixing Bowl ..... 5¢
Baking Pan ..... 5¢
Measuring Spoon ..... 5¢
Mixing Spoon ..... 5¢
Your Total Refund... 20¢

Here's all you do—just mail us one Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix label and your name and address by the end of Lent, April 6th, 1958 and we'll mail you 20 cents refund. Address: Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix Dept. 880, Box 6015, Chicago 77.

Here's why this corn bread is no work—you get mix, mixing bag and baking pan in every package. Add only egg and milk. Squeeze bag to blend.

Pour right from the bag into the special pan. It needs no greasing, never sticks. (Bag and pan are both disposable. No muss, no dishwashing.)

Bake perfect corn bread—the moist, tender, non-crumbly kind. Look for this gold foil package and mail in label for 20¢ refund!

Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix

Our Teen-Age Drug Addicts

Crowded neighborhoods are breeding new delinquents: teen-age "junkies," turned criminal to support the habit

By MARGARET PARTON and MARY ANN MacKAYE. PHOTOGRAPHS BY ABBOT MILLS

Sixteen is the common age for becoming a drug user today. That is the age at which boys and girls whose problems make them drug-prone are most vulnerable. Instead of putting childhood behind them and seeking the pleasures and challenges of adulthood, they live only for the "next shot" . . . and the next, and the next. They face a lifetime of addiction, a tragedy for them personally. They also pose a new threat to the community. For an addict in his teens is much too young and unskilled to support a habit which costs him $35 to $70 a week. He must turn to some form of crime which will yield him the necessary money.

Who are these young addicts, and how are they trapped into the habit?

"Twenty years ago," according to a 1955 report of the New York Academy of Medicine, "addicts were generally adults in the latter part of their life span; today addicts are predominantly under thirty, not infrequently youths." The problem of the teen-age addict has been established only recently, and there has obviously been no opportunity for long-range study of the victims. But the future that can be painted from such a trend is so alarming that many psychiatrists, social scientists and the medical profession in general are expediting their efforts to pin down the causes of such youthful addiction, and to develop new methods of treating it. Thus, a research team at New York University, comprised of a psychiatrist, Dr. Donald L. Gerard; a psychologist, Dr. Robert S. Lee; a sociologist, Dr. Eva Rosenfeld; directed by Dr. Isidor Chein, has made seven intensive studies tracing the path a young drug user follows to addiction. They can now describe the home background of the typical addict, and have unearthed some important clues to successful treatment.

Dope addiction is a big-city problem, intense in parts of Los Angeles, New York, Chicago, Detroit and Philadelphia, generally their slum areas. "The typical teen-age user lives in a poor neighborhood, where family life is disrupted, where the population is deprived and disorganized," say the New York University investigators. "This does not mean, necessarily, that he comes from one of the poorest families in the area. Furthermore, 90 per cent or more of the youngsters in deprived neighborhoods don't use drugs, and many who do don't become addicts."

This research team also disputes any quick-and-easy connection between juvenile addicts and juvenile delinquents in general. Not all addicts were previously delinquents. And they aren't, most of them, gang members. More than occasional indulgence is disapproved by gangs, and habitual use will cause a boy to lose leadership in a gang, because the other boys feel he cannot be depended on. Anyway, a boy in the clutches of a habit has no time for gang warfare, vandalism or general Cain-raising: he personally must turn to delinquency "for profit," to cover the cost of his drugs.

"There does not appear to be any organized selling of drugs in juvenile gangs," Dr. Chein observes, "nor does it appear that such gangs are a medium for recruiting users." Nor does the novice usually get his first shot from an adult pusher. Usually a friend offers it to him—a common occurrence in poor neighborhoods where drugs are available.

The teen years are the time when many boys and girls will try anything. Many children, even in high-drug-use areas, know little about the bad effects of drugs. In any case, they cannot realize the consequences as an adult can. Some try drugs for "kicks" and never become addicts. Others who try dope find a reason for continuing. Drugs make them feel better able to cope with their problems. So why not take more . . . and more . . . and forget the problems?

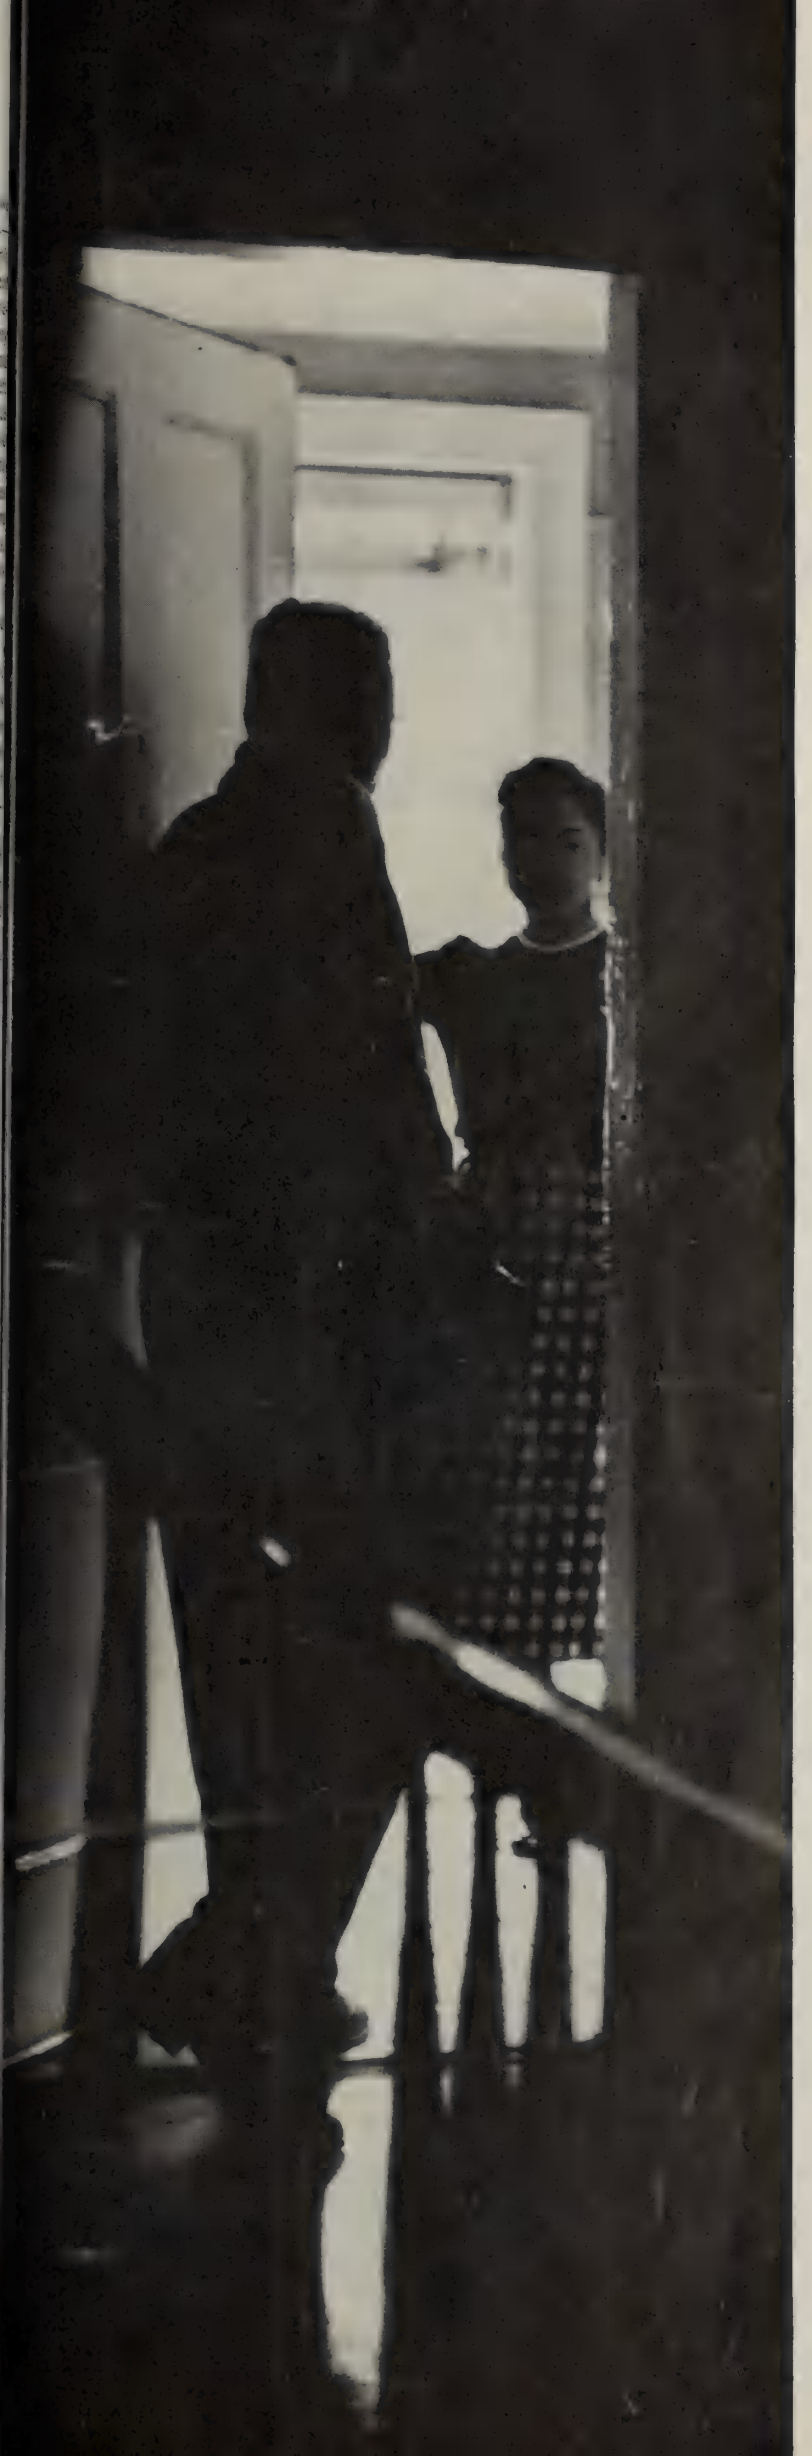
What are these "problems" that can lead a youngster into such a vicious habit?

Manuel Diaz has begun to find out. It wasn't any one thing, exactly, which made him an addict. He was unhappy at home to begin with. The stuff was there, so why not? Normally a handsome boy of nineteen, his face is bitter when he remembers his arrival nine years ago in New York.

"All we could think of was getting our next shot. We decided we were spending too much money, so we bought some heroin, capsuled it with milk sugar and started selling it around."

"We couldn't find an apartment, so we lived with my mother's father and his—his wife. My father was sick and couldn't work and one day my grandfather got drunk and told him we had to leave. I remember my mother came to me and my brothers and put our coats on us and wrapped Anna in a blanket and we left that same night. We went to the police and asked them to help us. They said they couldn't do anything, so we went to a hotel and got a room. The hotel was dirty and the people who lived there were dirty too. We slept six in a bed crossways, and during the days my mother and father would look for a place to live while I stayed in the room with my brothers and my little sister.

"We got a room downtown on Twenty-fourth Street with two beds. My brothers and I slept in one, my mother and father in the other, and my sister in a crib which my father got for her. There weren't many Spanish in the neighborhood—mostly Irish, and I had to fight every day. It got so that when I was coming out of school I would just set my books down on the ground and put up my fists. But I liked the people at St. Peter's Church. I met Luis Gonzalez there, and Father Chandler, who worked there while he taught at the seminary, and he helped us play baseball.



"Then after about three years my uncle came and told my mother she should live uptown with him and his mother, in El Barrio. When I heard we were going back to Spanish Harlem, I cried. I wanted to stay down with Luis and Father Chandler and all my friends. But my mother told me we had to move.

"My father said I could keep on going to trade school downtown, so I took the subway every day, and on weekends I sometimes stayed in a room at the seminary, so I could see Luis and Father Chandler and my friends.

"But little by little, I met people uptown. The first boy I met lived in our apartment house. I was coming down the stairs one day with a funny book in my pocket. He grabbed it and I said to him don't try any more stuff like that. That boy looked at me and told me, I like you, kid, you're down. Down means ready for anything. I told him, I can be as down as you can any time, boy.

"This boy—his name was Carlos—was two years older than me, but he liked me. Luis began coming up to stay with me and after a while Carlos got me and Luis into his gang—the Black Dragons. I was the Right Hand of the War Councilor. But there was one thing they used to pick on me about. I didn't like to smoke kids—that is, I didn't like to beat people up. I didn't mind a fight with another gang. But when it was just one guy or two to all of us, I wouldn't be in on it.

"My father was sick a lot with stomach trouble—ulcer. I think. He was good, but I never really knew him. He used to talk about Puerto Rico and how he could be rich if he were in South America or

"We were good at giving the girls lavia—sweet talk. We'd tell them how pretty they were and they'd give us their rings, watches. We'd pawn them to get some more dope."

someplace. He told me to work hard and be a good boy and never steal or cheat or do anything bad. He wanted me to go to school and be somebody.

"But I wanted to quit and get some money. I got my working papers and right away found a job as a delivery boy at $35 a week.

"So I was working and making money and buying lots of good-looking diddy-bop clothes and learning diddybop talk. I hung around at dance halls and places and picked up girls. I used to give a girl some lavia—sweet talk—and she'd be pleading with me to be her guy. Girls really go for me. When a girl would fall for me I'd wait until she had really fallen and then I'd say beat it, baby.

"We smoked pot—marijuana—in the club. It made us feel big, and everyone was doing it. My cousin, who was twenty-one, and a junkie, gave me a sniff of heroin one night when we were on the roof. It made me high, but I didn't think anything of it until a long time later. There was nothing to it. A lot of people I knew were junkies.

"I don't remember when or how I started sniffing horse on my own. I don't remember why either. Luis and I were hanging around with my cousin, Chico, and another junkie named Tato. We used to sit on the roof and sniff heroin and things looked a little better to us. I didn't know I was getting hooked on the stuff until one day a girl I was going with told me to stop. I tried and I couldn't. It wasn't long after that I started mainlining.

"I took a cure—a shot—two times a day then, and all I thought about was getting my next one. Chico, Tato, Luis and me got to talking and decided we were spending too much money copping shots. So we all chipped in some and bought an eighth of a piece and some milk sugar and some empty capsules and went into business. We worked on the roof: took some glass and cut the piece [the heroin] on it, then added milk sugar and capsuled it. We bought the eighth for $40, made up thirteen packs of twenty-five capsules each and sold them for $13 a pack. Every week we bought a bigger piece with the profit."

Both Manuel and Luis stopped working. "You can't hold a job when you're in deep. You can't do anything but hustle dope. The only time I ever went to a movie was when a girl would take me. Luis was good at giving the girls lavia—he'd tell them how pretty they were and they'd give him their rings, watches, whatever they had. We used to pawn the things and get dope.

"I used to see this girl Terry Garcia walking home from work at night, and I could tell she CONTINUED ON PAGE 185

What Boys and Girls are Getting Dope?

Can you tell whether teen-agers you know are using dope? Here are some signs (authority, the Community Council of Greater New York) to help you to know when narcotics are being used. However, don't jump to conclusions.

Are his school grades suddenly falling?

Is he playing truant from school?

Has he suddenly started staying away from work?

Are clothes and personal belongings rapidly disappearing?

Is he rapidly losing weight?

Has he suddenly lost his appetite?

Does he suffer from nausea after eating?

Has he suddenly dropped his old friends; taken up with questionable companions?

Has he suddenly taken to staying out late, refusing to explain his actions?

Does he spend an unusual amount of time locked in his room or in the bathroom?

Are his finger tips scorched from cigarettes?

Does he yawn too frequently?

Does he have strange-looking, odd-smelling cigarettes?

Does he have a glassy stare—fish eyes?

Does he have marks on his arms or legs that could be caused by injections?

Does he leave empty capsules, bent spoons, hypodermic needles in places where he has been?

If the answer is "Yes" to most of these questions, get the child to a doctor and find out why.

New York University studies have shown that sixteen is the most vulnerable age for those with the personality make-up that makes them susceptible to drugs. If offered heroin at this age, they are more likely to try it. They are more likely to find the sensations agreeable. They make less effort, subsequently, to break off. Sixteen is the average age for becoming a regular user.

ARCHIE LIEBERMAN

"We lived like animals.
We just lay around all day—except when David went out to get money or dope."

The Way Down

A couple now released from the drug habit tell

The people who knew Judith and David Straus four years ago wouldn't recognize them today—and Judy and David make sure that none of them has a chance to try. Four years ago the Strauses, both in their early twenties, looked like fifty-year-old skeletons. Today they are normal, handsome young adults. Four years ago they were broke, in debt, unemployed and turning to crime, their stuporous days melting one into the other. Today sunlight floods their home, and the days are too short for all their plans and dreams.

Four years ago the Strauses were drug addicts. Today they are not. Their story is true, but the names are fictitious.

There isn't any miracle about it, for it was a long and easy road down, and a long, hard pull up. The illness, the agony and the shame are done with now, but all their lives the Strauses will have to live with one hateful residue of the past: uncertainty. Judy and David know as well as the experts do that a narcotic addict is rarely "cured"—the best an ex-addict can hope for is to "stay off drugs" for as long a period as possible. The Strauses hope that period will be for the rest of their lives.

"How awful," Judy sometimes muses, "if David hadn't been arrested. We might never have had any of this."

"This" means first of all two-year-old Sammy, their lively and adored little boy. But it also means their four-room apartment, sparsely furnished still (because of the debts) but bright and spotless. It means David working at a good job, Sammy napping peacefully among his toys, and a chance for Judy, her housework done, to sit down in the living room and reflect on the dark road which began no one quite knows where, and ended with David's arrest.

From Judy's point of view, it began when she was born into the Nagel family in 1933. Her father, a glum man, paid little attention to her, and went on about his business of peddling office gadgets. Her seven-year-old brother, Bobby, ignored the new addition to the family. Her fifteen-year-old sister, Sally, delighted in showing off the baby to her many boy friends. Her mother, after two months, went back to her job as a department-store clerk.

Judy spent her early years shuttling back and forth between the Nagels' apartment on New York City's west side and her Grandmother Hirsch's apartment in the same neighborhood. Often her hard-working mother didn't get home until late at night. When she was ten her grandmother was dead, her sister was married and living in Chicago, and Bobby had joined the Navy. After school Judy was more or less on her own.

By the time she entered high school she was convinced that her mother did not love her. She felt the same way about her father, although she usually sided with him in family battles. She herself, Judy had concluded, was one of the homeliest, least intelligent, least popular girls in school. She mourned her protruding front teeth, she despaired at her skinny frame, she hated her curly black hair and heavy eyebrows. (Today she knows that her teeth do not protrude nearly so much as she thought they did, that eyebrows and hair can be changed, that a petite figure is an advantage; today she knows she is attractive.)

"Although I might not have become a drug addict if David hadn't introduced me to drugs," Judy says now, "I know that the emotional problems I had in my teens would have resulted in my finding some other form of dependency—perhaps a less damaging form. I think that there are two conditions necessary to make a person into a drug addict: the person must have drugs available, and the person must be immature. I'm sure that there are many kids who could have grown up fine, if some addict hadn't taught them how to obtain and use dope. The worst thing is, once a young kid is hooked, there's no chance for him to grow up emotionally.

. . . and Back

By MARGARET PARTON

of the four years in which they were hooked

"David started taking drugs when he was about sixteen. For the first four years he never used them more than once a week, at the most. It wasn't until after we were married and using drugs together that he became addicted. But David also had some problems that would have brought about his dependency on drugs whether I had been in the picture or not. When David describes the sensations he received from drugs, he always mentions that he felt 'relaxed' and 'didn't have any problems.' But it's funny—if you ask him 'What were the problems you didn't have?' he'll just shrug and say he really didn't have any problems ever. Personally, I feel that he had been spoiled by his family—especially his mother and his grandmother—and when he began meeting real competition, I guess he just couldn't take it.

"But I didn't know all this, back in those days. David was the only boy friend I ever had, and I clung to him as if he were my father, my mother, my sister and brother and all the boys who had never asked me for a date—everyone all rolled into one.

"I had known David for quite some time before we began going together. David lived across the street from a girl friend of mine, and he and some other boys used to play ball in the street there. We used to hang around and talk, hoping we'd get a date. I had a crush on one of them, a tall blond fellow named Frankie, and when he didn't ask me out I finally invited him to a dance at my school. I was really in the clouds when he said he'd go!

"But I had the worst luck—though as it turned out, it really wasn't so bad at all. I got flu and by the afternoon of the big day I knew I couldn't go anywhere. Frankie was very nice about it. That night he and David came by to see me.

"It was the first time a boy had come to my house for any reason at all—except delivery boys or something. They brought me a box of candy, and even though I was too sick to eat it (they finished off most of it), I felt like a queen because they thought enough of me to bring it to me. After they left, my mother, who was home that evening, said, 'Frankie is all right, but if I were you I'd set my cap for that dark-haired boy. I thought he was very nice.'

"David seemed more grown up than Frankie, and pretty soon I thought I was in love with him—as much as I knew about love then. We started going around together—I don't know if you'd call it exactly dating. You know how it is when you all live in the same neighborhood and go around in a crowd. We went to the movies and he came over to my house and we went to parties and school dances. Dave played in a jazz band at school, and I even sat in at his get-togethers with the other boys in the combo. I was the only girl at those sessions, and I guess I liked being queen bee. I depended on David for everything—for affection, fun, prestige. I can't imagine what my life would have been without him.

"It was after we had gone together for almost a year that I found out about the dope. One Saturday night David didn't show up at my house. I thought right away that he had another girl friend and I was never going to see him again. I lay around all evening feeling miserable. The next day, Sunday, I swallowed my pride and walked around to my girl friend's house, hoping I'd see him. He was playing ball with some of the fellows, and when he saw me he came over to the curb. I didn't know what to say so I burst into tears and asked him if he had another girl friend. He said he didn't, but he couldn't tell me why he stood me up. He tossed the ball to one of the guys, put his arm CONTINUED ON PAGE 192

"I didn't want my baby born with my addiction. David and I must make a whole life for our child!"

ABBOT MILLS

DON'T GET IN MY WAY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 62

from you, a herd of cows this year." . . . "Get a good education, a college education, don't waste your time." And waffles and sausage and fruit juice on the table. The cold corn bread and buttermilk he had eaten on the dark of his mother's hearth were like a stone in his stomach. The bill had been three-sixty, not two-forty. Mrs. Widlough had got mixed up again. She always did. When he could bring himself to tell her she would give a little shriek like she always did and apologize and tell him she could never keep money straight. He kicked at the rosebushes against the garage in passing.

He was early to school. He had walked a little quicker in the fog, hating to be wet. When he got to the field it was muddy, the school buses were just unloading. The boys and girls from the Ridge, from Bald Mountain and War Woman Creek, the mountain kids, were collected by the auditorium, pulled away from the front steps where the town crowd congregated. It was like someone had drawn a knife down between the two groups. They were cut apart. In a little while they would go inside the high school and mingle, but the division would still be there.

In the mountain group the boys were nearly all in need of haircuts, quiet-spoken, standing with their hips jutted forward, easy, the girls clad in wash dresses, rabbit-shy, plain as salt. The town kids were noisy, assured. They wore jeans and brass-buckled belts, the girls had on sweaters and skirts and hair ribbons. He looked for Jane Widlough, but did not see her.

But Addie Jean Sikes was there. She was on him like a cat on a mouse when he came up, her voice screechy, teasing. Now that was one girl he really hated, he decided. He put his hands in his pockets and turned away from her. Durned little scrawny Sikes girl from over near the Bald. For a mountain girl she sure did have a big mouth, but then you could look for anything in the Sikeses.

She followed him, looking to see if her girl friends were watching her, if any of the town kids were seeing her making a fool of herself, giggling and carrying on.

"Hi. Ain't you tired, totin' them eggs?" she asked him. Her words meant nothing, it was the way she cut her eyes at him and flailed her skinny little hands. He wished even one of the fat Mann girls would take out after him instead of this one. He knew Jane Widlough was somewhere on the steps. He hoped against hope that she had gone inside early.

"You goin' back on the bus this evenin'?" Addie Jean pursued. "I'll sit with you ifn you'll let me."

He wished that she would disappear into a hole in the ground. There was just no way of getting rid of her.

"Tell me about what I heard," she said breathlessly. "That you're goin' to pasture down in your pa's bottom land and Mr. Tucker is goin' to get free seed for you."

With long-legged strides he bounded ahead of her, up the steps. She was not quite bold enough to run after him. Fool girl. Sometimes she even followed him off the bus at the Gap road and walked all the way to the fork with him, carrying on a one-sided conversation all the way. She could talk the arms off a brass monkey.

It had always surprised him that any of the Sikes girls would bother to go down to Hobart to school. The others had gone off to work in the mill early and had sent back their babies by the welfare worker a year later. Not that this bothered old Bab Sikes too much. He was usually off in Carolina or Tennessee tripping moonshine or down in Atlanta serving a sentence for being caught at it.

Reece tried to put all annoyances in the back of his mind. It was hard enough for him to keep up with his schoolwork, getting up in the middle of the night to do the milking and the chores before delivering eggs, working on the dikes in the pasture until late lanternlight. It seemed that his life now was crammed full of things to do between getting up and going to bed.

When he was in history class he saw the sun break through the overcast and spring come out like a pale light on the mountaintops. King John and the rebellious barons fled from his mind. All he could think of was the pasture by Sweetwater Creek, the dikes all broken down and neglected since his father's death, and what he planned to do with them. He thought of Pet, the part-Jersey cow, standing in the trumpet vine and Johnson grass and blackberry stickers which had overrun the bottoms. Old Pet, her back swayed and laughable from many calvings. In his thoughts he built the scene again as he hoped to make it: the trumpet vine and briers gone, the dikes high and clean to keep the flood off the rich topsoil, and not Pet but a herd of purebred Guernseys, trim-ankled, standing in blue-green grass. Clover, thick like a cushion. This was the way his pasture should look.

He scratched the back of his chapped hand. His hands would do it, and the breadth which had gone into his back like a miracle this past year. His hands, his back and what Denham Tucker had put into his head. The county agricultural agent had singled out a shy boy, a mountain boy, had been persistent and patient with him, going the long trip into the hills to walk the bottom land and talk to him about drainage and flood control and proper seeding. It was a new thing for these valley people to hear of, who lumped all mountain folk with the Sikeses when they thought of them at all. It had been a long time since any town folk had thought of mountain land as worth working, any mountain people more than moonshiners.

He had figured out on paper how much time it would take to repair the dikes and the ditches and how soon it would be before Mr. Tucker could approve them. He knew to the

THE TRADING STAMP:

In cities where stamp use is greatest, food prices have risen the least

In these inflationary times, the finger of blame for rising food prices is being pointed in many directions. It should be interesting to American consumers to know that the trading stamp is not a contributing factor.

This fact has been shown in two ways by the studies of marketing experts in universities. First, these studies found no evidence that stamp stores, as a class, charge higher prices than non-stamp stores. Second, from studying the Government's Bureau of Labor Statistics Index, they found that food prices have risen least in cities where stamps are given most.

Between December 1954 and December 1956, food prices rose 2.8% in five Index cities where supermarkets did not give stamps.

During the same period, in ten other Index cities where more than half of all supermarkets gave stamps, prices rose only 1.3%. In 3 cities where stamp use was greatest (75% of all supermarkets), food prices rose only 1.2%.

From all available research, it seems reasonable to assume that families living in "stamp cities" have indeed been more fortunate than others. Their food bills have risen the least.

★ ★ ★

REFERENCES: "Competition and Trading Stamps in Retailing." Dr. Eugene R. Beem, School of Business Administration, University of California.
"Trading Stamp Practice and Pricing Policy." Dr. Albert Haring and Dr. Wallace O. Yoder, Marketing Department, School of Business, Indiana University.

This message is one of a series presented for your information by
THE SPERRY AND HUTCHINSON COMPANY, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York.
S&H pioneered 61 years ago in the movement to give trading stamps to consumers as a discount for paying cash.
S&H GREEN STAMPS are currently being saved by millions of consumers.

last sackful how much clover seed he would ask then. Everything had to be done according to the rules laid down on the mimeographed sheet like Mr. Tucker said. No slipshod slap-will-do. It must be done right. Better than right. With a mountain man's pride and stubbornness.

When he came to the house that afternoon he saw his mother out in the kitchen garden laying out the new-plowed rows with a hoe. She did not speak to him, only nodded. But he thought she gave him a queer look. He did not know she was thinking that it would not be too much longer she could nod him leave to go down by the creek and work. She saw that he was tall as a man now and his face and hands hard as a man's. He was past a boy's chores. It was his land now, not hers; his dreams had taken it from her. When he was out of sight she smiled with her pride.

He went to the cabin and hung up his school clothes, even the worn-out shirt. It was almost warm enough in the sun to work bare-backed and barefooted down in the mud of the creek.

When he got to the pasture and set to work he found it was indeed warm enough to work up a sweat swinging the shovel. A catbird began to squawk in the trees overhead and a cloud of sweat flies came from wherever they had been hiding during the winter to plague the skin of his arms and back. When his mind was not blank with the effort of flinging mud higher on the dikes he thought endless thoughts of how they would soon be high enough to keep out the unruly creek, and of the herd of cows which would stand near where he was bending and shoveling now. Somewhere, if he worked hard enough, there would be the money for the cows. He was certain of it with the certainty of eighteen years.

"So this is where you got to," a shrill voice like the jay bird's said. He looked up to see Addie Jean perched on the bank, her feet drawn up under her.

He threw down the shovel.

"What you want sneakin' around here?" he shouted at her.

She looked defiant. "I followed you offn the school bus. Your nose was so high in the air you never saw. I ain't goin' to steal your old field. I wanted to see what you acted so proud fer." She squinted around her. "Looks like a mighty little bit of grown-over land to me. My pa's corn patch is bigger."

He came up out of the creek, dripping mud and water. "You got as big a mouth on a woman as I ever seed. And a bigger bite of curiosity. Did you ever hear tell of what it did to the cat?"

To his surprise she jumped and squeaked. He towered over her, standing so close. She changed from boldness to terror all in a flutter of her eyes. She humped herself over the ground out of his reach.

"You needn't get so mad," she told him. "I jest wanted to see. You like to have scared the breath out of me. All I was goin' to tell you was I could swing a shovel as good as a man, all the corn I've chopped for pa and the wood I've hauled."

But he could see she was afraid to be with him now in this lone place. She was no pesty Sikes youngun any more, and he was no half-grown boy. He thought of her sisters.

She pulled the cotton dress down over her legs.

"I'll jest bet you wouldn't jump at old Jane Widlough like that," she flung at him. "Nor holler at her, neither."

He stared down, disgusted. When you were up close to her you could see that her hair was natural curly. She had a sharp little nose and her collarbones stuck up out of her neck. She had a soft little-girl's mouth when it wasn't all twisted up with boldness. But she was mighty skinny. Likely the Sikes girls never got enough to eat until they left home to go to work in Hobart.

"You better go on. Your ma will be looking for you," he told her.

She looked sullen. "They only look for me so's I can mind younguns."

"I'll carry you to the road," he said.

"You don't have to, I know my way," she said, but he paid no attention to her. He wanted to see that she was gone, not hanging about watching him.

As she walked along she kept her head down but she talked all the way. Her voice had lost some of its jay-bird shrillness.

"We got land been cleared since my pa's great-grandpap cleared off the trees," she was telling him. "It's all gone weedy now, some's comin' back in slash pine big enough for pa to log off. But they do say it was fields of corn and oats once. Same as the Bald was once cleared by oxen. Maybe that's why the dirt all washed off and won't nothin' grow up there now, not even scrub cover. I hear tell that men could make a good livin' in the mountains once and not like now with sorry corn and cotton crops."

Liberty, when it begins to take root, is a plant of rapid growth.
GEORGE WASHINGTON

"There's good livin' to be had still," Reece said. He spoke cautiously, the subject was near to his own dreams. "There's people live good in the mountains in Europe, the Swiss and other folk. They take care of the land and some of it's poorer than what we got here. But they know what to do with it. They know somethin' else too. That it's better to live free in the mountains than down in the valleys and towns with the others. Their ways ain't our ways, though I'd like to bring some of the good things about their life up here. Here a man is his own man, and if he's a good man he'll make a good livin' providin' he's willin' to learn. I aim to be that man."

She looked at him doubtfully. "I don't rightly know. That's a mean little creek. Your pa worked many a year and never could keep that bottom from flooding."

"I tore down some of pa's dikes and put in new ones. The ones I thought was put in right I left as they was. By first floodin' they'll be set so they'll hold."

He left her on the Gap road standing stock-still, staring after him.

The next day was Wednesday, the day he did not deliver in Hobart. He rode the school bus down to town in a light drizzle rain. Addie Jean Sikes was on the bus, but for once she was quiet, her face pressed against the pane of glass, watching the road wind down into the valley.

By noon Reece could not keep his eyes away from the windows streaming water. He felt cooped up in the school; the lights and the noise echoing in the big halls made him jumpy, mean. He wished fervently that he were down in the creek working on his dikes. He went over what he had done there, step by step, and how much lay unfinished and imperiled.

Somehow the day got over. It was gray dark, like twilight on the way home to the Ridge, and the windshield wipers of the school bus worked tirelessly against the torrents pouring down. Addie Jean leaned over from the seat behind so that her mouth was almost in his ear.

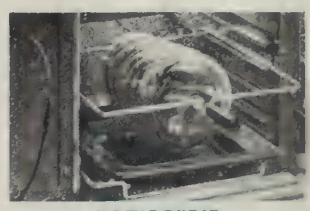
"Let me come down to the creek with you, Reece," she begged.

He did not answer her. He didn't want a fool girl floundering down around the bottom hindering him. He jumped off the bus while it was still in motion and ran down the muddy path to the cabin.

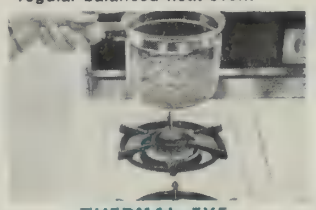
He stripped off his shoes at the door and left them under the well cowling. He hardly spoke to his mother. She went out in the rain to the lean-to for him and got his shovel and a lantern while he changed.

"I wisht I had got you boots last time I was to town," she said. Her face was worn in the lanternlight.

"It's all right, ma," he told her. He patted her arm. Her love was in the words she spoke to him, she was trying to tell him she was anxious for him and his dream. She handed him the shovel.



CONTINUED ON PAGE 181



HARDWICK
AUTOMATIC GAS RANGE

This new HARDWICK model combines so many cooking features you'd expect it to be twice as big and twice as expensive. A handsome range that brings out your cooking talents and leaves you more time for your family.
Years ahead in styling, in convenience, in cooking performance. See the HARDWICK Automatic Gas Ranges at your dealer's or gas company.

A. G. A. APPROVED for Natural, Manufactured and LP Gases.

ROTISSERIE
High broiler, with rotisserie and regular balanced-heat oven.

THERMAL EYE
Automatic top burner makes every pan an automatic utensil.

MIDDLE GRIDDLE
Grills hamburgers, many foods. Also 5th burner and work space.

FREE! Mail coupon for colorful, informative folder showing complete line of HARDWICK Automatic Gas Ranges to glamorize your kitchen . . . glorify the cook.

NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY_____STATE_____
Dept. L

HARDWICK STOVE COMPANY
CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE

Now make LOAF CAKE in 7 flavors from your favorite Betty Crocker Cake Mixes!

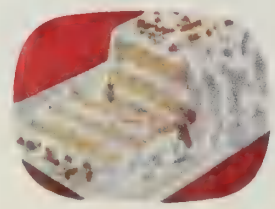
Perfect for lunch boxes...TV snacks...easy entertaining!

Here's your secret—how to make 2 country loaf cakes from one Betty Crocker Cake Mix!

WHITE YELLOW MARBLE CHOCOLATE MALT PEANUT DELIGHT	Mix just as for regular cakes
CHOCOLATE DEVILS FOOD HONEY SPICE	Mix as for regular cakes, except add 1 extra egg yolk

Bake in 2 loaf pans (8½ x 4½ x 2¾") for 35 to 45 minutes in a 350° oven. (325° for glass pans)

Four wonderful ways to serve a Betty Crocker Country Loaf Cake!



Breakfast idea! Honey Spice Loaf Cake slices served oven-hot with butter and marmalade.

Lunch-box trick! Frosting between 2 slices of loaf cake. A wholesome noontime treat!

Dinner delight! Ice-cream "sandwich" made with loaf slices, sauced with chocolate.

Party pretty! Cut a Yellow Loaf Cake in 3 layers. Fill and frost with fluffy whipped cream.

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

"I guarantee a perfect* cake—homemade perfect—cake . . . after cake . . . after cake!" Betty Crocker General Mills

AT YOUR GROCER'S NOW—BETTY CROCKER'S SPRING PANTRY JUBILEE OF FOOD VALUES!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 179

"Your pa never had no boots neither," she told him. She turned her back and began to rake up the fire on the hearth. "I'll bring down your supper in a mite."

He went out, pulling the door firmly after him, as there was a little rain stirring out of the north. He caught a glimpse of a figure, Addie Jean, skulking through the woods, dragging a hoe.

"Git!" he shouted after her. He waved the shovel.

"Don't you yell 'git' at me!" she shrilled back. She looked like a little marsh rat with her pointed nose and skinniness and her dress plastered to her.

"If'n you get in my way I'll brain you," he snarled at her. He slid down the last slope and waded into the roiling creek. He began to throw up mud and stones onto the dike. Without being told to do so, she took a position on top of the dike and began to tamp down the earth with the back of the hoe.

For a long time he worked so hard that he did not pay any attention to what she was doing, but when he took time to rest for a moment he saw that she had done a good job. The dikes were firm and hard and would hold against the tug of the current. He wondered how she had managed to keep up with him. Peering through the rain at her, he saw a gesture of the hand against her face in weariness and her skin white with strain. But he had no time to waste on her. He hollered orders to her and she followed them silently. They went down deeper into the creek to throw up logs and tree branches to divert some of the drag of the brown water. They saw a beaver swim by, a twig in his mouth.

He looked around for Addie Jean, saw her slip and go down in the water up to her chin. He grabbed for her arm, hauled her to her feet.

"Go on back up to the dike," he shouted. "Get back up the slope and I'll follow soon's I throw some truck on top the logs to hold them down."

She shook her head stubbornly. He was disgusted, but made grudging allowance for her pride.

"Well, come on," he told her.

She could hardly walk, and he found himself impatiently hauling her upward. They finally stood on top of the dike, shading their eyes from the rain.

"It looks like it'll hold," he said after some time. "Ain't so much rain further up. Bet the crest has already passed." Her only comment was a shivering, chattering sound. "What's the matter, Addie Jean?" he teased. "Cat got your tongue? I ain't heard a word from you more'n half an hour."

She looked pitiful. Her hair dripped down into little wet corkscrews on her forehead, and her face was not so much pinched and skinny-looking as delicate. Her long dark eyelashes were stuck together with the rain, her eyes deep blue, miserable. He looked around for something dry to put around her, yet there was nothing. He had a feeling of dismay when he thought of bringing this girl into the house to warm her before the fire and the look on his mother's face when she saw her. Yet Addie Jean had worked for him mightily, without complaint, and he could not slight her.

She clutched his arm and pointed. "Look!"

A great brown stain was spreading out from the creek. From somewhere above a great surge of water had begun.

Reece flung himself at the breach in the dike like a madman. It seemed to him for the first time that his body was not large enough, not strong or fast enough to fill the gap. A sense of being overwhelmed came over him and the creek became wider as he looked, the valley turned into an expanse that no man could defy.

They began to scramble about wildly. His arms worked the shovel in rhythm, hard. Addie Jean was beside him, flinging mud and stones up with her hands.

They lost all sense of time, even reasonableness. They stemmed the water in many places and it came through faster than they could work.

It's got to drop down sometime, he thought, it's got to slack off if we just stay long enough. Got to keep an eye on that fool girl, she tried to get herself drowned once.

He took precious minutes to look for her, saw her far out in the creek, being turned around and around by the current waist-deep, flailing with the hoe to try to catch a bush or branch to anchor herself.

How in the heck did she manage to get herself out there? he raged. Durn fool girl. She was too light to work down here; he needed a man, someone like his pa.

But he waded out to get her. With a sob she threw her arms about his neck, let herself be lifted in his arms. He waded for the dike, had a bad moment when he stepped into a hole and went down on his knees. But he kept going. There was water backed up behind the dike, it would give way any minute. He set Addie Jean on her feet, gave her a shove up the incline to get her going.

Behind them the dike disappeared into the flood. They paused to turn and look. The pasture had become a rippling brown pond, a big lake in the little valley.

Addie Jean clung to him and wept. "It ain't no use, it ain't no use," she repeated. "It's never no use for folk like us. Pa says us Sikeses is licked before we start. But I thought you, hard-workin' like you are, from good folk on the Ridge ——" Her voice went off into wild weeping.

He shook her loose and stepped to one side to be alone, to look down on the ruin below. He thought of the Widlough kitchen and the gleam of glassware, the roses planted by the garage. And Guernsey cows, deep in clover.

"Won't no pasture grow this year," he heard himself say. "That fool creek needs a dam in it up yonder and that's the truth."

"It ain't no use," Addie Jean insisted.

He stirred and looked down at her huddled in the rain. He mustn't forget that she had worked hard, near to killing herself for him. He bent and patted her back.

"You're just wore out, Addie Jean. You better quit that hollerin' or they'll hear you clear up to Wildcat." He found the heart to tease her a little. "What's your ma goin' to say you comin' in this time of night lookin' like you've been drug through a keyhole?" he asked.

"My ma don't care for nothin'," she said, her voice shrill, "only that I don't bring home another youngun for her to raise." She flung her head back and looked straight at him. "Hit sure don't pay to look above yourself," she told him. "It don't do no good for me to take out after you just like it don't do no good for you to want somethin' above you, neither. Like Jane Widlough and a fine valley farm up here on the Ridge."

He took her arm and his grip was not gentle. "You got some things backwards, Miss Fancy," he said. "I don't want Jane Widlough, if that's what you been thinkin'. But when I look for a gal I want her soft and pretty like town girls, but with grit like mountain folk. And I don't look for a valley farm. I want a mountain farm and a mountain pasture right by this creek and I'll fight to get it same's my pa did and my gran'pa. But I want it my way, the right way, and I ain't licked yet, you wait and see. 'Bout the only thing I got left now is fight and stubbornness and I was born with that."

Her eyes slid away from him. "I got to go," she said. "My ma is goin' to give me a lickin' for sure."

But he held her arm tightly. "Ain't nobody goin' to give you a lickin'." He frowned.

She jerked away. "A lot you know about what I'm goin' to get or not," she hollered at him. "What do you know about the way I got to live? You sure do make things sound nice and easy."

"Why can't you act right?" he shouted down into her face. "Why don't you quit low-ratin' yourself? Why don't you fix yourself up, stop bein' so no 'count!"

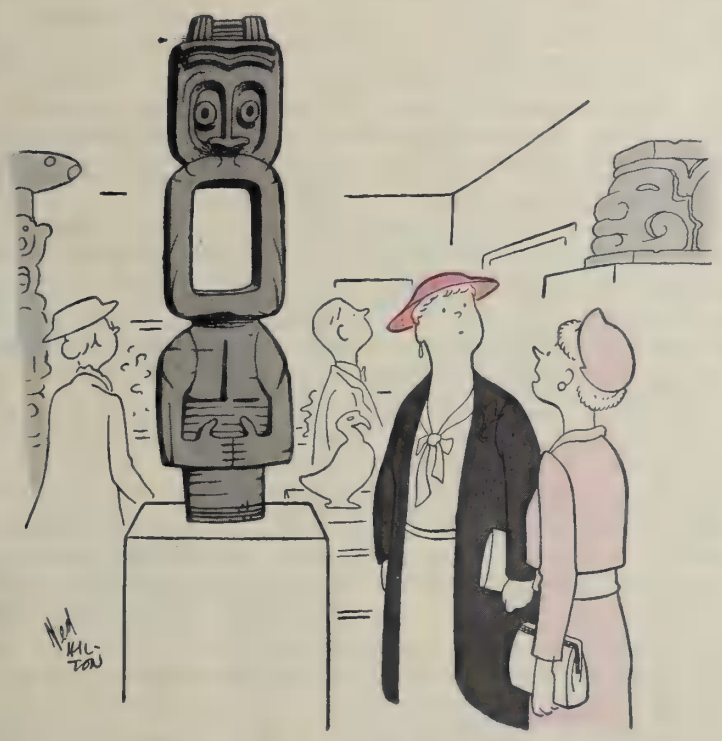
He was appalled at the effect his words had on her. He pulled her close, put his face on her cheek.

"Don't cry," he said awkwardly. "I guess we both look pretty sorry now. But, Addie Jean, you're a right pretty girl, and you sure have more spunk than anybody I ever saw. You wait and see. We'll show them."

He was sure he wanted only to comfort her, to make her stop crying. But for some reason he bent his head and kissed her. It took a long time.

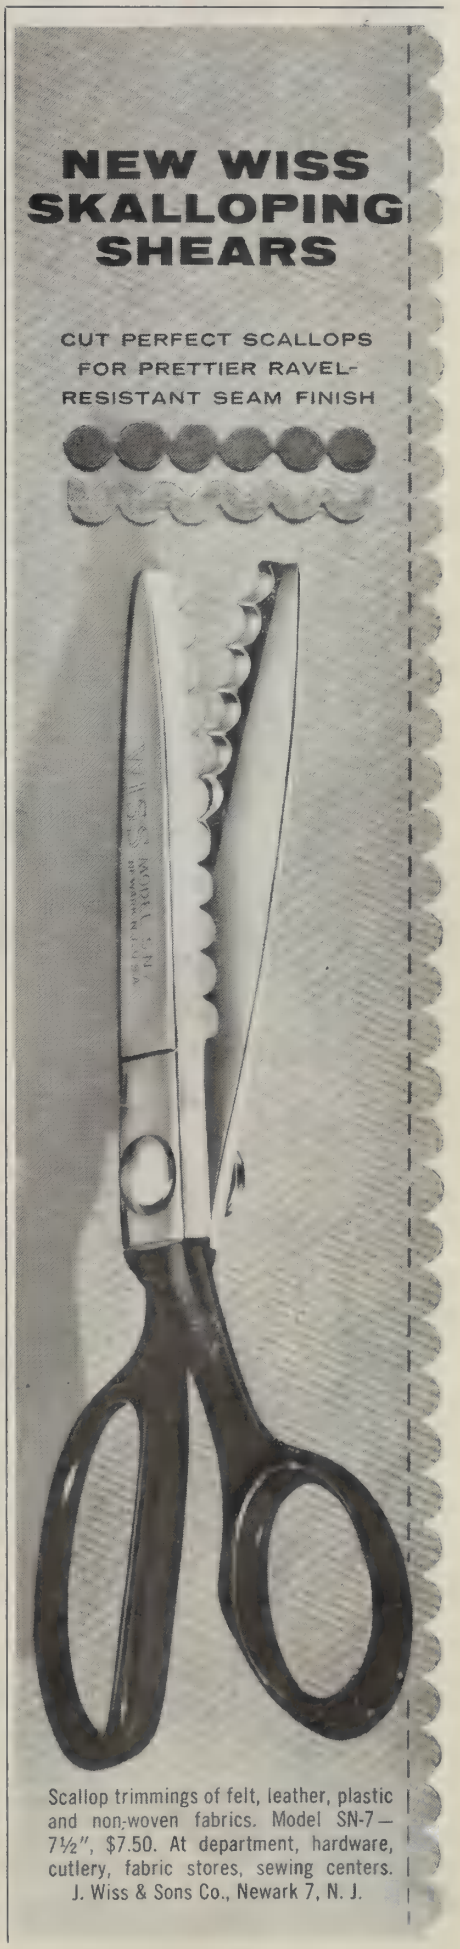
"Man," he said finally, "you sure do make a feller's head spin."

She struggled in his arms. "Let go," she cried. "When my pa gets back he's goin' to kick me out for sure, send me down to Hobart to stay with Rena and Martha Belle to work in the mill. I knowed I'd have to drop out of school. I only went 'cause of you, anyway. I thought I'd plumb die wantin' you to take notice of me."



"Never mind what your pa said," he told her. "You ain't goin' to work in no mill. You're too skinny to do much work and that's for sure. Beats me how you can work hard as a man as little as you are."

He kissed her again. His work lay in ruins in the pasture where he could see it, but it was surprising how hopeful he could feel about it. He tried to get his thoughts in order.



"Don't know what ma is goin' to say," he said gruffly. "I guess she thought it would be a couple more years anyway before I brought a gal home. Stop cryin', Addie Jean. First thing I'm goin' to do, I'm goin' to get you a ribbon for your hair. No, first thing I'm goin' to do, I'm goin' to get ma to feed you up some. You sure are a disgrace to good vittles."

She started to laugh with her sobbing. She hung on his arm, her eyes big and shining. He began to feel impatient, like there was a lot of work to do, a lot of things to plan for and be happy about. He pulled her away, dragging her by the hand over the rocks and mud in their path. His face hardened, black-browed, thinking.

"Addie Jean, sugar," he said suddenly, "you ever broadcast any clover seed?" END

"How's Uncle Harry's indigestion lately?"

Scallop trimmings of felt, leather, plastic and non-woven fabrics. Model SN-7—7½", $7.50. At department, hardware, cutlery, fabric stores, sewing centers.
J. Wiss & Sons Co., Newark 7, N. J.

However you "cream" your coffee —

You'll love the fresh taste and the convenience of PREAM!

Extra creaminess. Delicious Pream is made entirely from fresh sweet cream and other milk products. The exclusive Pream process captures their fresh taste for your table.

Extra convenience. Pream stays fresh in daily use without refrigeration. And new Economy Size Pream® "creams" up to 70 cups of coffee.

If you like it "with," you'll love it with Pream! Buy Pream in the Regular or Economy Size at your favorite store—use it every day!

Easy recipe! POTATOES A LA PREAM

Bake large, greased potatoes in 400°F. oven until done. Scoop out. Mash with 1 tbsp. Pream, 2 tbsp. hot water, 1 tbsp. butter or margarine, ¼ tsp. salt per potato. Pile into shell. Bake 10-15 mins. or until lightly browned.

FREE RECIPE FOLDER! Write Sally Ross, Pream Test Kitchen, Box 447, Columbus 16, Ohio.

THE AMETHYST CAT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 60

would for an instant drop; never, if he seized his chance, to be picked up again.

He went back to the shop next day and wrote out a check.

Sherrard had known all along that he was buying no common cat; the personality it developed, on the flight to New York, was nonetheless disconcerting. It created difficulties, and attracted attention, all the way.

To begin with, he hadn't cared to pack it in his luggage. It was too precious, and possibly too fragile. (It might have survived at least a century of racketing about, and perhaps a century before that; Sherrard still thought of it as fragile, because precious.) So he stuffed it into his overnight bag, where its weight, on the airport scales, produced a startled query from the officer in charge. "It's a cat," said Sherrard shortly. "I've a cat in my bag." Someone to the rear laughed, but the officer looked grim. "Livestock?" he inquired sternly. "No, quartz," snapped Sherrard. He pulled it out; the officer grinned and passed him—on payment of excess; and as they were immediately marshaled to their plane Sherrard boarded it with the cat under his arm.

Unusually, the seat beside him remained vacant. Having dumped the cat down on it, he left it there. The cat settled down very comfortably but continued to attract attention. Sherrard was reminded of the one and only flight he'd made with his Aunt Gertrude—a charming and sociable old lady who'd apparently regarded the whole trip as a nice at home given by the airline. Like his Aunt Gertrude—which was something—the cat made contact only with the nicest people: chiefly elderly ladies traveling with their husbands. One such couple—whom Sherrard mentally christened the Texans, on no other grounds than the man's broad-brimmed hat and general air of prosperity—sat directly across the aisle; this lady in particular was perfectly charmed by the cat, and the cat, it couldn't be denied, appeared most complacently to receive her attentions. It didn't purr—it couldn't—but it appeared to purr. Finally Sherrard, who unlike his Aunt Gertrude felt no social obligations whatever, covered it over with his scarf.

He was nonetheless roused from sleep, shortly before arrival, by the Texan.

"Pardon me, I thought you were awake," the Texan apologized.

"At least I should be," said Sherrard—his Aunt Gertrude, as it were, reminding him of his manners.

"The fact is, my wife's taken a remarkable fancy to your cat. If I could get one similar for her, I'd be very glad to know where to go for it."

"I'm sorry, I'm afraid this one's about two hundred years old," said Sherrard.

The Texan looked at it respectfully. (Somehow, during the night, it had got its head out again.) "You mean no one makes them nowadays?"

"Not that I know of," said Sherrard.

"Too bad," said the Texan regretfully. "All the same, I'd like you to take my card—just to show Maisie I'm trying. If you ever run across another and have the kindness to let me know, I'll be deeply obliged."

Sherrard pocketed the bit of pasteboard and tried to doze off again. But he'd been disturbed, for a man of his fifty years, too thoroughly; instead he sat and thought about Maria.

The cat dozed off all right. Sherrard didn't remember pulling the scarf over its head a second time, but when he looked again not an ear showed. It was thus in fine fettle to make an exhibition of itself at the customs but, leaning on its age, carried Sherrard through without difficulty.

Sherrard reached Maria's flat about seven that evening. There were several professional contacts he had needed to make first; he'd had no time to get the cat wrapped, as he'd thought of doing, in some elegant packing. It was still simply muffled in his scarf. But as he set it down, so muffled, on the little table in the center of her living room, it presented at least an intriguing shape.

Maria was there waiting for him. He'd cabled her. Actually he'd cabled her twice—once from London, once from Gander.

"You are the nicest friend in the world!" cried Maria. There was still, even in the pretty affectionate phrase, a formality: as though she offered a little poem of welcome brushed across a fan. She stood before him nonetheless so exquisitely beautiful, so explicitly friendly that his heart rose. "And you've brought me a present from England!" cried Maria. "Really you're too good!"

Smiling and eager, she poked at the bundle with a tentative forefinger. It was another of her charming traits that she was readily pleased and always showed her pleasure; yet Sherrard had no doubt that she reserved pleasure still in store, so to speak, that she would find the unimaginably right words of gratitude and admiration, when she saw his marvelous gift; that before the cat her compatriot, in short, the fan of reserve would at last drop. Already she was more eager, more caught up by a flow of pleasure and excitement, than he had ever seen her.

"Do I unwrap it, or do you show it me?" demanded Maria. "I'm not going to guess. I'm too impatient!"

"Sit down, and I'll put it in your lap," said Sherrard.

Obediently, Maria sat. She even (to give him pleasure) closed her eyes—and this momentarily distracted Sherrard, for he had never before seen Maria with her eyes shut. She looked at once ageless and very young; her lids were the color of tea roses; and with irrational tenderness Sherrard realized that her lashes weren't long, as he'd always believed them, but quite short and scrubby, like little brushes.

"What are you waiting for?" urged Maria.

Sherrard pulled the cat out of its wrappings and set it down on her knee, between her slim, welcoming hands.

For an instant, undoubtedly, as she opened her eyes, the fan dropped. But only for an instant. Almost immediately her features recomposed themselves into an expression of extreme politeness.

"How perfectly lovely," said Maria.

Sherrard picked up the table lamp and held it so that the light shone down through the violet ears.

"It's amethyst quartz."

"I see it is. Lovely!" repeated Maria. With quick, intelligent fingers she traced the curve from nape to tail, tipped the cat over, scrutinized its underneath, and settled it back between her palms. "Oh, dear, I hope you didn't pay too much for it!" cried Maria uncontrollably.

Then Sherrard knew that the emotion she'd so briefly betrayed had indeed been what he'd fancied it. For a moment, incredulously, he'd fancied she was disappointed. Now he knew she was.

"Does that mean it's no good?"

"Of course not! It's beautiful! Only if they told you it was eighteenth century, you might have paid four or five hundred dollars."

Sherrard was very quick-witted. He saw what was coming and got in first. "Of course it's only a modern reproduction."

Maria smiled with relief. "I'm so glad you weren't robbed—as people can be, quite shockingly! Now I can enjoy my present with a good conscience!"

She jumped up, and set the cat first on the table again, then on a taboret, then on the mantelpiece, seeking where it would look best; she gaily and charmingly made a fuss of it, even giving it a vase of violets to smell at, a little silver box to play with. Nothing could have been prettier; but Sherrard remained unhappy. He was indeed in a most distressing quandary: the sheer costliness of the gift had been a large part of its point—a declaration, so to speak, of his intentions; yet he couldn't now admit to it without also admitting himself a sucker—worse, without bringing down on his head Maria's mingled sympathy and exasperation. She had always an acute dislike of any kind of waste—in her early days in America, Sherrard recalled, how she'd worried over the crusts cut off from sandwiches!—and waste of money ranked next with her to waste of food. She was very nearly parsimonious. Considering her starveling infancy, the trait was a natural one; for the first time, Sherrard found himself disliking it. He hadn't toted the cat across the ocean to have its price asked! True, Maria hadn't done so yet, in so many words, but Sherrard strongly suspected her of wanting to: certain of finding it exorbitant in any case.

He also suspected—too late, too late!—that she didn't much care for the cat at all.

"Next time I'll bring you a cashmere twin set," said he.

Undeniably, her eye sparkled. "Will you? I'll give you my size."

It didn't soothe Sherrard's soreness that the cat meanwhile continued to sit handsome and complacent as ever, looking every minute of two hundred years old. It met Sherrard's gaze affably. All right, so you fooled me, thought Sherrard. (It didn't, oddly enough, occur to him that he might have been fooled by the shopkeeper; he was convinced that the cat had fooled them both.) But now you've run into an expert, thought Sherrard nastily, and as soon as I'm out of town you'll be put in your proper place—which is probably the back of a clothes closet.

Naturally the cat's expression didn't alter. Maria exclaimed afresh, that very moment, at its air of aplomb. Sherrard gave the impostor another dirty look, for his own aplomb left much to be desired—he having just realized the implications of his hasty threat. As soon as I'm out of town, he'd warned the cat; did he then mean to leave cat and Maria together behind him? Wasn't he, after all, going to ask Maria to be his wife? And if not, why not? Because she'd wanted to know how much he'd paid for her present? Put so, the thing was ridiculous: there stood Maria just as exquisite as he remembered her, just as charmingly affectionate, having moreover, and at last, dropped the fan of her reserve—and moreover to reveal behind it the admirable wifely quality of concern for a man's pocket.

What an admirable wife she would make!

She'd probably run a wonderfully economical kitchen.

Not impossibly, when he wanted to go out on the town, she'd have something in the oven.

She'd certainly want to see any dinner check.

Sherrard glanced again at the amethyst cat, and the cat with ancient wisdom gazed back at Sherrard. (With fictitiously ancient wisdom, Sherrard reminded himself.) It was shocking, and it was completely out of period, that the cat appeared to murmur something under its whiskers about wives to keep men steady, but concubines to keep them young. For a moment Sherrard felt he should absolutely apologize to Maria for the cat's immorality; but on second thought recognized that to her a lump of quartz, however masterly carved, remained simply a lump of quartz.

Which brought him to another point. Beautiful Maria—sensible and kind Maria—lacked imagination. And what else do I deal in? Sherrard asked himself. I, the factual reporter, what else after all do I deal in? Don't I produce, for those who haven't the wit or opportunity to make them for themselves, the images of President, Prime Minister, statesman? Don't I image the whole world, or try to, in a column of print? Maybe it would be all right for me, maybe it would be even good for me, to marry a wife with no imagination at all; but somehow I don't think so.

Complacently upon Maria's mantelpiece sat the amethyst cat.

Sherrard turned back to her. He didn't know how long the silence had lasted, only that it had lasted quite long enough.

"Where would you like to go for dinner?" he asked uneasily.

Now Maria was looking uneasily at him. "My dear, I hate to tell you," she apologized, "but actually I've a date already. And it's one I can't put off—with a boy from China, a boy who knew my family there. It's his first evening in New York, you see; without me he won't know what to do with himself. You do, do understand, don't you?"

"Perfectly," said Sherrard. "You'll see he isn't robbed."

Maria laughed in happy relief. "That among other things! Though tonight I think he wants to be rather grand and extravagant, to celebrate getting here!"

"Just for once I don't suppose it matters," suggested Sherrard, "if you keep him on a tight rein afterward?"

"Oh, I mean to," agreed Maria seriously. (No wonder the cat looked smug. "That's the sort of lad for her," it seemed to say, "a lad she can boss about; see what I've saved you from!" Sherrard ignored the brute.) "So I really ought to dress up a little," added Maria, now glancing frankly at the clock, "but won't you wait and meet him? He's studying medicine, and he seems to be really quite brilliant. Please wait!"

"If you want me to, of course I will," said Sherrard amiably.

He felt suddenly flat—flat and sore. He wasn't yet grateful to the cat at all. He felt let down. For nothing had turned out as he'd planned; even his own emotions had gone adrift, he didn't even feel jealous of the boy from China; and it wasn't exactly Maria's fault, so that he couldn't even feel angry with Maria. His anger turned itself upon the cat—upon the smug impostor he'd toted home, with no other result than to put himself, Sherrard, in danger of looking a fool.

What's the Chinese name that means Labor in Vain? Sherrard mentally inquired of the amethyst cat. You should know: it's yours.

He had been alone perhaps five minutes (while Maria dressed up) when the door discreetly opened. The old party who now joined him, however, was in appearance at least less discreet than showy.

Maria's efforts to turn her uncle into a 100 per cent American had in one respect succeeded only too well: he wore a tropical shirt. There were hibiscus blossoms upon it, also sea horses, also bathing beauties; but above its brilliant uninhibited coloring a face like an old walnut peered incongruously diffident, humble and submissive.

VISITOR

By MARJORIE LEDERER LEE

When love came calling yesterday
I was in town, and not about;
He rang a dozen times (they say)—
But I was out.

He carried quite a wondrous stock (I'm told by neighbors on the block):
Impractical and fragile ware—
A kind of halo for the hair,
An angel's gown with sunbeam ties,
A vial of star drops for the eyes,
A chariot with silver wheel,
And sandals, wingèd at the heel. . . .

I would have bought them on the spot,
Although impractical, indeed;
A woman really needs a lot Of things she doesn't really need.

And so when love comes back to lure
Me to his trade, my heart to win—
Of this you may be very sure:
I shall be in.

These actual statements are typical of the experience of hundreds of thousands with

America's Most Popular Reducing Book

...AND IT COSTS YOU NOTHING

If your doctor says you are overweight, ask him about the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan, with its unique Choice-of-Foods Charts.

This extremely successful Plan is unlike any other method you ever heard of.

It can be lots easier than you think. Without dangerous drugs, pills or capsules. Without giving up your favorite foods.

There is nothing "fabulous" or faddish about this new-day natural way by which millions have won and kept a lovely slim figure. The easy Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan is actually a modern way of life. A way to have more pleasure at mealtimes. To acquire, for the rest of your life, the habit of enjoyable, balanced eating, whether at home, at restaurants, or as a dinner guest.

Whether you'd like to lose 10 pounds or 70 pounds, you set your goal with the famous Knox Plan. Hundreds of thousands have achieved their goal, and for keeps.

One of the keys to the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan is Knox Unflavored Gelatine, which millions drink in fruit or vegetable juice, bouillon or water. Doctors recommend Knox. Your grocer has it in the 4-envelope package and the 32-envelope economy size.

©1958 Knox Gelatine Co.

Free... THE BOOK THAT GUIDES YOU TO LASTING SLIMNESS

The first step to slimness is the 36-page, illustrated book that has shown the way to more than ▮ million people. Its Choice-of-Foods Charts, including your own favorite foods, do away with calorie-counting and "diet-hunger." Developed by a group of distinguished doctors, dietitians and home economists, it is yours without charge. This coupon brings it to you.

Knox Gelatine
Johnstown, N. Y., Box LH-33
You may send me my free copy of the Knox Eat-and-Reduce Plan Book with the Choice-of-Foods Charts.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

.....

"I beg pardon," murmured Maria's uncle. "I did not know anyone present."

"Don't go, come on in and keep me company," said Sherrard. "I'm just waiting to meet Maria's new beau."

It was as incongruous to him, that slangy turn of phrase, as was a tropical shirt on Maria's uncle. Sherrard recognized it at once; recognizing also that he wasn't quite himself. Fortunately the old man, it seemed, recognized nothing but a permission to enter; he sidled in, bowing politely, with a smile that revealed a really splendid set of false teeth. Sherrard was again aware of an incongruity: they were so wonderfully confident, those splendid, American dentures, yet the old man's smile remained humble.

"Your company will give me great pleasure," Sherrard corrected himself. "Perhaps you remember me? My name is Sherrard."

Extraordinarily, to this overture there was no response at all.

The old man mightn't even have heard. It was extraordinary indeed: one moment all his attention was fixed on Sherrard, the next it had flown away; one moment his eyes dropped humbly before the stranger, the next they were riveted on the mantelpiece. With short, hasty steps he almost trotted across the room; pushed his wrinkled old face against the smooth complacent countenance of the cat, laid his fingers (like a bundle of bamboo twigs) to the curve of the cat's nape, tipped the beast over, scrutinized its belly—and only then turned back to Sherrard.

Maria had always insisted on her uncle's speaking correct English, so that he could never say anything very quickly; but the words got out at last.

"How—came—this—object—here?"

"I brought it to give Maria," said Sherrard. "D'you like it?"

"I made it!" proclaimed Maria's uncle triumphantly. "See, under, my mark!"

There was now naturally much Sherrard understood that he hadn't before. His thoughts raced. Poor Maria, to begin with!—had she recognized her uncle's mark, too, or only his general style? Or even remembered, perhaps, sitting under his workbench as he chipped and polished and engraved at that very beast? In whichever case, what a facer for her, what a grotesquely absurd disappointment! And how well, in the circumstances, she'd behaved! Sherrard felt all his affection for her flooding back—not too strongly, not strongly enough to make him jealous of her Chinese beau, but with sufficient warmth to heal all soreness. Poor Maria, it's a wonder she didn't box my ears! thought Sherrard—and began to laugh.

Maria's uncle had been laughing for some time. He stood and rocked with silent, delighted laughter, the cat clasped to his bosom, all humility wiped from his face by an artist's giddy pride. Even his teeth looked very nearly natural.

"Listen," said Sherrard, "I'm taking that cat away from Maria and giving it to you. Back to you. You understand? It's yours. If you want to sell, I can give you an address where they'll probably pay anything you like to ask for it. And if you can lay hands on any more quartz, or whatever else you carve cats out of, I imagine you've a very rewarding future. . . . I see I'll have to say all this over again," concluded Sherrard, "so in the meantime, instead of waiting for Maria's wonder boy, why shouldn't we go out to dinner ourselves?"

There was a response, all right, then. Half incredulous, half eager, like a very old tortoise sniffing the spring, Maria's uncle poked forth his head above the cat's.

"You and I go out to dinner?"

"Why not?" said Sherrard.

"Chinese style?"

"Why not? We needn't," added Sherrard, as the old man appeared to turn something over in his mind, "disturb Maria. We'll just leave her a note."

But it wasn't Maria the old man was thinking of. Stroking a finger down the cat, nose to tail, "You are certain," he pressed, "it can be sold for much? For how much? A . . . hundred dollars?"

"Six hundred," said Sherrard—justifiably confident in his Texan.

Every tooth in the old head gleamed anew. "Then you shall be my guest, not I yours," pronounced Maria's uncle.

What an evening it was!

All the best dinners, Sherrard remembered once hearing, are eaten on credit; the old man's credit with a certain compatriot restaurateur appeared illimitable—especially after he had displayed the amethyst cat, which they bore with them. (It didn't even have to suffer the indignity of being left in pawn.) They dined, with intervals for conversation, while special dishes were being cooked, or special delicacies sent out for, until well past midnight.

Sherrard was rather queasy next day, and so, as reported by Maria, was her uncle.

"Where did you two go, for heaven's sake?" demanded Maria, over the telephone. "And why didn't you stay to meet Harry? We were disappointed."

"Didn't you and Harry have a good time too?" asked Sherrard.

"Yes, of course we did," said Maria. "We had a wonderful time, we ate steak. But my uncle tells me you've given him my cat, he says now it's his!"

"As you always knew it was," said Sherrard.

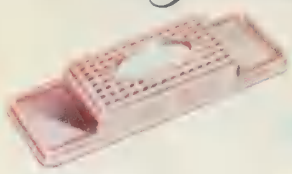
There was a slight pause. Then to his immense satisfaction—what a splendid girl she was!—he heard Maria giggle.

"How could I tell you? But really it's the nicest thing that ever happened, my uncle is so pleased! And what do you think he means to do now?"

"I know; we spent last night planning it," said Sherrard. "He's going to go back to carving cats, and make hundreds of dollars, and put them all away in a box, and write on it, 'For Maria's Dowry.'"

Sherrard himself boarded the eastbound plane as usual unwed—unaffianced—but not unhappy either. He hadn't Maria with him, he hadn't even the amethyst cat with him; but felt both to be better off where they were, and at least it made for a peaceful journey. He was indeed two hundred pounds to the bad, which he could ill afford; but there'd been something to show for it. An old man's face of bliss, as he looked down at his no-longer-useless hands; an old man's joy in dowering the kind child who'd succored him ——

Cheap at the price, thought Sherrard; glared disagreeably at all his neighbors, in case any should be minded to address him; and went to sleep.



END

Satin Smooth
POLYETHYLENE CLOTHES HAMPER

Deluxe family size (25½" high) with molded-in feet and full opening hinged cover. Pampers clothes—perfectly ventilated to prevent mildew. Light and easy to carry, with strong handle rim. . $9.95

Daisy Fresh BATH ENSEMBLE for lasting glamour, safety and utility

You'll delight in how gleaming Lustro-Ware accessories lend enchantment to the home...all of molded "cushion soft" polyethylene plastic.

Wonderful polyethylene can never stain nor harm your finest clothes . . . never mar walls, floor or furniture. So light and easy to carry . . . every item cleans with a whisk of a damp cloth . . . rust-proof and noiseless, too!

Choose from flower fresh pastel pink, yellow, blue or green to meet your decorating needs... at better stores along with other guaranteed Lustro-Ware to brighten your home.

TOILETRIES TRAY with built-in Tissue Dispenser
Keeps cosmetics and other beauty aids safely convenient. Fits on flat or curved top toilet tanks. Ideal for dressers, too. $2.98

BRUSH HOLDER and matching plastic brush
Clatter-proof plastic will not rust nor mar floors. Seamless leak-proof bottom, also handy shelf for cleanser. $2.98

Slightly higher in Canada

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Lustro-Ware

For FREE CATALOG of 175 guaranteed housewares for better living, just write COLUMBUS PLASTIC PRODUCTS, INC.
Dept. 81, Columbus, Ohio.

COMPACT HAMPER
Snap-hinged cover with leak-proof bottom. 17½" high. Wonderful for the kiddies' room $4.95

Oblong BASKET . . . $2.49

"He needs more affection."

OUR TEEN-AGE DRUG ADDICTS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 175

was a nice girl. I used to think she's for me, nd after a long time she said I could take her ut on a date."

Theresa Garcia de Diaz is a small, sparkling irl who is a year and a half older than Manuel. Her intelligence, quick sense of humor and vident common sense are impressive quali- ies. But most striking is Terry's glowing ma- urity. Her family, though poor, apparently has high living standards. This is one reason why she is different from her Spanish Harlem neighbors. Also, when she was thirteen her mother sent her to Puerto Rico to live with relatives and go to school there. Her reasons for sending Terry away might have been purely financial. But as a result, when Terry returned to El Barrio few of the girls her age were still going to school. She never was "one of the gang."

"I loved Terry right away," says Manuel. "She used to be after me like my mother, taking care of me.

"One day I even told Terry I'm going to quit my habit. She said, 'You can, you can.' She went with me to my father and I told him I was a junkie and wanted to quit."

Manuel's father arranged for him and Luis to meet Father Wendt at St. Christopher's chapel, and on his advice they went before a judge to seek admission to Riverside Hospital for Juvenile Addicts.

"By the time we got to Riverside, it was almost two and we hadn't had a cure since the night before. We were really sick. I had pains in my back, my belly, my knees, my fingernails, my hair, my eyes, my teeth. I got cold and put the blanket on me and got hot and took it off. Finally I put the blanket between my teeth and bit down.

"The doctor was nice. He gave us a shot for our nerves and told us to go to sleep. We couldn't. We lay there all night biting our blankets and feeling awful. Sometimes we got out of bed and lay down on the cold floor. That made you forget the pain for a while. In the morning they gave us another shot. After seventy-two hours the monkey was off my back and I felt good but tired and shaky.

"After about a month I was dying to go home. I didn't think about drugs. I didn't say to myself whether I would or wouldn't go back to junk. All I thought of then was that I had kicked the habit and that was all there was to it. I found out different."

It took only a week for the boys to get bored, buy drugs, become addicted again and go back to peddling.

"Then one day this girl with a habit, she came up to me with a man who looked like a hick. She wanted some junk, so I made a connection with a pusher and when I got back with the stuff the hick asked me what's my name and could he come around sometime to buy junk for the girl. I told him any time. A few days later this guy, he said his name was Visco, came up and said hello do you have any stuff. I said wait for me, and went and made the connection and gave the hick his stuff. The next day I decided to get myself a job. I had my hair cut and my sideburns and goatee shaved off. I was looking pretty greasy and I thought I'd better shape up before I went to get a job. That night a cop came up to me and put his gun right on top of my nose. I told him, 'O.K., daddy, you got me.' I wasn't worried, because I didn't have any stuff on me. He asked me my name and then he asked me when was my last haircut and shave. When I told him today, he said, 'Get in the car.'

"They booked me on 1751—sale to a narcotics agent. Then I knew what it was all about. The hick was a Fed and the cop asked me when my last haircut and shave was because the Fed had said I had long hair and a goatee and sideburns."

Manuel spent the next three months in the Tombs, New York's house of detention for men awaiting Federal trial. Meanwhile his father, Terry, Father Chandler and two other Episcopal priests who work with young addicts tried to get bail for him and to get the charge reduced to "user."

Terry, who spent so much time at court trying to help Manuel that she nearly lost her job, says she will never forget the day when they put their case in front of a judge. The judge had no compassion for "dope fiends," and told the priests they should be ashamed to ask for leniency. Terry remembers the judge saying he thought Manuel should get 45 years. But he stamped the "Youthful Offender" paper, and when Manuel was brought before him to sign it, he said only, "For you I have not pity," though he granted permission for him to return to Riverside.

That time Manuel stayed longer.

"I decided I wanted to change my life, get married, have a good job, have kids. I went to classes at Riverside and took painting, social studies, spelling and woodworking. I made a table for my room and hung my pictures on my walls. Every Sunday when Terry came to visit I had another present for her. The teachers at Riverside aren't like any other teachers I ever saw. The way they get along with you—it's like one big family.

"I tried to help my 'team'—that's what they call the doctor, the social worker, the psychiatrist who try to find out why you're a drug addict. But after two months I didn't want to talk to my team, I didn't want to eat any more. I didn't go to my classes and I stopped keeping my room nice. One day an attendant told me to make my bed. I told him to get out of here or I'll kill you. A few days later they sent me to Bellevue Hospital for observation. After twenty-eight days in their psychiatric ward they decided I wasn't crazy and I went back to Riverside. Finally, they let me go home.

"I got a job in a factory and I stayed off drugs for some time. But I felt bad, thinking about how I had hurt my mother, my father, my girl, my kid brothers, my little sister. After

Why women born before 1930 need Lanolin Plus Liquid for their skin

Jewels by Harry Winston

Exclusive formula, one-third of it 100% pure, natural lanolin, begins where nature leaves off, to help skin stay gloriously young looking

To look young and radiant your skin needs a steady supply of vital oils. But, as skin matures, nature often fails to replenish these oils. Dryness invites coarseness, loss of firmness—and tiny lines which finally become wrinkles.

That's when you need golden LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID. For its exclusive patented formula restores to dry skin the closest duplication of your own skin oils. Feel its gentle beautifying action. At its touch, your skin becomes petal soft...so fresh, so smooth, so wonderfully younger looking.

USE LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID

1. as a cleanser
2. as a make-up base
3. as a night conditioner.

Yes, 24 hours a day you need LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID and other Beauty Aids by LANOLIN PLUS, to bring a fresher, more vital loveliness to your face, hands, and hair. Try them today, won't you? At cosmetic counters, everywhere. Also available in Canada.

Lanolin Plus Liquid; Lanolin Plus For The Hair (Dressing and Conditioner); Lanolin Plus Shampoo; Lanolin Plus Hand Lotion; Lipstick "35" and "Complexion Control" Liquid Make-up—by Lanolin Plus. And other Lanolin Plus Beauty Aids, $1.00 and up.

a while—I can't remember just what started me—I began using drugs again—just every now and then, on weekends. Somehow they help when you're feeling bad. You can look at your street, your house, your mother, your girl, and you don't love them and you don't hate them. You don't have to feel anything about them because they don't have anything to do with you. Everything is like in a picture frame and you're outside looking in.

"Just at about the same time I got addicted again, I got put on the night shift at the factory. It was too much—trying to hustle my cures in the daytime and work nights—and pretty soon I got laid off."

This time, when Manuel went back to Riverside, he committed himself. "I knew I couldn't handle my habit any longer. And during this eight months my psychiatrist made me understand some of the things that were wrong with me—that it wasn't just the habit I had to kick, but lots of other things I can't talk about. About my mother and how she held on to me and about pop and how he wanted me to be important. Things like that." On leaving he was more determined than ever to get a job, and marry Terry.

He got the job, but it was temporary and he was laid off, so he reverted to drugs. "But not enough to get hooked. I knew then what I should do. You can go back to Riverside and stay for a while if you're in for a bad time and you can't stay off the junk without help. So I went in for ten days. Then I got another job right away, and saved my money so Terry and I could get married fast. I didn't go near the junk for the rest of that month and on Jul seventh Terry married me.

"We didn't have an apartment, so after ou wedding we went to a hotel in the neighbor hood. Terry had one week's vacation, but only had an extra day, because I was new i my job. We had a swell time that week. Ou hotel room was real big and it had a littl kitchen that opened out of the wall. We spen one whole day scrubbing and cleaning up th room. It was our own home, for the tim being. Then exactly one week from our wed ding day—it was the next Saturday—Terry got a pain. I didn't know what to do. She kep moaning and I put a hot towel on her belly and ran out to find a telephone. The ambulance came and took her to the hospital. They said she had appendicitis and they would do an operation. I couldn't sit there waiting while they operated on my wife. I thought to myself this is the end. I'll never see Terry again. I bought an eighth of a piece down on my old street and got high.

"The next morning when I went to the hospital to see Terry I was too late. They said I couldn't come in. So I pawned a clock radio that was a wedding present and got myself some more heroin. In the afternoon I was too high to visit Terry. I went over to her mother's house, and her old grandmother grabbed me and started screaming at me about how I made Terry sick. When I got back to the hotel, I was looking at Terry's skirt and thinking about how I would never see her again, when a Western Union man came to the door. I didn't have any money to pay for the telegram, but I grabbed a piggy bank of Terry's and smashed it and gave him the money. I was sure I knew what the telegram said. I went back to Terry's mother's house to read it. It said she was on the critical list and needed blood. Terry's mother began crying, and her grandmother began screaming why did the hospital need to send telegrams for blood when they had plenty of blood right there. I got so high that night I didn't know anything.

"Terry got all right, and after a week she came home. That day my father was sick and had to go to the emergency ward at the hospital. It was his stomach again. I was worried about him, and worried about money, and besides, I had an infection in my arm from a dirty spike. My mother kept yelling at me about my arm. Terry and I moved in with my family because we couldn't afford to pay for the hotel room any longer. On July thirtieth I committed myself to Riverside again. I wasn't hooked, but I knew I would be if I didn't get away. When I left, my mother was mad at me, and she yelled out, 'Don't ever come back because I don't ever want to see you again.' I said I didn't want ever to come back."

Manuel was released from Riverside after four and a half weeks' treatment. In the meantime, his psychiatrist had told Terry that it would do no good for him to be released unless they lived in another neighborhood—away from his mother, away from his friends. Terry found a room about a block away from St. Peter's. She knew she could depend on Father Chandler to help Manuel. Manuel was indeed happy to come "home" to the new room, but he brooded about what his mother must be thinking because he hadn't been uptown to visit her.

Manuel wants to get a job, but he is still not used to being on his own, and the idea of facing new people frightens him. But he is able now to think about how lucky he is in some respects:

"My family has helped me. Father Chandler is always a friend. On my first day out, he went to the supermarket with me because I couldn't go alone. Others are helping me to find a job. My probation officer is so kind and patient—I know he wants to help me. He tells me not to talk too much to him, but to tell things to the therapist, because he says the therapist can help me more, and he doesn't want to do anything to interfere. My doctor is good to me. She doesn't tell me what is wrong with me—she lets me tell myself. Most of all, my wife—she helps me all the time just because she is my wife. She makes me want to do something with myself, and she gives me courage to try." With the help of his therapist,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 188

What does the Gardener do in the Spring?

The best thing to do is to start at the beginning: first the seed, then . . . but first the seed.

By THE GARDENER'S ASSISTANT

All gardeners are beginners in a way—in one department or another. And as for the true old-timers—what creatures of habit they can be. Don't let their Latin names get you down, or their dirt-gardener drawl. You're lucky if you're a novice—you have so much less to unlearn.

It's the way they begin in the spring that makes gardeners good, or bad. Now let's say it's about the first of March. For most Americans that is a good month or more too early to do any gardening in the open ground. But even so, if you haven't bought your seed yet, you had better hurry. Because this spring you are not going to sit around waiting for the weather and the ground to get ready; you are going to start your seeds right inside the house. Preferably in the kitchen, due to its vapors and facilities. A good cook and a good gardener can easily get along together. In fact, they're generally the same person.

Here let me interrupt myself long enough to say something you no doubt already know: that there are of course a number of ways to get your summer garden going even earlier than March if you want, and without cluttering up the kitchen with seed pans and flowerpots, without rigging up overhead lights and shelves in the basement. There are little lean-to plant-window arrangements*; there are minuscule greenhouses that attach to the house and the house heating system, and there are various types and sizes of cold frames. A good gardener considers something of this sort basic--as basic as a stainless-steel trowel or a pair of professional pruning shears, or light soft garden gloves, if you like to garden with gloves.

Nor are these various types of protected growing places (even the little greenhouses) expensive when you consider what heavenly joys and plants and smells they exude. Compared with 90 per cent of the garden gadgetry people acquire, they have a purpose as profound as the pleasure they impart. But this spring why not just clear a little space in front of the kitchen window? So now you get yourself an old-fashioned flowerpot of the 6″ size and a small package of vermiculite. The best pot for starting seed is in my opinion what the florist calls an azalea pot; 6″ in diameter and less tall in proportion than a regular pot. You can start enough petunias, marigolds and zinnias in this one pot to fill several gardens.

Now after you have placed a piece or two of broken pot over the hole in the bottom of the pot, to keep the vermiculite from falling through yet provide drainage, you pour in about 1″ of vermiculite, wet it and press it down to compress it firmly, then repeat the process layer by layer until you come an inch from the top. Now your seedbed is ready for you to set out your seeds, one by one. . . . But not yet!

Inasmuch as all good gardening begins with seeds, all good gardeners start with one or more good seed catalogues. Let us assume that you are so good as to have got your catalogues. Let us also assume that you have decided to send for several choice varieties each of petunia, marigold and zinnia seeds, and the smallest packet of each you can possibly buy. Well! You are already a very wise gardener! You have not only chosen the three most popular annuals in the world, and three that beautifully fit what I am trying to put down here on paper, but you have chosen to buy your seeds with the most remarkable restraint.

That was the very next thing I was going to talk about: about what a nation of seed wasters we are. If seed were sold by the seed, instead of by the packet, we would eliminate overcrowding in planting, save work in thinning and soon become a race of supergardeners.

Here comes something important. First find out how long it normally takes for the seed you are setting out to germinate and develop into a plant of just the proper size for planting out in the garden. Then find out for certain what would be the first safe frostfree time for planting out tender plants in the garden. That tells you when to set your seed—and not before! Some plant seeds are much faster than others. For instance, petunias are perhaps three times as slow as zinnias; six or seven weeks against two or more. If it doesn't say on the packet, write and ask the seed company.

Start with your slowest seeds, your petunias. Take a pinch or two from the packet of each variety you've bought and scatter them thinly on separate areas of the vermiculite seedbed, and press them down gently with the backs of your fingers. I hope you're paying attention, because you must do all your watering with one of those little fine-fogging push-plunger bottle sprayers, like the ones for windows, especially on the Jiffy pots mentioned below. Now forget the whole affair for about fifteen days, if you can.

If the seedlings had any say they would select a sunny southern window, but would settle for an eastern or a western exposure in that order. Lacking bright sunlight for the better part of each day, a bright electric light about three feet above the seedlings will serve.

First, microscopic green shoots will appear with two tiny leaves on the top. Leave everything alone. In another fifteen days, third leaves will be forming under the two-leaf sets. When this happens the seedling is ready to be pricked out. Now the gardener is really cooking!

During the month or so that has passed, you have bought several kits of Jiffy pots, which include some specially prepared sphagnum moss. These pots are pressed out of peat and wood fiber, so that when the seedling, which you have lifted tenderly with a little stick from the seedbed pot and have inserted in the nest of sphagnum moss in its Jiffy pot—when that seedling has sent its roots through the sphagnum moss and reached the enriched moist soil of the Jiffy pot, the little plant is prepared to assimilate the adult diet of the pot. And by the time the seedling's roots have grown through the sphagnum moss, and on through the peat walls of the pot, the plant is ready to set out in your garden, pot and all. This whole preceding operation is clearly and completely covered in the directions that come with the kits.

Do all your seeds this same way, no matter what the directions on the seed packet say about sowing the seeds right out in the open ground. Take my word for it that you will never do it differently again.

Don't try to be a mass-production gardener. Treat every seed you sow as an individual seed, and every plant you produce—treat this plant the same way.

If you have ever considered gardening to be difficult, discouraging or dull, it will all be different now.

Note: Since writing the above I have had a chance to observe an even simpler and more direct process involving the use of fertile-cube seedling starters: pressed compost cubes about 1″ square which come in trays of 20. You put the seed itself right in the cube, and when the seedling has reached the right size, you plant cube and all right out in your garden. How easy can good gardening get? Why, you can even buy the cubes with certain seeds already in them. Send a stamped addressed envelope for where to get fertile cubes and Jiffy pots.

In June:

WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN SUMMER?

*Send 15 cents† to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for No. 1429, WINDOW-BOX GREENHOUSE.

†Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

SEE FLOWER-INSPIRED "PETUNIA PETTICOATS" BY MUNSINGWEAR . . . NOW AT BETTER STORES

PETTICOAT PETUNIA

Now grow your own hybrids from Northrup King's easy-to-handle "Pelletized" seeds!

BEFORE AND AFTER PELLETIZING

Suddenly it's easy to grow those glorious F2 hybrid petunias!

A special protective coating that quickly dissolves in the soil encases each choice F2 hybrid seed...makes it large, easy to handle and plant. And you transplant easily, avoid wasteful thinning!

So this year grow Petticoat Petunia! Enjoy these unique hybrid advantages: vigorous, compact bushy plants loaded with continuous bloom. Flower shapes that are flirty and feminine. And color! Some 20 different shades and combinations . . . including striking new colors.

Where can you buy Petticoat Petunia? Only at the completely stocked Northrup King Seed Rack, now on display at your dealer's. It's one of Northrup King's exclusive 1958 "Garden Winners" . . . choice flower varieties in special cellophane-wrapped packets.

NORTHRUP, KING & CO. NK® MINNEAPOLIS, MINN. • BOISE, IDAHO • FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 186

whom he sees once a week, and his probation officer, whom he also sees once a week, he maintains a vestige of the discipline he finds so strengthening at the hospital.

The problem about Manuel's mother is yet to be resolved. The confusion of love and selfishness in their relationship will be a long time in the untangling. "My mother always tells me what to do. She tells me I can't get along by myself, with Terry, but I'll have to come to her. I want to tell her I am a man and I have a wife of my own and someday I will have a family—but at the same time I want to just sit there and not have to make any decisions and let my mother tell me what to do all the time. She doesn't understand. It makes me feel bad that I can't make her understand. Then I think that if she did understand it would break her heart, and I don't know what I want."

Manuel certainly had several strikes against him: his family's housing problems, their poverty, the bewilderment of being a Spanish-speaking child in an English-speaking country. The poor neighborhood in which he lived, where pushers and drugs are readily available, is a typical addict-breeding area. But these alone could never have made him an addict.

In examining boys who were prey to heroin addiction, Dr. Chein and his collaborators at New York University found that aside from having drugs available to them, the boys had one thing in common: "All juvenile addicts are severely disturbed individuals." They were unhappy boys, pessimistic, they had a sense of futility. "Everybody is just out for himself," the boys felt. "Nobody really cares about anybody else." They were also distrustful, negative, defiant.

The investigators also visited their families, and concluded that they had a second thing in common. "The causes of personality disturbance in juvenile addicts can be traced to their family experiences." Here were families in which the parents were divorced, separated, in which, at the very least, mother and father were hostile to each other, or, like Manuel's parents, lacking in warmth and mutual interest. The boys believed, "Parents don't want their kids to have any fun." Or they had reached the opinion that "Parents are always looking for things to nag their kids about."

Actually, most of the parents were simply confused about their sons' future. Their ambitions were unrealistically low or high. The boys' mothers were often overindulgent. The boys' fathers, if present at all, gave them little genuine affection or attention. "The child had little chance to identify with and model himself after a male figure."

Manuel's father was of no help to him, either in withstanding the pressure to fall in with the fast, aggressive "cats" of the neighborhood, or in really planning an adult life.

Manuel was very lucky in meeting Terry Garcia. Had he followed a more usual pattern of teen-age addiction, he would have continued to have no time for girls. Heroin deadens the sexual instincts, in addition to costing the victim all his time to hustle shots. Terry offered very real help in giving him some adult purpose in life, to marry and have a family, and support them.

No future . . . so why not take drugs? . . . Drugs absorb the teen-ager in an unreal life, further prevent any realistic attitude toward life. This is the vicious cycle in which the teen-age adolescent is involved.

But this isn't the way the teen-ager sees it. He gets to thinking that the habit is his only problem. He will be O.K. if he just gets "the monkey off his back," he thinks. If his parents and friends are concerned about him at all, that is what they think too.

Patrick is a boy who never got beyond this stage of thinking.

Patrick was the son of a perpetually drunken father and an ignorant, hot-tempered mother whose attitude toward her nine children ranged from hysterical concern to weary indifference. The marriage had been a shotgun affair.

The years of his childhood were monotonous with misery. The family was always being dispossessed, always moving from one

Fashion... with an unforgettable feeling of comfort

TROPICOOL... All lightness and luxury. Wonderfully soft and flexible . . . prettily punched for breezy coolness and textured smartness. Exciting examples of the new Arch Preservers now at your retailer's. All with the exclusive Arch Preserver comfort features you love. Most styles $16.95. Others $14.95 to $18.95

Selby
ARCH PRESERVER
Shoes

SELBY ARCH PRESERVER DIVISION...THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

THE SOUND OF GREEN

By PAUL ENGLE

The color red has quick teeth that can bite.
While blue caresses like a friendly child.
Black is a beast that shambles through the night.
Green is the sound of grass, growing and mild.
Gray is the dripping hush of morning rain.
Gold is the song of birds in a tall tree.
Orange is all the noisy hue of pain.
Brown is a rabbit you can barely see.

Purple is our color of apprehension
When she is lost on a white summer day.
We call in voices yellow with our tension.
And then we hear her calling far away
And see, in love, her many-colored cry,
A rage of rainbow arching the clear sky.

owded New York tenement to another. he father was always coming home drunk nd beating up his wife, while his children reamed and hid under the furniture. Often here was no food. Sometimes the children ere taken away and sent to institutions, but ey usually managed to get back home in a onth or two. The mother was said to "enter-in" men while her husband was away on his rinking sprees. When Patrick was still a small hild, his eldest sister became pregnant by her ther. The sister was exiled from her family, nd has not been heard of since. She is never entioned in the family. The father was sent o jail by the authorities, who learned of the case from Patrick's mother. He died in jail a few years later.

For several years the fatherless family—still on relief, of course—lived in a fifteen-room old wooden house on the outskirts of Queens, a New York borough. There was no heat in the house and the mother and eight children lived in only two rooms, because those were the only rooms with furniture. But there were friends for Patrick and a school he liked and the feeling of settling down at last.

Then, when he was fourteen, the mother was dispossessed again and moved the family to a four-room tenement in one of the worst sections of Queens. "The place is little better than a hovel," a social worker reported some time later, "not far from places where dope pushers meet and peddle their wares." There were many Italians and Negroes in the neighborhood, as well as Irish families, and racial gang fights were frequent. The only playgrounds were the streets.

Patrick's mother claims that all her son's troubles date from that time of change. He missed his old friends and his old school. He began to play truant from his new school, which he hated. He was constantly getting into fights. He took no interest in sports; comic books were his only reading, his only recreation. His mother alternately scolded him, petted him and ignored him.

When he was seventeen Patrick left school and got a job as a night-hours bus boy in a restaurant. After work, around midnight, he liked to go to a nearby dance hall and hang around, looking at the girls he didn't dare to speak to. Inevitably, because it was that kind of dance hall, he found that nearly all the other patrons were dope addicts. It wasn't long until Patrick was an addict too—it was almost as if he had been looking for the chance. And it wasn't long until he had followed the same doomed path of so many sick adolescents: increasing addiction, inability to carry on a job, unemployment, desperation for drugs, drug selling to make money, arrest. He wanted (or thought he did) to get rid of the habit, and was glad when he was sent to Riverside Hospital. He was just eighteen.

Patrick's withdrawa symptoms lasted three weeks, and were unusually bad. After that he was studied, and the reports were encouraging. He had an I.Q. of 99, which is normal. The psychiatric social worker, remarking that Patrick had "an almost plaintive wish to be accepted and liked," said that he was suffering from anxiety and tension but should be amenable to long-term therapy.

As the weeks went on Patrick's anxiety and tension increased to the point where he threatened to commit suicide; he was sent to Bellevue. Bellevue is another New York City hospital with special psychiatric-ward facilities, better equipped than Riverside to protect patients who threaten violence. In some cases the authorities at Bellevue diagnose mental illness requiring the psychotherapy offered in state mental hospitals, and transfer patients to one of them. But Patrick's violence was short-lived, so after a month they sent him back to Riverside, suggesting long-term treatment. But Patrick refused to recognize that he had any problem at all beyond the drug addiction, of which he now felt cured. Unable to force therapy on anyone unable to accept it, the authorities let him go.

Within a few months he was back again, voluntarily. He had had a summer job in the country, the job had ended, and he had taken to drugs again in his depression. So he got rid of the habit, left for home—and a few months later he was back. He had wanted to go to trade school, but instead had had to take a job to help support his family—and took to drugs again. Since then Patrick has been back to the hospital three times.

During his in-and-out months at Riverside, the psychiatrists have done their best to probe the secrets of his addiction. But since Patrick steadily refuses to face or explore his inner self, the psychiatrists ended by noting that he was "deeply disturbed but not amenable to psychotherapy," and sent him back once more into the world of the slums.

Patrick is now in a reformatory on a long sentence for armed robbery committed in order to get money to buy drugs. He is, short of a miracle, now past saving. His home life was dreadful, but no one knows why he and one brother were the only ones to take this form of escape.

Neither Patrick's nor Manuel's story lends much encouragement to the idea that there is a sure-fire "cure" for addiction. And available figures on relapsed patients are no cause for optimism. A narcotics agent once said, "I have been in this business for thirty years. When you're hooked you have one chance in ten thousand of ever snapping out of it!" For this reason neither doctors nor patients ever speak of an addict as being "cured." If he's lucky, if he has a lot of help, if he wants to enough, he "stays off it."

"If he wants to enough" is a major factor. At Riverside Hospital, the nation's only school and treatment center for teen-age addicts, many patients relapse almost immediately after leaving the hospital. They think they can make a go of it, want to get out, find they can't, go back—they generally go through several cycles of trial release. "A patient may need repeated failure," says Dr. Rafael Gamso, Riverside director, "to convince him that he has been overestimating his powers of self-control, that the trouble is not simply an external 'monkey on your back' and that there

Only Conso® Bestpleat®
gives you new Scalloped Pleater Tape and beautiful golden NIP-TITE® Pleater Rings

for decorator-smart
SCALLOPED PLEATED CAFE CURTAINS
"the hinge is the secret"

Rich, golden rings with triple-action NIP-TITE pleaters — plus the exclusive, easy-to-apply scalloped Bestpleat pleater tape — make the most striking pleated and scalloped cafe curtains you ever saw!

Smart! New!
Ready-made SCALLOPED Bestpleat pleater tape. Stitch it on in a jiffy.

Send for the NEW
1001 Decorating Ideas
This wonderful edition is just off the press and simply bursting with the latest, smartest ideas in home decoration. 76 pages, many in full color, with easy-to-follow directions on how to make slip covers, bedspreads, lamp shades, draperies, swags, cornices and a host of other lovely things. Just send 25¢ in coin to Dept. LH-3.

15th Edition

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

CONSO 27 West 23rd St., N.Y. 10

ONLY Conso® Bestpleat® CREATES SUCH EXQUISITE pleated window beauty!

"the hinge is the secret!"

Every woman can make perfect pleated draperies with Conso Bestpleat and NIP-TITE hooks ...quick as a wink—no fuss—so inexpensive —and THRILLING when hung!

CONSO BESTPLEAT PLEATER TAPE

is absolutely SAG-PROOF with its sturdy, WOVEN-IN pockets. Bestpleat stays strong and firm through washings and cleanings.

Conso® Bestpleat
TRIPLE-ACTION NIP-TITE pleater hooks.

Only Conso NIP-TITE hooks have the controlling middle arm and hinged lock that make each pleat stand out evenly — for drapery perfection never before possible. And... NO SEWING! NO TACKING!

LUXURY TOUCH FOR FULL LENGTH PLEATED DRAPERIES: HANG THEM FROM BRASS RINGS ON 1 INCH BRASS RODS!

CONSO gives you the ingenious No. 19 golden NIP-TITE Pleater Rings. Use with regular 4 inch BESTPLEAT pleater tape and bring rich beauty into your home.

Don't short change yourself ... be sure to say: Conso Bestpleat for the finest made. In drapery departments everywhere.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

"NIP-TITE" hooks patented No. 2,796,928 • "Conso", "Bestpleat" & "Nip-Tite" registered®

CONSO, 27 WEST 23rd STREET • NEW YORK 10, NEW YORK

really is something about himself that needs to be changed before he can be truly cured. Indeed, repeated failures should not be taken as a convincing demonstration of the hopelessness of the struggle."

To Doctor Gamso the narcotic addict is not a "dope fiend," not a criminal by nature. He is a sick person, and his addiction is simply a symptom of his emotional disturbance. "It is essential to treat the whole patient and not only his symptoms."

Doctor Gamso does not discount the importance of police action in managing the drug problem today. He favors increased national, state and local efforts to eradicate illegal drug traffic, and hopes for increased international co-operation in restricting the cultivation of the opium poppy, illicit traffic and smuggling of drugs. But many of his hopes for preventing and treating drug addicts more effectively touch programs in which the ordinary citizen may engage:

- Better education of susceptible young persons as to the dangers of drug addiction. Few, if any, youngsters have any realistic picture of the harmful results following habitual use.
- More narcotic hospitals, properly staffed. Federal hospitals at Lexington, Kentucky, and Fort Worth, Texas, treat both adult and juvenile addicts. Riverside, a New York City hospital admitting patients from New York State, with a capacity of 140, is the only center dedicated to the young addict. Many more local hospitals should have facilities for helping addicts withdraw from drug use.
- Widespread public information about treatment programs. "It would be wonderful if only more people right here in New York City knew about Riverside," Doctor Gamso says. The Salvation Army is doing a unique job in all sections of the country to inform addicts of Federal hospital facilities, and assist them in getting admission and transportation to these hospitals. Clinics are available in Detroit and Chicago to counsel addicts. But more such work is needed.
- "Halfway" houses—residences properly staffed to guide the ex-addict in the interval between his release from the hospital and his return to the home which may have been responsible for the addiction in the first place. Narcotics Anonymous, the counterpart of Alcoholics Anonymous which gives ex-addicts an opportunity to share their common problems, does a most worth-while job. But it does not separate the newly released patient from the temptations and other damaging influences of the neighborhood which fostered his addiction. Some victims should be able to go to training camps affording an even longer period of rehabilitation.
- More professional personnel, including psychiatrists, psychiatric social workers and others trained in the field of drug addiction, and more trained sympathetic workers to help the ex-addict when he is trying to readjust to the world without drugs. Mothers who encourage their daughters to take training in such fields are helping.
- More playgrounds, better schools, more counseling for emotionally harassed families. This is part of a long-range battle against narcotic addiction, as is any fight against racial discrimination which confines minority groups to aimless, drug-ridden slum environments.
- Co-operation among community agencies to provide job opportunities, recreational facilities, housing, family counseling and guidance, and other necessary services. Convalescents are not wanted in the schools, they are not wanted in the neighborhood settlement houses, they are not wanted in churches and Sunday schools, on the grounds that they might introduce other youngsters to drugs. Employers are loath to hire a former addict. Lack of understanding and sympathy on the part of the public is one of the great obstacles to a lasting cure.

"I've found St. Joseph Aspirin For Children to be the best way to give aspirin to a child" Maureen O'Sullivan

MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN (Mrs. John Farrow), Famous Motion Picture Star, and daughters Stephanie and Theresa

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is approved by more doctors for fever and pain than any other medication for children.

More mothers trust its accurate dosage. Children like its pure orange flavor. It's America's mother-and-child favorite. Buy the best for your child.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

. . . and for my family's adult aspirin needs, I always buy regular St. Joseph ASPIRIN

Can't Use MILK????

If for any reason you cannot use regular milk, don't miss all its pleasures and benefits! Join the thousands who have discovered a new, highly nutritious all-vegetable milk—Soyamel®—an instant powder. A delicious drink! Fine in recipes! Has no allergy reactions. Trial 12-ounce can $1.00 ppd. in U.S. (money back if not satisfied). Worthington Foods, Inc., Worthington, Ohio

This compact white enamel Washer has exclusive "AERATOR" fast washing action—TAKES ONLY THE SPACE OF A KITCHEN CHAIR. Now with ELECTRIC WRINGER that folds into Tub. Washes 5 lbs. in 5 minutes.

MONITOR WASHERS AVAILABLE IN SEVERAL MODELS from $59.95

At all better appliance and department stores.

MONITOR EQUIPMENT CORPORATION
Riverdale-on-Hudson
New York 71, N. Y. Dept. J-3

☐ Please send FREE booklet "Helpful Hints on Easier Washing and Drying".
☐ Also send information on new MONITOR JET DRYER.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____

MORE PEOPLE USE
Sugarine
SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE
Doctors recommend Sugarine for diabetics, overweights, lo-calorie diets. Pure, Harmless, Economical.
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 OZ.—75¢
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW

Dr Scholl's
Super-Sheer
51 GAUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS
NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. Only $12.95 pair. At Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. For booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Ill.

DOES MEDICAL RESEARCH REPAY THE AMERICAN PEOPLE?

- There has been a 19 per cent decline in the death rate since 1937. Why the striking figure? Because medical research discovered antibiotics and drugs against high blood pressure, and other new drugs. In addition, medical research has recently produced the Salk antipolio vaccine and new drugs for mental illnesses such as Reserpine and Thorazine.

The decline in the death rate between 1944 and 1954 means that 1,244,897 more Americans are alive, more than the combined populations of Rhode Island and Vermont, almost as many as the combined populations of Arizona and New Mexico. Medical-research discoveries mean that the Federal Treasury gained in taxes in 1954 alone $277,711,720.

How much is Congress spending to finance new victories over death through medical research? Although the Congress voted $267,139,000 for atomic weapons, it voted for research in heart disease only $25,700,000.

Although the Congress voted $116,000,000 to agricultural research, it voted only $31,810,000 to defend Americans against cancer. Cancer killed 236,900 Americans in 1954. Although the Congress voted $51,000,000 for development assistance to Asia, it voted to the National Institute of Mental Health only $17,013,000 for research against mental illnesses, which now fill every other hospital bed!

Although the Congress voted $62,980,000 to continue the Inter-American highway, it voted to the National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases only $13,671,000 for research. These diseases cripple (in varying degrees) over 10,000,000 Americans!

Total voted by Congress for medical research against the main killers and cripplers: $102,244,000. Congress voted $33,147,224,106 in fiscal 1956 for defense against death from military attack.

Isn't $102 million for research against the major killers and cripplers of the American people too small in proportion to $33 billion for defense against death from military attack?

To bring victory over deaths from major diseases depends on dollars to pay for brains, training, buildings, equipment. It depends on your understanding and action! Will you help? You can do this by urging increased research funds for voluntary national health agencies and for the National Institutes for Heart, Cancer, Arthritis, Mental Health, Neurological Diseases and Blindness of the U. S. Public Health Service, and your voluntary state- and city-operated health services.

"Drug addiction has been a problem for about a hundred years," says Doctor Gamso. "It wasn't until 1949 and 1950 that the courts, the police, social agencies, schools and private physicians were aware of an alarming increase of narcotic addiction in the teen-age group." These are unlike the addicts of yesteryear. Their rehabilitation is difficult, to be sure. They are used to sleeping or lying around, drugged, by day, to wandering the city streets by night. They've never known what it's like to get a job or—more important—hold one. Love? They've seen little of it; it has no connotations of security for them. The boys may feel they should demonstrate their virility, but drugs rob them of any normal interest in girls, and the girls are likewise indifferent. It is hard for them to see the future through grown-up eyes, they have so few of the memories and experiences that strengthen most of us in our purpose, and help us overlook the frustrations of daily living. But swinging down the corridors of Riverside, they look like other boys and girls. In the adjacent school, beautiful paintings, prize-winning sculptures, fine shopwork attest to a normal range of talent among them. When they reach an understanding of their problems, they can find roles in life, but only then can they resist the invitation to oblivion which drugs have given them, and which will otherwise destroy them.

"KEEP HIM IN BED A COUPLE OF DAYS LONGER"—BUT HOW?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 31

toy store. Sometimes you can find very miniature trains (without motors or tracks) which can be run on a small surface. When one of my sons had to lie on a couch for a month he was happy with a large baking pan of water on the floor in which he arranged docks and sailed the miniature boats which I bought or carved from balsa wood and painted with model-plane colors. Models of planes and trains and boats and cars and scenery can now be bought at model stores in an endless variety of kits, from the simple ones which a six-year-old merely glues together, to those which will keep an adolescent busy for a week.

For boys and girls there are kits for sewing, bead stringing, basket and pot-holder weaving, leatherwork, paper-doll cutting. A construction set, of wood or metal pieces, has dozens of possibilities aside from those in the instruction book, and a boy wants to branch out into his own designs. Doll play can be revived by a few additions to equipment.

The main problem with purchased kits is that if they are beyond a child's capacity, and he cannot adapt them to his level, he will quickly become discouraged. It's always worth remembering that new playthings don't have to be bought at the store. Creation is more soul-satisfying (as well as time-consuming) than the actual play with an object when it is finished. That's why a doll's bed made by the child from a shoe box and equipped with sheets and blankets which she has cut from rags fascinates her more than the finest purchase. A good set of building blocks will challenge a boy to ever more elaborate constructions from the age of two to the age of eight. If a child can't create something new, his second choice is to change something old to a new purpose. This is why, to the distress of his father, he wants to wrench the top off a tin railroad passenger car in order to have it carry real freight.

An invalid's table that extends over the bed is a sound investment for any family.

You don't need to think as far back as covered-wagon days to realize how much convalescence has been shortened and simplified. It was only twenty-five years ago that we had to wait for days, hoping for a favorable crisis, in pneumonia. A child having scarlet fever, even mildly, had to stay in bed for three or four weeks, with good cause. Rheumatic fever required bed rest for many months. Ear infections, which can now usually be stopped in their tracks in a couple of days, used to have to be lanced; and then the doctor and parents would sit with crossed fingers, just hoping that the discharge would cease before too many days and that the infection would not spread to the mastoid bone.

Convalescence was not only long-lasting—it was agonizing.

There is an informative pamphlet called Effects of Radiation and Fallout, by Dr. James Crow, a geneticist, which can be secured by sending 25 cents in cash or stamps to Public Affairs Pamphlets, 22 East 38th Street, New York 16, N.Y.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

for comfort,

safety,

healthful sleep . . .

KANTWET®

for baby's first years

A KANTWET CRIB MATTRESS

The most famous crib mattresses in the world . . . now with latex rubberized dorsal insulation, exclusive Firm-O-Flex innerspring unit, double-sealed tufting for the firm and resilient support doctors recommend. Your baby sleeps well, and grows well on KANTWET.

KANTWET-made mattress from $12.95 to $29.95 for many years after the Tot-N-Teen® HEADBOARD BED

A complete bed that grows with your child. The fine innerspring mattress is wetproof on one side, "adult" on the other. Headboard and removable side-arms have sturdy, washable, glamorous cover. Complete with box spring and legs. #101 — 33" x 66" youth size, approximately $69.95.

best for health and safety!

KANTWET® BABY PRODUCTS

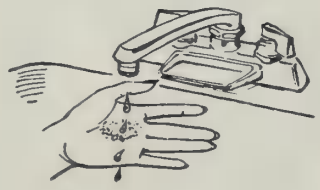
THE GREATEST NAME IN CRIB MATTRESSES

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Rose-Derry Company, Newton 95, Mass.

FREE! BABY SITTER MEMO PAD — get it at your local KANTWET dealer's.

MOISTURE-PROOF your baby against diaper irritation



Here's How-

When changing diapers, apply soothing ZBT Baby Powder generously. ZBT protects like oil . . . guards tender skin against urine scald and diaper rash.

After baby's bath, sprinkle entire body with soothing ZBT Baby Powder, to protect against chafing and prickly heat.

Make this test! Smooth ZBT powder on the palm of your hand. Let drops of water fall on palm. See for yourself how ZBT Baby Powder repels moisture, where ordinary powders absorb it.

Used by hundreds of hospital nurseries

ZBT BABY POWDER CONTAINS OLIVE OIL

soothes like powder
protects like oil

THE WAY DOWN AND BACK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 177

around me and said, 'Come on up to my place. My family is gone for the day.'

"I was dissolved in tears. I sat on the edge of the couch in the Strauses' living room wondering what David's explanation was going to be. He put some records on the phonograph, and after he started them playing, instead of coming over to sit with me, he went into the bathroom. I just sat there trying to stop crying, and looking out the window. Then David called to me and told me to come in for a minute. I got up and went over to the open bathroom door.

"David was standing by the washbasin holding a spoon in one hand and a lighted match in the other. I was mystified. He held the match under the bowl of the spoon. 'I don't have another girl friend, Judy—but here's your competition,' he said. He sounded so funny. I went over and looked at the spoon. There was a little water in it and some white powder which was bubbling and dissolving. I had no idea what it was. After the powder had completely dissolved, David picked up a little capsule from the sink and emptied some more powder out of it into the spoon. David didn't say anything and neither did I. The sun was coming in the bathroom window, making everything look brighter than life, and it was so quiet in there. Out in the living room the record blared away with a drum sequence. It seemed like a dream or a movie or something.

"Finally David reached into his pocket and pulled out a funny contraption—an eye dropper stuck on a hypodermic needle. As he started filling the eye dropper with the stuff in the spoon, I began to realize just what it was all about. I had heard about dope before, and had even had a puff off a marijuana cigarette at a party once, but I had never known just what real dope looked like, or how you used it.

"David pinched the big vein in the crook of his elbow so it stood up a little, and then rammed the needle in. He said, 'Maybe you understand now. I've been taking this stuff for almost a year—just on weekends. I usually take my shot before I come to your house on Saturdays, but last night there was some trouble and the pusher was lying low, so I didn't make my connection until pretty late. Then, after we took our shots—Frankie, Jimmy and me—we were walking along and passed a bar where there was a good combo playing. We went in to listen, and I didn't think any more about my date with you. When you're hopped up you don't care about things like being where you're supposed to be or keeping other people waiting.'

"I sat down on the edge of the bathtub and tried to blink things into focus. It may seem odd, but I was more shocked that Frankie and Jimmy took dope, too, than I was at anything else. I guess when you have so many things to take in at once, you just fasten on one idea. David put his arm around me and lifted me to my feet. 'Come on in the living room,' he said.

"We sat there with the records playing away and David told me how Jimmy's brother, who was twenty-two then, had taught Jimmy, David and Frankie how to use dope, and had sold it to them. David said that a lot of jazz musicians used dope. 'I'm not an addict, though,' he said; 'I just use it with the boys once or twice—sometimes three—times a month. It's pretty expensive.' I kept looking at him trying to see if the dope was making any difference in him. I couldn't see any change. That's a funny thing—an addict can spot another addict a mile away; the ordinary person—unless you're a doctor or something—finds it very hard to tell if a person is under the influence of dope.

"Well, this will seem crazy, but as I was sitting there one thing ran through my mind, and that was that if David was taking dope I wanted to take it too. It seems incredible to me now, looking back, that I could have made a decision—one that was to affect my whole life—so quickly. What I was thinking about was that David had said, 'Here's your competition,' and if that was my competition, the way to get rid of it was to share that part of David's life. I asked him to give me a shot and at first he refused, but when I kept begging he gave in. He said later on that if he hadn't been hopped up he would never have given in to me.

"Back in the bathroom, David started cooking up some heroin in a spoon. After that was dissolved, he pulled out another capsule, which was cocaine, and dumped it in too. He told me that this was a 'speedball'—heroin and cocaine together—and it was the biggest and best kind of shot you could take because you got two different kicks from it. I was shaking all over. I wasn't exactly scared. I was excited and I felt as if the whole world had disappeared or something. I stuck out my arm, and David plunged in the needle. I started to cry because the needle hurt, and then as the fluid disappeared into my arm I began to feel dizzy and very sick. As soon as David took the needle out I ran to the toilet and began to vomit. I have never vomited so much in my life. Then I had the dry heaves. I was staggering around the room, sure I was going to die right away. David didn't seem too concerned—that's because he was hopped up. You're never concerned about things when you're high. Actually, I could have had even worse effects from taking a shot of that potency when I wasn't used to drugs. After I had control of myself, I went into the living room.

"As I lay there on the couch, I began to know what it meant to be hopped up. I can't explain that first feeling to you very well. I don't know if it's anything like being drunk or not, because I've never been drunk. I just lay there until it was dark outside, and David was stretched out in an easy chair with his eyes closed and his hands behind his head. We talked and talked and talked, and it seemed as if everything we said was very important and very interesting. The music sounded better than any music I had ever heard. The ordinary thoughts that were always running through my mind—my family, my looks, my schoolwork—just faded away. I didn't have a care in the world, and it didn't matter to me what time it was or what day it was or even what year it was.

"From then on, it was like the first time I had ever been kissed. I kept thinking about what the second time would be like, and the third time.

"After that, David and I took dope together once or twice a month. We called it 'weekend binges.' We usually gave each other shots at my house, when my father was asleep and my mother was out. As the year went on, those binges became more frequent, but still they were never more than weekend affairs. We were sure we could never become addicted.

"By this time David had been out of school for a year and had been working as a bookkeeper for $35 a week and going to business school at night. I decided to quit school and go to work to earn some money. David and I thought we were in love, and we were talking about the day we could get married.

"His parents were reluctant because they thought David was too young—he had another two months to go before he would be twenty. But we were married a week after my eighteenth birthday.

"We moved into a furnished one-room apartment where we shared the kitchen with two other families, and for two months after our wedding neither of us took any dope. Then we got bored. We didn't seem to have as much social life as we had had before. I didn't enjoy preparing meals in a shared kitchen, so we mostly ate out, and when we were in our room we felt sort of closed in. We didn't have a TV set, and we ran out of things to talk about.

"So one weekend David went over to Harlem and bought some stuff. We went on a binge that lasted the whole weekend. We didn't mind sitting around in our room while we were high. The next weekend we did the same thing. After a while, we got so that Mondays were just about too much for us, and we started buying a little extra dope for a small shot on Monday mornings. Pretty soon we were taking drugs every day. There didn't seem to be any reason why we shouldn't. We were on our own, and we didn't have anything better to do.

"One Saturday night we used up our supply, and the next day we slept late. When we woke up that Sunday morning, we both felt sick. We knew we had to get ourselves a shot fast. I guess the idea hit both of us at the same time, because we looked at each other and said, 'We're hooked.' Until then, it hadn't occurred to us that we were addicted to dope. So far it had just seemed like one long binge. David went out to get some stuff, and I lay in bed getting sicker and sicker."

Judith, contemplating now the dark time that was past, fell silent for a moment, her face shadowed with pain. Then from the next room young Sammy's voice, still dreamy with naptime, sounded a plaintive summons. Smiling, she went to him swiftly, hugged him, changed him, and placed him in a sunlit playpen. Fortified with this reminder of present reality, she was ready again to relive for a time the bad days that are gone.

"Soon we were spending about $10 a day on drugs," she resumed. "Since our combined incomes were only $67 a week, and our rent was $70 a month, you can see we were living way outside our means. My mother had been talking about finding us a nicer apartment, and when she finally did locate a three-room basement apartment on her street, we didn't know what else to do but move in. We didn't dare tell her how broke we were.

"Within two weeks after we moved, I got fired from my job. I had been afraid of that, because I was so sleepy every afternoon at work that I wasn't really getting anything done. Also, I had called in sick just a few times too often. I stayed home from then on. We didn't know where the first month's rent for our apartment was going to come from, but we cared about things like that only when we were not under the influence of drugs. We pawned our wedding gifts—the silver that David's aunt sent us, a new clock radio, and several other things, even my engagement ring, a family treasure which had belonged to David's great-grandmother. David had quit night school by this time—he couldn't keep up the pace. We were taking drugs as often as three times every day. We were borrowing from everyone we knew; and worse than that, David was successfully extorting money from the men in his office. He and Jimmy had worked out a 'con game.' The system they worked was as old as the hills, and we often wonder how people could have fallen for it.

"What he used to do was to tell a guy he knew where he could get some stolen merchandise—cameras, typewriters, radios—for

CONTINUED ON PAGE 195

What makes children good or bad?

The Shaw twins, of Beaumont, California, have successfully grown up with the companionship of delinquents, runaways and poorer children brought home by their father for temporary brothers and sisters.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME

By JOSEPH LAITIN

HOW AMERICA LIVES In the April JOURNAL

Emotional Tensions

drain your skin of beauty oils—every day

Skin authorities say the emotional tensions of your daily life can actually drain your skin of its own beauty-giving fluids. That's why by evening, your skin looks drawn and dry. To keep your skin lovely you must replace the oils your skin has lost.

The iron scorches a shirt

Susie "helps" in the kitchen

Tommy starts to pound

. . . And so do your nerves!

Pond's exclusive formula replaces the beauty oils that tension drains away

Bring your beauty to glowing life

How relaxing . . . how refreshing the cool, smooth touch of Pond's!

As you cream and cleanse your skin with Pond's Cold Cream, dry tension lines smooth out, tautness disappears. And quickly, as each tiny pore is replenished—you see your beauty wake!

Once more, your skin is smooth and lovely—beautifully alive!

Deep-Cleanses to let beauty oils in

After a rushed day your skin is thirsty for Pond's rich "beauty-oil" formula. As it deep-cleanses, Pond's sends needed vitalizing oils deep into dry tissue.

What a glorious feeling!—You can really feel your skin soften. You can see it glow. He'll notice the lovely difference, too, when you're close enough to kiss!

You need never be too busy to be beautiful. Let Pond's Cold Cream work this magic for you—tonight.

Today—in 37 seconds—bring out the beauty that is naturally yours

You need never be too busy to be beautiful

so good in glass

. . . because pure glass is a natural protector of the rich full flavor of instant coffee. Because glass jars are so convenient. You can seal them up again and know the contents will stay fresh. That's why you find instant coffee, and so many other products you don't use all at one serving, safely sealed in sparkling glass jars.

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVE., NEW YORK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 192

about half price. Let's say the victim bites and he wants to buy a typewriter, a famous-make standard, brand new, for only $50. He agrees to meet David at such-and-such an address—one of those buildings full of furnished rooms in Harlem, the kind with the flat roof that leads on to the roofs of all the other buildings up the block.

"When the victim arrives, he is introduced to David's pal, Jimmy. David says he is going to buy two typewriters—one for his uncle—and Jimmy says he is going to buy two Leica cameras. David and Jimmy have $100 each, while the victim has $50. While they are waiting for the man with the goods, David hands Jimmy his $100 (usually a wad of paper rolled up in a $5 or $10 bill) to keep with his money, and suggests that the victim turn his $50 over to Jimmy also. The victim does so. They wait some more, and eventually Jimmy strolls upstairs to see if he can find the man. He returns in a few minutes to say that he saw their man on the second floor, and he'll be right down. They wait. The man does not appear. After a while, David turns to Jimmy with a horrified expression: 'Hey—you didn't give that guy our money, did you?' Jimmy looks stricken. He turns red. 'Well, he said he'd be right down with the stuff. I thought it would speed things up.' David glares at Jimmy and dashes for the stairs. There is no sign of the man on the second floor or the third or the fourth. Usually the victim discovers the stairs to the roof, and decides that the man must have escaped over the rooftops. The victim is furious because he has lost his $50, but he doesn't suspect foul play. After all, his friend David lost twice that much and David's friend lost $100 also.

"We went downhill faster and faster. I can't really remember this period in our lives. I was always doped up, and I couldn't distinguish even one month from another. I just remember the end, when we were completely broke and had no way to get hold of some dope. I was violently sick—it was a Sunday morning again. David had some crazy idea my parents would give him the money if he told them the whole story, and then he could buy some stuff to last us through the day, and then worry about what they would say later on. My parents didn't react the way he wanted them to, though. They called our family doctor.

"The doctor wouldn't give us anything to ease the withdrawal. After he left, we were so desperate we went around looking for old envelopes and sacks, trying to scrape up just a little heroin or cocaine from the corners. That didn't work. Somehow we suffered out the night without anything at all to help us. I went into convulsions, and couldn't sleep at all. The next morning my parents and David's family came over and took us down to Bellevue Hospital.

"I don't like to remember my four days at Bellevue. I was violently ill the whole time, and they wouldn't give me anything to relieve the withdrawal pains, except paraldehyde—which just made me vomit. On the third day I learned that David had checked out of the men's ward. I was furious. David was out of the hospital one day sooner than I and therefore having at least one more shot than I was going to have! I was determined to catch up with him, and I made plans with another girl in the ward, who was also a junkie, to go out on my own after I left the hospital. I shiver when I look back on this, for I am sure that the girl was a prostitute—like most girl addicts—and I hate to think what sort of life I might have led had I gone ahead with my plans. The next morning, though, David was in the lobby waiting for me, and with him were our parents. The Strauses' car was outside, and before we knew what was going on we were being driven up to a sanitarium in upstate New York for a three-month 'rest.'

"We rested all right. There was no therapy of any kind—in fact, there was nothing for us to do but just sit. We hated it.

"I got sick there. I had realized that the drugs were affecting my normal female functions—I hadn't menstruated for I don't know how long. The doctor told me this was a usual result of using drugs, and that I wouldn't conceive, either, while I was on the habit. But he also said I had an ovarian infection, and couldn't have babies without an operation. I felt bad about that. I hadn't really wanted babies until the doctor told me this. Then all of a sudden I wanted them. But even though I had decided that dope was the cause of my problems, I was still obsessed with one idea—to get myself a shot when I got out. Just one shot to catch up with the speedball David had the night he left Bellevue without me.

"However, when we left the sanitarium, our parents had more plans to keep us out of trouble. They had arranged for David to go stay with an aunt in Hartford, Connecticut, and look for a job and place for us to live there. By the time I joined him, he had a good job as a salesman and bookkeeper in a large television and electrical-appliance store, with a salary of $70 a week. This seemed like a million dollars to us—we never dreamed of making so much. We located a nice three-room furnished apartment for only $50 a month, and after a week or so I found a job typing for $35 a week.

"We liked this life. We saved some money and bought a secondhand car. We didn't think about dope much, but we weren't 'cured' by any means. I resented terribly, still, the fact that he had checked out of Bellevue and left me alone there. I was the one who ruined our chances to continue with our constructive life in Hartford. I kept nagging David about how much I wanted to go visit my family. I had in the back of my mind the notion that once we got to New York, it would be easy to get hold of a shot for myself. Then, I thought, I would never take any more.

"Finally, after we had been in Hartford for more than a month, we drove to New York one Friday evening. We visited my parents and David's family Saturday and Sunday. Before leaving, we bought a deck of heroin [an ounce or less] and a package [about the same amount] of cocaine.

"After that first binge, we wanted more, and started hanging around bars and other places in Hartford where there were dance bands. Finally we met a couple of musicians who were addicts, but we learned that they made trips to New York every weekend for their supply. We all decided to go in together the next weekend. From then on, it was routine.

"It didn't take long for us to get hooked again. We had been gradually increasing our purchases, so that we'd have enough to last all week long. What with gas and other expenses, our habit started costing us $200 a week—and we made only $105. David started dipping into the till at the store.

"Two months after that first weekend binge, David was caught. He admitted to having stolen $2000 and his boss decided not to press charges, because all the store was really interested in was getting the money back. A bonding company agreed to reimburse the store, and David was free, with the understanding he would pay back the bonding company. We had no money, and we were desperate. I had already been fired from my job for the same old reasons—drowsiness, sleepiness, absences. We decided to go back to New York, but first we knew we'd have to kick our habits. We checked in at a Hartford hospital for three days. The doctors and nurses were very nice, but they weren't used to treating drug addicts, and didn't know what else to do for us but to give us paraldehyde. While I was there, despite the terrible withdrawal pangs, I think I began to have my first thoughts of recovery. I believe it was because I was so well treated by everyone at the hospital.

"We packed up, borrowed $20 from David's aunt, drove to New York, and checked into a hotel in Harlem to buy some stuff. We wanted a last binge before we faced our families.

"The next morning we decided we might be better off alone, and we agreed to separate. David went to his family and I went to mine. Because of that last binge, I had more withdrawal sickness to go through, and I did it alone at home with no medication.

"After two weeks of separation, David and I went back together again. We told our parents we needed each other, but what we both craved was a shot. David's grandmother loaned us $100 to get started on again, and we took a furnished room in the neighborhood for $14 a week. Our first night together, we got high, and as I remember it, we were almost immediately hooked. We went through David's grandmother's $100 in a week. Neither of us could work. I didn't have enough energy to job-hunt, David looked too bad to apply for an office job. He was fifty pounds underweight, and full of needle scars. The veins in his arms had collapsed, and each time he took a shot he had to punch all over his body to find a vein that would take it. He did get a job as a shipping clerk in a supermarket, but it lasted about two days. He didn't have enough strength.

"We lived like animals. I just lay around all day. I can't remember eating anything more than soup and bread. We didn't trust each other. If there was some stuff in the room, neither of us would leave the other alone with it—we were both cheating each other by holding back on portions. David took an overdose and nearly died, and after that I took charge of doling out the stuff. I used to mix about half his share of heroin with mostly water, and throw in a little cocaine, saving the rest of his heroin and some of his cocaine to make my own shots better. Then I would watch him make a pincushion of himself just to get half a kick. He didn't suspect that I was the one doctoring his shots, because I used to complain that mine weren't good either. We blamed it on the pusher—we'd had milk sugar sold to us before."

Judith leaned back in the chair and looked weary with remembrance. After a moment she shook herself, as if from a recurrent nightmare, and disappeared briskly into the kitchen. Soon she was back, with a tray of coffee and cookies, and orange juice and zwieback for Sammy. She set the tray carefully on a little table, carried his midafternoon snack into her son's room, and returned looking happier and refreshed.

"The end came," she said, sipping her coffee meditatively, "when David was arrested for cashing a stolen Government check. In one way this was the worst thing that ever happened to us, for my husband has a jail record. But also, as a result, we haven't taken any dope for almost four years.

a 3¢ stamp may give you the figure you long for BEFORE—Imperfect posture and ugly bulges may mean you are neglecting your figure!

AFTER—Note new poise, new beauty in her Spencers, improvement in appearance and posture.

This FREE booklet discusses your figure faults!

Many women suffer from ugly sags and bulges—and figure faults due to imperfect posture. If you have found other supports inadequate, you are ready for a Spencer—the foundation of good posture!

Your Spencer Brassiere and Foundation—individually designed, cut and made for you alone—will give you the gentle "lift" you need – guide your figure to lovelier lines – give you graceful poise. And Spencers are guaranteed not to lose their shape!

Write or Phone for FREE information today

Mail coupon below for free 16-page booklet, or phone your Spencer Corsetiere. Look in yellow pages under "Corsets," white pages under "Spencer Corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop."

Lordosis Backline ☐ Breast Problem ☐ Fatigue Posture ☐

Please send FREE 16-page booklet.
I have marked my figure problem.
I would like to make money as a Spencer Corsetiere ☐

3-58

Mrs.
Miss _____
(Print name and address)
Address _____
City _____ State _____

MAIL to SPENCER DESIGNERS, 141 Derby Ave., New Haven 7, Conn. (In Canada—Rock Island, Que.)

SPENCER®
individually designed foundations and brassieres

"It happened this way. The pusher bailed David out of jail, and while he was waiting for his trial to come up, a probation officer told us that there was a good chance David could serve out his sentence at the Federal hospital for addicts in Lexington, Kentucky. He also suggested that I go there immediately.

"I can't remember too much about the trip. David supplied me with enough heroin and cocaine to keep me from getting sick on the long ride, and I was hopped up the whole time. I do recall that it was no easy job to fix a shot in those little cubicles in the ladies' room. I had to be pretty steady to keep from spilling my spoonful when the train went into a lurch. I took the last of my supply shortly before my stop.

"At Lexington I was examined from head to toe. They make sure you're not hiding any dope on you—and I mean they make sure. After that they took me up to the isolation ward. I'm not sure whether it was because the nurses and doctors at Lexington were so understanding and so interested in helping me, or because they gave me medicine that helped me to relax and even sleep, but my whole withdrawal period was, I think, as easy as a withdrawal can possibly be. There was none of the violence of the other times—the vomiting and convulsing, the horrible itching and hot and cold flashes, the thrashing around. This time I just felt sort of weak and uncomfortable. After about a week I was feeling well enough to be bored with just sitting around.

"I requested a transfer to the population ward, where I could keep busy with hospital duties. I noticed some typewriters around, so I taught some of the other girls how to type, and before I knew it I was conducting a regular typing class. By the time I had been at the hospital two weeks, I was beginning to gain some weight (I was thirty pounds underweight when I went there) and I was taking an interest in how I looked—something I hadn't bothered about for a long time. I decided to ask for psychiatric help. You're not required to do this unless you want to.

"I'm not sure now why I stuck with the psychiatrist as long as I did. We didn't get along well at all. It started off wrong when he refused to believe that I had not been a prostitute. I could understand why he was so suspicious, for all the other girls there had done that kind of thing. He kept saying to me, 'Come on, now—tell me the truth. How did you contribute to getting the supply?' And I'd say over and over, 'When I didn't have a typing job, I didn't contribute anything. David got the money. He bought the dope.' Finally the psychiatrist wrote to David, who was still in New York, and asked him to verify what I had said. When David did, the doctor seemed satisfied and went on to other things. By that time, though, I was just frozen against the psychiatrist, I didn't feel like opening up to him at all.

"I am convinced that the experience that made me determined to overcome my addiction was my first meeting with David after I had been at Lexington for three weeks. On the day he arrived, one of the nurses took me to a visiting room to see him before he went to the men's isolation ward. I went into the room and sat down on a bench to wait for him. There was a skinny figure huddled on the end of a bench along the opposite wall. I glanced at it, half interested. It looked like a very sick man who hadn't changed his clothes in a month. He was bent over with his head hanging almost to his knees and his arms folded in front of his chest. His hair was dark and long—it straggled around his neck and ears and hung in his face. I wondered vaguely if he was there to see one of the girls I knew, and it ran through my mind that I hoped he wasn't going to sit there all the time while David and I were together.

"The nurse, who had been standing at the door talking with a social worker ever since I came into the room, looked over at me and said in a surprised tone, 'Hey! Aren't you going to speak to him, now that he's finally here?'

"That emaciated, dirty man was my husband. It was like a nightmare. I walked over to the bench and sat down beside him. He didn't move—just sat there shaking. He hadn't shaved or washed in days. I had never looked at my husband when he was under the influence of drugs when I hadn't been in the same condition myself. It was a shock—it was the greatest shock of my life to see him then. My twenty-two-year-old husband looked like a middle-aged bum from skid row.

"After that, I was a different person. Most drug addicts who manage to get cured—or as cured as an addict can get—tell of experiences which bring about what we call a 'reawakening,' after which they have a real drive, deep and powerful, to be cured. I don't think it's possible to overcome an addiction without this drive. From the moment I realized that I was sitting in the same room with my husband and didn't know him, I had that drive.

"From then on I saw David only on Sunday mornings, when the girls sat on one side of long tables and the boys on the other side for visiting hour, and on Sunday afternoons, when the girls' Addicts Anonymous group met with the boys' group. During the week I missed him terribly—I would get very depressed, and once I was in such a bad way that the nurses arranged for me to see him on a weekday. Even though I was getting well and was busy in a number of activities, I still needed reassurance from David. I needed to hold his hand and have his arm around me. He was my whole life.

"I was very enthusiastic about the Addicts Anonymous group. That's the same sort of thing as Narcotics Anonymous, only Addicts Anonymous is a strictly institutional group and doesn't meet outside the hospital. Both are run on the order of Alcoholics Anonymous. I was secretary of the girls' group, and I think that one indication of how far I had progressed by the time David came to the hospital was that I stayed enthusiastic about the group even after I found out that David thought it was all silly and stupid. When he first started coming to the meetings I used to hear him snorting and mumbling in the boys' section behind me. In the old days, his attitude would have killed my enthusiasm: if he sneered, I sneered. But I was beginning to grow up, and I worked as hard as ever with the group. As the weeks went by, he stopped snorting and making remarks, and after a while he began taking a real interest. Before long he was editor of the newspaper we put out and he spent his free time reading everything he could find on narcotics.

"I left the hospital after eight months. David still had about eight months to go because he was serving his full fifteen-month sentence there. When I got home, I had my real test, for I had to learn all over again how to get along in the world of normal people, and I had to discipline myself by myself. There were no doctors and nurses around to help, to keep me from going out and buying drugs, no one to think up occupational therapy for me. Although I hadn't had much trouble with cravings during my stay at Lexington, the moment I arrived home I began to suffer terribly from what we call 'yens.'

Never despair; but if you do, work on in despair.
EDMUND BURKE

"One thing helped me a lot in that period. My mother, who had always ignored me, became very understanding. She had thought before I went to the hospital that it was all David's fault. She couldn't understand how some white powder could have taken over my life. David's family couldn't understand either. They thought he was just being pigheaded. When my mother saw how I struggled with myself in those first months out of the hospital, she knew at last that I had been an addict in my own right and that I could continue to be one, with or without David. She made up for all the time she had spent away from home during my childhood by being my close companion during those months between my release and David's. We went to the movies together and she came to Narcotics Anonymous meetings with me every week.

"The doctors had been unanimous in their verdict that if we were ever to be cured, David and I would have to separate; that as long as we were together one would drag the other down. We refused to do this, but I knew that the doctors weren't talking through their hats either. I knew very well that if I didn't make myself strong by the time David came back, we would both sink together. At the time I left the hospital David still didn't have it through his head that we could never take another shot as long as we lived. He was still talking about going on one final binge before we quit.

"I went to all the meetings of Narcotics Anonymous, and when I would get a strong yen I'd spend hours on the telephone with one of the members just talking off the craving. When I got terribly depressed I went to a doctor. We discovered that my depressions were mostly a product of extreme premenstrual tensions. The doctor wanted me to take tranquilizing pills at that time, but I was so afraid of establishing a dependence on any kind of medicine that I wouldn't take so much as an aspirin, no matter how bad things were.

"I got a typing job in the neighborhood, and by my fourth month in the world I was beginning to know I could succeed in my new life, no matter what happened.

Shown: Model 8-W, *$15.95. Other COSCO tables from *$6.75.

Guest's eye view of today's handiest serving cart!

● You'll shine as a hostess . . . with this handsome cart handy! It rolls soundlessly on three-inch rubber casters . . . holds a whole evening-full of refreshments . . . and has a lift-off top that doubles as a serving tray! Sparkling chromium or fashionable black enamel legs. Five-ply COSCOAT finish is extremely resistant to staining, scratching or scorching . . . wipes clean with a damp cloth . . . comes in handsome wood-grain pattern, in charcoal, blonde or gray. At furniture, hardware, department stores. Get yours now . . . a cart that will serve for years!

HAMILTON MANUFACTURING CORPORATION • COLUMBUS, INDIANA

Stools, from *$5.45. Step Stools, from *$9.95. Room Dividers, from *$13.95. Card Tables, from *$11.95. Folding Chairs, from *$7.45. Juvenile Seating, from *$14.95.

COSCO
for every purpose
. . . every purse

*Slighty higher Colorado and west

"By the time David came home, I had tually stopped having cravings, and no atter how terrible his cravings were they dn't hurt me, except that it made me feel d to know what he was going through. We oved in with his family in their new home the suburbs. No one in the neighborhood ew anything about us, and that helped a eat deal. When David would get a bad yen e would go to the movies and hold hands tight as we could. Sometimes we'd come t of a double feature and look at each other d I'd know that he hadn't got over it, so e'd get on a bus and go to another movie. avid came through his first month with ing colors, and he never had any trouble ter that.

"Three months after David's release, what e had thought was impossible happened. I arned that I was pregnant. If there had been y doubt in our minds then that we were oing to stick to our guns, this news dispelled entirely. We didn't want our baby to be orn with my addiction.

"From the moment we knew that I was go- g to have a baby, nothing mattered to us ut to make a whole life together for our child. avid had already started his present job with e insurance company, and by the time our ttle Sammy was born had had a promotion nd a raise.

"We moved into this apartment a year after ammy was born. We have been paying off ur debts every month—we have $500 to go— nd we have two big dreams: first, to have wo more babies; and second, to have enough oney to buy brand-new furniture and some- ay a nice little home where our children will ave their own rooms and a yard to play in."

It was almost six o'clock, and Sammy, re- eased from his pen, had been running about houting "Daddy" for the past ten minutes. udy leaped to her feet. "David will be here n a minute and I haven't even started din- ner!" She looked thoughtful and sat down again. "I can't quite understand why people are so afraid of addicts," she said at last. "You read how addicts are homicidal maniacs, sex-crazed fiends—I don't know what all. I would say that it is rare that a junkie will commit acts of violence. For one thing, the worst addicts are too weak and undernourished to be violent. Another thing: it's not when the addict is 'hopped up' that he is likely to steal. When he is high, he is happy, and he isn't worrying about where he's going to get money for more stuff. It's only between shots, when he isn't doped up, that he will steal and cheat to get money to buy his drugs. If there weren't a black market in drugs, encouraged by the laws connected with drug selling, there wouldn't be so many criminals.

"David and I also talk about the laws connected with drug using. They're so tough. One of the best ways for Narcotics Anonymous to help addicts would be for one or two members of the group actually to go to the addict's home and stay with him until he has overcome his craving—the way members of Alcoholics Anonymous do. But we can't. If David or I—even after four years of inactivity—went to an addict's home to help him through his withdrawal, we would run the risk of arrest. If his place was raided while we were there, and narcotics were found, we would not be able to prove that we were innocent. We both think that if the public knew more about the addict's problems, the laws would be changed."

Judy jumped to her feet. "I've got to stop making speeches and get dinner started." She disappeared into the kitchen. Just as she started the hamburger patties, the front door opened. Sammy, with a great, glad yell, ran to greet his father. David Straus, a pleasantly ordinary young man who might be anyone's husband, father, son or brother, was home at last.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 95

upposed to help me through my menopause hich, according to the doctor, has come prenaturely. It drives me wild to have Whit renind me of my medicine, although I won't leny I had forgotten to take it and frequently lo forget. Well, I took the pills. But I didn't eel any better. I couldn't keep from thinking Whit might have lost his temper because my accusations had hit on the truth and that he really was stepping out on me.

"Maybe Whit isn't guilty of infidelity, but if he is innocent it seems very odd he should be away from home so much. I know he is unusually capable, and yet, judging from the money I receive, he earns ridiculously little. Those facts just don't add up. It is almost impossible for me not to suspect another woman in the picture.

"My great fear is that my second marriage will be a repetition of my first. Late one evening a month ago I was bringing Larry home from a junior-high basketball game when I saw Whit's car parked outside a tavern. Almost before I realized what I was doing, I got out and went in. Whit was sitting in a booth with a lovely-looking blonde. For a minute I stood and stared at them, too weak from shock to move. I don't know what might have happened except that just then another man walked over from the cigar counter to the booth, and the blonde looked up and smiled in a way that made me think the two of them were probably together. Somehow I managed to leave, but when Larry and I reached home I was still trembling inside.

"Twenty minutes later Whit came storming in. He insisted I had made a spectacle of myself, although I hadn't spoken a word. Whit's story was that the blonde and the second man were married, and that he was trying to sell them both on the idea of a big annuity for the husband. But he did not explain why he didn't bring his prospects to our home, less than a mile away, to be entertained. Furthermore, if he ever sold a policy to that couple, which I doubt, he has yet to mention it.

"I cannot understand why insurance needs to be sold at expensive lunches and dinners, in bars and in taverns. Whit doesn't drink much, but he often stops in that particular tavern, the one so close to our place, and fraternizes with his business associates instead of bringing them to meet me. If I object to the tavern stops, Whit is likely to punish me by taking out his annoyance on Larry.

"I cannot understand why a man as basically decent and kindhearted as Whit can treat a child as he treats my son. If our daughter Ellen brings home a good report card, Whit praises her to the skies. If Larry's marks are high, he accepts the fact without comment, but he has plenty to say when the marks are low. In my opinion Whit himself is partially responsible for Larry's poor record. Larry would love to think of Whit as a father, but Whit makes the youngster feel like an outsider in our family.

"Larry has never had a decent break. His own father made him feel like an outsider too. On the rare occasions my first husband—his name was Joe—was at home he plainly showed his preference for our elder child, a little girl who died of leukemia. I myself neglected Larry in those days. My daughter by my first husband died during World War II, when it was impossible to obtain nurses, and for the two years she was ill I scarcely left her bedside long enough to change my clothes. The week she died her father announced that he had no affection for Larry and me, and within the month I filed for a divorce.

"My first husband and I should never have married; Joe was a star football player, a ranking tennis player, the president of our freshman class in college, and I was overwhelmed at his noticing me. My father thought little of either my charm or my intelligence—he was disappointed I hadn't the brains to study medicine, of all things!—and he was impressed that a man as popular as Joe should propose to me. Both he and my mother, who always agrees with what my father thinks, disapproved of my divorce, and I am quite sure my father believed I was to blame for the crack-up. I know my father was very surprised I had a second chance to marry. He said so.

GLAMOUR

...with Beauty Tone bulbs

Soft tinted light...not harsh gaudy color!

Now you can bathe your home in beauty without drowning it in colored light. Westinghouse Beauty Tone™ bulbs have a flattering light that comes from a coating within the bulb, not from harsh outside paints. You get a soft, subtle tint that calls attention to you and your rooms, not to the light. The color can't scratch or chip off; the light is soft enough to cut glare, bright enough for restful reading. Look for softer Westinghouse Beauty Tone . . . the tinted bulbs that flatter you! In 60, 75, 100, 150 watts and 3-way sizes.

YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse

BEAUTY TONE BULBS

"Whit and I were extremely happy in our first years together. Four years ago, before Whit went into business for himself and burdened both of us with debts and with worry, we hardly ever quarreled. He didn't pick on Larry in the beginning. It was after the birth of our own children—Whit was marvelously proud when our daughters were born—that my son was shoved out in the cold.

"Whit used to be a wonderful lover to me. On our honeymoon and for long afterward our sexual relationship was perfect. That part of our lives has now almost disappeared. If I approach Whit, he says he is too tired. He pushes me away from him. He turns his cheek to my kisses. Many, many nights he leaves our bedroom and sleeps by himself in the living room. In the long, sleepless hours that follow when I turn and toss and worry over so many things, I wonder whether weariness is the only answer to Whit's indifference. Again and again I wonder whether his thoughts aren't with some other woman. My worries are wrecking my nervous system, breaking my heart. I love Whit as I never loved Joe, as I could never love anybody else.

"I simply must make a success of this marriage. I am sick with fear I will lose Whit either to another woman or to his business. If only he would take up a different line of work, I believe our marriage could be radically improved."

Whit Tells His Side:

"Lila has never really understood the insurance business, although her father made a fortune in it," said forty-four-year-old Whit, an attractive man whose wide shoulders were held straight but whose quick chain smoking was an indication of inner tensions. "I am afraid to tell Lila the amount of my picayune earnings for fear of throwing her into a tailspin of worry. It's bad enough for me to worry; supporting his family is the man's part of the marriage bargain. I have never been able to buy the things for Lila and our children I have always wanted to buy for them.

"Ten years ago when Lila and I were married I was employed in a real-estate office and was pulling down enough to support myself in fair style, but my achievements were hardly remarkable. When my father-in-law recommended I shift to the insurance business, I was so impressed by the trappings of success surrounding him I overlooked the fact that he didn't offer to sponsor me in his own company or offer me any backing—except advice. I changed my career overnight, not realizing that it takes the average fellow, who lacks influence and isn't on the inside track, five years to build a profitable clientele and make a decent living.

"My father-in-law, a rugged individualist who worked his way up from nothing into custom-made shirts and a ten-thousand-dollar automobile, is the most self-centered individual I have ever known; he is actually more selfish than the uncle and aunt with whom I lived as a boy after the death of my parents. My father-in-law has cheerfully sat on the side lines and watched his daughter and his grandchildren and me sink into a bog of debt—there are occasions we have barely enough to eat—and his sole help has been trifling birthday gifts. Oh, yes, on one occasion he did offer us the down payment on a house, provided Lila could locate a real bargain.

"After a lengthy search she turned up a gem of a place at a genuine bargain, something very rare in these times. The real-estate agent, a personal friend of mine, promised to hold the place off the market for three days. My father-in-law was already regretting his burst of generosity. He inspected the house for five minutes, patronizingly remarked that he guessed it was O.K. but he would require several weeks to make up his mind. My disgusted real-estate friend immediately telephoned a red-hot prospect and sold the house the next day.

"Lila was crushed and I was burned to a crisp on her account. I blame Lila's father—his browbeating and bullying, his changeableness; my father-in-law is the sort who would kick a horse to death and then pet the colt—for the worrywart qualities that make her life a misery.

"I tried to make up to Lila for her disappointment in losing the 'dream house.' I suggested that perhaps she and I might find a more desirable place to rent than we were then occupying. Lila selected our present home and we moved. The place has a magnificent view. Also, we are farther away from Lila's parents—my mother-in-law, I must confess, is a sweet, self-effacing little lady—and this, of course, is dandy with me. In other respects, however, our location is anything but ideal. Both Lila and I spend too many of our waking hours in driving. I average from four to six hours at the wheel seven days a week. I arrive home too late and too exhausted to feel affectionate toward Lila or to feel like relating the petty details of 'my day.' At this time I have nothing optimistic to report anyway.

"If Lila could grasp the over-all picture and realize I won't always be a failure—she doesn't tell me I'm failing, but I know what she thinks—the situation would be easier for us both. I realize I may be largely to blame for her present unhappiness—her poor health is a factor too—but I literally don't know how to help her. In the evenings she is feeling blue and lonely and sorry for herself—she has seen nobody except the kids since early morning—and she wants excitement and stimulation. But I'm too dispirited myself to provide it. My heart sinks the moment I walk in the front door.

"Maybe I should be more philosophical about Lila's housekeeping, but I just can't manage it. When I see things thrown around, it has a physical effect on me: my stomach tightens, my eyeballs throb, and invariably my temper snaps. Perhaps my aunt's one virtue as a woman—it was my Aunt Gertrude's delight to push me around when I was a helpless kid until finally she pushed me into military school—was her meticulous housekeeping. If I brought in any dirt on my shoes I was not only obliged to sweep out the dirt, I was compelled to sweep and often to wax the entire

HOW DO YOU RATE AS A PARENT?

You know your child takes a size 3. The fitter brings out a 3½. Do you A ☐ say it's too large; B ☐ leave it to the fitter; C ☐ accuse the man of not having all sizes.

You can't tell if a shoe fits just by measuring the foot. It doesn't show how much grow-room the child needs. Or the last he needs. Takes special knowledge to fit growing feet. Like knowing that ¾ of the growth is from heel to ball and only ¼ in the toe. The man who fits Little Yankee shoes is an expert on growing feet. Most Little Yankee fitters can even fill a doctor's prescription on shoes. (Correct answer is B.)

Little Yankee shoes, fit for the child you love! For boys and girls, tots to teens, $5.95 to $8.50. The store nearest you? Write to The Yankee Shoemakers, Newmarket, N. H.

LITTLE YANKEE SHOES

SCHOOLS AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Retailing

Tobé-Coburn School for Fashion Careers
Prepare for a career in buying, advertising, fashion coordination, radio/TV. Field trips, cultural activities, store work with pay. One and Two Year Courses. Lifelong placement service. Begins September 3. Ask for catalog K.
851 Madison Avenue, New York 21, New York

Dramatic Arts

American Academy of Dramatic Arts 74th Year. Thorough preparation for Stage, Screen, TV and Radio. In Senior Year public performances on B'way. 2 yr. day courses approved for Korean Veterans. Part-time evening courses. Saturday teenage groups. Rm. 195, 245 West 52nd St., N.Y. 19.

Fine & Applied Arts

Moore Institute of Art 114th year. Professional College for Career Women. Internationally known artist-instructors. State accredited 4-year B.F.A. or B.S. degree courses. Advertising Art, Art Ed., Fashion Design & Illustration, Interior & Textile Design. Painting & Illus. New residence hall. Catalog. 1384 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia 21, Pa.

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design. Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st Monday each month. Specify course. Write Registrar, Rm 706, Ray-Vogue Schools, 706 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Home Study Schools

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.

I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39196B

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H33, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 52nd year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 853 E. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet. Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 1373, Chicago 14.

ACCOUNTANT
BECOME AN EXPERT
TO THE WOMAN WHO WANTS TO ENJOY AN ACCOUNTING CAREER
FREE SAMPLE LESSON
Thousands of firms need women accountants. We train you thoroly at home in spare time for well paying accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of CPAs and expert accountants. Placement counsel. Write for sample lesson and illustrated free book, "Opportunities in Accounting" which describes the opportunities for women in this profitable field.
LASALLE Extension University, 417 So. Dearborn St.
Correspondence Institution, Dept. 102 Chicago 5, Ill.

Vocational

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home, or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in hotels, motels, clubs, and apartment house projects. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.
Course Approved for ALL Veteran Training.
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL Room DC-549, Washington 7, D. C. 42nd SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Medical Technology

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Faculty. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory, X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. G. I. approved. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

Girls' Camps

Lake George Camp For Girls 6-17. On Beautiful Lake George, Glenburnie, N.Y. Mile-long private shore. All water sports. 95-acre woodland campsite. Little theatre—professional staff. Riding, riflery, tennis, arts, crafts. 3 age groups. Resident nurse. Brother camp—Adirondack for Boys—nearby.
Mr. & Mrs. John E. Donat, 15 Walnut Hill Rd., Orange, Conn.

Ogontz White Mountain Camp
For girls. On Ogontz Lake, near Sugar Hill, N.H. Aquaplaning, swimming, sailing, golf, riding, tennis. Crafts, nature study, dancing, music. Outdoor cooking. Mt. trips Tutoring. Cabins. 750 acres of woods and meadows. 36th yr. Booklet. Abby A. Sutherland, Box B, Ogontz Center, Pa.

Brown Ledge Mallett's Bay, Vt. "One of America's finest camps"—2 divisions. The "Buffs" 7-16; The "Browns" 11-18. Free daily riding for all. Water skiing, swimming, sailing, dramatics, golf, riflery, archery, crafts, trips. No "extras". Give age. Booklet both divisions. Write winter office:
Mrs. H. E. Brown, 18 Carver Ave., Box A, Scituate, Mass.

Beenadeewin On Lake Fairlee, Vermont for Girls 5 to 17. 4 age groups. A friendly, happy camp. Two complete waterfronts. Riding, Sailing, Trips, Dramatics, Crafts. All sports. Tutoring. Attractive cabins on ½ mi. lake frontage. Mature staff. 45th yr. Water Skiing. Catalog. Please state age.
Mr. & Mrs. L. J. Dundon, 15 Shelley Road, Short Hills, N. J.

Kiniya On a Bay of Lake Champlain in Vermont. Girls 6-17. 40th Season. Riding for every girl every day—wonderful trails—own stable. Sailing, swimming, canoeing, water skiing, tennis, archery, riflery, crafts, dramatics, dance. Separate division for girls under 10. Give age. Booklet.
Mr. & Mrs. John S. Williams, 70 Park St., Canton, N. Y.

Tegawitha on the sunny top of the Poconos. A Catholic camp for girls. 800 acres on private lake. All land sports. Swimming, riding, dancing, dramatics, crafts. Junior and Senior groups. Private chapel on grounds. 41st year.
Director: Mrs. James P. Lynch,
Catalog: Camp Tegawitha, Box L, Tobyhanna, Pa.

Moy-mo-dä-yo
"Sunny Woodland." 52nd year. Cornish, Me. Where 90 girls from 5-18 enjoy a friendly, relaxing, and happy atmosphere. Swimming, water skiing, sailing, canoeing, land sports, dramatics, dancing, crafts, riding, trips.
Mr. & Mrs. C. C. Peterson, 81-F. Winslow Rd., Waban, Mass.

Bryn Afon Girls 7-17 Rhinelander, Wis.
41st Season. Alt. 1750 ft. 300 acres. Sailing; Riding; Tennis; Fencing; Riflery; Aquaplaning; Dancing; Crafts. Resident Physician and Nurse. One Counselor for every four girls. Brother camp—Camp Deerhorn—3 mi. distant. Booklet.
Lotta J. Broadbridge, 2906 E. Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Mich.

Sylvania of the Rockies The Western Riding Camp
Daily riding (Arabian horses), music, dramatics, tennis, crafts, dancing, riflery, archery, etc. are all part of the fun. Experienced staff. 23rd. season. Ages 6-17. Catalogue. Write: Directors: Amy Lou Holmes & Elizabeth M. Hanaman, Bailey, Colorado

Boys' Camps

Idlewild The Oldest Private Camp. 68th year. Lake Winnipesaukee, N. H. For boys.—3 divisions. 8 weeks $495. No extras. Riding. Sailing, canoe, mountain trips. Golf, riflery, archery, speedboat, water skiing, aquaplaning, music, tutoring. Mature staff. Doctor, nurse. Cabins. Booklet. Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Roys, 375 Otis Street, West Newton 65, Massachusetts

Adirondack Woodcraft Camps
Fun and Adventure in the Woods. 33rd yr. Boys 7-18. Five age groups. 2 private lakes, trout stream near Old Forge. Adirondack, Canadian canoe trips. Horsemanship. Riflery, forestry, fishing. Moderate inclusive fee. 3 nurses. Bklt.
William H. Abbott, Director, Box 2387, Fayetteville, N.Y.

St. John's A lakeside Mountain Camp. Sandy Beach on Hunter Lake. Boys 6-16. 2300 ft. alt. 100 mi. from N.Y.C. Modern buildings. Lavatory in each cabin. Hot showers. Excellent meals. Recreational, instructional activities. Mature, professional staff. 1 counsellor for every 4 boys. Jesuit Chaplain. All incl. fee. Catalog.
Robert B. Giegengack, Yale Univ. A.A., New Haven, Conn.

Farragut Naval Camps
Summer of adventure on Toms River. Boys 8-18 in 3 age groups. Trips on 63-ft. flagship. 42 land and water activities. Modern buildings. 2 gyms. 2 athletic fields. Approved summer school program available. Write for catalog.
Farragut Naval Camps, Box ABC, Toms River, New Jersey

Camp Lupton on the Shenandoah
A carefully supervised camp for desirable boys ages 8 to 14. Excellent equipment and location on Shenandoah River in foothills of Blue Ridge Mts. All appropriate sports, shops & crafts. Own stable, riding master & instruction. For Catalog: Address The Director, Box 73, Woodstock, Virginia

Special School

The Training School at Vineland, N. J.
Summer session, June 30-Aug. 29. An adventure in happiness for retarded and slow-learning children. Internationally noted. Medical, psychiatric, psychological, speech programs. 1600 acres; swimming pools. Minimum enrollment—4 weeks. Write: Box L.

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for thorough training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

om. In military school, if a white-gloved ill sergeant turned up a single speck of dust my quarters, I had to march around the rade area, a distance of four miles.

"I sometimes wish Lila had attended the male equivalent of a military school. She eps our house fairly clean, I guess, but she is pelessly unsystematic and scatterbrained. e works in spurts and dashes and habitually pends her energy, which isn't great, on the rong things. Six months ago, instead of waitg for me to come home or calling for Larry's sistance—my stepson is only fourteen years d, but he is a big kid, who should develop s muscles—she dragged the heavy lawn furniture from outside and stowed it in the cellar. That night she was in agony; the following week she was in the hospital for surgery with a severe hernia. One large item in the debts I will have to hump to overtake consists of medical bills, over fifteen hundred dollars, mostly Lila's.

"An ironic thing is that Lila worries constantly about my health, which is reasonably good. She diagnoses a slight case of the sniffles on my part as incipient pneumonia and drives me distracted by clamoring that I stay home in bed. I must work and work long, hard hours if we are to eat, and I am ever to be solvent. If Lila were genuinely concerned about my health, it seems to me that she might spare my nervous system by providing me with a neat, orderly house. Also she might raise a few windows and turn down the heat occasionally. Many times I have to move out of our bedroom to the living-room sofa in order to raise a window and get some air to breathe.

"Yesterday evening when I came home the thermometer in my den registered eighty-four degrees. The whole house, den included, looked as though a cyclone had passed through it. The vacuum cleaner was in the middle of the living room, the ironing board was set up in the dining area, my daughter Ellen had scattered crayons and note paper on my desk. I stepped on one of little Sally's roller skates in the foyer and it's a miracle I didn't break my neck. Lila was lying down.

"I hung on to my temper until I put away the vacuum cleaner and the ironing board and a pile of unironed clothes and deposited the crayons, note paper and roller skates in my daughters' room. But Larry had dumped his coat in my easy chair and shoved his schoolbooks under it. My stepson, who used to be a smart little kid, now uses his schoolbooks for everything except study.

"I wasn't going to pick up after Larry, who is under strict rules to stay out of my den. I shouted outside, where he was fooling around doing nothing. I told him to haul his stuff to his own room. He stuck out his lip and just stood there. His impudence was too much for me. I pushed his coat and his books into his arms and ordered him to be on his way.

"He moved, but he went into his sisters' room. In a minute I heard a yell from five-year-old Sally. Larry had pushed over her dollhouse, a favorite trick of his. Furthermore, he'd clouted Ellen when she rushed to her baby sister's assistance. Lila excuses Larry for teasing our daughters as she excuses him for everything else, but I will not tolerate his bullying the girls. I grabbed him by the shoulders and shook him and ordered him to apologize to Ellen and to put the dollhouse together. He bellowed as though I were murdering him.

"Lila came flying out of our bedroom. I could tell at a glance she hadn't taken her pink pills—when she forgets her pills, the difference in her disposition is enormous—but I tried to give her the high sign to wait for my story of the fracas until we could be alone. She proceeded to attack my authority in the presence of all three children. She blessed me out for favoring our daughters, which possibly is true to a very limited extent, and for consistently maltreating her son, which is sheer fiction. As evidence of my brutality, she shrieked that I hadn't bought Larry a bicycle I can't afford.

"If Larry wants a bicycle so much, I should think he could get a paper route and earn it. I earned my way through college by carrying papers and jerking soda and washing dishes while other boys my age were joining fraternities and attending dances.

"I finally managed to get Lila back into our bedroom and behind a closed door. But I couldn't calm her down until she had given her jealousy, which is almost pathological, a thorough workout. If I stay in the drugstore twenty minutes instead of fifteen, Lila decides I've fallen in love with the cashier. Yesterday for the hundredth time she abused me about a pretty blonde I once took to dinner with her husband in the hope of selling a twenty-five-thousand-dollar policy. Because of Lila's reaction on the occasion—she stood in the restaurant and stared like a zombie and then without a word marched out—I was so rattled I lost the thread of my thought and lost the business. Frequently when I am in the midst of a business conference Lila shows up and behaves that way, and I'm always thrown off balance. She thinks I should bring my prospects into our home to meet her. I have never explained to her why this is impossible, since I dislike hurting her feelings. The truth is I am afraid to take such a risk when I don't know what condition I will find the house in or what shape her nerves may be in.

"I love Lila and I love my children. But my nerves are in bad shape too. I wish Lila would try and remember I'm not made of iron. If she doesn't drive me into a breakdown, if she will try to co-operate and be a little helpful and understanding, I am sure I shall soon be earning a better living for the family. When that

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Junior Colleges

GREENBRIER FOR GIRLS
Junior College & 2 yrs. High School. In healthful Alleghenies. 146th year. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Personal guidance. Outstanding social, sports programs. Fireproof suites. Addah B. McClaskey, Dir. of Admissions, Box L, Lewisburg, W. Va.

Vermont College A two-year college for 300 women. Terminal, transfer courses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, home ec., art, nursery teaching, secretarial, medical sec'l, medical tech., general. Spacious hilltop campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 16 bldgs. Glee Club, choir. Est. 1834. Catalog. R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier, Vt.

Gulf Park By The Sea Fully accredited. Jr. College, 2 yrs. H.S. Strong Liberal Arts program prepares young women for college entrance or transfer. High academic standards. National patronage. Music, art, dance, home economics, secretarial, speech. Water sports on Gulf of Mexico. Trips. Catalog. William G. Dwyer, Ed. D., Box J, Gulfport, Mississippi

Virginia Intermont Fully accredited Junior College for women. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Music, Art, Drama, Radio, Journalism, 2-year Nursing, Home Economics, Physical Education, Retailing, Secretarial. Elevation 2000 feet. Sports, riding, gym, pool. Est. 1884. Inclusive rate $1250. Catalog. Dir. Adm., Intermont, Box 102, Bristol, Va.

Averett College For girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Pre-professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 99th yr. Catalog. Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Marjorie Webster Junior College Accredited. 2-yr. terminal and transfer courses. A.A. degree. Lib. Arts; Phys. Ed.; Kindergarten; Secretarial; Med. Secretarial; Speech; Dramatics, Radio, TV; Music; Art; Merchandising. Pool, gym. Suburban Campus. Catalog. Box H, Rock Creek Park Estates, Washington 12, D. C.

Nichols Junior College For Men, Executive Courses in Business Administration, leading to degree. Conservation & Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment. James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols Junior College, Dudley 6, Mass.

SULLINS
Distinguished Junior College for Young Women
Accredited. All major liberal arts and career courses. Outstanding social program. All sports. Own stable. Lake. Indoor pool. Golf. Est. 1870. Catalog.
Wm. T. Martin, Pres., Box J, Bristol, Va.

Cazenovia Junior College Awards A.A. and A.A.S. degrees. Liberal arts, science, merchandising, nursery school; chemical, foreign, legal, medical and general secretarial; physical education, music, art. Year 'round sports. In beautiful New York lakes region near Syracuse. Founded 1824. Catalog. Director of Admissions, Box A, Cazenovia, N. Y.

College

Emerson College Specialization in radio, television, drama, speech, speech and hearing therapy within a broad liberal arts program. B.A., B.S., M.A., M.S. degrees. Coed. College owned theatre, radio station and completely up-to-date electronic TV production studio. Dormitories. 78th yr. Catalog. Admissions Dean, 126 Beacon St., Boston 16, Mass.

Business & Secretarial

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Special Course for College Women. Residences. For catalog write: Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave., Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

Chandler School For women. Professional secretarial training combined with advantages of living-in-Boston available to H. S. graduates. 2-yr. Medical, Legal, Executive courses. 1-yr. skills course. Resident facilities with cultural, social program at Franklin Square House. Write for catalog. Dr. G. I. Rohrbough, Pres., 440 Beacon St., Boston 15, Mass.

Wood Secretarial School Courses for H.S., Private School grads and College women. Air-conditioned. Accredited by State Educ. Dept. Guidance, placement service. Dorm. 79th year. Enroll now for July or Sept. Catalog. Enrollment Sec'y, 125 Park Ave., (100 E. 42 St., opp. Grand Central), N. Y. 17. OX 7-1290

Bryant College B.S. degree in 2 or 3 yrs. Professional training for business leadership. Business Administration: Acctg., Management, Marketing. Exec. Secretarial: Admin., Legal, Acctg., Med. Business. Teacher-Ed.: 4 yrs. 1-yr. Sec'l Diploma. Coed. 25 bldgs., dorms. Vet appr. 95th yr. Sept., Feb. entrance. Catalog: Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6, R. I.

Boys' Schools

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY
Health and interest assured by Spring and Fall in Georgia mountains. Winter at Hollywood-by-the-Sea, Florida—two complete school plants, each with all facilities. Outdoor sports year round. Attendance from 35 states.
Fully accredited preparation for all colleges. Also Post Graduate Dept. Constant association with selected teachers who live and eat with cadets. Weekly reports. ROTC program. Progress GUARANTEED. Reasonable All-inclusive fee. Outstanding record Athletics for all. Separate Junior High, grades 7-8. For illustrated catalog, address:
GENERAL SANDY BEAVER, Pres., Box 503-J, Gainesville 5, Georgia
6 MONTHS IN BLUE RIDGE MOUNTAINS • 3 WINTER MONTHS NEAR MIAMI

Worcester Academy Boys prepared for increasingly difficult college entrance exams. Graduates in engineering, scientific schools. Grades 8–12. Preference given younger boys as college pressure requires thorough prep. Only few 1-yr. boys accepted. Nat'l. enrlmt. Est. 1834. Sports. Headmaster. William S. Piper, Jr., 105 Providence St., Worcester, Mass.

PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY
125th year. Successful College preparation. High Achievement records in College and Life. Non profit. Small classes. Personal interest in each boy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. Expert coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming pool, Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 7–12. Summer session. For illustrated catalog write:
Headmaster, Box 401, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

Admiral Farragut Academy
Fully accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New Jersey; St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Junior Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. Sports, boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog. Adm. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey

Manlius
Founded 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7–12. Complete college preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for over 50 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Band. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog. Robert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

Perkiomen Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading colleges, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 8–12. Sports, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New York City, Philadelphia. 84th year. Summer school. Write for catalog. Stephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Penna.

Carson Long
Military School. Educates the whole boy—physically, mentally, spiritually. How to learn, how to labor, how to live. Prepares for college and life. Grades 6–12. 122nd year of character building. Rate $1275.00. Box 10, New Bloomfield, Pa.

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Summer School. 85th year. Catalog. Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY
★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 863, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Girls' School Switzerland

La Chatelainie St. Blaise, Neuchatel French Switzerland
Preparatory & Finishing school for girls 13–21. College Board preparation in English. Languages, home economics, secretarial courses. Optional winter & summer at Gstaad. Tours to Italy, France. Established 1880. Summer Session June—September. Dr. A. L. Jobin, Principal

Girls' Schools

Chapel Hill
Carefully supervised college preparatory and general courses for girls. Grades 7–12. Small classes. Moderate rate. Music, art, drama. Typewriting. Social, athletic, creative activities. Wilfred C. Clark, 327 Lexington St., Waltham, Mass.

Howard Accredited college preparation for girls. 83rd yr. Grades 8–12 and P.G. Art, music, speech, dramatics. Typing, shorthand. Small classes, friendly atmosphere. Supervised study, personalized guidance. New gym and auditorium. All sports. Riding. 40 min. from Boston. Mrs. Vida A. Clough, Box 22, West Bridgewater, Mass.

Mary A. Burnham School For Girls. 81st year. Graduates are mature, poised, thoroughly prepared for college. Fully accredited. Music, art emphasized. Traditional campus life. National enrollment. Riding, skiing, swimming, all sports. Summer School. Newport, R.I. Catalogs. Mrs. George Waldo Emerson, Box 43-X. Northampton, Mass.

Bordentown Military Institute
Fully accredited. College preparatory and general courses. Aviation. Outstanding record of college entrance. ROTC. Boys taught how to study; small classes; individual attention. All sports. Junior School. 77th yr. Summer session. Write for catalog. Registrar, Box 403, Bordentown, N. J.

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY
In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J3, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS. Founded 1860

Peddie A college preparatory school with a tradition of outstanding success preparing boys for college and for life. Grades 7–12. Endowed; fully accredited. Guidance; developmental reading; public speaking required. Separate Junior School. All sports, golf, tennis. Gym, swimming pool. 280 acres. Summer session. 93rd year. Catalog. Dr. C. O. Morong, Headmaster, Box 3-M, Hightstown, N. J.

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges, service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog. Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Tilton School Thorough college preparation. Grades 8–12. Builds character, responsibility, leadership. Small classes, understanding masters, stimulating instruction. Large gym. Extensive sports program for all. Outing Club, Glee Club, Debating. Mod. tuition. Est. 1845. Early application advised. Catalog. J. Gordon Jeffries, Dean, Box D, Tilton, N. H.

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep. School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band, Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

Greenbrier Military School
146th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-603, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5–12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influence. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog: Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog. Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee Randolph-Macon Academy Military. Accredited. 67th yr. Near Skyline Drive. Prepares for college through intensive study methods. Fireproof dormitory includes class rooms, swimming pool. Superior equipment. 70 miles from Washington, D.C. Write for catalog and "Your Boy." Col. John C. Boggs, President, Box H, Front Royal, Va.

Wentworth Military Academy
Thousands of business and professional leaders started here. 4-yr. High School; separate 2-yr. College. Accred. Sr. ROTC. CAA flying. Modern bldgs., country club. Sports for all; pool. Summer school; also younger boys' camp. 79th yr. Catalog. Col. J. M. Sellers, 1838 Washington Place, Lexington, Mo.

Coeducational Schools

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep. Grades 9–12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog. R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

Oakwood School An accredited coeducational Friends Boarding School. Grades 9-12. Strong college preparation. Religion, art, music; shop, typing. Guidance. Work program. Sports. Social activities. Country campus 75 miles from New York City. Founded 1796. Catalog: C. J. Hutton, Principal, Poughkeepsie, New York. GLobe 4-9400

Act the part of men. Prepare yourselves to endure toil. Resolve to rise; you have but to resolve. Nothing can hinder your success if you determine to succeed. REV. DR. W. D. HOWARD

Faraway friends are as close as your telephone

A telephone call is the easiest way to keep in touch with family and friends out of town. You can chat together as if you were face to face.

Why not call right now? It means so much, costs so little.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

For example:	Station-to-Station Calls First 3 Minutes	Each Added Minute
Providence, R.I., to New York	55¢	15¢
St. Louis to Chicago	70¢	20¢
Cleveland to Milwaukee	85¢	25¢
Miami to Atlanta	$1.10	30¢
San Francisco to Washington, D.C.	$2.00	55¢

These rates apply nights after six and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

Call by Number. It's Twice as Fast. BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM happens, I am hopeful all our differences, including our arguments over Larry, can be ironed out."

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"I started working on this case by trying to help Larry. It seemed quite possible the fourteen-year-old's mental health was at stake. At my request Whit thought back to his own boyhood spent with unfriendly, unsympathetic relatives; he then acknowledged that any child from a broken home is likely to have a tough time and he recognized that he had been making Larry's life very tough indeed. He also recognized that Larry, in haunting his den, borrowing his shirts and neckties, was repeating some of his own boyish patterns; as an orphaned youngster Whit had wistfully tried to copy and stick close to his uncle, only to be slapped down. The fact was that Larry desperately wanted to be a member of the family on an equal footing with his small half sisters. He resented being singled out and spoiled by his mother almost as much as he resented Whit's harshness.

"Whit was horrified to discover he was subconsciously reflecting the behavior and attitudes of both his uncle and his aunt, two people whom he had heartily disliked. His demand for neatness, tidiness, cleanliness, which was exaggerated to the point of compulsiveness, was an echo of his demon-housekeeper aunt and his military-school experiences. Whit set about the task of viewing himself objectively and trying to see Larry's side of things. In a long confidential conversation, the first of their relationship, he talked man-to-man to Larry and asked for the boy's co-operation in helping the younger children, being less careless with his possessions, applying himself to his studies. Admitting that a youngster living in an isolated beach neighborhood could hardly earn a bicycle with odd jobs, Whit stretched his overextended budget and bought Larry a second-hand bicycle. Almost at once there was a sharp turnabout in the boy's attitude. Treated generously himself, Larry began treating his small half sisters more generously. When he began carrying a magazine route, a job made possible by the bicycle, he frequently divided his profits with Ellen and Sally. His school marks rapidly picked up, even though he was busy with a job as well as with his studies.

"When Lila was invited to review her past, she perceived that her overprotectiveness of her son—she was coddling Larry far too much—sprang from feelings of guilt. Instinctively she was attempting to make up to Larry for what she fancied was her neglect of him in the sorrowful days her first-born daughter lay dying. This effort, she came to understand, was futile and foolish, hard on everybody in the family.

She also came to understand that her baseless jealousy of Whit, her fears and insecurities were rooted in her past. Lila's parents, her father in particular, had reared her to feel self-deprecatory and stupid; subconsciously she had patterned herself upon her self-effacing, shy little mother. Her first husband, Joe, had swelled her feelings of inadequacy and taught her to be suspicious and jealous. Since Joe had been faithless, she subconsciously expected faithlessness of Whit.

"After Lila recognized the origin of the jealousy and perceived she had unconsciously been confusing Whit, her second husband, with her first husband, Joe, it became easier for her to control her jealousy. Whit assisted her very materially in this respect. He stopped being so secretive about the details of his business, a reticence that in a considerable measure was based on his own feelings of failure and inadequacy.

"Lila had a good-enough head to deal with the family creditors; she was sufficiently intelligent to comprehend Whit's business once he explained it instead of leaving her apprehensive and in the dark. She stopped thinking of his work as an enemy and greatly modified the pressures she was putting on him. When the pressures were modified and Whit was able to apply his whole mind to his business during business hours, his income went up. Today—perhaps in part because he has passed the five-year mark he set himself, but certainly partly because of the improvement in his family life—Whit is doing much better financially.

"Whit and Lila's sexual problems were resolved as the other problems of their marriage were resolved. Overwork, weariness and worry are seldom conducive to increasing a man's interest in sex. Moreover, it was unreasonable and unrealistic of Lila to expect Whit to sleep in an overheated bedroom. When she began to show him thoughtful and sensible concern (her multiple anxieties, her frequently expressed worries about the state of his health were not helpful), when Whit felt less harried and driven by family and business demands, he soon became more affectionate.

"It was difficult for Lila to organize her housekeeping on a smoother basis, but she did so. Together she and I worked out a new schedule for her which included doing important tasks, the things important to Whit, early in the day. This meant she didn't let the bed-making and dish washing slide while she exhausted her energies scrubbing the floors and woodwork throughout the house. She quit attacking chores beyond her strength and then feeling unwell and martyred. She scheduled the heavy cleaning for Saturdays, when Larry could be of assistance. She admitted it was being unfair to Whit and to her whole family when she neglected to take the medicines prescribed by her physician. She wrote little notes of reminder to herself, began taking her pills faithfully, and her nervousness was considerably relieved.

"Toward the end of our counseling, Lila and Whit took another step. They borrowed the money to pay off their landlord and move to a more convenient address. They saved on telephone and gasoline bills. Whit automatically was able to spend more time at home and automatically Lila became less pushed, less clinging and dependent on her husband for her entire social life. The children now walk to school and Lila has made friends among her neighbors. If Whit is a little late, a rare occurrence these days, she doesn't go searching for him. Most of the time he still entertains his prospects outside his home, like the majority of insurance men, but Lila no longer worries about it.

"This case was closed some time ago, but from time to time I hear from Lila and Whit. Both assure me their marriage is on a firm foundation."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

SONG FOR A SECOND CHILD

By GLADYS McKEE

A first-born child is kept so sterile
That love itself seems touched with peril,
His schedule causes much mayhem,
Especially at two a.m.
A second child, all parents find,
Won't break or tarnish, peace of mind
Returns. He sleeps at his own notion
And eats and plays without commotion.
His smiles and teeth we take for granted
And life once more becomes enchanted
With normalcy. Pass on the word
And polish welcome . . . for the third.

Printed in U.S.A.

ES' ME

JOURNAL

APRIL
1958 • 35

MR 17'58

PUBLIC LIB

THE MAGAZINE
WOMEN ELIEVE IN

BEGINNING
EDNA FERBER'S GREAT NEW NOVEL
ICE PALACE

Complete Books Condensed in This Issue

AS CHURCHILL'S SECRETARY By ELIZABETH NEL
CKTAIL TIME By P. G. WODEHOUSE

NO PLACE LIKE HOME FOR TROUBLED CHILDREN

PARTY DINNER FOR 8 FOR $1.00 PER PERSON
Miracle Menu—Delectable, Easy to Prepare

HY I LOVE MY HUSBAND
I LOVE MY WIFE LETTERS

For the Bride Who Wants to be Both Beautiful SPRING TROUSSEAU IN COLOR
THE WELL-FED BRIDEGRO

Inlaid vinyl floor is Armstrong Mosaic Corlon, Style No. 6507.

SMART MOSAIC effect in black-and-white Armstrong vinyl Corlon goes with any colors, makes a lovely background for rugs. There are several practical black-and-white designs in Corlon, many other colorings. Picture below is about 1/6 actual size.

floor fashion news: black and white and practical all over

Black-and-white is very fashionable in floors today. Here's one that's more distinctive—and far more practical—than usual. It's Armstrong plastic Corlon, in a handsome "mosaic" style, with tiny squares of black and gray set in a clear white field. Decorators love it! But what many women like best about Armstrong Corlon is the way it hides dirt until they've time to sweep. (Previous black-and-white floors showed every little mark, every speck of dust.) And when it does come time to clean, Corlon has yet another advantage—it's virtually seamless. There's nowhere for dust to hide, so when you've swept or sponge-mopped your Corlon floor, you know its smooth surface is completely, satisfyingly clean. For any room in your home, Armstrong plastic Corlon is a modern, fashionable floor.

SEND 25¢ FOR "SUCCESSFUL DECORATING," 32 pages of ideas in color for every room. Sketch plan and list of furnishings in this smart bedroom-sitting room available free. Write Armstrong Cork Company, 5804 King Street, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

Armstrong

THE MODERN FASHION IN

FLOORS

LINOLEUM • INLAID VINYL CORLON® • RUBBER TILE • CORK TILE • LINOTILE®
CUSTOM CORLON PLASTIC TILE • EXCELON® VINYL-ASBESTOS TILE • ASPHALT TILE

WATCH ARMSTRONG CIRCLE THEATRE, Alternate Wednesday Nights, CBS-TV

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so

• New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.

• Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

ipana® TOOTH PASTE

Look for the BIG cap— only on NEW Ipana

Another fine product of Bristol-Myers

Softest, most luxurious white negligee—in silk point d'esprit—designed by Scaasi specially for Scott. Softest, most luxurious white bath tissue—Soft-Weve, Scott's superb 2-ply "facial quality" tissue. Soft-Weve in pastels is wrapped in cellophane to show you the lovely colors.

SCOTT PAPER

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

2-PLY "FACIAL QUALITY" BATH TISSUE

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 4

April, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Edna Ferber

EDNA FERBER's novel, Ice Palace, begins on page 62—that's about all the encouragement most people need to turn to that page and start reading. Before you do, though. you might like to know that Warner Brothers, who made the highly successful, all-star movie, Giant, from her last JOURNAL-serialized novel, plan to do the same with Ice Palace. You can decide how you would cast it as you read—although her imaginary characters often seem more real than real ones. Alaska may seem to you to be the heroine in this novel, and that part can be played by the territory itself. It is, you can be sure, Alaska today. Edna Ferber says she has never written a historical novel. But in Alaska at this moment, she wants the world to know, there is no town of Baranof, no village of Oogruk, no building called the Ice Palace, and no character in this novel is meant as a portrayal of any real person.

Joseph Laitin

"I am not now, nor have I ever been, married," JOSEPH LAITIN informs us. He wrote this month's How America Lives: No Place Like Home, on page 159. "For twenty years I was a newspaperman, starting as a police reporter in Brooklyn. I left because baseball leaves me cold and I couldn't stand all the talk about the Dodgers. As a correspondent I witnessed the Japanese surrender on the USS Missouri, the occupation of Korea and the war-crime trials in Manila. After the war I was present for the first two atomic tests at Bikini atoll, then traveled halfway around the world for the closing weeks of the war-crime trials at Nuremberg. I live in Hollywood Hills, but now that the Dodgers are in Los Angeles I may go back to Brooklyn."

Elizabeth Nel

I Was Churchill's Secretary, by ELIZABETH NEL, page 68, accounts for the author's whereabouts until December, 1945. And then—"I was married at Pretoria, Transvaal, to Lt. Izak François Nel, ex-prisoner of war captured at Tobruk, whom I met just after his release in May, 1945. We now have three children: Andrea Elizabeth, eleven; Deborah Susanna, seven; and François Michael Jonathan, two. Frans, my husband, is in charge of the Port Elizabeth branch of the South African Bureau of Standards. I love South Africa and am very happily settled here."

Condensed Books Complete in This Issue

COCKTAIL TIME (Fiction), P. G. Wodehouse . 64
I WAS CHURCHILL'S SECRETARY (Nonfiction), Elizabeth Nel . 68

Stories

ICE PALACE (First part of three), Edna Ferber . 62
PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST'S WIFE, Inez McGowan . 66
THE UNSUSPECTING, Kaatje Hurlbut . 70

Special Features

THE MOST POWERFUL ANTIPOISON, Dorothy Thompson . 11
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 21
FATHERHOOD WITHOUT FEAR, Abbot Mills . 43
WHAT MAKES A CHILD AGGRESSIVE?, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 46
THERE'S MUSIC IN THE AIR . 51
KIWANIS AND YOUTH, Margaret Hickey . 51
WHY I LOVE MY HUSBAND . 72
WHY I LOVE MY WIFE . 73
HOW AMERICA LIVES: NO PLACE LIKE HOME, Joseph Laitin . 159
IS ONE BILLION DOLLARS FOR EDUCATION ENOUGH?, Neal Gilkyson Stuart . 178

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 36
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 41
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 56
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 61
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 136
REFERENCE LIBRARY . 149
THIS IS A MESSY MISSER, Munro Leaf . 180

Fashion and Beauty

I DO LOVE A WEDDING IN THE SPRING, Wilhela Cushman . 74
APRIL PRINTS . 78
BEST-LOVED COTTONS, Nora O'Leary . 80
WANT A LIFT? TRY A NEW HAIRDO!, Dawn Crowell Norman . 82
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING, Bet Hart . 139

Food and Homemaking

SPRING SHAD FEAST . 86
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: SAUCES . 88
GOOD-TIME BUFFET FOR EIGHT, Margaretta Stevenson . 108
A KITCHEN FOR THE REST OF OUR LIVES, Margaret Davidson . 114
THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM, Margaret Williams . 122
MRS. WIZARD, THAT'S YOU, Jean Anderson . 170

Architecture and Interior Decoration

DREAM HOUSE FOR US, Grace L. Roosevelt . 84
HOUSE WITH A PLACE FOR EVERYTHING . 184

Poems

CHILD'S VOICE, Eleanor Averitt . 30
THE BLUE FIRE OF APRIL, Rosemary Clifford Trott . 91
THE SILENT WOMEN, Mary Kennedy . 102
MARGINAL NOTE ON A MILK BILL, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 112
I SHALL COME TO YOU, Barbara Shook . 126
DINING OUT, Janet Henry . 167
OLD SONG, Elizabeth McFarland . 169
SPLIT ROOT, Joseph Langland . 173
AGED EIGHT AND THREE, Norman Nathan . 188
WHITE COLLAR, Constance H. Dallas . 196

Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1958 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary. Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

Helena Rubinstein solves your beauty problems

The first lady of beauty science helps millions of women

HELENA RUBINSTEIN has had more experience with skin problems than any woman in the world. Ever since her medical student days she has worked to keep young skins beautiful . . . to correct bad skins . . . to make aging skins look younger.

Today dry skin, aging contours, large pores, blackheads are no longer tragedies. With the help of Helena Rubinstein's scientific skin care every woman can solve her own beauty problems. The first step is knowing what to do. The second step is doing!

DULL, DRY SKIN? Helena Rubinstein has just created remarkable new BEAUTY DEW*. In one quick step at bedtime this delightful lotion cleanses pore-deep, moisturizes your skin and helps sweep away blemish-breeding bacteria. You wake up to a complexion that is noticeably brighter, softer, clearer . . . completely refreshed! There's never been anything like BEAUTY DEW. And it's greaseless, too. 160 beauty treatments only 1.35. *T. M.

AGING SKIN? Now women over 35 can look younger! The skin's oil glands can be reactivated to supply the natural emollients found in a young skin! The miracle is Progesterone, the most feminine sex hormone of all. For the first time, Progesterone and Estrogens are available in Helena Rubinstein's medically-tested ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM with PROGESTERONE so you can correct wrinkles caused by dryness, bring natural moisture back to aging skin. 3.50.

FACIAL HAIR? NUDIT is a new scientific formula that wipes off facial hair! It is safe, quick, easy. It is the only hair remover that comes with SUPER-FINISH, the medicated cream that eliminates redness or rashing. NUDIT melts off hair below the surface of the skin for more lasting effect. 1.50.

CRACKED LIPS? Helena Rubinstein's new DEW-KISSED LIPSTICK helps heal while it beautifies. It actually releases moisture to the lips all the time it is on. The luscious sheen lasts as long as the color! In new Convertible Cases, 1.35 to 5.00. Refills .90.

DEHYDRATED SKIN? SKIN DEW is the remarkable new beauty discovery created in Helena Rubinstein's Paris laboratories. A fragrant pink lotion, SKIN DEW® sinks deep into the skin's under layers replacing moisture. It is instantly absorbed without a trace of grease. For a fresh young look, use it as a foundation under make-up, also as a glamorous night cream. 3.00, 5.00.

BLACKHEADS? Now you can actually wash away blackheads and correct oily skin problems with BEAUTY WASHING GRAINS. These miraculous little granules combine with water to clean out pores, turn greasy shine to pretty glow. 1.35.

PIMPLES? For skins that "break out," Helena Rubinstein has formulated new greaseless MEDICATED CREAM. Its medicated ingredients dry surface blemishes and actually help the skin heal itself. A boon to teenage boys and girls. 1.25. Prices plus tax Helena Rubinstein beauty products are available at leading department and drug stores or, if not available locally, write Helena Rubinstein®, 655 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 22, N. Y.

fairest of them all . . . beautiful

BAN-LON® SWEATERS

Pretty as a spring bouquet—carefree new "Ban-Lon" sweaters in sizes and colors and styles to delight both mother and daughters. And the beauty of it is—these talented sweaters keep their springtime loveliness and perfect fit through season after season of wear, with absolutely no pampering. Washing is easy. Pilling is no problem. No blocking's ever needed. At fine stores everywhere, for every girl in the family.

the test is in the touch

BAN-LON Quality Garment®

For Your Protection
Sweaters which carry this trademark must pass rigid quality and performance tests.

® Reg. Joseph Bancroft & Sons Co.

OUR READERS WRITE US

Back-Yard Lily Pond

Larned, Kansas

Dear Editors: I had a dream's-eye view of my back yard. The view was of a bathtub, sunk into the ground, surrounded by a collection of rocks and having a water lily, goldfish and cattails growing in it.

The tub and rocks materialized soon, but the contents! There have been frogs, Lilies and cattails.

fish, a very bad-tempered turtle and toads. The most frequent contents are shown in this picture. The cats also love to play in it.

I haven't even missed the water lily or the cattails. Sincerely,

ALENE ZOLL KIRCH

That First Word

Kalamazoo, Michigan

Dear Editors:

One morning at an early age
Our daughter proved herself a sage.
Her round face decked with cooky crumbs
She spoke her piece from toothless gums,
"Good!"

No music that we ever heard
Surpassed the charm of that first word.
Indeed, it soon became a song.
She sang it to us all day long,
"Good, good, good."

She crooned it as she stroked her pet,
She wailed it when her pants were wet,
She gurgled it when she was fed,
She shrieked it as she went to bed,
"Good, good, good!"

We wait in vain for baby girl
To drop another verbal pearl,
But since she sounds but one clear note
We're glad it's one that we can quote:
"Good!"

Sincerely,

BETTY FERGUSON HORVATH

Parents are Human Too

Klamath Falls, Oregon

Dear Editors: I think it's about time we scrapped the so-called "modern" theory that there are no juvenile delinquents, only delinquent parents. We parents are trying to raise a generation of children who are being taught that they do not have to accept responsibility for their actions, for the crimes they commit—and consequently they obey every slightest urge to do wrong. Wouldn't it be better if juvenile officers helped to impress on juveniles that their parents are human beings too?

There are innumerable cases of youngsters who run away from home because they do not want to accept the responsibility of a few household chores. They are put into other homes where they don't have to do chores. Their parents are pictured as tyrants, and instead of punishment for the child, he has a grand vacation. Is this any way to teach a child that he must accept his share, that he will get back only what he puts into his family? I think not!

There are no "angel" mothers or perfect dads; and not all bad children come from bad homes. Sincerely,

LENORA KIRKPATRICK

Hot Foot?

North Bergen, New Jersey

Dear Sirs: Years ago I always complained that the pot holders I purchased, as well as the pretty crocheted ones I received as gifts, were never insulated enough. Then my husband brought home a piece of asbestos cloth.

Now, using an old woolen or cotton sock, I cut off the heel, cut a piece of asbestos to fit, slip it into the sock foot and loosely stitch the opening for easy removal. A loop can be sewed on if the pot holder is to hang on a hook.

When soiled, take out the asbestos, wash sock and you have a clean pot holder. When sock wears out, the asbestos is usually good for another sock foot. This is a good inexpensive gift for children to make!

Sincerely,

MRS. CHARLES CASTORO

Give Yourself a Chance

Des Moines, Iowa

Dear Editors: On a gloomy Monday morning I had a phone call from the leader of my daughter Jenny's Camp Fire group. Would I be willing to accompany fifteen girls to Camp Hantesa, forty miles away, for the weekend? I looked out at the dingy sky. It was late in the season. Snow could be expected any day.

The leader went on. We would be housed together, in the lodge, and would cook our meals outdoors. The girls were greatly enthused; none of them had ever been to winter camp. From the urgency in her voice, I received the impression that she had put this proposition before some of the other mothers with little success.

My mind was busily at work preparing my own excuses. I had made plans for the weekend. It was the only time my husband and I could work together on family projects. Moreover, I had little inclination for camping. Then when the leader finished talking I took a deep breath and put into practice the theory of giving myself a chance. "You can count on me," I said.

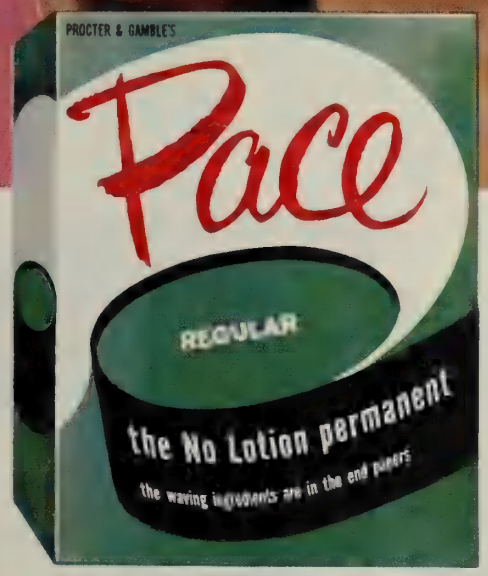
I faced the weekend with misgivings—and some of my fears were justified. It was frequently bedlam in the cabin. One girl had to be forcibly dissuaded from listening to all fifteen hours of an Elvis Presley program on a pocket radio. Water had to be carried across a swinging bridge from the caretaker's cottage down the valley. And the toilet was beyond the cottage.

But there were rewards that far outweighed the inconveniences. Not even minor disasters could extinguish the laughter. And in the evening, as the girls painstakingly brushed their hair, the firelight shone on their sweet young faces. By

CONTINUED ON PAGE 58

OLD JOURNALS?

The Radcliffe College library's set of JOURNALS is now complete with the exception of these issues:



December, 1883
January through December, 1884
January through November, 1885
February, 1886
August and September, 1889

Readers who own one or more of these magazines and wish to sell them for $1 each should write to Mrs. Richard Borden, Women's Archives, Radcliffe College, Cambridge 38, Massachusetts.

no lotion!

New kind of Home Permanent from Procter & Gamble

The end papers do the waving for you

Costs no more than lotion permanents—$2 plus tax.
Choice of 3 strengths: Regular...Gentle...Super

Every end paper contains its own waving ingredients—just the right amount for each curl

Because the end papers themselves measure out the waving action, your wave will be perfect

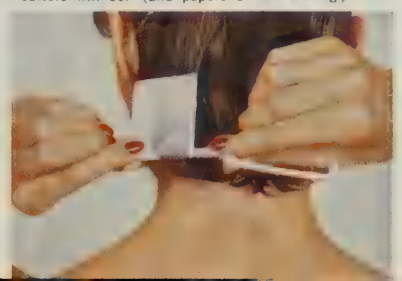
Easiest, fastest way yet to a really lasting wave—just wind, wet with pure, clear water, and neutralize

Why didn't somebody think of this before? A home permanent with the wave in the end papers instead of a bottle of lotion. That's Procter & Gamble's new PACE.

Guesswork taken out. Because each paper contains just the right amount of waving ingredients—never too much, never too little—you get a perfect permanent automatically.

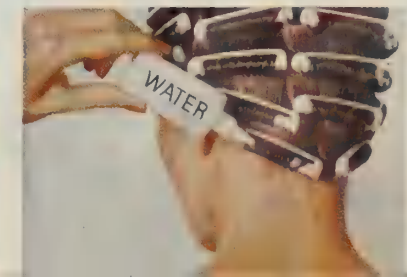
No more waves that take in one place, don't in another. No more stragglers or strays. No more "first week" frizz.

No messy, strong-smelling lotion. Just wind hair as usual, wet with water, neutralize, and look! An even, lasting wave that looks like a gift of nature.



So now there's no reason to leave the house for a permanent. Not when it's next to no fuss at all to get one at home. That's with PACE—the worry-free way to a perfect wave. How about today?

Pace



Procter & Gamble's
no lotion permanent

© P. & G., 1958

Wind curls as usual. Any home permanent curlers will do. (End papers do the waving.)

Squeeze on clear water with PACE'S handy plastic bottle. No messy, strong-smelling lotion.

"Me? Wear a strapless bra in April?"

"Of course, darling! You feel so free in GOOD NEWS by Warner's"

The back can't budge so the front stays up

Of course you'd love the easy freedom of a strapless bra in spring—all year 'round, in fact. If you could find a strapless bra you'd trust. One that didn't slip, slither or slide. Darling, your search has ended—with Good News by Warner's.®

Why? How? The back is one long line of cotton-lined latex. So it hugs you gently, gently. No need for those furtive downward glances. No need for those embarrassing tugs. Because fickle is just what Good News™ is not.

So away with digging, binding shoulder straps forever! Freedom is yours—gloriously! All day, every day. At work or play. Under everything in your wardrobe. Wonderful, front-closing Good News is at your nicest stores. If not, write Warner's, Bridgeport 1, Conn.

Best-selling deep-plunge style. Front hook closing. With embroidered foam-lined cotton cups. #P1031. White or black. $6.50.

New circular-stitched style for extra support. Cotton, with lightly foam-lined cups. #1081. White. $6.50.

When, save in this vigorous, thrilling world of today, have women had so many chances to find fascinating careers? You look at fashion, industry, science, travel and find every door open. And not the least part of this new freedom is your own confidence—assurance—a sense of security that never leaves you, even during difficult days. Thanks to Tampax® internal sanitary protection, you're scarcely aware of differences in days of the month. Millions of women use Tampax—it's the modern way!

Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

TAMPAX

SO MUCH A PART OF YOUR ACTIVE LIFE

New PINE SPRAY in International Sterling

Solid Silver in a pattern that will stay young forever!

Your heart says "Yes" at first sight—to the lovely new Pine Spray.

Created in International Sterling, its beauty is young, slim and delicate—graceful as a swaying pine. And each handle sweeps toward your plate—to please your eye even more, with a balanced setting.

Pine Spray's beauty glows with inner warmth—for it is real solid silver. Real silver never wears out—daily use just increases its mellow loveliness and keeps it shining.

Yes, Pine Spray belongs to you from first sight. And it will keep your love—for it will stay young and fresh forever.

International Sterling is precious solid silver—yet it is easy to own. Your jeweler offers convenient budget plans.

FREE INTRODUCTORY OFFER FOR APRIL SHOPPERS!

If you start your Pine Spray collection during April, International offers you the following exciting introductory gift opportunities:

Honeymoon Service for Two—Buy two 5-piece place settings and receive free, 1 butter knife and a sugar spoon worth $15.25.

Homemakers' Service for Four—Buy four 5-piece place settings and get free 1 tablespoon, 1 butter knife, 1 sugar spoon worth $27.75.

Family Service for Eight—Buy eight 5-piece place settings and your free gift will be 1 tablespoon, 1 butter knife, 1 sugar spoon, and 8 additional teaspoons worth $63.75.

This offer is good during the month of April, 1958 only.

BRIDAL GOWN BY MURRAY HAMBURGER

Don't live a little—live a lot

You're that little girl who always "knew she'd have the finest" when she grew up! Fine things like Lenox China. So here's good news. Lenox costs only slightly more, you know. And Lenox, today, is even more beautiful and stronger than the Lenox your mother cherished! So don't bother with "compromise china." Lenox makes only one quality—superlative. For presidents, kings and for that little girl who always "knew she'd have the finest." You! ✓ ✓ ✓ Five-piece place settings priced from $14.95 to $50.00. Also individual pieces.

For informative "Reference Book of Fine China," leaflets in color send 25¢ to: Lenox, Inc., Dept. F4-8, Trenton, N. J.

LENOX CHINA

That Ivory Look

so clear...so fresh...so easily yours

This budding beauty has a complexion so smooth and soft, That Ivory Look! Your complexion can look that way, too, with a simple change to regular Ivory care. Remember, the milder your soap, the prettier your skin—and Ivory Soap is mild enough for a baby's skin. It leaves your complexion brighter, clearer—fresh as Spring with That Ivory Look!

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

Wash your face regularly with pure, mild Ivory Soap. Gentle enough for a baby's skin—the beauty soap you want for yours.

99 44/100% pure®...it floats

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

THE SEASON OF BLOSSOMS.
Currier & Ives were essentially pictorial reporters. This actual scene in 1865 was drawn by staff artist Fanny Palmer, who lived on Long Island. Probably a local view, it is a good example of the sentimentality which characterized certain of the Currier & Ives lithographs.

THE MOST POWERFUL ANTIPOISON

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Some time ago two articles appeared in remarkable, possibly accidental, juxtaposition on the editorial page of the New York Herald Tribune. One reported and commented on the case of a four-year-old Canadian boy. The other, entitled The Perils of Alertness, was contributed by Britain's famous military critic and historian, Capt. B. H. Liddell Hart.

Little Ronald Tisdale, of Montreal, swallowed a bottle of sleeping pills and was rushed to St. Justine's Hospital, where he was put into a resuscitator, his stomach pumped out, and he was dosed with every available antidote. Nothing availed; sunk in the deepest coma, his life was flickering to a quick close.

Dr. André Soucy had read of a powerful new British antipoison called Megimide. A call was put in to the Poison Control Center of the New York Health Department. The center had half an ounce—a sample imported from Great Britain.

At the moment of the call, late at night, an Eastern Airlines plane was about to take off for Montreal. The forty-eight passengers aboard were asked whether they would endure a delay and told the reason. The "yes" was unanimous. A Health Department car raced to the airport. A waiting car in Montreal rushed to the hospital. In a few minutes the little boy stirred in his coma, soon he was conscious and spoke. He was saved—in a Canadian hospital, by a British drug, furnished by an American institution.

The Tribune commented: "Only one life was at stake, but what . . . resources . . . were called into play to save it! Telephones, automobiles, airplanes, interference with vital schedules, the single-minded concentration on putting everyone's plans and purposes secondary to the saving of one boy's life"; and further, "When one considers that the world now enters a phase in which the pressing of a single button may shortly be able to extinguish whole cities, nations, populations . . . one can only hope that this lesson . . . may, somehow, have its application. . . ."

Captain Liddell Hart, in the adjoining space, warned that the catastrophe envisioned might happen by accident.

Last autumn General Power, commander of the United States Strategic Air Command, rather casually disclosed that since October his force of over 2000 jet bombers had been put into such readiness that a third of it could get into the air with fifteen minutes' warning; that the aircraft, with H-bombs aboard, were kept at the end of their runways with the crews sleeping beside them, and that a goodly proportion of them were always in the air, day and night. This, in answer to a question in the British Parliament, was confirmed by the Foreign Minister.

The object of this continual patrol is to be ever ready for instant retaliation in case of attack on any one of the allied countries and bases scattered throughout the world. The British Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Macmillan, in a recent broadcast defended this, saying, "Effective deterrence depends on instant readiness to deter," and that "None of these bombs would be used except on deliberate military order given upon the instruction of the British and American governments acting in agreement. We have an absolute veto on the dropping of these bombs from any plane based on this country."

But do they have this "absolute veto"? Does any government?

"Instant retaliation" does not square with government agreements reached after deliberate consultation. Captain Liddell Hart called attention to reports in Washington that the U.S. Government has authorized local commanders to unleash their own bombs if they believe their bases are in "imminent peril" of destruction.

If this is true, one local commander would have the fate of mankind in his hands by his interpretation of "imminent peril."

But Captain Liddell Hart goes into other risks than that of trigger-happy commanders acting in a moment of nerve-racking tension.

Retaliatory orders would be transmitted by code. Suppose (again under tension and with overstretched nerves) the code word was misused or misunderstood! He gave three illustrations of just this happening during World

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Elizabeth Hart
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Abbot Mills
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel, Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Duncan Wright.

The unerringly accurate Counselor Classic

The Counselor Classic is the most luxurious necessity that ever graced a bathroom. It's a modern classic in design—and in precise performance, too. The entire movement centers upon an imported Swiss jewel. It's made like a fine watch, then set into a gold-trimmed case crowned with a 300-pound magnified dial. The Counselor Classic is a prized possession, a treasured gift. (In white, pink, blue, green, or yellow.) $20 at fine stores everywhere.

Counselor also creates lifetime scales with exclusive lighted dials, scales with handles, lovely, slim scales as low as $6.95... beautiful new hamper ensembles, too, in decorator colors.

The Brearley Company, Rockford, Illinois

The world's largest producer of bath scales

Counselor

Wars I and II, all of which caused greater or lesser fatalities.

There on one page are two sides of a picture. A network of governments, hospitals, science, communications goes instantly into motion to save one young life, that one man might instantly destroy along with millions of others.

This is what Erich Kahler sees as "The Tower and the Abyss," in a remarkable book of that title that I cannot too earnestly recommend to readers. The title alone describes the position in which all mankind stands today: The Tower, symbol of human aspiration, of life abundant beyond anticipation, of ever-expanding knowledge of earth, sky, universe, and man himself. And the Abyss, into which man, his civilizations, his culture, his works and even his biological future may be swallowed, conceivably never to rise again.

Truly this generation of mankind has a rendezvous with destiny. The destiny involves everyone—the most refined Parisian, the proudest Londoner, the Moscow student mounting the broad stairs to enter his fabulous university of science, the professor on the campus of Harvard, and the savage of the most remote African jungle.

It is as though the Creator, having endowed but one of His creatures on a minor star with a measure of His own power and freedom, were putting that creature, man, to a final crucial test: as though He said, "I will permit man to penetrate into the nature and secret of all things, in which lie creative power never yet out of My hands, and the Satanic power utterly to destroy. If he chooses the latter—the universe will go on. There are other forms of ever-evolving life and myriads of other stars. But man will have proved himself unworthy of freedom or power."

There is a very simple test by which, it is said, we can tell good people from bad. If a smile improves a man's face, he is a good man; if a smile disfigures his face, he is a bad man.

WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

Between the tower and the abyss there is no room for compromise. Either we are heading for a new civilization or for a mass grave in a poisoned planet.

Whatever forms a new civilization may take, it will be a world civilization.

It will not be, as it has predominantly been for centuries, a white man's civilization. It will not, I am sure, follow the pattern of any existing "ideology" comprehended in such words as "communism," "capitalism," "nationalism," or even, I think, a mere synthesis of them. All these ideologies have in them the ingredient of war, open or implicit: communism of class war, capitalism of war for profits, nationalism of war for superiority.

And "democracy" to which every state and society pays lip service is a still-unrealized dream.

We have entered a new human and historical cycle, which can neither be checked nor reversed. It has been impelled less by political thinkers than by the scientists who, for better or worse, have unleashed new and until recently undreamed-of energies affecting all forms of social and political organization, national and international. The promise of universal abundance automatically removes one perennial cause of war, while it unleashes the determination of less-developed peoples to win access to it and to speed up the process of equalization. It confronts highly developed societies, such as our own, with the problem of surpluses, which, in itself, challenges all monopolies. It upsets the cumbersome and unproductive bureaucracy of Communism. It demands a new world society—the tower.

On what foundations can the tower be built? Surely only on mutual aid—on which, in fact, the survival of every species is dependent.

In the long and painful course of building the tower, all beliefs and institutions will come under review, including religious beliefs and institutions. It will be realized that though the Creator has sent many messengers to mankind, He has always sent the same message. For how could He seek to confuse those whom He seeks to enlighten? The messenger has been eclipsed by the creeds and rituals and institutions that have grown up in His name obscuring the limpid truth of the message.

The truth will be rediscovered, not in spite of science but with science, within the new science of spiritual power. For it, too, is a science. Whether or not men call themselves "Christians," Jesus of Nazareth will loom in transcendent splendor. For what He taught a few humble men, withdrawn from the multitude on a mountain in Judaea, will prove demonstrably true. The dispirited will find the "Kingdom"; the mourners will be comforted; the pure in heart will see God's plan; and the meek—the unaggressive—will inherit the earth, or whatever is left of it. Those who hunger for righteousness will find it. The merciful, and only the merciful, will find mercy; the peacemakers will be universally recognized as the children of God.

The prophecy will be fulfilled by the foreordained means, foreordained because as true as the mathematical formula through which the atom was split and a new human cycle initiated: "Resist not evil with evil" for thereby you compound it. Love your enemies and do good to them who hate you—and they will cease to hate. Salute only your brethren and you will have a feud with those not of the tribe, religion, clan or "ideology."

The greatest "deterrent" in the world is the aspiring power of the human mind and soul.

If you do not believe this, consider one single person: Marian Anderson. This woman's recent visit to the Far East had the most extraordinary effect upon every person, every child and every crowd with whom she talked, and for whom she sang. Transmitted by TV, she had the same effect in our living rooms. The effect was to create the loftiest harmony, in an aura of pure love and complete faith.

Miss Anderson is "colored"; she has endured personal insults from stupid people; the colored Americans have for her a peculiar concern. But there is in her not a trace of resentment or revenge. She walks, as the old phrase has it, through nettles and they do not sting. She does not sing "for America." She sings for humanity, whatever its color, and for the love of the universal Creator and her Redeemer and mankind's. She cannot sing anything without its being a testimony and an affirmation. She is a healer of souls. And I am not at all sure that she consciously knows it—and certainly not how or why a beneficent power speaks through her.

But this power of the soul is a scientific reality. And so is the power to transmit poison.

The most promising branch of medicine today is in the all but unexplored psychosomatic field which has already demonstrated the physiological effects of fear, hate and anxiety.

We already know that every person is a radioactive center, emitting and receiving rays that can be electrically measured—every thought causing its own vibration. We are all sending and receiving stations.

A little child, even an infant, cries, becomes peevish, refuses his food when there is tension in the household. A bitter quarrel between his parents, conducted beyond his sight and hearing, nevertheless creates "static," outside his consciousness but rasping to his nerves. What we used to call "sensing" things can already be more accurately explained.

Now, consider what has been happening—for years! Thoughts and feelings of hate, fear and self-righteousness—which Jesus found the deadliest of sins—have been cross-beamed out upon the atmosphere from all quarters of the globe. Hundreds of thousands of people employed by the "blocs" into which mankind have blocked themselves, have been searching for every weakness, every fault, every vice in their opponents, publicizing them with relish over every medium of communication. We are living in continual bursts of static without a harmonious song in the air.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 17

NEW FAB WASHES CLOTHES CLEANER, WHITER, BRIGHTER, MORE LASTINGLY ODOR-FREE

than any other washday product in the world!

No wonder New FAB is approved and recommended by the nation's leading manufacturers of fabrics and clothing!

The men who make the clothes you wear now say: "Wash them in New FAB!" New FAB is the only washday product that contains miracle Duratex! Thanks to Duratex, New FAB washes clothes cleaner and whiter than ever before —and deodorizes, too . . . actually helps keep clothes odor-free during wearing!

Yes, New FAB washes clothes so completely clean, so brilliantly white, that the very men who know fabrics best—the manufacturers themselves—recommend it without qualification! 24 of them tested New FAB with Duratex in their own laboratories and in 1958 over 250 million of their products will carry these instructions: "WASH IN NEW FAB WITH DURATEX"!

Wash all your family's fabrics and clothing in New FAB with Duratex . . . sheets, shirts, socks—everything! Remember, no other product in the world can wash clothes so clean, so white, so lastingly odor-free!

HERE THEY ARE!

The "Who's Who" in American fabrics and fashions!

And every one of these famous brands recommends New FAB with Duratex:

Manhattan · Munsingwear · Pacific Contour Sheets · Esquire Socks · Cinderella · Tom Sawyer · Springmaid · Burlington Mills · Chatham Blankets · Hanes · Mojud Hosiery · Fortuna · Seamprufe · Judy Kent · Blue Bell · Exquisite Form · Excello · Saconv · Big Yank · Weldon Pajamas · Monocle · Wamsutta · Botany · Stevens · Utica · Mohawk

ALL TRADE MARKS REGISTERED

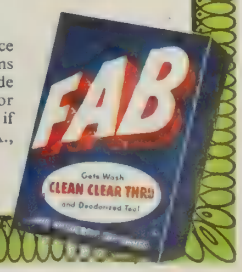
Look for these brands . . . and the tag they carry that says,

"WASH IN NEW FAB WITH DURATEX"

DOUBLE YOUR MONEY BACK!

If you don't get a cleaner, whiter, more lastingly odor-free wash with New FAB than with any other product you've ever used—then Colgate will refund double the price you paid!*

*RETURN EMPTY FAB CARTON WITH YOUR NAME, ADDRESS TO: COLGATE-PALMOLIVE CO., DEPT. FJF, 300 PARK AVE., N. Y. 17



10¢ C-15 10¢

NOW—SAVE 10¢ on New Fab with Duratex

Prove to yourself that New FAB is everything we say it is . . . and more! Clip this coupon, take it to your dealer, and he'll clip 10¢ off the price of two large-size boxes of New FAB or 10¢ off the price of one giant-size New FAB. Get your first package of New FAB with Duratex today—at this handsome saving—and tomorrow get cleaner washes, whiter washes, washes that are lastingly odor-free!

NOTICE TO DEALER: Our salesman will redeem this coupon at your store for 10¢ in accordance with the agreement made with you, provided you and the customer have complied with the terms of the offer. Any other application constitutes fraud. We will not honor redemption through outside agencies, brokers, etc. Invoices proving purchase of sufficient stock to cover coupons presented for redemption must be shown upon request. The customer must pay any sales tax. Coupon is void if use is prohibited, restricted, or taxed. Offer expires June 30, 1959. Good only in Continental U.S.A., Alaska and Hawaii.

Cash Value 1/20 of 1 cent. Colgate-Palmolive Company, P. O. Box 1799, Louisville 1, Ky.

141-58011 C-15

A chance of a lifetime to get the only cookware so good it's guaranteed for 15 years

Stainless Steel FLINT-WARE®

NOW

25% OFF REGULAR PRICE!

37 PIECES OF COOKWARE

20 PIECES OF BAKEWARE AND STORE-'N-SERVE

LIMITED TIME ONLY...

EVERY PIECE REDUCED!

CHOOSE FROM 57 ITEMS!

There's never been a sale like this in cookware history! Think of it! Not just one pan—but every piece of Flint-Ware reduced 25% off the regular price. This is really your chance to equip your kitchen with a full matching set of the finest triple-layer cookware made . . . stainless steel FLINT-WARE. Offer good for a limited time only at housewares departments of leading stores.

Typical Savings

you can make if you buy now!

1 Qt. Saucepan with Cover
Reg. $5.50 Special Price $4.13

8" Skillet with Cover
Reg. $8.75. Special Price $6.56

4½ Qt. Saucepot with Cover
Reg. $10.95. Special Price $8.21

3 Qt. Colander Reg. $5.95—Special Price $4.46

2 Qt. Double Boiler with Cover
Reg. $12.75. Special Price $9.56

6 Pc. Starter Set
Reg. $20.95. Special Price $15.71

12" x 16" Cookie Sheet
Reg. $2.95. Special Price $2.21

. . . the greatest name in housewares EKCO®

© 1958—Ekco Products Co., Chicago 39, Ill.

LONG LIFE MOTOR NEVER NEEDS OILING

BUILT-IN AUTOMATIC NEEDLE-THREADER

SCIENTIFICALLY
COLOR-TESTED NON-GLARE
BEIGE FINISH

AUTOMATIC DROP-FEED FOR EASIER DARNING

Only Pfaff sewing machines

SLIDE-ON ARM
ON LIGHTWEIGHT PORTABLES

CALIBRATED SELF-ADJUSTING THREAD TENSION CONTROL

have the magic DIAL-A-STITCH

AUTOMATIC DECORATIVE ZIG-ZAG AND STRAIGHT STITCH SEWING ACTION

SNAP-OFF
TOP COVER FOR EASY CARE

PFAFF'S EXCLUSIVE WRITTEN LIFETIME GUARANTEE
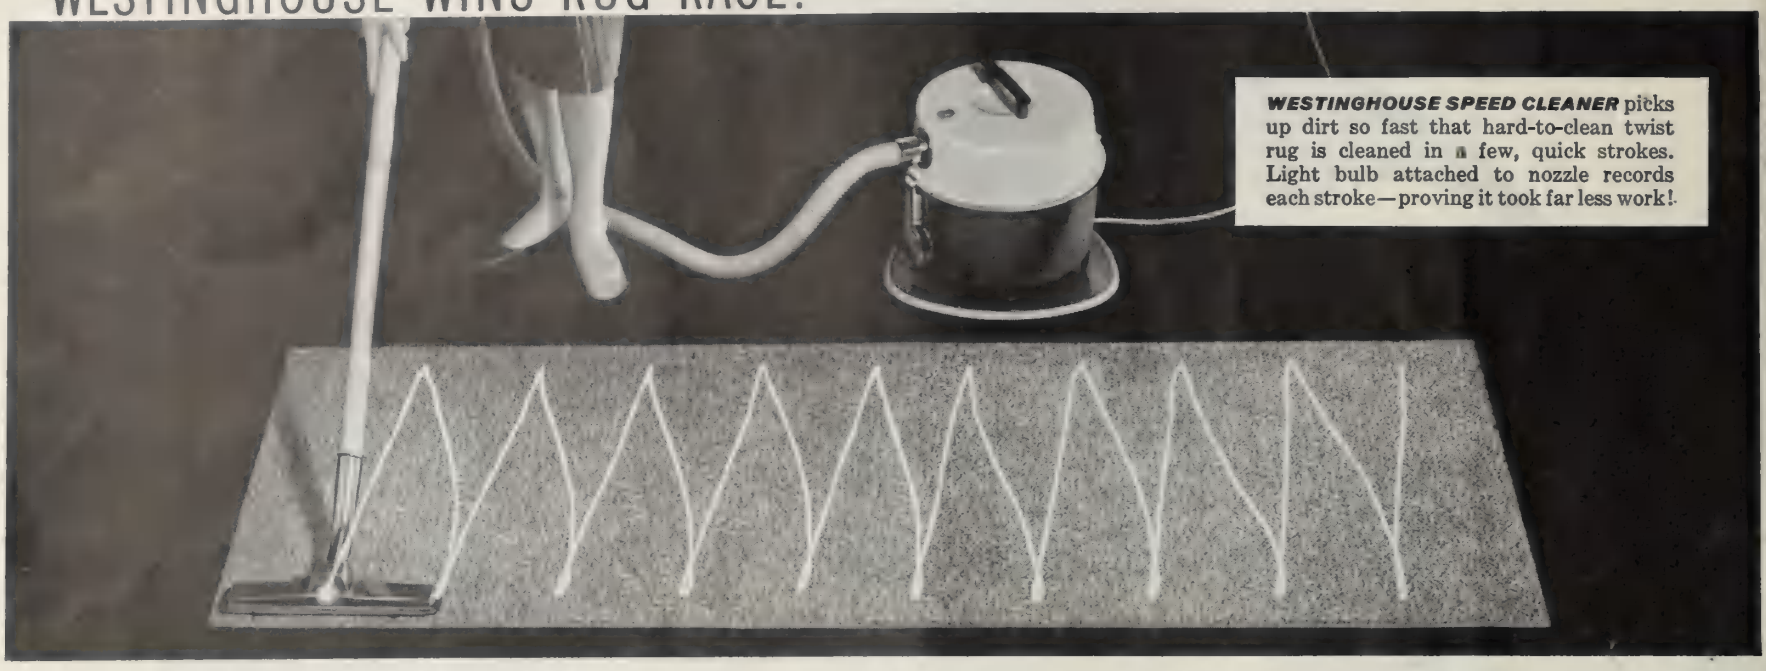
SINCE 1862

MAGIC DIAL-A-STITCH
NO DISCS, NO WHEELS,
NO CAMS

You just dial and all these patented Pfaff features automatically go to work for you to make beautiful sewing simple. Pfaff makes other sewing machines old fashioned.



PFAFF®

FAMOUS FOR QUALITY SINCE 1862

Service guaranteed by over 2000 dealers in United States and Canada. See the classified telephone directory or write Pfaff for dealer nearest you!
373 Fifth Avenue, New York • 216 N. Canal St., Chicago • 1142 S. San Julian St., Los Angeles • 2435 Duncan Road, Montreal

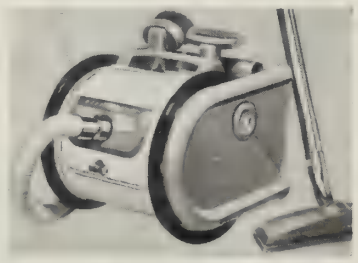
©1958—Pfaff International Corp.

WESTINGHOUSE WINS RUG RACE!

New Westinghouse Speed Cleaner

PICKS UP MORE DIRT FASTER

than other canister cleaners



Suddenly, other canister cleaners are slowpokes! This amazing "rug race" proves the Westinghouse Speed Cleaner is the fastest, work-savingest cleaner you can own. With greater pick-up power, every stroke cleans completely—no need to repeat strokes again and again. You'll clean your whole house in far less time than ever before!

HANDIEST CLEANER on wheels, too—it glides swiftly, smoothly anywhere. Cleans where others can't reach, thanks to a Floor-N-Rug Tool that gets right up to the baseboard. Exclusive Reel-Away Cord Storage and Toss-Away® Filter Bag. Attractive charcoal and white. Full set of attachments. See it demonstrated at your Westinghouse dealer's today.

5-Year Guarantee

Model SC-3 $54.95

EQUALLY POWERFUL is the all-new Westinghouse Mobile Speed Cleaner with big wheel design. Rolls over door sills, other obstacles—even climbs stairs. Built-in tool rack. Smart two-tone beige.

5-Year Guarantee

Model MC-1 $69.95

THE SHAPE OF TOMORROW

YOU CAN BE SURE... IF IT'S Westinghouse

LADY LONG LEGS. Super-slims hips, thighs, legs via strong satin side panels. French Secret dip frees waist, non-bind legs stay put without nylons, never ride up. Hidden garters detach. Nylon power net, small to extra large 10.95 For store and free figure beauty booklet write Olga, Dept. J48, 7915 Haskell, Van Nuys, Cal.

CORNS
also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Invisible. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.
removed by MOSCO

Worry of FALSE TEETH
Slipping or Irritating?
Don't be embarrassed by loose false teeth slipping, dropping or wobbling when you eat, talk or laugh. Just sprinkle a little FASTEETH on your plates. This pleasant powder gives a remarkable sense of added comfort and security by holding plates more firmly. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. It's alkaline (non-acid). Get FASTEETH at drug counters everywhere.

HEART
burn?
During pregnancy, heartburn and acid indigestion are often a problem. Tums gives total relief from excess stomach acids in just 4 seconds—and they're high in calcium. Carry Tums in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 12

The earth, we are told every day, is divided into a "free world," a "slave world" and an "uncommitted world."

But it is not true.

In the "free" world are peoples suffering under governments as oppressive as that of the Soviet Union. In the Soviet Union and throughout the Communist world a new wind of freedom is stirring, as palpable to the sensitive visitor as a spring breeze. Communism is evolving all the time, as it must, since to live is to change. There is no "uncommitted" world, for all peoples are committed to something if not to someone.

And to what is the spirit of the times, the spirit of man, in however monstrous or distorted forms, committed?

It is committed to building the Tower.

I have seen it in Khrushchev's Russia, in Nasser's Egypt, in Bourguiba's Tunisia, in Nehru's India, in West Germany. I see it in every line I read from Poland. I read it in the abortive Hungarian rising. I find it in words written or spoken by the natural scientists, geneticists, biologists of every land. In Algeria's tragic war I see it in the aspiration of the Arabs and in the disillusioned but still living spirit of idealistic French youth. I have seen it in deeply disturbed young Israeli, who know that the only hope for their state is to win the love of their neighbors. And I see it, and feel it, in my America.

People say that the Tower is "visionary." Then let them gaze into the Abyss, which is not.

"Gaze too long into the Abyss and the Abyss gazes into you," said a European of genius long ago. It is gazing back, friends, it is staring.

We must never throw away a bushel of truth because it happens to contain a few grains of chaff.
DEAN STANLEY

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help," said the immortal psalmist. And the hills are still there.

Suppose we changed the tune—which is no "tune." Suppose our country and all its media of communication should seek to find what is praiseworthy everywhere—and were to praise it. Suppose we should celebrate every great achievement, from wherever it comes, as an achievement of, and for, mankind. Suppose that by whatever spiritual means at our command, we should purge hate and fear out of ourselves—each of us, individuals.

Suppose we should propose doing things together—West, East and Uncommitted: exploring outer space, fighting disease, sharing all knowledge, giving away what we do not need. All this is being done, but in how small a way! A pittance of the wealth and energy of the world is being devoted to building the Tower; a monstrous amount to digging the Abyss.

Armies—yes, armies—are necessary to build the Tower. Armies of teachers, physicians, nurses, engineers of all sorts, workmen, youth, working side by side with their counterparts of all races on enterprises often difficult and sometimes hazardous but of a value not debatable by anyone: the armies projected by the American philosopher, William James, as a "moral equivalent for war."

Diplomatists seek for "points of agreement." But they seek them precisely where they are, for the time being, least likely to find them. Travel around the world and you will see innumerable points of agreement in every sphere of human endeavor, with every race of man.

The grapes of wrath have long since been trampled out. The wine of love is yet to be distilled.

Distill it and the Abyss would begin to recede and the Tower to rise. The task begins in wanting it to rise—determining that it shall rise, clearing the air of static, attuning our ears to good tidings, tuning in on other wave lengths. They are there. END

THE NICE SOFT FEEL THAT ONLY NuSOFT GIVES!

SHEETS
BLANKETS
COTTON KNITS
BLUE JEANS
CORDUROYS
SWEATERS...everything you wash, rinses out soft, fluffy, comfortable with

NuSOFT® FABRIC SOFTENER RINSE

Such a thoughtful thing to do for your family! Rinse everything with wonderful NuSoft! It makes everything you wash soft, fluffy, comfortable as never before. And...so smooth, ironing's easier! Inexpensive! One bottle capful of NuSoft gives you a full load of fluffy wash. And you get 16 washloads per bottle!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS'

NOT A WATER SOFTENER...ASK FOR NuSOFT FABRIC SOFTENER RINSE

KROEHLER 65TH ANN

This, our 65th Anniversary Sale, is our way of saying "Thank you America!" for your year-after-year favoring of Kroehler furniture
We're saying "Thank you" with values never before equalled in our entire 65 years of making good furniture for the America

ANNIVERSARY CURVED SECTIONAL IN BOUCLÉ TEXTURED FABRIC
Three pieces $259.50
Armless center section $59.50

A beautiful future is built into this luxurious new Anniversary Living Room Group—PLUS-BUILT* to serve you better, longer! Exclusive fabric, specially made for durable beauty, in your choice of many stunning colors! Foam rubber cushions available at moderate extra cost.

ANNIVERSARY SLEEP-OR-LOUNGE $229.50 as shown in bouclé textured fabric.

FULL-SIZE DOUBLE BED!

THE SOFA WITH A SECRET*. Instantly, this lovely sofa gives you a full-size double bed—extra long, extra comfortable, deep innerspring mattress.

ANNIVERSARY DINING ROOM GROUP
Table and 4 side chairs, $139.50
Buffet, $99.50

Permanized* construction! Selected mahogany veneers! Choice of beautiful Stardust or Autumn finish! Fine craftsmanship!

*Trade Mark

KROEHLER MFG. CO. GENERAL OFFICES: NAPERVILLE, ILLINOIS • IN CANADA: STRATFORD, ONTARIO

VERSARY SALE

home. Your Kroehler Dealer proudly invites you to inspect Our Crowning Achievement in Furniture Values now! Beautiful living is now within the reach of everyone! Don't miss this outstanding opportunity from the World's Largest Furniture Manufacturer!

OUR CROWNING ACHIEVEMENT in Furniture Values

ANNIVERSARY SOFA AND CHAIR
as shown in jumbo textured fabric $199.50

ANNIVERSARY RELAXER CHAIR

RELAX in comfort unlimited! This wonderful chair adjusts instantly to any position you desire, from upright to full-length lounging luxury. As shown in fabric and "Boltaflex" Palomino.

$99.50

Also available with soothing electric massage at extra cost.

ANNIVERSARY BEDROOM GROUP

Spacemaker bed, double dresser and mirror $179.50

Chest, $65 Night stand, $35

Panel-wold* construction! Selected mahogany veneers! Choice of beautiful Shadow-tone or Autumn bronze! Fine craftsmanship!

A-HOSTESS CHAIR as shown in lovely textured fabric and "Boltaflex" Palomino. $37.50

B-CLUB CHAIR
as shown in nylon tweed $79.50

C-SWIVEL ROCKER
as shown in nylon nylon boucle $89.50
WIDE CHOICE OF LATEST DECORATOR COLORS

Prices slightly higher in some areas. Convenient terms are offered by most Kroehler Dealers.

NOW—AT KROEHLER DEALERS EVERYWHERE

Aren't you tired of setting curls with hair sprays only to have them droop a few hours later?

USE NEW

bliss!*

A creme in a tube with applicator tip! only $2.00 plus tax

An entirely different kind of home permanent, by Richard Hudnut! Unwinds right from the curlers into silken-soft, natural-looking curls... no re-setting... this wave lasts 'til you cut it off!

It's so easy! Just-wind-and rinse-when-dry-brush-out!

A superb new creme formula! Gets past the hair's natural oil barrier to give you a softer, yet longer-lasting wave! It's bliss!

*TRADEMARK

Can this Marriage be Saved?

Money has often been called the greatest source of conflict between husband and wife, but actual surveys indicate that, at least in the educated part of the population, there is more quarreling over the handling of the children than there is over the handling of the finances. Since this is as disastrous to the youngsters as it is to the marriage, parents should be given better preparation for child guidance, long before they become parents. The American Institute of Family Relations includes a special Children's Department to deal with that phase of family life; but all parents can read and study together. If they get the same ideas, have the same understanding, about how to treat their children, and if they then maintain a united front in the presence of their offspring, most of their difficulties will disappear. . . . The counselor in this case was Mrs. Kay Sinclair.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

DON ORNITZ

"Clark's refusal to discuss his divorce has caused me abiding worry. There are times I don't feel my husband and I are truly married."

SHE: "I think Clark was too self-centered to adjust to fatherhood. Our daughters are tense and jittery around him. Like me, they are braced for trouble. If he ever again lays a hand on either of my children I will leave him."

HE: "Ellen and Janey are important to Abby and I am not; I have the feeling I'm horning in on a threesome. When I get home, dead beat, the kids are wild, rambunctious. I watch TV to keep my mouth shut."

ABBY TELLS HER SIDE: "Perhaps Clark didn't want to take our children to the zoo," said plumply pretty thirty-year-old Abby, who was ten years younger than her husband. "Clark hardly ever wants to take our two small daughters anywhere. But last Sunday seemed like the perfect opportunity for the girls to wear the new dresses Clark's mother had given them. She'd been visiting us for a month and had just gone back to Missouri. I hoped showing off his mother's gifts might please Clark. Also, I wanted my parents, my father particularly, to see my daughters in their pretty clothes.

"At first things went fairly well at the zoo. Clark bought Ellen a bag of peanuts to feed the bears and she was overjoyed. She is five years old and at an age to value attention from her daddy; she receives very little. On the way to the bear cages the baby—Janey is a frenetically active two-year-old—fell and hurt herself and cried; I should have been holding her hand. But Clark blamed Ellen for the accident and confiscated her peanuts. Ellen set up a howl at this injustice and I defended her. No doubt I should have kept quiet. For Clark increased poor Ellen's punishment. He made her sit on a bench and watch while, one by one, he fed her peanuts to the bears. The child screamed herself into hysterics and Baby Jane again began to wail. Clark lost his temper and marched them both to the car.

"By then it was lunchtime. Maybe his conscience was troubling him or maybe his sour mood had temporarily improved. Anyway, to my surprise he suddenly invited us to eat in a restaurant. I declined. He needed a haircut, I wasn't wearing a hat and Janey's dress was dirty from her fall. Besides, we can't afford restaurant meals and my parents were expecting us for lunch. When we arrived at their apartment Clark was still busily policing the girls. My father had one of his nervous headaches and didn't seem glad to see us. He went into the bedroom with a volume of the encyclopedia, and did not come back till lunch was ready.

"My mother is fond of Clark and far better at coping with a man's moods than I am; she's had practice. My father is high-keyed and difficult to live with. Unfortunately I inherited his nervousness—I take tranquillity pills nearly every day—instead of inheriting my mother's heavenly patience. She and I hurried up the food. Then she put the youngsters' chairs at the far end of the table. To be perverse—no other reason—Clark shifted the chairs around and placed himself between Ellen and Janey. At home he has no interest in eating with the girls and me; by preference he eats from a tray before the TV set.

"Ellen rebelled and demanded to sit beside her grandmother. Clark sent her away from the table. By then I was really upset by Clark's performance before my parents, my father in particular. My mother shook her head at me and I managed to hold my tongue. At that point Janey reached for her milk and turned over the glass; Clark slapped her. I went wild. I grabbed her in my arms and when Clark jumped to his feet and tried to get her away from me I held on. The baby began to cry. My mother calmly stepped forward and took Janey from us both. I screamed at Clark that if he ever again laid a hand on either of my children I would leave him.

"It was Clark who did the leaving. He turned on his heel and walked out of the apartment. He did stop at the front door long enough to say he wouldn't return until I had learned to behave like an adult. Clark himself had been behaving all day long like a mean, undisciplined child. I knew right then my marriage was on the rocks. My mother thinks Clark and I should stay together—he is sleeping on the sofa now—for the children's sake. I have religious scruples against divorce, but I think Ellen and Janey would profit if Clark and I went to court and got a legal separation.

"Clark was thirty-five when Ellen was born—we'd been married almost six years—and I sometimes think he may have been too old and self-centered to adjust to fatherhood. At first he seemed proud we had a child, but I wasn't home from the hospital long before he began to snap and growl at both me and the baby. Often when I was bathing or feeding her he would interrupt by asking me to iron a shirt or to make coffee for him. Ellen cried a lot and when she cried at night Clark complained bitterly. It was a difficult time for me. I was away from my mother—we were then living in Chicago—and I was inexperienced in child care. I didn't know how to keep Ellen quiet; I thought her crying meant she was sick. I called the pediatrician so often that he finally refused to talk to me on the telephone.

"Clark's temper got worse as the months went on. Even today I will not trust my children to a paid sitter, and in Chicago I wasn't willing to leave Ellen for a single minute. Clark wanted to go out to restaurants and night clubs, I wanted to stay at home. Clark gave Ellen her first spanking when she was nine months old; she wasn't really hurt, but for weeks afterward she screamed whenever he came near her. His disposition hadn't improved by the time Janey came along.

"Both of our daughters are tense and jittery around Clark. Like me, they are braced for trouble. In the evenings he comes in with a scowl on his face, never with a smile. The children are afraid to run and kiss him. He doesn't remember their birthdays, and if they receive gifts from him at Christmas it's because I choose them. I have to buy our presents to his mother and his brothers too. Last year I had all those presents selected by mid-November, but I couldn't induce Clark to visit the store and look at my selections. Eventually I went ahead and mailed the presents, but his indifference spoiled Christmas for me.

"Even when Clark intends to be friendly he misses. He speaks to our girls in the same remote, superior manner my father used to speak to me. I can still recall the sinking dread I used to feel when father cleared his throat and began to talk about my studies. My school marks were never high enough to suit him, and I often thought I was not smart enough to be his daughter. To tell the truth, I often feel as a grown woman that I'm hardly smart enough to be a wife and mother. Clark isn't entirely to blame for the failure of our marriage. I've failed, too, failed him and failed my children.

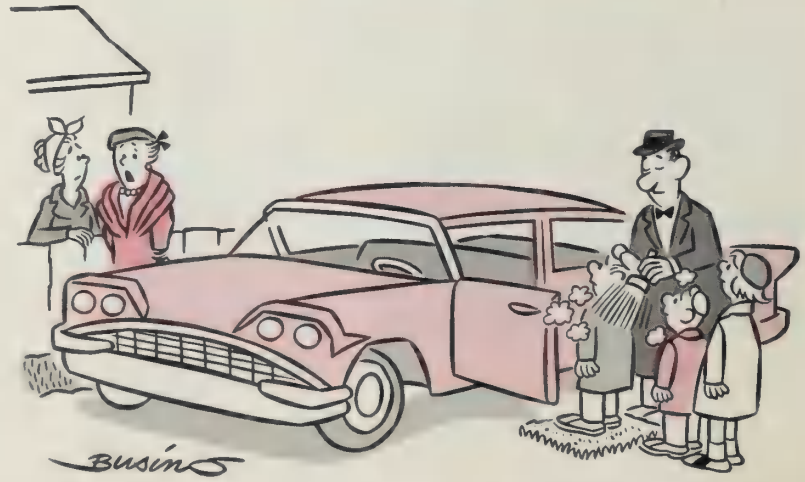
"I'm not quick and versatile and clever like my mother. She comes from a long line of clergymen and educators—there are four college presidents in my background—but she left college early to marry my father and to establish a business that eventually supported the whole family. Mother had a talent for design and for business too. She started with one dress shop in Los Angeles and since has opened a chain of dress shops on the West Coast. Father is a vice president in mother's company. He is brilliant, but he is also restless and erratic and not interested in business details. In his own words, he prefers literature to ledgers.

"I'm slow-thinking and slow-moving and so constituted that I can do only one thing at a time. If I'm ironing, say, I can't gossip with a neighbor or even listen to the radio; I have to concentrate on the ironing. If I'm cooking and am disturbed by the doorbell, I inevitably burn the food. If I'm playing a game with my youngsters, I can't simultaneously peel potatoes for supper or sort the laundry. Interruptions frequently bother and fluster me so much I burst into tears of sheer frustration. Then to pull myself together I sit down and drink another cup of coffee—I drink coffee endlessly—while my housework falls still farther behind.

"I fully realize I'm too nervous for my own good and for my family's good. I'd be a better mother if I could take things in my stride and be relaxed. I can't. Ellen's incessant questions—she is at the 'why' stage—drive me almost crazy and I screech like a wild woman and make her cry. Then to salve my conscience I may bake the child a special little cake for supper, although I know a cake won't settle for my unfairness. Whenever I fail to meet my own standards, I usually penalize myself in some sort of fashion. If I let my housekeeping slide badly, if Clark stumbles over toys I've neglected to put in the toy chest, I scrub the house from top to bottom the next day. My house comes in for a lot of scrubbing. Perhaps I have the feeling I can scrub away my failures. Of course, I know I can't.

"Just last week I assigned myself the dismal chore of tidying our twin dressers—the day before I'd forgotten to send Clark's suit to the cleaner—and in the midst of the operation my mother telephoned. While she and I were talking Janey dragged out everything from all the drawers and mixed the lot in one huge pile. I was so discouraged and disgusted at my own carelessness—I should have replaced the drawers before I answered the phone—I sat down and cried. Then I took a tranquillity pill to calm myself and put in two hours straightening out the mess. After that I scrubbed the kitchen, the bathroom and both porches.

"By the time Clark appeared that evening I was exhausted but our house was spotless. If he appreciated the fact, he didn't mention it. As usual he turned on the television and fell into his favorite chair, hoping I would keep the youngsters at a distance and hand him his food in utter silence. It was eight P.M. He hadn't seen us since seven o'clock that morning. Yet he hadn't a word of greeting to offer. I'm sure his long hours at work—he is the dispatch agent for a big transportation company—aren't a matter of necessity. The truth is he prefers his place of business to his home.



"When Clark and I were married ten years ago I thought he was somebody I could lean on and trust. Somebody strong and dependable and mature. At the time we met I was disillusioned with young men of my own age and was struggling to recover from intense disillusionment with myself. I was twenty years old, living in Los Angeles with my parents and younger brothers and holding a job as an airline hostess. Both of my parents had worked and sacrificed to send me to college—my father always told me to reach for the stars—

CONTINUED ON PAGE 27

the shoe that understands children

. . . understands that having fun is sometimes serious business! This is the shoe that's brightened Easter through the years, with happy style and stamina . . . fine and lasting fit. And, this is the shoe with fresh young fashion . . . made with patient skill and lots of good old-fashioned pride.

THE STRIDE RITE SHOE
Green Shoe Mfg. Co., Boston, Mass.

"Every time we get a new car he's like this for the first few days."

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

Skin so delicate, you stroke it in wonder...
You know that only the finest skin care will do...
Only the purest powder...
Only the gentlest oil...
Only Johnson's.

DISCOVERY!

DISCOVERY!

FEMININE FABRIC—a fabulous new cover

The wonder of it . . . a fabric that combines sheerest luxury and perfected protection. Feminine Fabric . . . first fine fabric ever created exclusively to cover a sanitary napkin. Only napkins by Modess® have Feminine Fabric.

Incredibly soft . . . and white . . . and sheer. Make new Modess your own discovery this month.

...and a fabulous "2-for-1" offer

Buy any two of these products: Feminine Fabric Modess (box of 12), Teen-Age by Modess, Modess Belts. Send your name and address with words "Personal Products Corporation" cut from the packages to: Box E-67, Milltown, N. J.

We'll send you half the money you paid by return mail. Limit, one refund per customer. Offer expires April 30, 1958.,

Modess . . . because

In the City of Bagdad lived Hakeem the Wise One, and many people went to him for counsel, which he gave freely to all, asking nothing in return.

There came to him a young man who had spent much but got little, and said:
"Tell me, Wise One, what shall I do to receive the most for that which I spend?"

Hakeem answered, "A thing that is bought or sold has no value unless it contains that which cannot be bought or sold. Look for The Priceless Ingredient."

"But what is this Priceless Ingredient?"
asked the young man.

Spoke then the Wise One: "My son, the Priceless Ingredient of every product in the market-place is the Honor and Integrity of him who makes it. Consider his name before you buy."

E·R·SQUIBB & SONS
Division of Olin Mathieson Chemical Corporation

© 1958 O.M.C.C.

Important

free centennial offers...

1. For a free print of the "Priceless Ingredient" story on the opposite page, just write to Box 150, E. R. Squibb & Sons, 745 Fifth Ave., New York 22, N.Y.

2. Ask your pharmacist for a free copy of the colorful new SQUIBB MEDICINE CABINET Booklet. It describes many of the fine, quality products developed for your use and comfort by the Squibb Laboratories and contains an emergency ANTIDOTE CHART for your medicine cabinet.

3. Your pharmacist also has the free Squibb leaflet "Hidden Hunger," which tells what vitamins can and cannot do.

Beginning our second century of research and manufacture in the field of medicine and health, dedicated to the principle of the "Priceless Ingredient."

MASSAGE YOUR FEET!

Enjoy grateful relief from tired, aching feet, legs WHILE YOU RELAX

Exclusive 30 Degree Angle allows Feet, Legs to rest naturally, comfortably

The wonderful benefits of professional-like massage can now be yours while you sit and read, watch TV or relax, with the new 30 degree angle Dr. Scholl's Electric Foot Massager. This highly invigorating type of massage improves circulation in feet and legs . . . relieves fatigued, aching feeling . . . rests, refreshes, revitalizes the feet.

MAKES AN IDEAL GIFT

Choice of lovely pastel pink, green, ivory white. Model for both feet $16.95. Single foot model $8.95. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. Mail orders filled if not obtainable locally. Write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. M2, Chicago 10, Illinois.

Dr Scholl's Electric FOOT MASSAGER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 22

but I had flunked out in my sophomore year. The college boy to whom I'd been engaged promptly broke our engagement and nearly broke my heart. I put marriage from my mind in favor of making my parents proud of my career. On the night Clark and I met—he was then working in the Los Angeles office of the same airline company—I had just received a promotion and been transferred to Chicago. Consequently I supposed our first meeting would be our last. But Clark arrived in Chicago from Los Angeles only a week after I arrived there; he had asked the company for a transfer in order to be near me.

"Within a few months we were married. I was too thrilled and impressed by Clark to question him about his past. It wasn't until after our marriage that I discovered he was a divorced man. If I had known that at the time of his proposal I don't think I would have accepted him. I belong to a strict Protestant church which disapproves of divorce except in extraordinary circumstances. I can't tell you the exact circumstances of Clark's divorce. He has consistently refused to discuss the subject either with me or with my pastor; this stubbornness of his has caused me abiding worry. My religion is very important to me. There are times I don't feel my husband and I are truly married.

"I worry, too, about Clark's flightiness in business. When he changed jobs to follow me to Chicago I thought it was romantic, but he had to take a cut in salary. Maybe the salary cut hurt his pride; anyway, he quarreled with his superiors and quit and took another job at still less pay. I finally talked him into returning to Los Angeles and, with my mother's assistance, prevailed on him to buy a house—he was willing to pay rent forever—but in the meanwhile he had held six or seven different mediocre jobs. When Clark is dissatisfied, his impulse is to fly into a temper and quit. He has been in his present job for three years now and by careful planning we can get by on his earnings, but I feel no confidence in the future. I have no faith that Clark won't throw up his job at any minute and try something else.

When one door is shut, another opens. CERVANTES

"Nowadays Clark and I don't discuss the matter, but our sexual relationship is not a success. In the beginning I tried desperately hard to please Clark, but I wasn't ever able to satisfy either him or myself. Too often I would be haunted by thoughts of his first wife and by fears our marriage wasn't right in the eyes of my church. I used to ask him questions about his first wife, but he wouldn't ever answer. Although she bore him no children, I've always believed he loved her more than he ever loved me. Our youngsters haven't brought Clark and me together. If I get a legal separation, I'm sure Clark won't miss us."

Clark Tells His Side:

"I would like to be a good husband and a good father, but Abby makes it a tough assignment," said forty-year-old Clark. He was a tall man with thinning hair, hollow eyes, a narrow somber face. "When I get home from work, dead beat and in a mood to relax, the kids are wild and rambunctious and so loud you can't hear yourself think. They've had no discipline from Abby since early morning and she's so tired from chasing after them she's on the point of collapse. She probably won't admit it, but they make her just as nervous as they make me. Often she asks me to take charge.

"But when I try to make our daughters toe the line, she invariably objects to my methods and jumps all over me. The girls then lose what little respect they have for my authority and I lose my temper and the chances are excellent Abby and I find ourselves engaged in another brawl. Things have come to such a pass that I watch TV to keep my mouth shut. I'm one man who has no temptation to hurry home from work.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 30

New deep moisturizing discovery

Stops Dry Skin Problems in these 5 "Danger Zones"

★ Frown lines!
★ Crow's feet!
★ Flaky patches!
★ Expression lines!
★ Crepey throat!

Now flood precious moisture deeper into your dry-lined skin. Age-revealing "danger zones" become less apparent as your skin drinks in the rich benefits of Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. Skin looks, feels smoother.

Woodbury's new deeper moisturizing and deeper softening ingredients help smooth and freshen skin where the look of age strikes! Its remarkable blend of skin softeners and rich, beauty-giving lanolin penetrates deeper than ever before!

Woodbury Dry Skin Cream is a moisturizing cleanser as well as a superb skin softener. Use it for seven days. See "danger zones" become "beauty zones" or your money back! 25¢ to $1.

WOODBURY LANOLIN RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

All during their freshman and sophomore years, college boys and girls used "mystery" toothpaste—with spectacular results

How The Class Of '57 Brushed Their Way To Healthier Teeth

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

"Which toothpaste are you using? Mine's Toothpaste B."

"I've got Toothpaste C—and I wish I knew what's in it."

Conversations like this were frequent among the students at a Midwestern university from 1953 to 1955. A large part of the class of '57 had volunteered to brush solely with two toothpastes, known as "B" and "C."

What the students did not know was that one of the toothpastes, now named Crest with Fluoristan, contained stannous fluoride. The other was ordinary toothpaste. The test was one of a series directed by dental scientists seeking a better way to prevent tooth decay.

I think you'll agree that they succeeded.

The students who brushed with Crest had 42% fewer new cavities at the end of the first year, compared with those who used ordinary toothpaste.

And the second year's results confirmed that Crest had brought about a major reduction in new cavities.

To me, there are two particularly impressive things about these results.

First, they reveal Crest's remarkable ability to prevent decay during the teen years—the very years when cavities are at their height.

Second, they show that Crest provides steady, long-range protection against cavities—in this case, over a full two-year period.

Crest's success is due to its unique ability to strengthen weak parts of the teeth, called "soft spots," and stop them from turning into cavities.

Indeed, like the gleeful youngster dramatized by Norman Rockwell on the opposite page, many a teen-ager who brushed with Crest has heard the dentist report, "No new cavities this visit!"

X-RAYS AND DENTAL EXAMINATIONS made on the college campus showed that students who brushed with Crest had 42% fewer new cavities than those who used ordinary toothpaste. Thousands of grownups and children took part in the tests, conducted by dental scientists.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU PARENTS' MAGAZINE

SATISFACTORY OR A REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter.
©1958, The Procter & Gamble Co.

Is Your Car Lowering Your Standard of Living?

"It is for Thousands of American Families" says George Romney
President, American Motors Corporation

Millions of families today are spending a higher percentage of the family budget than ever before to buy and keep a big, gas-hungry, oversized car. Reports show that most families spend 10 per cent of income after taxes for automotive transportation. Some spend as much as 50% of their income!

They spend this money at the sacrifice of other important things that can improve the "family standard of living"—things that can make family life more enjoyable. Do you?

There is an answer to this problem

Tens of thousands of budget-minded families are finding the answer to this problem. It is Rambler. Rambler has room inside for six 6-footers, plus the economy and handling ease of a European car.

Cut car costs in half

Many Rambler families find that they can cut their overall car costs in half. Rambler provides the same comfortable, dependable transportation for less, making more money available for new kitchens, power mowers, dishwashers, education, etc.

There is a solution to your budget problems, too!

Let me suggest that you take your husband—take the whole family for that matter—to a Rambler dealer. Try a Rambler for size. See if you, too, wouldn't be way ahead with a Rambler—because you save when you buy and you save every mile you drive.

Discover a new way of life

I think you might discover, as other women have, that you are able to operate a second Rambler, for yourself and the children, for what it costs to buy and run one, big gas-guzzler of a car. Go see and drive the 1958 Rambler.

George Romney

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 27

"Later on in life, our girls are bound to pay a high price for their mother's coddling. If children don't learn to behave while they're young they inevitably suffer the consequences as adults. I often wish I'd been better behaved as a kid and hadn't thrown away my opportunities. I'm paying now for my lack of training and formal education.

"My father sent my two younger brothers to college—he was such a crack salesman that during the national depression he managed to hang on to a decent income—but at the age of seventeen I landed in the Navy as an ordinary seaman. It was largely my own fault. I was unruly and undisciplined and set a poor example for my brothers, as my mother often told both me and my father. I was the oldest son and a lot was expected of me, but I didn't deliver. I lied and cheated and played truant. During my boyhood my mother would store up the list of my various escapades while my father was on the road and every time he returned I would receive a sound beating. The beatings didn't do much good.

"I ran with the wrong crowd, I suppose, though I didn't see it that way in my youth. Through my parents I was introduced to the upper-crust youngsters in our town, but I never felt the upper crust gave a hoot for me. My disposition was to side with the underdog. I can still remember the sense of outrage and burning injustice I felt when two girls in our high-school class got in trouble, the usual trouble. The rich girl's family covered up the facts while the poor girl was disgraced and practically driven out of town.

"I wanted a scientific education, but not badly enough, I guess. I was bored by the dry-as-dust diagrams and wordy theories that represented science and math in our high school. What I craved was to learn from actual experience; one of my ragtag friends and I picked up quite a bit of practical knowledge of stresses and strains by building model airplanes in his back yard. Years later I found that back-yard learning useful when I went to work for an airline company, my favorite job to date. I quit that job to follow Abby to Chicago. I'm sure she has forgotten that.

"Nowadays Ellen and Janey are important to Abby and I am not. The other evening I came in hungry as a bear to find supper wasn't even on the planning board. Abby had washed a terrific amount of laundry that day, but her hair was uncombed and her own dress should have gone in the washing machine. She was sitting on the sofa with both girls crawling all over her while she read them their bedtime story several hours in advance. She was making things up to Ellen because she had scolded Ellen for disobeying a flat order and running out in the street. We live in a heavy-traffic neighborhood. What Ellen needed wasn't a scolding but an 'I-mean-business' spanking.

"An hour and a half later supper was on the table. Abby cooked and served the meat before the potatoes were done. Halfway through the meat the potatoes appeared. Then there was a lengthy wait while she stepped in the kitchen and washed and mixed a green salad. I excused myself from waiting for the dessert.

"Abby's one-thing-at-a-time technique is rough on her and everybody else. Seemingly she just can't be casual and easy. I'll admit I'm too absent-minded about holidays, but Abby sure takes the fun out of celebrating, out of giving. Last Valentine's Day I bought her a plant and a box of candy; her thank-you was to remind me that three months previously I'd forgotten the baby's birthday. By midsummer she is knee-deep in planning for Christmas. She is determined the presents we give must equal or surpass the presents we receive, particularly where my family is concerned. My father is dead. I don't care about showering my brothers and my mother with gifts—my mother has very seldom given anything to me—but Abby is bent on striking a hundred-per-cent balance. Recently she invited my mother for a lengthy visit against my wishes and my mother bought the children some dresses. The good-by present we gave my mother strained our budget, but matched the price of those dresses to the penny.

"I would like to take Abby out occasionally, but she won't leave Ellen and Janey. It's an ordeal for me to try to show her and the kids a good time. I would sooner stay at home. Last Sunday she was all enthused about making a trip to the zoo and I agreed. It took her two hours to get ready. Then she didn't like the way I drove the car; I try to stay within the speed limits, but I let nobody pass me if I can help it. I'm pushed around too much in my daily life; I don't like to be pushed around in Sunday traffic. On Sundays I like to feel I'm my own boss.

"When we reached the zoo neither of my kids was willing to walk with me; they clung like burs to Abby. When I offered to treat them to a restaurant meal Abby said I couldn't afford it. What kind of remark is that to build up a man's pride? Maybe I'm not a millionaire, but I'm able to support my family. I should be able. I work longer hours than anybody else in my shop, the big boss included. I've been promised the next promotion, which of course doesn't necessarily mean I'll get it. Many a night I lie awake wondering whether or not one of the other guys is out to knife me. Daytimes I keep a weather eye out to be sure I'm not undercut at the plant.

"It's been my experience in life that promises are often broken, that people can't be trusted to give you a square deal. I learned to be a cynic as a kid. One month after I joined the Navy at my father's orders, my high-school sweetheart—she was wearing an engagement ring I continued to pay for for the next two years—eloped with my best friend. To prove I wasn't affected by being jilted, I played the fool and married a woman I scarcely knew; she was only interested in drawing her allotment and was unfaithful from the beginning. Abby used to nag me to talk about my first wife, but I just don't care to discuss humiliations of the past.

"When I first met Abby one of her great appeals to me was her sweetness, her innocence. I knew at once she was a girl I could honor and trust. On our first evening together she took me to meet her parents and they made me feel welcome. I'm fond of my in-laws—I prefer my mother-in-law to my own mother—but sometimes I can't help wishing Abby would listen to me the way she listens to her folks. Every day she and her mother confer on the telephone. I admire my mother-in-law's taste, but I would like our house just as well if Abby and I had picked it out ourselves. It might be pleasant if Abby would develop some taste of her own. My mother-in-law chose our rugs and draperies and furniture—she has helped us meet the installment payments more than once—and I appreciate her kindness.

"Still and all, I wish Abby didn't set such a high value on her parents' opinions. I doubt she is especially fond of her father, but he has a deep influence on her. Not long ago I heard him correct her pronunciation of a word and in a sharp, curt way suggest she consult the dictionary. She ran out of the room to the big dictionary and I followed and found her crying. It made me furious. Abby never knew why I rushed outside and took a long walk before coming back. If I hadn't, there would have been a knockdown fight between me and my father-in-law.

"Abby used to say she wanted a husband who wore the pants in the family. Plainly she didn't mean it. She has no confidence whatever in me. Regularly each week I hand her my salary, minus transportation and lunch money, but she accepts the money as though it were a weekly miracle. I don't begrudge my wages to her and the youngsters. I used to be quite a fancy Dan. In high school I owned a hundred-dollar tuxedo. As a common seaman in the Navy I wore uniforms that cost me seventy-five-dollars apiece; the uniforms were tailor-made. I haven't had a new suit for the past three years. I don't complain about that.

"What I complain about is the lack of companionship in my life, the lack of love. In our house my companion is the television set. Once upon a time Abby loved me. It's true we weren't particularly compatible in a sexual way, but I didn't press Abby. I hoped as she grew older that part of our marriage would improve. After the children came along, I lost the hope. Now if I kiss Abby she turns her cheek. More than likely both of our girls are clinging to her skirts and I have the feeling I'm horning in on a threesome. I don't like horning in where I'm not welcome. It's been six months since I've made love to Abby. She and I have no real marriage. Any love and companionship we once shared now belong to the children. Do you wonder I complain?"

CHILD'S VOICE

By ELEANOR AVERITT

Her voice on the wind is high and thin
As a lone, disconsolate elf—
And I who neither believe nor grieve
Shudder in spite of myself.
Oh, who comes crying that ancient tune,
Piercing the worlds I know?
The world of a child is lone and strange
Now, as long ago.

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"Abby and Clark were using their children to fight each other. They were fighting each other because both of them were miserably insecure and in serious need of personal aid and encouragement. Abby was pouring on her children the affection she withheld from Clark and (perhaps subconsciously) was making him feel shut out and alien in his own home. To revenge himself for this assault upon his already tottering self-esteem, Clark was yielding to plain bad temper and was disciplining his daughters with undue severity. He could excuse his lack of control and judgment by reflecting that Abby was too soft and easygoing with the girls. And she could excuse herself for her coldness toward her husband—here she felt very guilty—on the grounds of his harshness toward her daughters, harshness she had provoked. Continued conflict over children is almost always a reflection of other difficulties in a marriage.

"Abby's and Clark's middle-class backgrounds and even their youthful experiences were surprisingly similar. Both were intelligent and yet both had scholastic difficulties. Both had been jilted and both were wary and suspicious people; as a result they had almost no friends. Abby was obviously a timid, fearful young woman; Clark endeavored with some success to hide his timidity under a cloak of belligerence. Neither Clark nor Abby in youth received enough of the right kind of attention from their parents, their fathers in particular.

"Clark grew up with the conviction that his father was a brutal tyrant, although in the course of many conversations between us very little evidence was developed to sustain this view. To be sure, Clark's family followed the unhappy practice of assigning to the male parent the discipline and punishment of the children. As a young boy Clark began to see his father not as a loving protector but as the man who returned from selling trips with a great big stick in hand. Perhaps, too, during his father's absences too much was required from Clark as the eldest son. At any rate, very early, he visualized himself as the scapegoat in his family. There isn't much doubt Clark associated himself with the group he described as the underdogs in high school because he felt like an underdog himself. When Clark married Abby he was pretty well sold on the notion that nobody liked him. Longing for her love, he was more than half persuaded she was fated to let him down.

"When Abby married Clark she hoped he would build her up and endow her with the sense of importance she hadn't found in her girlhood home. She didn't realize Clark

CONTINUED ON PAGE 35

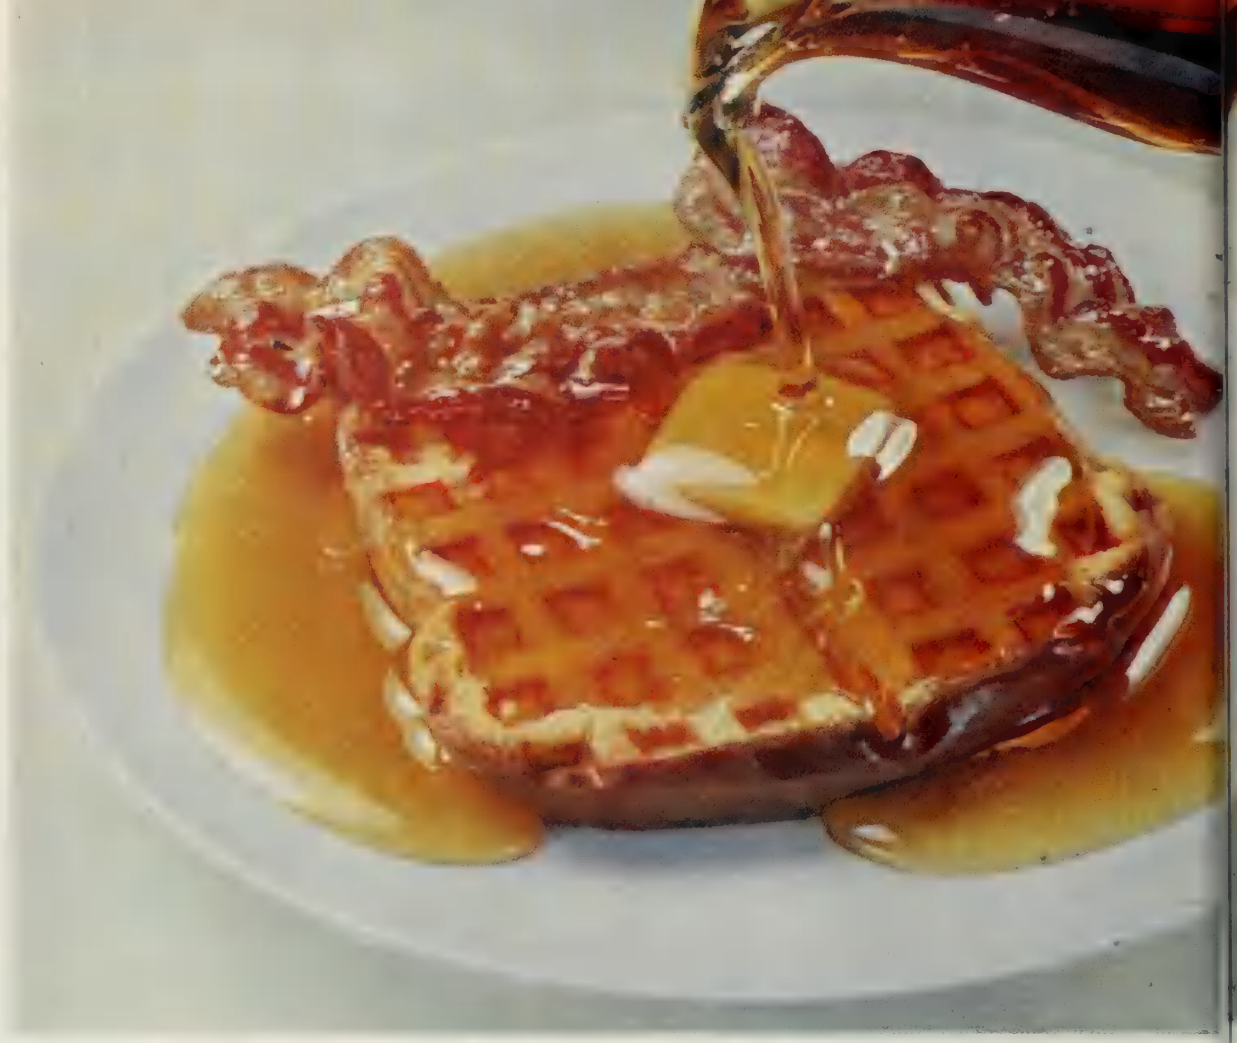
Company Meat Loaf with a new crunch top and the delicious natural flavor of Del Monte Peas

You know how peas taste when they're just exactly right? Nice and sweet, yet with enough richness to round out the flavor? And so tender they just seem to melt away as you eat?

Well, that's DEL MONTE Early Garden Peas. Like peas fresh from the pod, they're a mixture of smaller, sweeter peas with larger, richer-tasting ones. With this improvement: they're all carefully selected for tenderness and flavor first.

So expect garden flavor and plenty of it from DEL MONTE Peas. Sure, they're quick and easy. But the big reason so many women serve them so often is just because they taste so good!

CRUNCH-TOP MEAT LOAF



- 2 cups soft bread cubes
- 2 tablespoons melted butter or margarine
- 1½ lbs. ground beef
- ½ cup DEL MONTE Catsup
- ½ cup water
- 1 egg, well beaten
- 2 tablespoons finely chopped onion
- 1 to 1½ teaspoons salt
- 2 cans (17-oz. size) DEL MONTE Brand Peas

Toss 1½ cups of the bread cubes with the melted butter or margarine. Combine rest of cubes with remaining ingredients except peas. Pack loosely into deep round (8 x 1½ in.) ovenproof glass cake baking dish. Lightly press buttered bread cubes into top of meat. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 1 hour. Cut in wedges. Serve with hot, seasoned DEL MONTE Peas. Garnish with broiled tomatoes, if desired. Serves 6.

Del Monte® Peas

Bread ideas you'll love with Log Cabin Syrup

You can make such crispy-light Waffles—with bread, no batter! And they taste so heavenly with Log Cabin Syrup's real maple flavor. Butter 10 slices of bread lightly on both sides. Add ¾ cup milk, dash salt, to one slightly beaten egg and blend. Dip slices in egg mixture and drain. Bake bread golden brown in moderately hot waffle iron about 5 minutes. Lavish on Log Cabin—it's blended with real maple sugar.

You can delight the children with Pan Cookies! Heat ½ cup Log Cabin Syrup and ¼ cup butter in large skillet over medium heat. Cut up 8 bread slices into cookie shapes with knife or cookie cutter. Sauté in skillet 2 minutes. Turn, cook 5 minutes until golden on undersides. Turn, and brown other side. Cool. Mm-m-m . . . 24 maple cookies. Extra good because of the real maple sugar perfectly blended into Log Cabin Syrup.

New drip-proof bottle

Another fine product of General Foods

You can make sensational French Crisp—flavor-bright with Log Cabin's maple goodness. Mix ¼ cup Log Cabin, ¼ cup melted butter. Brush 6 slices of bread on both sides with this mixture. Brown on Presto's New Control Master Griddle, 3 minutes on each side. Serve with plenty of Log Cabin. Presto Griddle browns evenly, never burns, has slide-out drip tray. Control Master is detachable, so griddle washes completely under water.

You can be gala with bread—make crisp maple Dessert Cups. Mix 2 tablespoons each of Log Cabin Syrup and melted butter. Trim crusts from 8 bread slices. Flatten slices with rolling pin. Brush on syrup mixture and press slices into buttered muffin pans. Bake in hot oven (400°F.) about 15 minutes. Spoon in your favorite ice cream and top with shimmering Log Cabin Syrup. Your family will love this truly different dessert.

Real Butter—
the natural flavor
to use with nature's foods

You're sure the flavor's right—with real butte

(Flavor that makes eating more fun)

You're sure, because you taste the flavor magic real butter adds. You know real butter turns good food into great food. Butter is a natural food, churned from 100% pure cream, with a delightful flavor all its own. Hot foods especially: vegetables, toast, biscuits, eggs, meats, seafood . . . taste twice as good with real butter. Real butter is flavor magic—nothing else can equal it!

See "The Perry Como Show" on NBC-TV

© 1956, AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION

Just like milk, real butter belongs on your family table

AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION • Chicago

Representing the dairy farmers in your area

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 30

himself was too emotionally poverty-stricken to meet the specifications. The strength and maturity she fancied she detected in him during their brief courtship were imaginary. Actually, as she and I quickly decided in our interviews, she was originally attracted to Clark by his resemblance to her father. Both men were restless, visionary, moody.

"The strongest person in the situation was Abby's mother. This clear-eyed lady called at my office, admitted that she had been giving Abby too much advice in the present—probably to make up for neglect in the past. She agreed to encourage Abby to depend more on herself and less on the telephone, and was as good as her word. She sketched a picture of Abby's youth with herself, the mother of the family, preoccupied and often traveling on business, while the nervous, supersensitive father was in the library among his books.

"In childhood Abby had gone all out in the effort to wring praise and approval from her father, always felt she had failed. As an adult she was still hugging the consciousness of inevitable failure; this accounted for her fussy, compulsive housekeeping, her constant indexing of her weaknesses, her foolish self-punishments, her slavish concentration upon the minute details of a task. Few tasks demand absolute attention. Indeed, too much rigid attention can ruin rhythm, destroy skill and bring on premature exhaustion.

"When I met thirty-year-old Abby she was still belaboring herself for flunking out of college; years later she still felt that she had failed her father. Recently it has become the fashion for grown children to blame parents for all their personality deficiencies, a practice that seems to me futile and self-defeating. Abby and I discussed her father's history, not with the idea of placing blame but to gain understanding. As Abby came to understand her father she began to understand herself, to understand the nature of her marital difficulties. Abby's father pushed his children too hard and was too ambitious for them (it seemed to Abby and me) because of his own disappointments; his father, a distinguished professor at a famous Eastern university, had expected a more brilliant career from his son.

"Abby made up her mind to break out of this backward-looking, vicious circle. She examined herself and Clark in the clear light of reality. She determined to be rid of the useless self-depreciation that hobbled her in all her actions. Knowing that formulae and symbols were impressive to Abby, I was able to help her in this regard. An intelligence test was arranged and, as was anticipated, Abby registered an unusually high score. She promptly concluded she was smart enough to work and improve her marriage. Once the problem was understood, it could be attacked from several different angles.

"Abby had never taken up with her pastor the matter of Clark's divorce; instead, she had tortured herself by fretting over the possibility that the two of them might be joined in an adulterous union. She had allowed this worry virtually to destroy her sexual relationship with Clark. At my urging Abby called on her pastor; thereupon an illusion of years' standing evaporated. When her pastor was advised of the facts in the case Abby was informed that her marriage, blessed with children, was also blessed in the eyes of her church.

"Next Abby made an appointment with her physician. The tranquillity pills she was swallowing in quantity were self-prescribed. When her physician inquired into her daily consumption of coffee and cigarettes, he strongly recommended that she cut down there as well as on the pills. Dosing herself far less, Abby became less depressed, less vague and a more pleasant, relaxed person to be around.

"When Abby acknowledged she had allowed Clark to feel supplanted by his children and was largely responsible for the unhappy results, she changed her tactics. She could sympathize with sensitivity (once she recognized it) because she was sensitive herself. She arranged to give Clark some genuine and exclusive attention upon his evening return—if only a few minutes. She saw to it that Ellen and Janey weren't immediately on view, clinging to her skirts. It wasn't too complicated to settle them with toys or a game. When she had a sandbox installed on the patio the children spent more time playing outdoors and less time crawling in her lap; they benefited from the exercise and fresh air and from their independence too. Abby had been babying Ellen in particular.

"Once Clark felt welcome at home he automatically cut down his televiewing. He also trimmed his hours on the job. Like Abby, he had been wearing himself out with a large amount of compulsive 'busy' work. He confessed to me that after he began to spend fewer hours on the job he actually accomplished more.

"Abby appealed to Clark for his cooperation in handling the children. It was swiftly granted. When he thought it over, Clark soon realized the impression of himself he was leaving with his children was uncomfortably close to the impression his father had left with him. He didn't want his children to grow up feeling put upon and abused as he had felt long ago. Clark and Abby shared an academic turn of mind; they read books on child care together, discovered what was to be reasonably expected of children the age of theirs, and put the teachings into practice—together. When they differed, they composed their differences in private.

Every time we lose courage, we lose several days of our life.

MAURICE MAETERLINCK

"Ellen and Janey rapidly responded to the changed atmosphere in the home, as is the usual way of children. Nowadays they aren't afraid of their father, they return in full measure the affection they receive. Ellen and Janey are now left with paid sitters whenever their parents feel they can afford the fees. It was unfair of Abby to refuse to leave the youngsters except when her mother was available.

"Abby and Clark try to go out together, without the children, at least once a week. On Sunday afternoons they usually go somewhere with the children; with the improvement in his circumstances and disposition Clark has ceased to be one of those dangerously aggressive Sunday drivers. He does not attend church with Abby on Sunday mornings and she still regrets the fact, but no longer lets it worry her.

"They have made a few friends. Now that Clark is less suspicious of people's motives, he has invited several of his fellow workers to his home. Now that Abby is less tense about housewifely details, she has become acquainted with her neighbors and enjoys their company.

"The couple's sexual relationship improved as their other troubles were lightened. Abby had been trying too hard in that area too. When she was content to be loving just to show her affection and to please Clark, for the first time in the marriage she had a sexual experience that was satisfying to her too.

"Clark still is no great shakes at remembering birthdays, but Abby—incidentally, she has stopped price-tagging gifts—now makes remembering easy for him: she rings the kitchen calendar in colored crayon. Despite reminders, Clark forgot her last birthday. That evening when he sat down to supper empty-handed, Abby served him and the children the regular meal but served herself a candle-lighted birthday cake. Clark took one look at the cake, then left the table. Fifteen minutes later he sheepishly returned from a hurried trip to the drugstore with a big bottle of Abby's favorite perfume.

"In the old days Clark's forgetfulness would have caused hurt feelings, bitter words, an acid, dragged-out quarrel. Now Abby thanked him for the perfume and then, simultaneously, the two of them burst out laughing. Abby and Clark have discovered that laughter is a great asset in maintaining a marriage that is still imperfect but that continually grows in richness and variety with the passage of time."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by
DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

New Universal Frying Pan and Detachable Control

a $19.90 VALUE for only $15.95

Now at this special low price you can have the same thermostatically controlled heat in your surface cooking that you do in your oven. Just plug in Universal's Cookamatic Control, set it to the recommended heat . . . and you're sure of perfect results every time. Cooking's easier, food even tastes better. Start your Cookamatic set with this money-saving special at your dealer's now!

COMPLETELY SUBMERSIBLE

Each appliance can be washed entirely under water like any ordinary pan.

UNIVERSAL

LANDERS, FRARY & CLARK, NEW BRITAIN, CONN.

TASTES BETTER NATURALLY!

RIVER BRAND
Popular low-cost medium grain rice.

COOKS QUICK NATURALLY!

CAROLINA BRAND
King size extra long grain rice.

Happy meals every time— the whole family loves the naturally better flavor of natural white River Brand and Carolina Brand Rice. Easy to prepare, and they taste so much better — naturally!

READY TO EAT
in a few minutes!
Fast Cooking Recipes on Every Box.

RIVER BRAND RICE MILLS, INC.
New York, N.Y. Houston, Texas Memphis, Tenn.
El Campo, Texas Eunice, La.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Now, if I were doing that ——"

I've cajoled my Creature of Sheer Delight not to mention our trip around the world, yet I catch myself violating my own resolve. How delicious to circle the globe and get home before anybody misses you!

My neighbor with the four-car garage tells me he suspects the modest people in smaller houses on quiet unpretentious side streets enjoy more pleasure and relaxation than he does. But I can't persuade him to swap with 'em.

Our male opponent at the bridge table got hot under the collar and demanded that nurses and teachers be drafted and trained just like soldiers. Our female opponent calmed him down by reminding him the bid was four spades, doubled.

In a bighearted moment I told our younger son he could choose any twelve of my neckties for his very own. Later I moved a few of my ties from Siam and Italy to a dark corner of my closet.

We agreed at our annual stag dinner that a wife's dazzling smile, her eager caress, is the greatest reward and solace for any man from truck driver to used-car dealer. (You women underestimate yourselves.)

When we visit our Air Force trio in Japan (our journey's true goal) maybe I'll offer Harlan III a flashlight bulb. At nine months he ate a fragile glass ornament from the Christmas tree, and I'd like to find out if it taught him anything, the little gourmet.

We're short of bookshelf space, so we're equipping our new bathroom with bookshelves and magazine racks. We aim to make it one of our great state's best equipped small libraries.

My neighbor with the thirty-mile-per-gallon imported car confides that his wife confuses worrying with planning. "If she planned more," he says, looking around nervously, "she could worry less."

Few men who've slept in barracks or in the field wear more than the upper or the lower halves of pajamas. (Often less.) What we're really waiting for is a short toga nightshirt that'll make us resemble a Roman senator.

"My modern girl friends," muses Betty Comfort, chasing the squirrels away from the bird food, "resent us sweet women who're so demure and winsome with the men. No style, they say; no zip; only popularity."

I've discovered a sure way to get my sausage or bacon almost free of grease: I watch my chance and drain the skillet once or twice.

Who's to blame for the unwed loneliness of one third of all men and women? Too shy to woo, they need help from our high-pressure organizers who waste their energies on trifles.

Our town's most famous nonstop talker has gone wily: she chops her monologues into one-minute bursts, allows her listeners ten-word questions or interruptions.

One of our globe-trotter friends suggests that my Dream Girl carry a canister of powdered coffee around the world in her handbag or purse. And a small bottle of condensed milk?

I like to shoot a few baskets before breakfast or dinner at the goal in our back yard; maybe a quota of ten at twenty feet. Often this requires thirty or thirty-five shots, all the more exercise. It helps clarify the global situation. I recommend it to Dulles.

Without an argument I take my family out to dinner once or twice a week. Our airport restaurant is a favorite spot, like a café on the world's water front, and I notice it's only $424.70 from Rio, tourist class.

One of our neighborhood matrons denounces Disney as a sadist, a child-frightener, because his hungry and sharp-toothed little creatures are so enthusiastic about eating one another. (Shucks, when I was seven I hid under my seat at Hamlet when Polonius got stabbed through a curtain.)

Seven couples from our town have flown around the world recently; one matron even has four complete trays of Pan American dinner dishes and serves a compact meal for four on lap pillows before you can swallow your third sherry.

That deadpan husband in the middle of the next block discovered his wife had never owned a really choice doll. So he bought her a de-luxer on her fortieth birthday and now she wants to start a collection.

Several people used my epigram, "There is no solution, seek it lovingly," on Christmas and Valentine cards. But it's a little verbose, so I hereby condense it to "No solution? Seek it lovingly."

When we phoned our son and his Dream Girl in Japan they were triumphant: a bachelor had swapped duty and taken his holiday flying assignment, and we could hear Harlan III prattling across the 8000 miles.

My family scoffs at my whim for one poem read aloud at breakfast. But I find that by shrewd, swift maneuvers I can read four lines before they drown me out.

After six months, our converted pantry hadn't quite become a bathroom. Tile men blamed carpenters, electricians blamed painters, only the plumbers played it deadpan. We'll have a bath-warming yet.

All winter the squirrels grew plumper and plumper, eating the snacks we put out for the birds. We even greased the legs of tables and grills, in vain: they're too ingenious.

One good reason for mentioning a trip around the world before you go is that afterward people won't listen to a word about it. But in advance a peculiar, curious courtesy prompts 'em even to quiz you zealously.

"If I ever become dictator," warns Peter Comfort, sweeping out his garage, "it'll be illegal for wife and husband to have words till after they've swallowed a cup of morning coffee."

My frugal neighbor with the boxful of tax-free municipals blames our economic "flurry" on people's extravagance. "Imagine!" he exclaims incredulously. "Giving a child fifty cents for a loose tooth! All I ever got was a dime."

. . . When your wife gives you a humorous book on tennis instead of spoofing you about your backhand,

. . . And your youngest son becomes a front-page columnist on his high-school paper,

. . . Or your daughter-in-law keeps her sense of humor and her gifts as a letter writer at an air base in Nippon,

. . . And after all these years you begin to feel relaxed with your in-laws,

. . . Or your son-in-law thinks he can bring your golf score below 90,

Then you're getting adjusted, stranger, your misgivings about matrimony were groundless.

NEW IDEA!

Apple Jelly Glazed Ham

Bake a whole or half ham. About ½ hour before it is done, remove it from the oven. Cut away any remaining rind and score the fat surface with a sharp knife. Spread ham with Kraft Pure Apple Jelly and stud with whole cloves. Return it to the oven and spread with more jelly two or three times during the last ½ hour of baking.

In all your favorite varieties

Add flavor to your favorite foods with KRAFT Jellies and Preserves!

Use them as ingredients to add true flavor of fresh-picked fruit, captured the special KRAFT way!

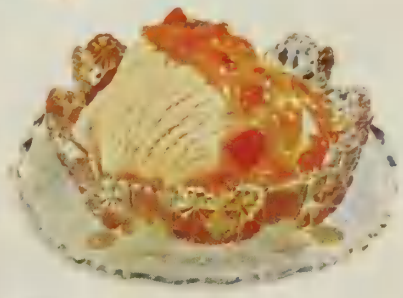
New Kraft Jellies and Preserves are the ones to use—because they're made to be extra flavorful. Even when Grandma made her wonderful jelly, much of the good fruit flavor boiled away. But Kraft makes jellies and preserves a new, flavor-saving way. They're "cool-cooked" . . . at temperatures 'way below boiling . . . to keep the flavor and color of the fresh-picked fruit! Doesn't using new Kraft Jellies and Preserves as ingredients sound delicious, and easy? Try it!

(1) Minted Broiled Peaches. Place drained canned peach halves, cut side up, on broiler rack. Brush with melted Parkay Margarine and broil a few minutes until lightly browned. Fill each peach half with Kraft Mint Flavored Apple Jelly. Serve as garnish with roast leg of lamb.

(2) Silhouette Cookies. Cream ¾ cup Parkay Margarine and ¾ cup sugar together. Add 1 beaten egg, ¼ teaspoon vanilla and 3 tablespoons cream. Mix well. Add 2½ cups flour and ½ teaspoon baking powder sifted together. Chill. Roll out on lightly floured board to 1/16-inch thickness. Cut with 2-inch round cutter. Cut small star shape from center of half the rounds. Place whole rounds on lightly greased baking sheets and place teaspoonful of Kraft Pure Seedless Black Raspberry Preserves in center of each. Top with star-cut round. Press edges together with floured fork. Bake in moderate oven, 375°, for 10 minutes, or until edges are lightly browned.

(3) Pineapple-Apricot Sundae. Top each serving of ice cream with Kraft Pure Pineapple-Apricot Preserves.

FREE RECIPE FOLDER!



Here are many ways to add flavor to baked goods, desserts, main dishes. Write to Kraft Jellies and Preserves, Dept. L4, Box 522, Chicago 77, Ill.

Silhouette Cookies

Minted Broiled Peaches

Pineapple-Apricot Sundae

The 30th in a Series of Advertisements Presented by New York Life to Help Guide America's Children to a Better Future

Should your child be a Secretary?

by

CLARE H. JENNINGS, CPS

President, The National Secretaries Association (International)

(As told to LLEWELLYN MILLER)

I overheard the comments quite by accident.

The high school juniors who passed me in the school corridor did not know me or that I was on my way to talk with them and their classmates, at the request of their career counselor, about my profession.

"This assembly is a waste of time—for me, anyway," said one. "What can she tell us?"

"Same here," said the other. "Everybody knows that all a secretary does is take dictation, type letters and file."

"Like so many other young people, you haven't the vaguest idea of what a secretary is and does," I said to myself as thoughts of the careers of friends flooded to mind.

I thought of the confidential secretary to a midwest Governor who travels widely all over her state, an indispensable part of her boss's staff.

I thought of the secretary to a department store executive in the Northwest, and of her daily dealings with experts in the exciting, competitive world of merchandising and fashion.

I thought of the secretary to the chief engineer of an oil company in the Southwest who is entrusted with running his office while he is on field trips, and who has a steno-typist assigned to take her dictation.

I thought of the efficient young mother of teenagers, secretary in a big Red Cross chapter in the South, and of her stimulating contacts with all elements of her community from mayor, newspaper editor and social leaders to those in need of Visiting Nurse Services.

I thought of secretaries in banks, business offices, insurance companies, law firms, police departments; in hospitals, weather bureaus, travel agencies, steel mills, research laboratories, farm cooperatives; in advertising offices, TV stations, universities, brokerage houses, and in countless other industries and professions—each involved with the inner workings of an important enterprise. I thought of the thousands of secretaries in big offices and small all over the country; of the special satisfactions they enjoy as essential members of the business team; and of how valuable a place secretaries have made for themselves in a comparatively short time.

Only a little more than fifty years ago, the young women who mastered a machine just coming into wide use and who ventured into the then almost entirely male world of business were known as "typewriters." Perhaps that is why many people still have the impression that a secretary's main task is a machine-like turning out of perfect letters from nine to five; and why so many others use the title "secretary" to mean anyone employed in any stenographic or clerical position in an office.

True, typing and shorthand are two of the basic skills of the secretary, but her duties cover a much wider field than the work of such valuable specialists as the typist, stenographer, file clerk and receptionist. The secretary, as we use the title today, often fills all of those positions. In addition, she is an assistant who knows many of the confidential matters of her office and of her employer's business dealings. She uses this knowledge to protect him from unnecessary interruptions, delays and confusions, and to clear decks for him in a score of other ways.

She knows which calls to route to him immediately, which to delay until she can supply him with needed reference material from her files, which she can best deal with herself.

She sits in on conferences when a trusted witness is needed. Her manner over the telephone and to visitors sets the mood of his office. She is his daytime hostess rather than a receptionist.

One secretary may handle a great volume of letters. Another does very little typing. Under any circumstances, there is little machine-like about their work. No machine has the tact to soothe the ruffled feelings of an important caller, who must cool his heels while an equally important one overstays his time. No machine has the judgment about what information may be released in a boss's absence, which requests must be smoothly side-tracked.

No machine can act as a boss's memory by combined use of intelligence, filed material and a carefully kept appointment book.

A secretary's career can have enormous personal rewards. Her working hours and conditions are pleasant. Her office is certain to be comfortable. In a big office, she has opportunity to meet many new friends. Her work puts her in touch with men and women of achievement in many fields. And no field of special interest is closed to the young woman who chooses secretaryship as a career.

Every young person does not have the temperament, talent, time or money to prepare for a career in one of the arts or professions, but the door is still wide open in all such areas—to the secretary.

I think of countless examples, among them:

Miss A. is not a musician, but she is a keen appreciator of music. As secretary to the program director of a radio station, she combines job and major personal interest.

Mrs. B.'s keenest interest in high school was sports. She could not afford college training as a physical education teacher and did not want to work with the young, anyway. She is now secretary to the director of an athletic club, where her knowledge of sports is of great value to her boss because she can talk the language of the coaches, equipment salesmen and members.

Miss C.'s chief interest is people and their problems. She is absorbed in her work as secretary to the personnel director of a manufacturing plant.

The training period can be brief

Not the least of the many advantages of my profession is that the ambitious girl can get a fast start.

As in every other profession, the more schooling a young person has, the better are chances at top spots and for rapid advancement. However, the girl who needs, or wants, to go to work immediately after high school can train herself for a secretary's responsibilities while gaining office experience as a typist, stenographer or clerk. High school will give her the fundamental tools: typing and shorthand. With these alone, she can get a job as a clerical worker or stenographer. If she is ambitious and persistent, she will pick up the extra skills from others in her office, or through night school or correspondence courses, and eventually become a fine secretary, though this will take some years since a secretary must have mature judgment as well as special knowledge.

Private business schools and colleges offer many different training programs at varying costs. Short courses of two to six months usually give the student about the same training that a high school course provides, though intensive coaching in typing and shorthand are of special value in some cases. Business colleges with highest ratings require as much as two years' attendance (one year for the student with two years of regular college) before granting a diploma, and fees can run as high as $800 a year for tuition.

Young people who have four years of college training in the technics of secretarial work and in the sciences and liberal arts, have a flying start, of course.

Nothing points more conclusively to the fact that secretaryship is now a recognized profession than that 209 colleges and universities are offering degrees in the field of secretarial studies, according to the U.S. Office of Education's last report. At the end of 1956, Bachelors Degrees were awarded to 1,236 women and to 42 men.

There is a special way by which the secretary, with or without a diploma or degree, can win acknowledged standing in her field. By passing the stiff, two-day written examination given annually in various parts of the United States and Canada by The Institute for Certifying Secretaries, she can qualify for the valued designation of Certified Professional Secretary. This program was established in 1951 under sponsorship of The National Secretaries Association.

Through experience and study, the secretary must be prepared to answer questions in this examination on such subjects as business law governing contracts, sales, insurance, negotiable instruments, property and so on; administration problems concerning prices, taxes, labor and governmental regulations, management controls; accounting knowledge concerning payrolls, income tax reports, budgets; and the more familiar secretarial skills, such as use of duplicating machine, buying of supplies and office equipment, dictation and transcription, and English usage.

The financial rewards can be sizable

As in every other field, salaries vary from one part of the country to another. In areas where a typist starts at from $150 to $200 a month, a girl with secretarial training starts at from $200 to $300. It is not easy to break through the ceiling of from $4,000 to $6,000 a year that many thousands of secretaries earn, but I know of several who draw $10,000. One young woman of 35, who is an officer of her company as well as secretary to the president, has an income topping $13,000.

Admittedly, such a large salary is rare—but it is possible. And one of the most tempting aspects of my profession is that secretaries are in such great demand that anyone not satisfied with her progress can move readily elsewhere.

It's a woman's career—in a man's world

In many professions, women are in constant competition against men. The secretary works with men. Ours is one of the very few professions where being a woman is of greatest advantage, rather than being a subtle handicap in reaching the top.

Some male secretaries make important places for themselves but, by and large, ours is a woman's profession. Employers value the feminine qualities of tact, intuition, imagination and manner that women bring to an office. They also know that the ambitious girl is apt to bend all efforts to reach the top as an executive secretary, while an ambitious young man is apt to have his eye on a transfer to management—though some girls use their secretarial jobs as springboards to other careers. I know of several who have become editors, account executives, heads of purchasing departments, branch managers, and the like.

These usually are young women who have found that their temperament is not that of the career secretary.

Success calls for special qualities

The girl who finds her greatest reward in being part of a team, rather than a solo star, shows the natural talent to work for and with others toward a joint goal that is essential to success as a secretary.

Loyalty, judgment, integrity and adaptability are high on the list of other requirements.

The girl who makes and keeps many friends, and who sticks up for them and for her family at all times, shows the loyalty in word and deed that a secretary must bring to her boss and her company.

Can your daughter accept sudden changes of plan amiably and without flurry? The secretary must be able to turn on a dime, occasionally, and work efficiently under heavy pressure when an emergency challenges her chief.

Is your daughter accurate? Her boss must be able to rely with total confidence on her reports. Neatness, good spelling, and promptness in completing school papers show the respect for detail and the reliability needed by a secretary.

Is your daughter adaptable? The secretary deals with all kinds of people. The girl who is liked by teachers and neighbors, as well as by many fellow students, shows the capacity to make her way in a big group—rather than stick with a clique—that is needed by the secretary.

Perhaps a prime requisite for success in my profession is approaching secretaryship as a chosen career—not as a stopgap before marriage, or as a stepping stone to other positions.

The girl who does so will gain experience in her working years that will serve her well, no matter what life brings, because she will have learned the secret of greatest happiness in all human relations: the more imaginatively, loyally and consistently she works for and with another person for his success, the more she benefits herself.

nylic

HOW TO HELP YOUR CHILD HAVE THE CAREER HE WANTS

Many factors will enter into your child's choice of a career: his interests, his ambitions, his abilities, the counsel he receives from teachers, friends and family. But, most of all, it will depend on his opportunities to get the training he needs to enter the field of his choice.

Even though his college days are still years away, it's never too soon to start making sure that your child will have the opportunity to continue his education when the time comes.

Your New York Life agent has chosen as his career the business of helping families plan for the future—for education, for retirement, for all the things which life insurance helps make possible. Through training and experience he has become a highly qualified specialist. You'll find him both able and willing to help you.

Booklets available on many careers

This article on a Secretarial Career is one of a continuing series on career opportunities for young men and women. Thus far, similar articles have been prepared on Newspapering, Law, Medicine, Accounting, Teaching, Architecture, Aeronautical Engineering, Electronic Engineering, Public Service, Farming, Chemistry, Selling, Nursing, Starting a Business of Your Own, Pharmacy, Dentistry, Banking, Printing, Home Economics, the Mineral Industry, Personnel Work, Retailing, Atomic Science, Librarianship, the Armed Forces, Engineering, Food Retailing, Medical Technology and Traffic Managing. Each is available in booklet form and will be sent to you on request. You'll also find additional help in our free booklet, "The Cost of Four Years at College." Just drop a postcard to:

NEW YORK LIFE
Insurance Company

51 Madison Ave., Dept. 30-J, New York 10, N. Y.

The New York Life Agent in Your Community is a Good Man to Know
Copyright 1958, New York Life Insurance Company

What kind of diet are you on ?

(almost everybody is)

Infant diet?

There used to be a bugaboo that bananas were indigestible. Now doctors prescribe ripe bananas as one of baby's first solid foods – because they are so easily digested.

Weight-losing diet?

Maybe you have heard the bugaboo that bananas are fattening. What are the facts? The U. S. Department of Agriculture states that a medium banana has only 88 calories.

Low-fat diet?

Bananas contain almost no fat at all – less than 2/10 of 1%. Yet, unlike so many "diet" foods, they have a rich, mellow flavor and really satisfy your appetite.

Growing-up diet?

Bananas satisfy hunger – and "hidden hunger," too. They provide vitamins and minerals to help kids grow strong and healthy, plus wholesome fruit sugars for quick energy.

Geriatric diet?

Bananas are easy to fix, easy to chew – perfect for older folks. And they help sustain youthful vitality with a well-balanced supply of vitamins and minerals.

Low-cholesterol diet?

There's no cholesterol at all in bananas. So if your doctor suggests cutting down your daily cholesterol intake, bananas a-plenty are safe – and ever so satisfying.

Liquid diet?

Be sure to try a banana shake on the days your doctor advises liquids. Just mashabanana with a fork, shake with cold milk and pour yourself a balanced ration.

Got-no-troubles diet?

Bananas are one of the best-tasting foods you can eat any day! Such a happy way to build good nutrition into your daily diet. So help yourself. Havabanana today!

Whatever diet you're on...

Help yourself—HAVABANANA

Help yourself to a slender figure!

Help yourself to new vitality!

Help yourself to better digestion!

Remember—a medium banana has only 88 calories!

* Calorie low! Fruits as a class are low in calories and bananas are a particularly low-calorie food because they are usually eaten straight from the peel with no high-calorie extras added. A medium banana has only 88 calories.

UNITED FRUIT COMPANY

Calorie Low!* Vitality High! Bananas belong in your daily diet!

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"Last-minute bulletin—there will be no school today . . ."

The mother had just put her little girl into the hands of the progressive-school teacher, who took the child into the classroom. It was little Margaret's first day. Presently the teacher returned, beaming. "Margaret has made a wonderful adjustment," she said. She had walked into the classroom and promptly socked a little boy on the nose.

It was different when father was a boy, says Newman Levy, father of Margaret, in MY DOUBLE LIFE: Adventures in Law and Letters (Doubleday). This is one of the most entertaining biographies I can remember. Since the author is a rhymester par excellence (see Opera Guyed) and a successful criminal lawyer, you get both fun and drama for your money. New Yorkers of a certain age will find it captivating, for Newman Levy has lived in New York all his life, and each decade of the big city unfolds anew.

He describes New York at the turn of the century, when Harlem was quaint, and wistaria grew up the front of the house in springtime; when the horse-drawn fire engines went faster than any fire engines today; when bonfires lighted the entire city on Election Night; when school got you somewhere.

"I learned to read, write and spell, and add, subtract and multiply," he says. (Margaret was still wrestling with these accomplishments during her freshman year at college, he adds.) "We used McGuffey Readers, and I could read fluently by the time I was six. . . . We learned to spell by rote, standing rigidly with our hands clasped behind our backs as we recited the assigned words in a flat singsong voice. It is a practice frowned upon today, but I did learn to spell. I developed a proofreader's eye, and ever since a misspelled word jumps violently out at me from the printed page."

●

HISTORY TODAY is the English counterpart of AMERICAN HERITAGE, both excellent magazines. I am told that the English are instructed to make History more like Heritage, and that the Americans are told to be more like History. History Today covers all time and all places. It is one of the few magazines that come into our house that I sit down and read at once. ($6 for 12 issues. 72 Coleman St., London E.C. 2.)

●

THE GREAT DEMOCRACIES is Winston Churchill's fourth volume in The History of the English-Speaking Peoples (Dodd, Mead). This brilliant series is a must for us all—a magnificent opportunity to view ourselves and our forebears through the eyes and the emotions and the astounding pen of the outstanding figure of our time.

(This may sound hysterical, but if you haven't done so already, it's my advice to take a little time off to read these books. It will restore your self-confidence and your possibly dwindling trust in those same English-speaking peoples.)

●

The complete book on the family feline is now out: THE CARE OF YOUR CAT, by P. M. Soderburg (Harper). This is almost a cyclopedia, covering kinds of cats, habits, illnesses, feeding, accidents, personality. When a cat walks with his tail aloft, turned over at the tip and waving slightly from side to side, he is pleased and happy. When he holds his tail low and swishes it violently from side to side, something has come up to give him active displeasure: he is annoyed. When he purrs—Ah! But I needn't go on. Recently I met a cat named Teakettle, because of the delectably cozy sounds he made.

●

Like the flowers that bloom in the spring, books are popping up all over. Here are a few, far apart, quite special, but all good:

AN ELEPHANT FOR ARISTOTLE, by L. Sprague de Camp (Doubleday), is a delightful scholarly conceit. It seems that Aristotle somewhere describes an elephant as if he had seen one. It is also a fact that Alexander the Great used to send him biological specimens from distant parts. Hence the story, in which Alexander decides to send his old teacher an elephant, and gives the job of transportation to one of his officers. Through the adventures on the trip to Athens we get a day-by-day picture of life in the various cities and plains of the ancient world, including Babylon complete with traffic cop.

THE CHANGING FACE OF BEAUTY, by Madge Garland, is an absorbing picture book with text, Four Thousand Years of Beautiful Women, from Nefertiti to Marilyn Monroe, the Gibson Girl to Greta Garbo, Diane de Poitiers to Eve Curie, Lucrezia Borgia to Mme. Récamier. ($10, Barrows & Co., and worth every cent of it.)

PRIVATE, by Lester Atwell (Simon & Schuster), could be classed with The Last Parallel as an intimate, honest, inside view (not fiction) of the common fighting man. Besides going through the Battle of the Bulge, Saar Valley and other engagements in Germany, this author is literate and a good reporter. His is the kind of book we cannot afford to miss if we want to know the ultimate in experience of our own war generation.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"Now for goodness' sakes, don't make yourself ridiculous by saying anything."

ALFRED AND GUINEVERE, by James Schuyler (Harcourt, Brace), may strike readers as simple-minded, but I felt like the fly on the wall and enjoyed the sensation. This is helter-skelter conversations between two children, brother and sister, cold-blooded and impervious as a couple of villains on the subject of their grownups, but feverishly emotional where other kids are concerned—jealous, scheming, triumphant or infinitely dejected. Either this author has total recall or a remarkable imagination.

●

Last of all there are good mysteries by two practiced hands:

THE HUSBAND (Harper), by Vera Caspary, author of Laura, which concerns a shady husband and a rich wife, London and Paris. And SINGING IN THE SHROUDS (Little Brown), by Ngaio Marsh, in which the murderer commits his crime every ten days and leaves hyacinths on the corpse!

No more tears

from soap in the eyes

Use the shampoo that can't burn or irritate eyes.

Leaves hair silky-soft, easy to comb.

Johnson's BABY SHAMPOO

On Baby: Pin Dot Panti-Dress Set. Nylon yoke and ruffles. Pink or azure dots on white. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $3.00.

Look who's sitting pretty!

Left: Top Print Sacque Set. Snap-fastened. Plasticized pant. Blue/pink, mint/toast, toast/yellow. Layette size. $2.50.

Center: Dimple-Knit Sun Suit. Snap-fastened crotch. White/red, white/royal blue stripes. S-M-L-XL. $2.50.

Right: Doll Print Topper Set. Panties ruffle pants. Azure, pink, yellow print. 6 mos.-1½ yrs. $3.00.

That's me in the picture-pretty dress set. It's made of Carter's softest dimple-knit cotton. Auntie says that's because I have soft dimples, too! It has stand-up nylon ruffles that look like angel wings. Grandma says Carter's had her little angel in mind when they put them on! It's machine-washable, never needs ironing, and it's Carter-Set so it won't shrink out of fit. Now, Mother says that's what keeps me and my dress set sitting pretty. But Daddy thinks it's the seatful of ruffles on the matching panties!

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS

"She keeps saying, 'It's the most natural thing in the world.'"

FATHERHOOD WITHOUT FEAR

The author, once a well-known worrywart, reveals how he has finally achieved the calm that has caused so much comment in the expectant-fathers' room.

By ABBOT MILLS

As the title suggests, it is now possible to have Fatherhood Without Fear. I am the father of three children and as I write this am expecting a fourth. I plan to have this child fearlessly. Many friends know this attitude of mine. Some think it ridiculous, but all of them have begged me to put into writing how I came to feel this way. It is all in having the first baby. After that it becomes more and more routine until the fourth—pffft—nothing. So I will tell you my story, the story of my first baby which I had with considerable fear.

Jody and I were married while attending adjoining colleges in sunny Southern California. We lived in the Pomona College veterans' units with many other young couples and I had occasion to notice a number of expectant fathers. It was not a pleasant sight to notice. To say the least, they were not a well bunch of boys. I felt quite superior not to be among this select group when, to my unbelieving ears, Jody announced that on May 2, 1950, I was going to have a baby! From that very moment on I remember feeling, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that I was going to have a baby. As time went on it grew worse.

Christmas, which is usually a great time of rejoicing for me, was nothing. Lincoln's Birthday, April Fool's Day—nothing! By April 28th I had lost ten pounds, had tired blood (known by the medical profession as "the gray sickness"), and was in a noticeably shaky condition.

All this time my wife, having put on a few pounds, and in the pink of good health, planned to take her final exam, history, April 30th, and also attend her graduation ceremony at Scripps College the first week in June.

Looking back now, I don't know if she had really given much thought to the near arrival of my first baby, but I can tell you the history professor did.

During the three hours that Jody pored over her last college exam, the good professor paced the floor behind her like a caged tiger, terrified that, by some quirk of nature, he might suddenly find himself taking an active part in the birth rituals of my first child. Nature was kind to the professor, but it was several days before he was strong enough to correct the almost perfect paper that Jody handed in. I mention this only to illustrate one example of how fearful fatherhood can be passed along, even to unexpecting fathers (not to mention unsuspecting bridegrooms).

I must say here that for all Jody's blaséness, she was not unaware of my weakened condition and thoughtfully took over completely. She not only mowed the lawn and did the small amount of heavy work there was to be done, but audited many of my classes, taking excellent notes for me.

Then May 2nd arrived! It was a bright, clear, sunny day like all Southern California sunny days. But it seemed different to me. If someone had said, "Today the earth will come to an end," I would have felt very much the same. The not knowing exactly-what-time-May-2nd is what bothered me most.

That morning Jody ate a hearty breakfast as though nothing in the world were wrong. It might have been Valentine's or Labor Day as far as she was concerned. Not I. No eggs for me this morning, and only two jiggers of orange juice (fresh California) instead of the usual four.

I let her do all the house cleaning and dishes as usual that morning, but by noon I was exhausted. She was hungry, also as usual, but I was anything but. She did encourage me to take one small, extra-dry malted milk (double portion of malt—it's good for babies), and I'm glad I did. It helped keep my blood-sugar level level, which is important at a time like this.

Afternoon arrived. Condition weak. Nothing! Darn fool doctors should work for the Weather Bureau! Five P.M. Still no patter of little feet. By 5:30 I was fit to be hog-tied and remembered an old saying by Doctor Spock: "God helps those who help themselves." (I often wondered why he said that, as I wouldn't think it would be especially good as medical advertisement, but maybe he didn't say it.) Anyway, I planned to do just that, if only to save face for the A.M.A.

Jody and I climbed into the car and drove out to the nearby orange groves. There she jogged up and down the rows of orange trees while I stood bravely by—car motor running. This is what is called, professionally, "bringing on the baby." We didn't actually want to bring on the baby, not in the orange groves. We just wanted him to get the general idea. Then we planned to lam out of there for the Kaiser Steel Mill. That's actually where he was supposed to be born, at the Permanente Hospital—sort of an assembly-line arrangement, we were told.

Well, after about the fifth lap I just gave up and told her to stop, that it just wouldn't work and anyway I was suddenly awfully thirsty and I think she was too. On the way back we stopped at the Sage Hen, the local pub, and ordered two extra-dry malted milks but they

MOISTURE-PROOF your baby against diaper irritation

Here's How-

When changing diapers, apply soothing ZBT Baby Powder generously. ZBT protects like oil . . . guards tender skin against urine scald and diaper rash.

After baby's bath, sprinkle entire body with soothing ZBT Baby Powder, to protect against chafing and prickly heat.

Make this test! Smooth ZBT powder on the palm of your hand. Let drops of water fall on palm. See for yourself how ZBT Baby Powder repels moisture, where ordinary powders absorb it.

Used by hundreds of hospital nurseries

ZBT BABY POWDER CONTAINS OLIVE OIL

soothes like powder
protects like oil

didn't serve them. We settled for two lemonades, which, when fresh (and these were), are packed with vitamin C. That night, needless to say, I hardly slept a wink, though Jody did very well.

May 3rd. May 4th. May 5th. Nothing! Idiot doctors couldn't get a job with the Weather Bureau if they tried! For all I knew, the baby wasn't due for two or three more months.

May 6th started off like any other day. Then a weird thing happened. The sky started clouding over. By early evening a heavy fog hung over the area. This, mixed with smog (drifting down from the Oregon coast), made it almost impossible to see more than a few yards in any direction.

This, naturally, was the night we chose to go to the hospital. It was agony driving at ten miles an hour down the highway, knowing that at any moment I might be a father. I think I would have gone nuts had I been alone, so I was especially glad to have Jody along this trip.

We did finally get there and I was all for heading straight for the operating table, but we were stopped at the door by a stony-eyed receptionist who insisted on first getting the story of our lives. How did I know if my father had ever been crazy? I told her I'd have to check with him, as he was in Washington, D.C., working for the Government. She said to let her know for sure later.

Finally Jody went off somewhere and they took me into the expectant-fathers' ward, which was quite crowded. I was amazed to see a few of the older fathers reading magazines. I sat all the time on the edge of my seat, cursing myself for not getting a private room.

Before long Jody's parents arrived. They had already spoken to the physician in charge and assured me that it was safe to go out to supper with them. I went, but it was a waste of time. I couldn't eat a thing.

When we got back we were told that Jody had gone to the delivery room sooner than expected. With that news I sat down and took seasick pills. I don't know how long I sat there before a nurse came in and said, "Mr. Mills, follow me."

We went down a long hall and into a small room. And there she was, Jody and my first baby boy! She smiled and hugged me and I could tell she was very proud of me and I was a little proud and happy for Jody too.

Well, that's the way it happened; and as I said, I really learned something from that experience. Before we even had our second and third I figured that it really wasn't so bad after all. The whole problem just answered itself, and from that day on I knew that Fatherhood Could be Without Fear.

You see, in this modern generation women are doing practically everything: sword swallowing, wrestling, skywriting—practically everything. So why not let them have the babies?

That's why I can calmly sit here today writing this. Our fourth baby was due yesterday. In front of me is the weather report. It says, "Rain today, tonight and tomorrow." Outside it is a beautiful, sunny day—and my wife, God bless her, is on her fifth lap around the house.

END

Bake the tenderest, most delicious Easter ham you ever tasted . . . seal in natural juices with strong ALCOA WRAP

So strong, a single sheet of regular-weight Alcoa Wrap pulls water skier at 30 mph in Cypress Gardens, Florida

Here's happy Easter eating! Wrap and bake your beautiful ham in strong Alcoa® Wrap that resists splitting and ripping . . . makes the ham so tender . . . seals in luscious flavors and juices. Wrap ham in double-thickness Alcoa Wrap. Fold ends over to tight seal. Bake according to instructions on package. Remove from oven. Fold back foil. Score fat in squares, stick with cloves. Top with brown sugar. Return to oven for 15-20 minutes until sugar-top is crusted and brown.

Alcoa Wrap Available in 3 Sizes:

Regular: 25 feet long, 12 inches wide
Economy: 75 feet long, 12 inches wide
Heavy Duty: 25 feet long, 18 inches wide

"ALCOA THEATRE"—Exciting Adventure ALTERNATE MONDAY EVENINGS

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES SAID:

Why can't somebody give us a list of things that everybody thinks and nobody says, and another list of things that everybody says and nobody thinks?

The great thing in this world is not so much where we stand as in what direction we are moving.

Whatever you may be sure of, be sure of this, that you are dreadfully like other people.

Man's mind, stretched to a new idea, never goes back to its original dimensions.

Knowledge and timber should not be used until they are seasoned.

Quick meal magic!

Just sprinkle in one level teaspoonful! This high-protein, low-calorie Instant Seasoning gives you home-cook thrift with a French-chef flavor. Ideal for you, the family, for company meals.

QUICK N' TASTY SPRING STEW—Simmer in butter two thinly-sliced onions. Add one cup boiling water, and two tsp. Herb-Ox Instant Seasoning for double strength, double deliciousness. Add 1 pkg. frozen mixed vegetables. Cook 10-12 minutes. Thicken with one tsp. cornstarch, or flour mixed with a little cold water. Add one cup cut-up left-over beef or lamb. Heat thoroughly.

Herb-Ox

INSTANT BOUILLON AND SEASONING

FOR FREE SAMPLES of Herb-Ox Instant Bouillon and Seasoning, send to: Dept. LHJ, The Pure Food Company, Mamaroneck, N.Y.

ENJOY "Constant Comment" TEA

At Food Gift & Dept. Stores

fine Ceylon tea with bits of oranges and sweet spice added. "Constant Comment" is the richest, liveliest, most deliciously different tea you've ever tasted. With your family, — your friends — enjoy "Constant Comment" daily.

TOGETHER

For 6 cup sample, send 10c to R. C. Bigelow, Inc., Mills 15 Merwin St., Dept. L-A Norwalk, Conn.

MONEY...

In Your Spare Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
315 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

You Get ALL-YEAR "MOTH INSURANCE"* ©

WITH APEX®

FOR 1¢ A DAY

*You can protect an 84 cu. ft. closet for a whole year with only 1 Apex Closet Protector, refilled every 3 months with 1 lb. of Apex Moth Crystals or Nuggets. Use as directed on label.

APEX MOTH CAKE—2 sizes

NO MOTH HOLES... WHEN YOU USE APEX!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Campfire®

MARSHMALLOWS

Fresh-fluffed to stay soft and tender by Campfire's exclusive hot-whipped process

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes from glare"

LEONARD WARREN
Metropolitan Opera star and R.C.A. recording artist

"Singing under powerful stage lights is tiring to my eyes," says Leonard Warren. "I keep Murine handy in my dressing room. It soothes my eyes in a jiffy." When glare, tension, smoke or dust irritate your eyes, rest them with gentle Murine. It cleanses as well as comforts. Use Murine morning and night. Keeps your eyes feeling clear and bright.

MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES*

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U. S. A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

"I've never talked with a mother who didn't find one child more baffling than another."

What makes a child aggressive?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

GEORGE ZIMBEL

The four-year-old often explains or protests before attacking.

Quite a few mothers have written asking what makes a child aggressive and what to do about it. I think I've been putting it off because there are so many different answers. A lot depends on what you mean by the word. What's disturbing aggressiveness to one parent is healthy animal spirits to another.

Students of education and psychology and medicine often ask, "Is aggression normal?" Everyone is endowed with the mechanism for becoming aggressive under the stress of dangers of various kinds or in response to the hostility of others. The gentlest of mothers will attack a dog that is threatening her child. Kind men can be taught to kill in a wartime army where the alternative is to be killed.

Most psychologists would use the term "normal aggression" to include the drive or forcefulness which ordinary people put into such everyday activities as games and business striving. In this sense there is nothing abnormal about aggression, as long as it is not excessive for the situation.

I believe—like most people in the psychological professions and most parents—that children are born with different amounts of drive or aggressiveness, even though this can be modified a lot by the experiences they have later. Mothers will comment on the greater activity of one baby while in the womb, which continued right on through childhood. It's so apparent that one infant is content and docile from the earliest months, another shows his energeticness and impatience by the time he's a month old—always straining to raise his heavy head on his weak little neck whenever he's awake on his stomach. A couple of months later he's already struggling to pull himself to a sitting position as soon as you take hold of his hands.

It would have been more appropriate to call the docile baby "her" because I have the impression that a larger proportion of the gentle ones are girls.

Normal aggressiveness and the exaggerated forms vary at different stages of development. To me, one of the fascinating things about the first and second years of life is that though a baby has occasional rages, all right, he doesn't usually direct them at other people. Even when he's 1½ years of age and knows just whom he's mad at (when his mother deprives him of something breakable or dangerous) he takes it out on himself and the floor by pounding it with his arms, legs and head. It's as if he has an inborn inhibition against attacking people, which he only gradually overcomes with experience in this harsh world. At six or eight months, when he's miserable with teething and tries to gnaw his crib rail to splinters, he's usually careful not to bite his mother's nipple. If he yields to the temptation occasionally, he can, in most cases, be easily inhibited again by a sharp word or other correction. Young kittens and puppies show the same restraint. They love to play at tearing each other and people's hands to pieces, but they're surprisingly careful not to go too far.

A baby experiments delicately with hurting as he gets to be about a year old. Looking his mother straight in the eye, during a fretful period, he begins pulling at her hair or slowly approaches her cheek with his mouth open. It's as if he feels the impulse to be mean, but knows that his nature disapproves. A sensible mother promptly reminds her baby that she doesn't like it and that it's not allowed, by pulling back and by restraining his hand or mouth if he tries again. Another mother, who is not quite straight in her feelings and who is willing to play the hurt-and-be-hurt game, lets the baby bite and then just looks reproachful, or pretends to whimper. Then the baby, with a slightly sadistic grin, does it a little harder the next time.

You can see that I have a theory that a child under three years doesn't attack very vigorously unless he's encouraged or taught to. Frequently parents complain that their first child at the age of two is incapable of defending himself when other children grab his toy or knock him down. He looks bewildered or cries and runs to his parent. They worry that he's going to be a sissy. By the age of three the parents report, in most cases, that he has learned how to fight back, from bitter experience.

I don't remember ever hearing this complaint about a second child. He has usually taken enough punishment from the jealous first child by fifteen or eighteen months so that he's learned to hang onto his possession like grim death, or whack his brother with it, screaming all the time for whatever help he can get from a parent.

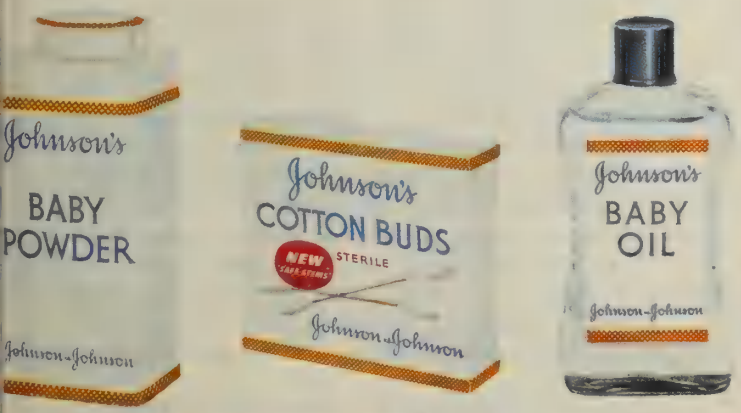
At one or two years of age biting seems to come naturally as a first line of defense or offense, but pushing the opponent over or whacking him with a heavy object is popular too. In other words, the aggression that does come out in earliest childhood is crude and direct. By three or four years of age you begin to see the effects of civilization and maturation. Instead of attacking immediately, kind children will often first ask or explain or protest. More important still is the turning of aggressive feelings into play form. A child will play the cowboy shooting the bad guy, the giant knocking down the house (made of blocks), the cop (on a tricycle) chasing the robber. You might call such play simply the safety valve for hostility, the blowing off of anger he may have accumulated toward his brother or parent. Yet it's also something more important than that. It's practice in controlling his feelings in accordance with the rules of the grown-up world for which he is already developing respect.

Some conscientious parents get this turned around. They try to discourage gun play in the four-to-eight-year-old period, fearing that it might lead to gangsterism or brutality in adult life, whereas it really represents, at this stage, a way station in the progress toward civilization.

The age period between three and six is one in which most children get along relatively well with their parents because they are more aware of how much they love them and want very much to be like them. However, the fact that a boy at this stage normally feels a special romantic and possessive love for his mother—and the girl for her father—makes for an undercurrent of rivalry between boy and father, between girl and mother. In most cases this rivalry does not come to the surface in a dramatic way because the child does his best to suppress it and because the parents maintain a wholesome relationship with each other and with

CONTINUED ON PAGE 48

Special Offer of 3-Dimensional



FAIRY TALE PLAQUES

Created Exclusively for Johnson & Johnson

SET OF 3 ONLY $1.00 ($5 VALUE!)

- 3 fairy tale favorites in 3-D
- Beautifully designed in vivid colors
- Permanent, washable plastic
- Add charm to any wall or room
- Wonderful for gift-giving, too
- Size 8″ by 11″—ready to hang

Johnson & Johnson

Order With This Coupon!

JOHNSON & JOHNSON, P. O. Box 1781, New York 46, N. Y.

Please send me____sets of FAIRY TALE PLAQUES (3 plaques per set). Enclosed is $1.00 for each set. I have just purchased a package of Johnson's Baby_____
(NAME OF PRODUCT)

Name_____
(PLEASE PRINT)

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 46

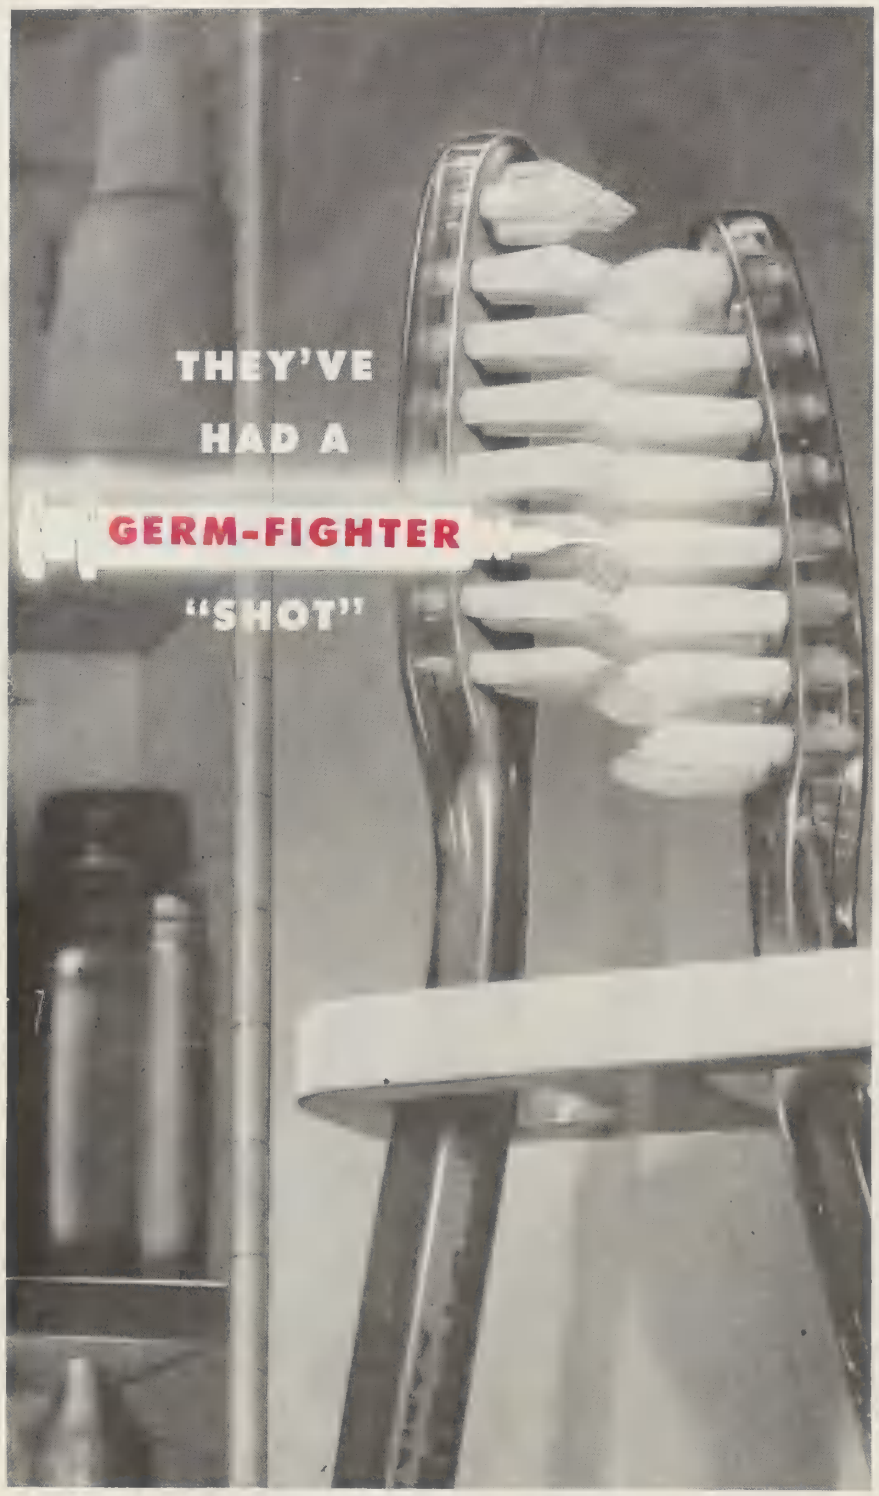
each child, which gives little encouragement to the rivalry. But in a few families where things have got out of balance, the mother may be quite baffled to have her four- or five-year-old daughter become surprisingly antagonistic to her for no apparent reason. (In a similar way during adolescence, which is a stage where rivalry is even more intense, a mother may get the feeling that she's pure poison to her daughter.) The rivalrous antagonism of son to father shows on the surface less frequently because sons seem to be, on the average, more in awe of their fathers than girls are of their mothers.

After the age of eight or nine, the simple play-acting of hostility loses some of its fascination. That's where the comics and TV and movies come in. Westerns and crime stories give full rein to all kinds of imaginary aggressions, and then subject them to the penalty of the law by the end of the episode.

The age period between about six and twelve years is one in which the child's own maturing nature makes him try to subdue the impulses which he feels are wrong. Open expression of hostility, especially toward the parents, comes under strict control, even in play form. A four-year-old boy can point a pretend pistol at his mother and grin while he tells her he's shooting her dead. But by the time he's nine years old his conscience has become so strict that it makes him step over a crack in the sidewalk when such a thought merely pops into his mind.

In this age period a child no longer feels free to attack a brother or sister without provocation. He may be almost as antagonistic underneath as he used to be. But he works into a fight step by step, subtly provoking his opponent to counterattack, so that he is convinced at each stage that he is only standing up for his rights.

Now comes the more complicated matter of what the environment does to change the intensity and the character of aggressiveness. Certainly the most important factor is the fit between the child's nature and the personality of mother and father.



I've pointed out before that parents are obliged to adjust to the child they receive as much as he has to adjust to them. Some parents take much more easily to girls, and others to boys. Some have a knack with roughnecks and others are particularly successful in bringing out a naturally cautious, shy child. I've never talked with a mother who didn't find one child more baffling than another.

Often the baby who is overactive to start with tempts his mother to use methods of handling which increase his overactivity. I think of an energetic 1½-year-old I watched one morning in a park, who occasionally wandered off toward a road or got into other situations which his mother thought dangerous. She kept darting after him and yanking h back to safety. As the morning wore on y could see that he became frantic with her c stant restraint and lost interest in everythi but an obsession to dash away from her a toward the road. Of course you can see h not only an active child and a restraini mother; there was something a little unwho some in her willingness to stay in that spot t two hours (even though she had found a frie to talk to there), letting the situation deter rate into such a frustrating one for her son a herself.

Freud first made clear that a long-draw out toilet-training struggle between moth and child in the period between one and thr years can build a lot of antagonism into child's impressionable character. In a f cases this results in an outwardly aggressi child. More often, the reasonably good re tionship that mother and child have esta lished in other respects, and the fact that values her love and feels guilty in defying h makes him control his hostility (and even ally his bowels). So he is more likely to end with a personality that contains an uncomfo able mixture of too much balkiness and t much guiltiness, rather than an openly host one.

A mother has recently written me about t difficulty she's experiencing bringing up h third child, a boy now four years old. Her fi two were girls, now twenty-four and twen two years old. She found them easy, even f to raise. She remembers no particular pr lems at any time at home. Perhaps we sho take this with a grain of salt, since time dra a rosy curtain. But they must have been g erally well adjusted because they did wond fully in school and college, academically a socially. In the seventeen years that follow the birth of the second girl, the mother fi suspected and then gradually became cert that she wasn't going to have any more ch dren. By the time she was in her forties s was highly satisfied with a life that was fill with social activities and accompanying h husband on business trips to faraway plac They saw their daughters only during va tions and, as most parents of college stude know, not too much then. When her doct told her at forty-two that she was pregna she was at first incredulous, then dismayed a resentful. Being a realistic person, she even ally made the adjustments necessary in h thinking and planning. But in her feelings no matter how much she tried—she ne could become enthusiastic about the comi baby, and this added guiltiness to her oth troubles. The baby turned out to be one those very fretful ones who make the m joyful of mothers feel rejected and irritab As he progressed through infancy it beca

CONTINUED ON PAGE 200

If your toothbrushes touch . . . you need Dr. West's "Germ-Fighters"

The toothbrush that won't pass along germs...

New Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" BRAND

Is the picture above a familiar scene—family toothbrushes touching? Do you use the same toothbrush after a bacterial infection? Then you want the new Dr. West's "Germ-Fighter" Toothbrush. Treated by a special anti-bacterial process*, this toothbrush destroys or inhibits germs that fall on and hold to it—when family toothbrushes touch each other or other objects. It's the toothbrush that won't pass along germs. Does a better cleaning and polishing job on your teeth, too. In adult, youth's and children's sizes.

*Pats. applied for

69¢

Copr. 1958 by Weco Products Co.

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal-zone number in your address when writing us about your present subscription, renewing your subscription,

ordering new subscriptions,

questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines.

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal-zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

You get a Cleaner Wash with CLOROX®

Whitest and Brightest!

Every time you add Clorox to your laundry suds, you add an extra measure of cleanliness. All of your white things... cotton, linen, nylon and rayon... come out extra white! All of your color-fast cottons and linens come out extra bright!

Clorox, you see, bleaches and removes stains far better than any other type of laundering product. No wonder the cleanest wash you can get is a wash that's Clorox-clean!

Safest for Health!

A Clorox-clean wash is sanitary-clean, too! No other bleach... no other laundering product... equals Clorox in germ-killing efficiency.

So, get the good health habit... disinfect your family wash with Clorox every time!

KEEP AN EXTRA BOTTLE HANDY FOR HOUSE CLEANING!

CLOROX®

© 1958, The Clorox Company

Refreshing treat for spring-time breakfasts

Orange Juice Pancakes!...just shake 'em up and pour!

Good morning! Now you can drink your orange juice and have it too—in delicate, orange-flavored Aunt Jemima Buttermilk Pancakes. So easy—and so good! Use the quick shaker method (see package) substituting orange juice for the milk. Shake ten times, pour, and bake golden brown. Serve 'em warm and tender with butter and cinnamon sugar or syrup.

The famous TWO plus one that's NEW

Only Aunt Jemima gives you ALL THREE!

THERE'S MUSIC IN THE AIR . . . in Midland, Michigan

JOE CLARK

Midland, Michigan, may be off the beaten track for touring operas and orchestras, but its concert calendar is full—because people of all ages enjoy making music of their own.

Kiwanis and Youth

By MARGARET HICKEY

From lullabies to folk songs to popular ballads to the great works of classical composers, music touches our lives—and we are richer for it. As this month's story of Midland, Michigan, shows, the chance not only to hear but also to play and sing music makes the world a better place to live in.

Thousands of American youngsters, and some in Canada, too, regularly have this opportunity because of Kiwanis International's long-time program of backing bands, orchestras and choirs for boys and girls throughout the country. In 1957 local clubs assisted some 2815 musical groups, providing funds, business management, equipment and, in some cases, actually leading the group and helping train the children.

In Pasadena, California, members of the local Boys' Club are gleefully tooting and drumming on the old school and college band instruments of Kiwanis members. A local music store helped, too, by putting equipment in tiptop condition without charge. Kiwanis offers rehearsal space and pays for band trips.

In Racine, Wisconsin, Kiwanis came to the rescue of a 75-member Youth Symphony which was foundering in financial difficulties. In the past three years the club has raised $3500 to pay for instruments, sheet music, repairs, insurance and transportation. The young musicians, of elementary-, junior- and senior-high-school age, give public concerts spring and fall, make 30 outside appearances a year at veterans' hospitals, music festivals and Kiwanis meetings.

"Rhythm Aces," in Charles Town, West Va., became friends in Key Club, a Kiwanis-sponsored service organization for high-school boys. They found they liked the same kind of music, started a "combo" on their own. The men's club heard about them and invited them to perform. Since then Kiwanis has lined up other engagements for the Rhythm Aces, and last June took the boys to annual convention in Atlantic City.

Work with boys and girls is the oldest and most important of all Kiwanis community-service activities. Helping them make music is one of the best ways, the organization feels, to combat juvenile delinquency, and it hopes to work ever more closely through music programs with organizations that help "problem people."

"Music encourages an esprit de corps often lacking in our modern society," a Kiwanis spokesman has said. Parents throughout the country agree. In Pikesville, Maryland, grateful mothers and fathers "point to better military-academy and college work and more successful business careers as direct results of Pikesville band membership." END

Jimmy Nelson, aged eight, was sprawled out on the living-room floor studying a map. He knew where to find his home town, Chicago, but now he searched for another town—the one where his family planned to move. "Here it is," he shouted to his father. "Midland, Michigan. But, gosh, it's just a speck. Do you suppose they've got anything interesting to do up there?"

This is a question being asked by increasing numbers of American families moving every year to new and better jobs in far-flung communities. Midland, the home of the laboratories and executive offices of a growing chemical plant, is typical of the towns that are attracting newcomers by the score.

In years past it had never been easy to persuade people to come to live in Midland. And no matter how interesting the job, the company could never be certain they and their families would be content to stay. Located on flat prairie land 120 miles north of Detroit and some 16 miles west of Saginaw Bay, Midland did not get world-famous orchestras and opera companies on tour and it was off the regular road-show circuit. Of course some of the newcomers, scientists and engineers were people wholly absorbed in their work. But others were active, community-minded people who wanted to lead full, well-rounded lives that include the arts as well as specialized jobs. For them Midland spelled isolation.

Today Midland is still isolated geographically, but its cultural reputation is reaching out to prospective new residents. "Sure we're off the beaten track," an old-timer tells them, "but what does it matter after you hear the music we make ourselves?"

The old-timer is referring to Midland's rousing 100-member male chorus, the 75-member girls' chorus, the lilting madrigal singers and the 70-member symphony orchestra, all of whom sing and play throughout the year to thousands of enthusiastic neighbors and friends—and who also provide an incentive for many others to come to Midland to live and work.

It was not always so. Anyone looking for "cultural stimulation" in Midland some years ago was doomed to disappointment. Dr. Vernon Stenger, a research chemist who had once played oboe in the Denver Civic Orchestra, and his wife, a string-bass player, had tried, without success, to get an orchestra started in Midland. Finally they joined one in Saginaw, though it meant a 42-mile trip each week. Earl Pelton, also a research chemist, who plays either viola or violin, can recall that once upon a time, during the '20's, the town's more daring amateurs were able to get together for perhaps one small concert a year—and only occasionally did the audience outnumber the players. "To top it all," he tells you, "we had just one clarinetist. He had strong personal likes and dislikes and the rest of us had to play whatever he told us to."

Singers struggled too. Jack Spencer, a design engineer with a natural bass voice, sang falsetto for years because early choral groups were invariably short of tenors.

And children's music education was sadly neglected. The public-school system had only one music teacher; private teachers could not find enough pupils to keep them busy at the low price of 50 cents a lesson.

The smallness of the town and the lack of cultural activities meant trouble for the big chemical company, which needed more and more highly trained minds as it grew in size and volume of output. Midland has almost inexhaustible underground reservoirs of brine—with high concentrations of bromine, chlorides and other valuable mineral salts. It was only a sleepy village until 1891, when an adventurous young Cleveland chemist by the name of Herbert H. Dow took over an old salt well and began pumping the brine. He began by producing bromine, later manufactured chlorine bleach and other commercial chemicals. Eventually the company branched into production of organic chemicals, became a leader in the development of synthetic resins, and today manufactures hundreds of products.

The impetus for a new music program came one Sunday in 1936 when a small male chorus gave a short program at the First Presbyterian Church. Leland Ira Doan, then vice president and secretary of the chemical company, was in the audience. He liked what he heard and it gave him an idea.

The next day at the office he called in one of the company salesmen, Frank Whaley, whom he had heard sing in that chorus. "What would you think of starting a chorus right here at the plant, Frank?" Mr. Doan asked.

"I think it would be great," the surprised salesman said. "When do we start?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 55

Exciting Discovery from Betty Crocker

OF GENERAL MILLS

NEW Golden-Fry BATTER RECIPE

- "Thin" batter coats foods evenly . . . golden-browns evenly
- Fries foods crispier outside, juicier inside
- Keeps foods crisp, even in a warm oven
- No "transfer" of flavors from one food to another
- Fries everything better . . . meats, fish, vegetables . . . and even fruits!

Never before suc

Get lighter...juicie now with ne

GOLD MEDAL FLOUR AND MAZOLA CORN OIL BRING YOU THIS DELICATE BATTER RECIPE

Now! A new, easier way to deep-fry, guaranteed to please by Betty Crocker! This new GOLDEN-FRY BATTER is a "mix-quick and dip" thin batter that really stays on foods, sealing in all their natural juices and flavor.

It fries even, golden-brown, crunchy-crisp. Foods stay crispy-tender and delicious, too, even when kept warm in your oven. And you can fry different foods together without a transfer of flavors.

What a wonderful way to perk Lenten meals! Try shrimp, scall oysters, fish fillets! Chicken, lunch meats, cutlets, cocktail snacks! O rings, cauliflower, eggplant! Pineap bananas, strawberries! Such a quic easy way to make any food fabul Try GOLDEN-FRY BATTER today elicious fried foods !

crispier fried foods
Golden-Fry Batter

For crispier, juicier fried foods

Golden-Fry Batter

1/2 cup MAZOLA Corn Oil — 1 1/2 cups milk
1 cup sifted GOLD MEDAL Flour — 1 egg

Blend oil and flour. Add milk and egg. Beat with rotary beater until smooth. Batter will be thin. Dry food thoroughly; then coat generously with unseasoned flour. Dip into batter, letting excess drip off. Fry in Mazola (375°) 3 to 4" deep until golden brown. (Use chickens 2½ lb. or under; fry until tender.) Drain on absorbent paper, season, serve.

You CAN WIN FRENCH'S FRESH-START

1ST PRIZE—YOUR DEBTS PAID PLUS $10,000 NEST EGG
2ND PRIZE—YOUR DEBTS PAID PLUS $5,000 NEST EGG
3RD PRIZE—YOUR DEBTS PAID PLUS $1,000 NEST EGG

PLUS 200 4TH PRIZES—SUNBEAM AUTOMATIC FRYPANS

Out of Debt Cash in the Bank

Make all your dreams come true! Win French's Fresh-Start Contest and free yourself of money worries! These are only some of the debts covered: Home mortgage! Or a year's rent! Repair bills, property taxes! Time payments for automobile, appliances and furniture! Medical and dental bills! Plus current bills for food, fuel, utilities, and clothing! French's Mustard pays your debts of record as of February 28, 1958 up to a maximum of $30,000.00.

For a complete list of debts, contest details, and rules, pick up a convenient entry blank at your food store today!

How To Win—It's Easy!

1 Here's all you need to do: Try the two French's Mustard recipes on the opposite page. In 25 words or less, tell which one you like best and give reasons for your choice.

Special tip on writing your entry: you really need to try and taste these two new recipes in order to write your answer! The special quality of French's Mustard gives these foods a wonderful new Light and Lively flavor you can't describe until you taste them.

2 Write your entry on one side of any handy sheet of paper—or use the convenient entry blank which you can get at your food store. Just be sure to print your name and address clearly, and mail entries to French's Mustard, Box 90, Mount Vernon 10, N. Y.

3 No limit to number of entries you can send. Enter as often as you wish. Entries must be postmarked on or before midnight May 17, 1958, and received by May 23, 1958. Only first three winners' debts will be requested and they will be kept confidential.

HURRY! HURRY! this GREAT FRENCH'S MUSTARD CONTEST CLOSES MIDNIGHT, MAY 17, 1958

RECIPES FOR FRENCH'S FRESH-START CONTEST

FRENCH'S SAUCEWICH

1 tall can evaporated milk ⅓ cup ketchup or tomato paste
⅓ cup French's Mustard

Scald milk in double boiler. Thoroughly blend ketchup and mustard into milk. Serve hot on toasted or grilled sandwiches, closed or open-faced or on toasted English muffins. Some Sauce-and-filling variations: 1) Add tuna to Sauce, serve on toast, 2) Add deviled or ground ham, pour over poached egg on toasted English muffin, 3) Add grated cheese, cover 'burger on bun.

CONTEST

CROWN O'GOLD MEAT LOAF

Meat Loaf
1½ cups fine soft bread crumbs
1½ lbs. ground lean chuck beef
4 egg yolks, 1½ tsps. salt
2 tbsps. French's Mustard
1½ tbsps. prepared horseradish
3 tbsps. finely diced green pepper
2 tbsps. French's Minced Onion
⅓ cup ketchup

Topping
4 egg whites
¼ tsp. French's Cream Tartar
4 tbsps. French's Mustard

Mix bread crumbs with meat. Combine other ingredients. Blend into meat mix. Pack into 9-inch casserole; bake in moderate oven (325°) 30 min. Beat egg whites until foamy; add cream tartar; beat until very stiff. Fold in mustard gently. Swirl on hot meat; bake 20 to 25 min. or till tipped with brown. 6-8 servings.

French's own mustard recipe for a Light and Lively flavor calls for rare spices, specially grown mustard seeds, and fine vinegar. No wonder more women use it than any other!

On food...
In food...

no other mustard has the light and lively flavor of

FRENCH'S MUSTARD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

Within the hour Frank Whaley was tacking up notices on bulletin boards, fellow employees were passing the word at water coolers and at noon in the lunchroom. At auditions the following week, bass Jack Spencer was pleased to see that he could at last button his collar and sing in natural voice again. The new chorus organized with 40 members, scheduled its rehearsals in the company cafeteria or auditorium, and when necessary in the lobby. Company president Dr. Willard H. Dow often stayed around for rehearsals, was surprised to find that men who worked hard during the day got such keen pleasure from a leisure-time activity which itself involved exacting work. Within a short time he authorized hiring of a part-time director.

Company employees were not the only ones who enjoyed the chorus. Members of the community came to hear them sing and to applaud. And some began to ask, "Can't we sing with you—or is this just a 'company chorus'?"

In 1943 the president called in his director of technical employment. "We're starting a music department," he said matter-of-factly. "I want you to go out and find a full-time musical director." An unprecedented assignment at a chemical company it was. But the community wanted music, and in time the names of four conductors were presented to the chorus to "audition." Their final choice was a man who was a violinist as well as possessor of a fine tenor voice and who thus could help organize a new orchestra—Dr. Theodore Vosburgh, head of musical activities at Albion College.

At first there wasn't even a place to put a desk for the new musical director except in the already overworked and noisy auditorium. But Dr. Vosburgh turned out to be the kind of man who never sat down. Stocky, bright-eyed, a voluble talker, he "bounced like a rubber ball," as Frank Whaley puts it, visiting every department, every corner of town, including the public schools. He wanted to meet the men and women he expected to work with; he wanted to know what they were like, what they did for a living, and he wanted them to get to know him. Most of all he wanted to stir up parents and teachers to bring music into the lives of Midland children. "We must have a good supply of young musicians to keep our music alive," he told them.

Dr. Vosburgh's zest for his work, his warm friendliness, soon melted the coolness of executives and overcame the shy reserve of by-the-hour employees. When he announced auditions for a male chorus of 100 voices, he was swamped by applications. Hardly had these auditions ended when he next called for tryouts for a symphony orchestra and a girls' chorus.

Before long he was "Ted" to everyone—and still bouncing from rehearsal to meeting and back to rehearsal. He never overlooked a chance to recruit a new musician. On one occasion he called at the home of a tenor-saxophone player whose name another orchestra member had given him. Not only did Dr. Vosburgh persuade the man to join the orchestra—he also talked him into giving up the tenor sax and taking up the bassoon! Even people who couldn't play wanted to join. One young doctor was so caught up by Ted's enthusiasm he arranged to take viola lessons in Pittsburgh—to which he commuted in his own plane.

Whole families took up music. Arthur J. Barry, who joined the male chorus, and his wife, a charter member of the girls' chorus, soon had their daughters practicing on the cello and the piano and also joining with the choruses at festival and oratorio time. Friends of the family began dropping by even more often than usual for impromptu concerts at the Barry home.

Dr. Vosburgh kept his eye on every detail of the music making. At breaks during early male-chorus rehearsals he noticed that hourly employees would gather in groups around the soft-drink machines, too shy to speak with scientists, engineers and executives—though all were fellow members of the chorus. Ted Vosburgh made a mental note to do something about that.

As time for the first public performance drew near, Director Vosburgh announced that he expected the entire chorus to wear tuxedos at the concert. Then he waited for the uproar to die down. "We can't go out and buy a 'monkey suit' just to sing in," a foreman shouted. Everyone agreed. But Ted had anticipated this. "Anyone who needs a suit can buy one from me," he said, "and all it will cost is two dollars." He led them to a closet where he had collected trousers and jackets from owners around town who no longer wanted them. All had been cleaned and reconditioned.

Almost at that moment all class consciousness vanished, as Ted had hoped it would. From then on every singer began to call the others by first name.

By 1948 the music program was big enough for a building of its own. Every time there was a last-minute change in time and place of rehearsal, Ted Vosburgh had to get word out to 50 or more people scattered all over town. So quietly he began to scout around. He knew what he wanted, and he found it in an abandoned church on State Street, just two blocks from the plant. In it he could envisage an auditorium, large and small practice rooms and office-studios (all thoroughly sound insulated), and a kitchen for snacks during and after late rehearsals. Upon his recommendation the company bought and remodeled it.

> If we accept democracy, we must accord to everyone the right to think, speak and publish his sentiments on every subject; and in that case we must indeed be prepared to take the consequences, whatever they may turn out to be. CARL L. BECKER
> Freedom and Responsibility in the American Way of Life
> Published by Alfred Knopf, Inc.

Today the music building serves as headquarters for a group of madrigal singers, a small band and several other small instrumental and singing groups—as well as the established choruses and orchestra. Its music library is open to anyone with an interest in music. In all some 500 adults take part in the different activities in the building. During a typical season the men's chorus, girls' chorus and orchestra give about 17 performances in Midland and 13 away from home, in addition to the annual spring festival and the annual operetta.

Through free-will offerings at concerts the community provides cash scholarships for Midland's young people. Every March nearly 200 teen-age students gather in the music building to compete for scholarships to either a free summer course at Interlochen Music Camp or free lessons from a local teacher. In twelve years, $42,000 worth of music scholarships have been given to 249 young people. A number of parents have been so pleased by this incentive to study that they have secretly returned the money won by their youngsters for the benefit of more needy students.

Another outcome of the Midland music program has been growing interest in music in the public schools. Where once schools employed only one music teacher, they now hire fourteen. The senior high school and the two junior high schools have bands, orchestras, almost every kind of music group that can be fitted into the curriculum—and principals report that more and more students are entering college as music majors.

Midland, the town where once four private music teachers couldn't get pupils even at 50 cents a lesson, now has 30 teachers—who are turning away pupils. Everyone, from the fifth-grade drummer boy to a grandmotherly hi-fi fan, is music-conscious. Music is so taken for granted that occasionally Midlanders have to leave town to realize how much it has meant to them—as did Harry Cloft, an insurance salesman, and his family. "We soon found out—after spending four years in another city," Mr. Cloft, who neither sings nor plays an instrument, now tells Ted Vosburgh. "And we just had to come back." END

"Our thoughts and ideas are so different—even after ten years we have nothing in common."

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

ARE CHILDREN ENOUGH?

"There is no counselor to whom I can turn, and I need help. My husband is 32, I'm 28. We have been married ten years and have two children, the younger in the first grade. They are our only common interest. He says this is enough, but is it?

"I like to read and listen to music, to walk and go on picnics. He only likes to watch movies or television or occasionally to bowl. Our thoughts and ideas are so different. I never let him know how I feel or say anything to cause conflict. I avoid quarrels because he always loses his temper. I've kept mine so long I don't feel anything or any way toward him. I simply try to please him and to share with the children instead of with him.

"My husband is jealous, though I've never really given him any reason to be. I have looked longingly at another man, but that sort of thing is not for me. He doesn't even like for me to visit girl friends.

"I carry all the responsibilities except making the living. (He provides well for all of us.) I make most of the decisions, since he says whatever I want is all right with him, and he says our marriage is perfect. But he must know that I'm not happy.

"I feel the need of counseling because I need aid in accepting a situation that I doubt can be improved."

Many wives in their late twenties are troubled by vague dissatisfaction, especially if they married quite young. If there are no more than two children, as in this case, they are probably now in school, and no longer provide constant companionship and occupation. The wife suddenly has considerable free time, and may not know what to do with it. On the other hand, if there are several small children at home, she may have too much to do, and too little opportunity for adult society.

The combination of loneliness and boredom (whether from too little to do or too much of the same repetitive routine) is sure to result in discontent. But the difficulties will ease with time. Meanwhile, if the husband and wife have developed a close personal relationship, his understanding and companionship will compensate her for temporary discomfort.

But there is nothing to indicate that this wife has achieved such a relationship with her husband. Unlike most such letters, hers makes no mention of affection for her husband, now or when she married him. In fact, she reveals as much by what she does not say as by her specific complaints.

She apparently takes little interest in his work, for she doesn't mention it, except as the source of a good income. Finally, and significantly, though she says that the children are their only common interest, this interest seems to be separately pursued, rather than shared. She says as much: "I share with the children instead of with him." In forming the family circle, she has not drawn her husband within.

Her doubts must be resolved, her dissatisfaction relieved, or her marriage will be in real danger. At any time, another man (or another woman) may come along and precipitate a crisis. Passive acceptance of a situation which she doubts can be improved will be of little value, for unless it is improved, it will deteriorate. And she must accept the responsibility for seeking the improvement.

The crucial issue, basically, is whether the wife really wants to improve her marriage. If she does, then she must start by deepening and strengthening her relationship with her husband. Only she knows all the facts and is able to analyze them. Once she does this, she will know how to proceed. But any plans must be related to these points.

Her reasons for saving the marriage must be specific, concrete, and must take into account her selfish needs and wants as well as the family welfare, if she is to make a genuine effort. One way for any wife to evaluate her situation is to visualize what her life would be like if her marriage were suddenly to end.

Her feelings must be expressed. Deep emotions, whether of love or anger, joy or sorrow, require expression. When they have long been restrained ("I never let him know how I feel") a deliberate effort must be made to cultivate spontaneity. There need be little fear that emotions will get out of hand; the real threat here is that the brakes will not loosen. This wife needs to talk and laugh freely, occasionally to cry or even lose her temper if she feels like it. Minor conflicts are less to be feared than total lack of communication.

She must learn to share, and she can do so through their common interest in the children. If he is a loving father, he will want to take part in family outings and projects. Gradually, as she tells him of the children's triumphs and disappointments, of her plans and hopes for their future, she will find it natural and easy to confide in him on other matters as well. From their shared concern for home and family, other mutual goals and interests will surely develop.

What this wife really needs (like every human being) is to feel loved. But to receive love, she must learn to give it, fully and freely. She and her husband may never achieve the high excitement of intense romance. But with all that is in their favor they can build a rewarding relationship founded on affection, understanding and companionship.

They have lived together for ten years without serious conflict. The husband has earned a good living, is devoted to the children, loyal to his wife, and even assures her he is contented with their marriage. Many wives would be happy with far less.

WHY ARE HUSBANDS UNFAITHFUL?

"When our club meets, we often discuss your JOURNAL page. There are twenty of us, all old friends, married at least ten years, and now between 30 and 40 years old. At our last meeting, the subject of chastity after marriage came up and many different views were expressed. Some of us felt pretty disturbed and upset, and I was appointed to ask you to write an article that would set us straight on our views.

"Some said they would not tolerate a husband's infidelity and would demand a divorce if such a thing happened; most said they would be terribly hurt. But one woman argued that if a husband went astray it could only mean that his wife was not affectionate. Naturally, this produced loud protests. Another said there were cases where a wife was affectionate and the husband loved her and showed it but still played around. Several of us have husbands who must travel for weeks at a time on business. Even though men get lonely away from home, is it right for them to turn to another woman?

"Why do husbands become unfaithful? I think there are many wives besides our club members who could benefit from your article. I have never had such a problem myself, but in this day and age it can happen to anybody."

At the outset, it must be clear to every reader that morally and Biblically, infidelity or extramarital intercourse is always condemned. In nearly all civilized societies, for a married person to have intercourse with anybody except the lawful spouse is regarded as both sinful and illegal. Yet the problem persists. Kinsey reported that 50 per cent of husbands had been unfaithful by the time they reached age 40. Other investigators have reported an even higher proportion of husbands admitting a desire, at one time or another, to engage in extramarital intercourse.

Why do husbands become unfaithful? There is no single answer. A major reason is undoubtedly the desire for variety and new or different experience. But this is often so trivial as to be unimportant to husbands who are happily married and sexually well adjusted.

Probably a tenth of all husbands are "scofflaws." They like to break the rules of society and take pride in getting away with infractions, whether moral or legal.

A husband who would remain faithful under favorable circumstances may yield to the wrong combination. Absence from home, strong temptation and easy opportunity, immoderate drinking, a violent quarrel, a wife's illness may be responsible for the first lapse.

There is no way in which a wife can certainly prevent her husband's infidelity. But there is much she can do to minimize the likelihood. In general, of course, she will do her utmost to achieve a happy marriage and a close relationship with her husband, physically as well as spiritually. More specifically, she can avoid the errors of behavior and attitude often associated with a husband's unfaithfulness. She will not be:

The wife who blames her husband for sexual dissatisfaction, or who casts reflections on his manhood.

The wife who is unresponsive or sexually cold.

The wife who frequently avoids or evades intercourse.

The wife who is repulsed by what seem to her unorthodox techniques.

The jealous and possessive wife who demands much affection but shows little interest in sex.

This is not an attempt to set the club members "right in their views," nor is it a brief for the philandering male. It is merely an attempt to set forth some of the facts, to help these and other women form opinions based on understanding, not prejudice. Then perhaps they will be less upset by the threat of infidelity, better prepared to act with wisdom and tolerance if unhappily it should come.

DO YOU AGREE?

Should married couples sleep in single or double beds?

Either as long as they mutually agree; if not agreed, then single beds in same room usually work out best.

ASK YOURSELF:

What Should a Girl's Standards Be?

Whatever your age, answer these questions as you think they should be answered by a girl 17 to 20 years old.

Do You Think it is Wrong To:

1. Go to movies on Sunday?
2. Swear explosively or frequently?
3. Dislike persons who are in authority?
4. Engage in social drinking?
5. Have doubts about religion?
6. Read fiction dealing in sex?
7. Criticize one's parents?
8. Marry somebody of a different religion?
9. Drink heavily once or twice a month?
10. Have friends of lower moral standards?
11. Tell a lie for selfish gain?
12. Date a man that parents disapprove?
13. Pet when going steady?
14. Think quite often about sex?

The average girl of 17 to 20 answers 7 or 8 questions "Yes." But the average mother of a girl this age answers "yes" to 11 or 12. Obviously, this means that there will be considerable disagreement in many individual cases. Unless a mother and daughter can discuss standards of behavior calmly and reasonably, conflict between them is inevitable. Even though such discussions may not resolve all the differences, they will lead to closer understanding between mother and daughter.

Emotional Tensions

drain your skin of beauty oils—every day

Skin authorities say the emotional tensions of your daily life can actually drain your skin of its own beauty-giving fluids. That's why by evening, your skin looks drawn and dry and lifeless.

The baby balks at breakfast

The cookies burn to a crisp

Jackie lassos the lamp

. . . As your nerves tie in knots!

Now– Pond's Cold Cream replaces the beauty oils that tension drains away

You look lovelier—feel lovelier!
So delightfully soothing!—you'll love the cool refreshing touch of Pond's on your tired skin.

As you cream and cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream, tautness slips away. Dry tension lines fade. Your skin softens, a lovely glow lights your face.

Deep-Cleanses to let beauty oils in
This is the wonderful beauty-lift waiting for you in Pond's exclusive "beauty-oil" formula! As it deep-cleanses, Pond's releases rich, softening oils deep into your thirsty skin. And quickly it responds. Smooths out. Wakes to radiant life! He'll notice the lovely difference, too, when you're close enough to kiss!

You need never be too busy to be beautiful. Let Pond's Cold Cream work this magic for you—tonight.

Today—in 37 seconds—bring out the beauty that is naturally yours

You need never be too busy to be beautiful

ADAM

Strong man with a weakness for beauty.

EVE

Utterly feminine with a flair for fashion.

MOJUD hosiery

The fashion that turns a leg into a legend!

MOJUD®
HOSIERY

division of Chester H. Roth Co., Inc., Licensed Manufacturer ®

WIN A EUROPEAN VACATION FOR TWO in MOJUD'S "FAMOUS PAIRS" GIVEAWAY!

FLY SABENA BELGIAN WORLD AIRLINES TO THE BRUSSELS WORLD'S FAIR, AND THEN TO THE "HEART-OF-PARIS" BY GIANT S-58 HELICOPTER. ALL EXPENSES PAID! NOTHING TO BUY! NOTHING TO DO! HUNDREDS OF OTHER VALUABLE PRIZES! GET ENTRY BLANKS AT YOUR LOCAL MOJUD HOSIERY DEALER.

Contest subject to all Federal, State and Local regulations.

OUR READERS WRITE US

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

a curious projection of time, each child seemed to assume for the moment the mien of the woman she would become.

Then, in the morning, as I escorted one of the campers down the valley, the naked trees revealed an unbroken rim of sky banded by an incredible scarlet. In the deep hollow beneath the bridge there were the myriad rustlings of wind-scattered leaves and small animals. Overhead a great owl flapped its wings and glided into the deeper woods. It was an interval of pure adventure and mystery.

On Sunday as we trudged up our own steps, Jenny smiled at me with a wealth of love and pride. "I'll never forget the wonderful time we had," she said. Even now I can't remember what small tasks or pleasures were sidetracked so that I could spend that weekend with the girls but, like Jenny, I know that I will remember it as long as I live.

It is rapidly becoming a matter of self-congratulation to be able to deliver a positive "No" when approached for participation in service activities. By phone, letter and in person we are bombarded with requests for our assistance with community, school, club, political and welfare projects; and even the most conscientious person cannot hope to accede to every request and do an adequate job. Often, however, women feel justified in exempting themselves from service activities by claiming that their lives are already spent in service to their families. But the things we do for our husbands and children we do for ourselves. Our families are a part of our own lives, their interests an extension of our interests.

It is also natural, of course, to hesitate at undertaking a new job. Doubt of one's abilities, self-consciousness, small idiosyncrasies are common stumbling blocks. But the field of public service often can afford the opportunity of conquering them.

A friend called on me to ask that I help with an Easter party at the home for blind women. I was greatly interested in the plan and I explained that blindness had always been appalling to me, that I couldn't be with a blind person without a horrible feeling of guilt that I should have the gift of sight he had been denied.

My friend heard me out. "Listen," she said wearily. "Some other time I'll sympathize with all your little quirks and foibles. Right now I need help. Twenty blind women are looking forward to this party and so far all I've produced in the way of a committee is a bunch of excuses."

I went to the party. For hours I guided presents into seeking hands, greeted guests, poured coffee and carried trays. Then we finished off the evening with a sturdy old hymn. With the last notes I looked down to discover that I was holding a songbook in company with a tiny silver-haired old lady. At my murmured exclamation she explained that for each song I had turned the pages and then held out the book for her to share. She had played right along with me, taking the book and pretending to read the words although she couldn't see a thing. It was the best joke on me, she said. She began to laugh. Others joined in and presently I laughed too. It was honest happy laughter that dispersed any lingering taint of guilt. When I left, the women thanked me for helping with their party, but I knew the real gratitude was due to them for teaching me that physical blindness need not mean blindness of the spirit. How close I came to denying myself the chance to learn that.

As long as an elderly person waits in vain for a visitor to appear at his door, as long as a child lies in a hospital bed yearning for a comforting hand, as long as workers are needed to support the charitable organizations and institutions, so long should each of us give himself the chance to serve.

Sincerely,
VALERIA WINKLER GRIFFITH

Altar-Rug Designers

Hudson, Ohio

Dear Sirs: The high-altar rug in the National Cathedral (shown in January JAT) is truly a "beautiful labor of love" by the twenty-two women who did superb work in this needlework project.

But who are the persons who created the rug, planned the design, color and stitches so that when those twenty-two pieces were sewn together there would be no flaws in the picture "stained-glass window"? They must be persons of great skill and talent.

Respectfully,
LAURA P. NEWBOLT

▶ The very skilled designers of the rug are the Misses Tebbetts, whose needlepoint studio is in Kent, Connecticut. ED.

That's the Idea, Men!

Victoria, B.C.

Dear Editors: After chuckling over your picture of the sleeping males in your December issue, I would like to show you the tradition that stands supreme in our family on Christmas Day.

Men at work.

We weren't actually sleeping, but were definitely resting in the front room.

Sincerely,
MRS. ROBERT G. SINNAMON

P.S. May I introduce my husband and our two sons-in-law?

Journal in Brazil . . .

São Paulo, Brazil

Dear Ladies' Home Journal: Last year we packed our four small sons into an airplane to come to Piracicaba, where my husband is teaching at the Agriculture School for six months.

The Brazilian people received us with such warmth that we began to love it here immediately. And almost the first question a Brazilian woman asked me was, "Do you read the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL?" It is very expensive here, but they buy it and read it from cover to cover.

When I try to cook a meal here, using the recipes in the magazine, I realize what marvels these must seem to Brazilians. We have no frozen foods, handy packaging, prepared mixes, and very few canned foods. So many wonderful recipes call for canned mushroom soup, cream cheese, potato chips, marshmallows or cottage cheese! Even so, the JOURNAL is my cookbook, and I am becoming very clever substituting fresh pineapple and papaya and coconut milk. And we are enjoying all of Brazil: the people, the lizards that walk on our ceiling at night, the vultures that roost on our roof, and the brilliant butterfly that dances by like a living flame.

The JOURNAL to me is a message from home; to the Brazilians, a tale of miracles. We love you!

Sincerely,
ALICE DELWICHE

. . . And in Kenya

Nairobi, Kenya, Africa

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: I must tell you how much the JOURNAL is appreciated here in Kenya. My copy goes the round of my friends and is eagerly read by the neighbors. I usually get it back in a rather tattered condition, since most of the pictures of frocks are cut out for the local Indian tailor to copy.

We simply love Munro Leaf. Is it possible to get a copy of his "This Is a Tub-Ringer"? I cut it out years ago, and pasted it up in the bathroom, but it is a bit splashed now. The native servants understand pictures, and clean the bath far better than if I shouted at them.

Sincerely,
DOROTHY STEELE

DuBarry COLOR GLO

© 1958 RICHARD HUDNUT

A new idea in hair coloring! It's fun, fast, foolproof ... washes right out with your next shampoo!

Color Glo is for you. It's new! Not a rinse, not a dye, not a color shampoo. It's a fabulous foam. Just pour it on, foam it in and that's it. Natural-looking, silken color that won't rub off — will wash out when you shampoo! And the colors! Blond's brilliant. Black's burnished. Red's radiant. And grey is pure shimmering silver! After your next shampoo, foam fabulous color into your hair with new DuBarry Color Glo!
Six sensational shades, 1.50 plus tax.

New Palmolive gives

New Life to Your Complexion Safely... Gently!

Palmolive's Rich Lather Contains –

No drying detergents!

No harsh perfumes!

No irritating deodorants!

You can give your complexion new life—leave it softer, fresher—with New Palmolive care!

And you'll see results after just a few days—as New Palmolive care gently washes away dirt and make-up . . . cleanses so effectively it actually gives your complexion NEW LIFE!

New Palmolive's rich, mild lather lets you cleanse far more thoroughly than you'd dare to do with harsher soaps. Palmolive contains no drying detergents, no strong perfumes, no irritating deodorants—just the gentlest of natural cleansing ingredients. So get that "new life" look with gentle New Palmolive Soap!

All New! lather fragrance color wrapper

JOURNAL

EDITED BY: JEAN ANDERSON - ABBOT MILLS - EILEEN SHARPE - GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

ABOUT TOWN

WHAT WE DO
WHERE WE GO
WHOM WE MEET

FRED FEHL

Helen Hayes and cover girl Susan onstage.

50 years ago in the Journal

In April, 1908, you could travel steerage from New York to Italy for $12. Cuddle Up a Little Closer was popular but unfeasible if the lady wore one of the new soaring bird-and-flower-decked Merry Widow bonnets. Autos were excluded from Nantucket, and a fire in Chelsea, Massachusetts, made 10,000 people homeless.

"There is a little saying among men which it may be well for girls to remember," admonishes Editor Bok in the April, 1908, JOURNAL. "It is: 'The thinner the shirtwaist, the commoner the girl.'"

"The $1500 bungalow" featured in this issue "is built of clapboards stained a rich brown and has five rooms and a bath."

The New Method to Keep Us Well, as related by Dr. Richard Newton, was to sleep in ventilated rooms. He decries the American custom of keeping all bedroom windows tightly shut and says, "I know of a little girl, three years old, the daughter of well-to-do parents in New York State, who has never slept in a house. She is as large and strong as a child of six."

To escape spring house cleaning: "Clean one room thoroughly each week, washing windows, curtains, woodwork, bedspreads, etc."

Beauty hint: "Before working in the garden or doing other rough work, rub your fingernails over a piece of soap to prevent dirt from getting under the nails."

"Louisa: When yawning bothers you, go to bed at half past eight every night for two weeks."

"When building a house, consider your wife carrying three hods of coal a day when you plan the distance between the range and coal bin. And why don't you knock your parlor into your living room, get a big room out of the two, and put your 'best things' into your daily life?" architect George Edward Barton urges Journal readers.

"Is it true short sleeves won't be worn this summer during the hot weather?" asks a wistful reader. "True," confirms the Journal. "Have your sleeves three-quarter or a fitted full length."

Fashion accessories: "A black ostrich-feather boa with two long silk tassels, back and front. . . . Bronze slippers with stockings to match. . . . Stiff linen stock collars, four inches high, embroidered with eyelet."

Susan Strasberg became our cover girl (April 1956) modeling a John Frederics hat for Wilhela Cushman. Now she's playing the role of a milliner in the current Broadway hit "Time Remembered"—partly because she loves hats so, partly because she adores Helen Hayes, who also stars. "Do you know," nineteen-year-old Susie told us, "that I made a hat once? A navy velvet cloche with a big bunch of grapes? It was really pretty . . . and I absolutely hate to sew!" Of her Easter bonnet she says, "No flowers this year. Feathers maybe, but no flowers." She eats an orchid in the play, a big purple one. Curious, we asked the obvious: How does an orchid taste? "Good, really. Bittersweet."

ABBOT MILLS

Tina tries skits with Zel.

We thought we heard a duckling talk, here in the Workshop. So we looked around, and there was Zel de Cyr, a multivoiced actress, doing animal imitations for Tina Fredericks. Radio uses her often, because she can also impersonate boys, girls, irate housewives ("Henry, I told you"), sexy debutantes ("low breathy voice—as if you weren't awake"), and even her cough was voted by a medical group "most convincing." "It's all character identification," she was saying. "I can't even sing unless a part calls for it." It seems Tina goes to an exercise class on lunch hour, met Zel there. "And I knew she had talent," Tina was telling us later, "because all through calisthenics the rest of us groan in an offhand way, but Zel puts real emotion into it."

"The new movie 'Witness for the Prosecution' is sensational," Nancy Wood reports. "Marlene Dietrich wears a slinky-looking beige hat and suit, and when the movie was over and I turned around, there was Marlene, with Noel Coward, and she was wearing what looked like the same outfit." Was it? Nancy asked. The answer: no, but the same kind, a Dietrich favorite and one reason she enjoyed her role in the suspense story. It's a brilliant chiller.

"Busman's holiday," explained Liane Waite, of the Food Department, going to a gala gathering of good cooks at the Coliseum. The eighty-ninth Salon of Culinary Art was in session, and amateurs and professionals could drop in to create "whole table or individual masterpieces." So the exhibit tables were filled with cakes three feet tall, flowered hams, salmon in aspic, candied houses. Liane cautiously refused some "Caterine de Medici pie," and, still on her feet, sampled some prize-winning cakes baked by the U. S. Navy. Can't wait till next year, she said. "But you have to enter as 'classical, practical or artistic,' so now I'll have to analyze my category." We left her looking thoughtful.

Remember the snapshot we ran on this page last June which William Holden sent to Peter Briggs from Burma—of Bill with his head in an elephant's mouth? We mention it again only because the movie Bill was then making in Burma has been chosen by the Workshop's first-line-film-tester team as the best big picture of the whole past year—The Bridge on the River Kwai (one-a-day, all seats reserved, priced up to $4, and way longer than most Broadway plays). It'll get around eventually, so start saving up for all its good ingredients—a story of British-army prisoners matching wits with their Japanese captors against unbelievable Burmese backgrounds, with jungle commandos led by luscious Ceylonese bearers, just the right amount of amour, and only one American, a Navy man, the best of all, played by Holden. And without once putting his head in an elephant's mouth, you'll be glad to hear.

Joe Di Pietro believes in authentic photos all the way. So while in California, photographing police sergeant Jack Shaw for this month's How America Lives feature, Joe joined in cruising on the trail of criminals. First caught: three delinquents who stole $1000 worth of band instruments. Next job was chasing speeders. Joe complimented his host on not hiding the prowl car behind billboards, and came back with our safety thought of the year. Said Jack: "Anybody who speeds is so dumb you don't have to outwit him."

We wanted to pass along a story from HUGH KAHLER, whose secretary called his favorite New York restaurant for a reservation.

"Hello," said secretary on phone. "Is this Louis XIV?"

"Speaking," answered the voice on the other end.

Outside our Workshop windows these balmy April days, our own garden expert, Richard Pratt, can look down at 1000 Easter lilies, followed by 3000 hyacinths, then 2250 tulips, all put in by eight gardeners who work for Rockefeller Center. They till 4½ acres of street and roof garden, have 150 trees, tend pools and waterfalls, and fight crab grass on the 11th- and 70th-floor roofs. Is big-city gardening easy? No, say the gardeners. Romantic young men pick flowers for girls. Pigeons eat ivy. Someone once put soap powder in Prometheus' fountain, so that he was blowing bubbles. "We don't want to encourage those things," said the Center. We promised not to. And still we like to reflect that in the fires of spring the city has a fling, and we look down joyously at everything green and growing amid our city stone.

ABBOT MILLS

Wendy, Nancy: calories via Casey Jones.

The editors' children's corner: Small Journalites lunching out with their mothers all want to go to the Hamburger Train down the block. Nora O'Leary's Wendy and Nancy, for instance, can perch on stools, place orders, and have a miniature railroad chug up the counter. Nora tells us that a cheeseburger borne to you by engine, flatcars and caboose carries rollicking adventure right with it.

EDNA FERBER, author of "Giant," writes a new novel of America's last frontier where "everything is large

"I don't know how you think Alaskans should look,"
Chris said,
"but I'm an Alaskan."

PA

n life, fantastic" . . . of a girl born with a heritage of conflicting loyalties . . . and of two men who loved and fought for her.

ICE AGE

FIRST OF THREE PARTS

Every third woman you passed on Gold Street in Baranof was young, pretty and pregnant. The men, too, were young, virile, and pregnant with purpose. Each, making his or her way along the bustling business street, seemed actually to bounce with youth and vitality. Only an occasional old sourdough, relic dating back to the Gold Rush days of fifty years ago, weaving his precarious pedestrian way in and out of the frisky motor traffic, gave the humming town a piquant touch of anachronism.

An exhilarating street, Gold, though the stores and office buildings that lined it—one- or two-story cement or wooden structures—were commonplace and even shabby. Middle-aged tourists, weary after thousands of miles of travel over this seemingly boundless territory—whether by plane or by a combination of plane, train, ship and automobile—were puzzled and plaintive as they viewed the haphazard town of Baranof for the first time.

"Everybody walks as if they had springs in their shoes. Or maybe it's because you're all so young."

If the visitor's guide happened to be Ott Decker, secretary of the Baranof Chamber of Commerce, he would reject this with the mysterious lightheartedness that seemed to suffuse most near-Arctic citizens.

"Young's got nothing to do with it. Around here you can live to be a hundred, easy, unless you're shot, or your plane cracks up on you, or a bear sees you first. Everybody feels good. I don't know. It's a kind of a balloon feeling."

It was true that everything in Baranof seemed exaggerated. Edges sharper. Skies bluer. Mountains higher, snow deeper, temperature lower, daylight longer, sunlight briefer, depending on the season.

As for grubby Gold Street—it compensated in scenery for what it lacked in architectural grace. At one end the shabby thoroughfare met the mountains that reared their incredible height, peak on peak, a screaming white. At the other end the water curved to hold the town in its icy arms. It was a setting of diamonds and pearls surrounding a blob of agate.

If you were an Important Person arriving by air to visit Baranof, you were officially met at the smart little airport by Bridie Ballantyne or Ott Decker or both. If you were a Very Important Person, you were met by Chris Storm. Christine Storm. Only her grandfather Czar Kennedy and her grandfather Thor Storm called her Christine.

As first assistant to the general manager of Alaska Public Relations, Christine Storm's appearance was likely to mislead the average tourist; but then, she never was assigned to small fry. She was reserved for any visiting President of the United States who condescended to the territory (none in her day); senators and congressmen (national); big-business types (with wife); big-game hunters (minus wife) with guides flying small maneuverable planes in search of polar white or mammoth brown bears. Born in Alaska, the daughter of a father and mother born in Alaska, the granddaughter of two grandfathers who were considered Alaska history, Chris Storm was almost as outstanding as Mount McKinley. Certainly in the wintertime Chris was a striking figure there at the airport gateway as the big four-engine plane from Seattle drummed down out of the heights to the runway.

Her official greeting costume was a pure white fox parka intricately bordered with a delicate frieze of Eskimo symbols in black sealskin. Her grandfather Thor Storm had told her that some of these symbols were phallic or otherwise sexual, which interested her, as did all Eskimo lore, and sometimes, quite matter-of-factly, she would obligingly explain these to inquiring visitors.

"My, that's a lovely coat!" the wife of a VIP from Outside would exclaim.

"It's called a parka, and we pronounce it parky, no one knows why."

"All those little figures and things in the border. Now that one—it looks like two little hills with a valley between. Do the signs have any significance, do they mean anything, sort of like the writing on caves and tombs in the Orient? Mr. Rauschenbusch and I took a trip around the world last year."

"Oh, that. That's part of a legend in which an Eskimo sees the back of his wife as she bends over the cooking pot, he dreams he must find his way through the two hills to the valley."

"What! Sh-h! The men will hear you. What's this one?"

The white fox parka, with its hood of white wolf, was a fitting frame for the girl's brilliant face. Slim white fur mukluks and gloves completed the dazzling effect—too dazzling, her enemies said.

The three Baranof professional public-relations stars used three different weapons with which to do battle with the world known as Outside. Christine, deceptively blithe and debonair, tickled you with a poniard of gaiety, but you never felt sure that she might not drive it suddenly into your ribs. Bridie Ballantyne used a verbal shillelagh wrapped in cotton velvet. Ott Decker, good Chamber of Commerce secretary that he was, just laid on with a shovel.

The visitor from Outside would wave an arm with a gesture that embraced the incredible landscape.

"Some country you got here, that's for sure. I thought it would be different. Of course it's different, all right, but other ways it's more like back home than I thought. Not like it, exactly, but ——"

"We're people—all kinds of people—just like you in the States. But we're absolutely different in one way."

"How's that?"

"Would you like to pay Government taxes if you couldn't have a voice in the state you live in, and couldn't vote for President of the United States?"

This challenge they found disconcerting in a girl as attractive as Chris. "Oh, now, say! What's a girl like you bothering her head about whether you vote for President? Let him worry. I know what I'd do if I was President.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 90

Copyright © 1958 by Edna Ferber. All rights reserved.

The complete novel is being published in book form by Doubleday & Company, Inc.

Joe Lyons

The train of events leading up to the publication of the novel Cocktail Time was set in motion in the smoking room of the Drones Club in the early afternoon of a Friday in July. An Egg and a Bean were digesting their lunch there over a pot of coffee, when they were joined by Pongo Twistleton and a tall, slim, Guards-officer-looking man some thirty years his senior.

"Yo ho," said Pongo. "You know my uncle, Lord Ickenham, don't you?"

"Oh, rather," said the Egg. "Yo ho, Lord Ickenham."

"Yo ho," said Lord Ickenham. "In fact, I will go further. Yo frightfully ho," and it was plain to both Bean and Egg that they were in the presence of one who was sitting on top of the world and who, had he been wearing a hat, would have worn it on the side of his head. He looked, they considered, about as bumps-a-daisy as billy-o.

And, indeed. Lord Ickenham was feeling as bumps-a-daisy as he looked. He had just learned that his godson, Johnny Pearce, had at last succeeded in letting that house of his, Hammer Lodge, and on the strength of this had become engaged to a perfectly charming girl, always pleasant news for an affectionate godfather; and his wife had allowed him to come up to London for the Eton-and-Harrow match.

BLACKMAIL, WITH A DELIGHTFUL CAST OF CHARACTERS SAVE TWO

He seated himself and beamed on his young friends like a Cheshire cat. "God bless my soul," he said. "It really is extraordinary how fit I'm feeling today. Bright eyes, rosy cheeks, and the sap rising strongly in my veins, as I believe the expression is. It's the London air. It always has that effect on me."

Pongo started violently. From earliest boyhood the loopiness of this uncle had been an open book to him and he quailed when he heard him speak of the sap rising strongly in his veins. It seemed to suggest that his relative was planning to express and fulfill himself again, and when Frederick Altamont Cornwallis Twistleton, fifth Earl of Ickenham, began to express and fulfill himself, strong men—Pongo was one of them—quivered like tuning forks.

It being the opening day of the Eton-and-Harrow match, the conversation turned naturally to that topic. "Talking of Harrow, by the way," said the Egg, "that kid of Barmy Phipps' is with us once more. I saw him in there a short while ago with Barmy, stoking up on ginger pop."

"You mean Barmy's Cousin Egbert from Harrow?" young Pongo Twistleton wanted to know.

"That's right. The one who shoots Brazil nuts."

Lord Ickenham was intrigued. The great advantage of lunching at the Drones, he often said, was that you met such interesting people.

"Shoots Brazil nuts, does he?" he asked. "You stir me strangely. In my time I have shot many things—grouse, pheasants, partridges, tigers, gnus and once, when a boy, an aunt by marriage in the seat of her sensible tweed dress with an air gun—but I have never shot a Brazil nut."

It was apparent to the Egg that the old gentleman had missed the gist. "He shoots things with Brazil nuts," he explained. "Puts them in his catapult and whangs off at people's hats. Very seldom misses, either. It's a great gift."

"Nonsense," said Lord Ickenham. "Kindergarten stuff. The sort of thing one learns at one's mother's knee. It is many years since I owned a catapult, but if I had one now I would guarantee to go through the hats of London like a dose of salts. Would this child of whom you speak have the murder weapon on his person, do you suppose?"

"Bound to have," said the Egg.

"Then present my compliments to him and ask if I may borrow it a moment. And bring me a Brazil nut."

A quick shudder shook Pongo from his upper slopes to the extremities of his clocked socks. In addition to shuddering, he uttered a sharp quack of anguish such as might have proceeded from some duck which, sauntering in a reverie beside the duckpond, had inadvertently stubbed its toe on a broken soda-water bottle.

"Really, Uncle Fred! I mean dash it, Uncle Fred! I mean really, Uncle Fred, dash it all!"

"I am not sure that I quite follow you, my boy."

"Are you going to take a pop at someone's hat?"

"It would, I think, be rash not to. One doesn't often get hold of a catapult. And toppers being obligatory at the Eton-and-Harrow match, the spinneys and coverts today will be full of them. It is of course the top hat rather than the bowler which is one's primary objective. I expect to secure some fine heads. Ah," said Lord Ickenham, as the Egg returned, "so this is the instrument. Yes," he said, moving to the window, "I think I shall be able to make do. It is not the catapult, it is the man behind it that matters."

The first lesson your big-game hunter learns, when on safari, is to watch and wait, and Lord Ickenham showed no impatience as the minutes went by and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

"Did you know Louis is getting married?"
said Richard.
She didn't answer.
Somehow tonight she must tell him.

She loved him—knew she must leave him. Carol was a woman, an

PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST'S WIFE

By INEZ McGOWAN

ed of waiting . . .

Funny how it all began. A hundred-franc note was responsible. A flimsy, colored piece of paper worth not quite fifty cents. Somehow, between the post office and the Metro station, Carol had lost it.

Looking into her empty wallet, she felt a stir of exasperation, but then smiled. So she would have to walk home. It was a thirty-minute walk, but still nothing to get bothered about.

She closed her purse, pulled on her mittens and started off for the Fourteenth Arrondissement. She had walked a good distance through the gray, moist afternoon when it happened.

She began to notice how constant was the ugliness of the people around her. Really impossible, but each person seemed more grotesque and evil than the last. Of course it was only in her imagination. The distortion would pass in a minute, but right now she could not look away or make the ugliness disappear. She tried to keep her eyes down, seeing only the cobblestones and the gutters.

What was the matter with her? These strangers were merely poor, hard-working souls going about their daily tasks, oblivious of her. How surprised they'd be to know that her mind had turned them into figures of evil.

What was wrong? Why was her imagination playing such tricks? As she asked, she knew. Now, on this wintry afternoon, truth caught up to her. She admitted to herself that she was desperately unhappy and her marriage was failing. Unhappiness had begun to distort her view of the world, turning even the commonplace into the grotesque. Despair had removed beauty and left ugliness. Despair had gobbled up hope and left fear.

She hurried on, the cold air stinging her cheeks. Just a few blocks more, and she would be home. She raised her eyes briefly and was rewarded. The ugliness was gone! The world had returned to normal.

She reached her apartment building, and the iron grille door swung heavily shut behind her. She heard the concierge scratching aside the lace to see who had come in, but Carol could not turn and smile at her. She ran past the glass to the staircase. Up and around the dark stairway—two flights up. She could not wait for the ascenseur. Today she could not travel inside its grimy, ancient cage.

She climbed upward, in the dark, without sound. She found the door to her apartment. In a minute she would be safe. She did not notice that her hand with the key trembled. She only knew that inside her body she felt weak and without support.

The apartment was very cold. She would start the stove in a moment, but first she must rest, sit on the couch, still in her coat. Weakness settled through her bones. She forced herself to sit up.

From the cupboard she took some Dubonnet and poured herself a glass. As she did so, she noticed the envelope on the mantel. Richard must have put it there. Once a week her mother wrote her. Once a week a thin envelope came as proof that her family still existed far away in a suburb on Long Island.

She put down the glass of wine. She knew now what she would write her mother. The flicker of truth had come and gone, but it could not be ignored. She began mentally to compose a letter:

Dear Mother: I am coming home. I can't go on with Richard any more. For two years here he has led an irresponsible, penniless existence. I don't want to share it with him any longer. I don't want to be afraid or cold or hungry any more. I want to feel safe again. I want to have a home and perhaps even children. I still love Richard, and I know we could have a happy life together in the States. But if he won't come back with me, then I will have to come alone.

She raised her head. Yes, the decision was right. It surprised her, because suddenly it seemed so inevitable. It was the only solution.

She took a sip of wine. Her eyelids felt tight and strained as though she had been crying. At that moment she saw Richard, crossing the street, below the window.

A noisy, spattering rain had begun to fall, and the wind tore against Richard's overcoat, whipping it about his legs. He wore no hat, his crisp dark hair ducked down against the rain. He looked thin, young and handsome. Under his arm was a large flat parcel.

And there was his friend, Jerry. If it hadn't been for good old Jerry and his tales of the rive gauche, heaven help them, they'd still be on Long Island. Why shouldn't Jerry like it here? He had a French wife who could stretch the franc like a rubber band. He had in-laws who, every Sunday, invited him to their home in the suburbs for an elaborate meal. Was it because of those imagined sumptuous feasts that Carol had come to find him unbearable?

She heard the ascenseur and left the window. She was still wearing her coat, and hurried to take it off. She smoothed back her silky pale hair so that it was ruffled and shining. Before the mirror, she marveled that her face could look so serene. Her green eyes surveyed her calmly from their gold-flecked depths, and she felt steadier.

Then there was the sound of the key in the lock. Ridiculous the amount of strength that sound gave her. Richard was the one solid, rooted thing in the shifting accumulation of days. But he was not enough. The accumulation of days had become too great.

"Hi," said Richard. "Look what I've got!" He began to undo the parcel. "A decent tray to heat the wax on. Jerry got it for me from the Embassy commissary. No more messing around with that lousy tray from the café."

Because his nose wasn't quite straight, Richard had two different profiles. The left one was the all-American boy, but the right one was slightly sinister. Carol preferred the right one. Now as he bent over the tray, he seemed to be examining it craftily, for motives known only to himself.

"Ça va?" Jerry asked, clasping her hand in both of his.

"Not bad," she said. She poured them wine.

Richard kept his coat on while he put the wrapping paper and wood in the stove. When both were burning nicely, he dumped in two shovelfuls of coal and adjusted the draft regulator.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

I was Churchill's Secretary

What was it like to work so closely with "the greatest figure of his time"?

Always exciting, sometimes frightening, frequently outraging, usually exhausting, and often hilariously funny.

says the author, who was Churchill's personal secretary through the most difficult war years.

By ELIZABETH NEL

The author at Chequers, where the P.M. went for "rest and recreation," and the secretaries worked straight through the weekend.

I doesn't really matter who I am or where I came from. The only thing of real interest about me is that during World War Two I worked for four and a half years as one of the personal secretaries to Sir Winston Churchill. Much time has passed since those days; I have not seen him for nearly twelve years. All that time I have felt a desire to write about him and the years I spent in his service. I have had much to learn here in South Africa, and some difficulties to overcome. But now I have a little more time; the children have all arrived, and housekeeping is less of a mystery. Therefore I am going to try to set it all down.

To my mind there can be no doubt that Sir Winston Churchill stands above the other great figures of our time. We of his personal staff were called upon to put forth the maximum effort of which our frames, nerves and minds were capable. I do not think this was only because it was wartime; I believe he has always been a fairly exacting employer. In those days, at any rate, he expected those around him to devote themselves heart and soul to the cause to which he was dedicated.

I used to grumble sometimes that there was never any opportunity for dates or fixing one's clothes. But from first to last we were utterly devoted to him, not because he was Prime Minister but because he was himself. Mr. Churchill was a person whom it was quite safe to hero-worship, for if one had not done so one could hardly have borne the effort involved in giving him satisfactory service. Certainly to me he shone with a very, very bright light. Perhaps, after all, it was the unheroic in him that endeared him to us: his twinkling eye and occasional jests at the expense of ourselves or the private secretaries, his unself-consciousness, his extravagant love for the cat, the emotion he would feel on hearing of the exploits of Royal Navy ships, his beaming smile of thanks when he was aware one had stayed up all night copying a speech.

I do not think there were many who in those days would have wished to devote more than a few years of life to serving Winston Churchill, as in time a state of complete exhaustion would have been reached; but I know that anyone who has had the privilege of working on his staff must feel forever a different person, must feel that he has passed close to a personality not to be met with again. What is the key to his character? Wherein lies the focal point of his greatness? I have always thought it is more than anything else his courage.

Among the many young women who have taken dictation from him during his long lifetime, I do not think Winston Churchill would remember me particularly. Perhaps he might recall the evening when a Russian general dumped a bunch of flowers unceremoniously in my lap by way of a bouquet. But I cannot, could not forget him.

I was born in England but brought up in Canada, on the western slopes of the Rockies. In 1936 my father sent me to London for a secretarial course, after which I worked for nearly two years in the employment bureau connected with the secretarial college. In the summer of 1939 I went back to Canada for a few months' holiday—but then war broke out and plans went haywire. Much as I longed to throw myself into some useful work, I was obliged for family reasons to stay at home. This position lasted until 1940, when I found myself free once more to return to England.

On reaching London my first call was upon friends in the employment bureau where I had worked, with an urgent request for a job. They promised to find me "something good"; in the meantime, I started work for the Red Cross.

The worst of the blitz was past; but almost every night raiders arrived. It was quite an experience in those days to travel on the Underground railway after seven in the evening. You would find the whole station—the moving staircase, the approach to the platform, the platform itself—choked with people arriving to spend the night underground. You would see some people sitting up and chatting, some lying asleep, arms shielding their eyes, some prowling about in search of buns and tea sold by girls in white aprons and caps. All the time traffic proceeded in and out as usual, the passengers stepping carefully over the rows of recumbent forms while the trains shot noisily past.

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE IN-ONE-ISSUE
CONDENSED
NON-FICTION BOOK

Copyright © 1958 by Elizabeth Nel

I WAS CHURCHILL'S SECRETARY is soon to be published in book form by Coward-McCann, Inc.

When a city had received a bad bombing he would try to pay it a visit, and the people, revitalized, would roar with delight at the sight of him.

It was into this rather muddled existence that the great news suddenly fell upon me. A telephone call from the employment bureau—the Prime Minister needs an additional shorthand-typist on his staff and would you like to apply?

On May 5, 1941, I started work at 10 Downing Street. There stood the door so often seen in photographs—plain, black, with a bell on one side, the figure 10 in the center and a lion-head knocker. It was opened by a uniformed doorman, and I stepped into the entrance hall, where a policeman also stood on duty. A messenger conducted me down a long red-carpeted passage which led to a red-carpeted lobby. I saw the door to the Cabinet Room, the nerve center of the British Government these last two hundred years. Beside it stood a solid-looking grandfather clock with a solemn tick. To the left was the Prime Minister's study, and to the right the private secretaries' office and the room used by personal secretaries.

I was shown the Cabinet Room—large, oblong, with windows looking over the garden. Around the walls were bookcases filled with leather-bound volumes, mostly Hansard, and a map of the world. There was a big rectangular table about which were placed some twenty-two leather-seated and backed chairs. The chair for the Prime Minister, the only one with arms, was at the center of the long table, and behind this was the fireplace, over which hung a portrait of Sir Robert Walpole, the first Prime Minister of Britain. On the mantel stood a large clock, an apparatus showing the date, and a jar containing a small bunch of white heather, which had recently been sent to Mr. Churchill for luck. Otherwise the room contained no ornaments.

Mr. Churchill's place at the table was marked by an interesting array of buzzers, pens, pencils, tags for joining papers, a paper punch for making holes for the tags, and some red labels stating "Action This Day." Standing on a table at the side was a covered typewriter.

To the right were large double doors leading to the private secretaries' office, which in turn led to the personal secretaries' office beyond.

Here let me explain the secretarial position at No. 10 at that time. There were six private secretaries, five men and one woman, who were civil servants, officially appointed. They occupied a position of considerable standing and did not necessarily change with a change of Prime Minister. Four of the men took turns in being actively on duty, usually two at a time. This meant that they acted as a buffer between Mr. Churchill and the rest of the world, seeing to his requirements, receiving information for him, guarding the precious boxes in which his work was kept. Besides, they had a great deal of correspondence to deal with, reports to produce according to the particular interest of each one, and many papers to read through each day in order to keep abreast of all that came in and went out. The fifth male private secretary worked behind scenes and advised the Prime Minister on various matters; and Miss Watson, a great character who had been at No. 10 for about twenty years, dealt with vast quantities of correspondence from the general public.

Mr. Churchill greatly disliked any change of staff. He had therefore, on his return to office in 1939, brought with him the two women who had been his secretaries at Chartwell, his home in Kent, when he was a private individual. These two, known as his personal secretaries, had been flogging themselves to serve him night and day, whenever dictation was required (and this might be at any hour, for any length of time); besides dealing with his personal work such as family affairs, personal letters, constituency business, household accounts, gifts and photographs.

These two personal secretaries felt they could keep going no longer—and a third was to be added. This was myself. This would not, they told me, be a popular decision with Mr. Churchill, but themselves being only mortal it was a necessary one.

It was explained to me that No. 10 was not at present the official residence of the Prime Minister and Mrs. Churchill. It is an old building, and when the Treasury (next door) was hit by a bomb, No. 10 was shaken so as to make it unsafe in case of further air raiding. Another building, the Annexe, had therefore been prepared for him; it was about five minutes' walk from No. 10 at Storey's Gate, facing St. James's Park and flanked by Great George Street. Here also were housed the offices of the War Cabinet and the Service Planning Staffs. For Mr. and Mrs. Churchill and the household staff there was a small but comfortably furnished flat where they lived and slept. Within the flat was an office shared by the personal secretaries and Mrs. Churchill's secretary. The location of the flat was not ideal, as it was situated between the main door to the building and the offices of the Prime Minister's official staff, and the traffic along the carpeted passage (which incidentally was flanked by Mr. Churchill's own paintings) was constant. But it was wartime, and in other respects the building was suitable.

For below it there stretched two whole floors of "safety"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 179

THE UNSUSPECTING

It was a deadly joke we played on Mr. Malachi — the more deadly for its innocence.

By KAATJE HURLBUT

It occurs to me that a man who must lie might bitterly envy an honest man's extravagance with the truth. If a man is honest he may exaggerate to his heart's content to please a lady or amuse his friends, and no harm's done. But a man who must lie cannot afford any such luxury: his lie must be economical; it must be down-to-earth. Fancy is for honest men. A liar must be logical.

Now the deadly Mr. Malachi was logical. And the lie he told was as solemn as death. Yet to this day, when I remember it, I cannot suppress a shout of unholy laughter!

I don't believe there had been a murder in Portertown in a hundred years; not in my memory, anyway, and I would know. I am the Sheriff's Office. When people speak of the sheriff, they mean Jim Carney. But when they refer to the Sheriff's Office, they mean me. Oh, I don't do much except coax the old typewriter along and keep track of the keys to the jail, which are usually tangled up in my knitting in the back of the desk drawer. Once Jim threatened to put me to work. He was going to deputize me. But I told him it would not be a becoming occupation for a fat old lady and that I would stick to mystery novels for my encounters with desperate criminals.

"Mystery novels," said Jim, having just returned from wagging his finger at a formidable little boy who had sneaked in the side door of the Jewel Theater, "is about the only place you'll encounter desperate criminals around here."

But that was before Mr. Malachi came to Portertown and called on Elizabeth Starr.

Mr. Malachi might have been just another of the art dealers and appraisers who had been in town lately to view a collection of paintings at the Primrose mansion: old Mr. Primrose had died and his heirs were to put the estate up for auction. When Mr. Malachi arrived on Saturday by the noon train, he registered at the inn, had lunch there, and spent the remainder of the afternoon examining the paintings at Mr. Primrose's.

On Sunday he called on Elizabeth Starr. He was, he explained, on business for a gallery in New York and was in town only until Monday. He said he called because he had known Mrs. Starr's late husband years ago in South Africa and wouldn't allow himself to leave town without paying his respects.

It was one of those golden afternoons in the fall when we sat in Elizabeth Starr's little drawing room, drinking tea and indulging in the intimate nonsense only friends of fifty years may do. Besides Elizabeth and myself, there were Mary Pike, who was one of the Primrose girls, and my cousin, Hannah Thomas.

In anyone else's house it would have been a living room or even a parlor (for we are getting on and we remember parlors), but to us, who adored Elizabeth and cherished the frayed elegance of her dear self and of her life in general, it was a drawing room. It would always be a drawing room, and Elizabeth the elfin little girl who had somehow, with the rest of us, stumbled into the mire of reality and grown old.

I remember now that just before we looked up to see Mr. Malachi standing in the doorway, dark and still, we were laughing. We were laughing and teasing Elizabeth about John Clendaniel. For she had just recounted the latest of his exquisitely absurd escapades, spiked with delicate improprieties and rollicking with nonsense. I suppose that was what we most admired about Elizabeth: her outlandish and enchanting relationship with John Clendaniel. For there was valiance in her merriment.

Elizabeth had had a fortune when Edward Starr married her. Her parents had died, and she was young and believing and deeply in love. But Portertown was a sleepy place, and Edward, who was restless and extravagant, wearied of the unpretentious simplicity on which Elizabeth quietly insisted; and after a year or two he began to roam the earth. He always went off alone, on the pretext of business, and managed in twenty years to squander Elizabeth's fortune. Hopefully at first she waited out his absences, and when he would return always more deeply and mysteriously involved in "business" and always more dissipated and restless, she would welcome him with open arms and open heart. But as the years passed she fell into the habit of loving in loneliness.

The last time she saw Edward he arrived home unannounced and left again almost immediately. He was in a great hurry and declined to say where he was going. Before he left he gave Elizabeth a little gift, the only thing he had ever given her; and his presentation of it was so tenderly sentimental that she had wept with astonished delight.

The gift was a pendant. Really nothing, he said. Oh, very fine paste, to be sure, but of no value except that it symbolized his gratitude for Elizabeth's long devotion to him. The irony of this escaped her and she promised, weeping happily, that she would obey his wish that she wear it always; that she never take it off. He was explicit on this point.

He left then and died soon afterward in Prague, leaving her very little but the sorrow of having loved him and, of course, his gift: the pendant, which was nothing less than the fabulous, the incredible, the magnificent Jens Diamond!

Everyone had heard of it. Sunday supplements which rehashed tales of much-married heiresses and unsolved crimes sooner or later carried the story of the Jens Diamond: twice stolen, twice recovered, only to be stolen again from the last of a long line of personages who had owned it. (Who but a personage could afford to own, legally, a diamond the size of a bird's egg and with the heavenly brilliance of a star?) "WHERE IS THE JENS DIAMOND?" their captions boomed in bold type. But now they can use another caption and add a new chapter of tragedy.

No one will ever know whether it was desperation or cool genius which prompted Edward Starr to hide the Jens Diamond on the unsuspecting bosom of a ruined, neglected wife. For ten years she lived in the bewilderment CONTINUED ON PAGE 176

Mr. Malachi had been standing in the doorway some time before any of us saw him.

ILLUSTRATED BY AL PARKER

". . . but most of all I love him when he says, 'And to think we thought we were in love when I married you.'"

WHY I
My Husband

"The one thing in the world I'm absolutely sure of is that I am a stronger and a better man; and the bad things, the accidents and

When we published ten letters on "Why I Love My Wife" and "Why I Love My Husband" in last November's JOURNAL, we received an avalanche of mail from readers who wanted to tell us how much the letters meant to them.

They said: "They stirred my heart." . . . "Please print more, especially the ones by men. I am a high-school student, but I hope to be a good wife someday." . . . "I cried, I laughed, and saw Bill and me in every line." . . . "They make the happiest reading I've found and I keep reading them over. Could you perhaps bring out a collection in book form?" . . . "Thank you for opening my eyes. I had been feeling sorry for myself because I am new in this city and my husband is gone a great deal. After reading those letters I realized just how much I love him and that

Around the World

Gentlemen: My husband has a beard—a black one. I'm not saying that I love him because he wears a beard—but I do love him because he's the kind of man who can wear one if he wants to and get away with it.

My husband has seven children—all of them beautiful, much more beautiful than either their father or mother, but born of much love, and possibly because of that beautiful.

My husband was once the richest boy in town, and then was the poorest. He worked his way through college and law school and helped to support his family. He waited on tables and did every kind of menial job. He never felt sorry for himself.

My husband has a box at the opera. Every Saturday P.M. he takes six children and his wife to the opera and gives them a lovely lunch beforehand. He tells them about going to the opera when he was a little boy. He reads the story of the day's opera in the car on the way to the city.

My husband decided on one day's notice to take his wife around the world. They were in San Francisco for a convention. He wanted to go fishing for trout in Alaska. But his wife said, "We have no warm clothes with us, so let us go to Hawaii and fish for marlin." So my husband took her to Hawaii. When they got there, he said, "We are so near to Australia that we will go there to see some people who want to talk to me on business." So they decided to go to Australia.

After my husband decided to go to Australia, he said, "I'll bet you can come back around the other side of the world just as easy as coming back this way." So he checked and, by George, you could. So my husband went around the world in ■ beige silk suit and when they got to New Zealand it was four above zero.

My husband has had cancer, diabetes and two heart attacks. He brought his weight down from 220 to 161 and keeps it there. He is in better health today than ever in his life. During all his illness, he has never complained.

My husband took an insular, limited girl of twenty-three and broadened her experience, made her secure, loved her with blind faith and made her a happy woman who thinks life is more wonderful for her than for anyone else she knows.

When my husband comes into a room, it changes. It is alive. He sends me a letter every day when he travels. My husband never lies. He is generous to me in spirit as well as in fact. He thinks I am the nicest thing that ever happened to him. He tells me so.

Of course there are things I would change. I would have him tidier, and smoother-tempered, and prompter—oh, the hours I wait for him! I would like him to know that women are different from men and can't always see things in the same light. I wish he wouldn't keep opening refrigerator doors and then not taking anything out. I wish he could drive a car. I wish he would come home from England, right now. DEBORAH LANE LAWSON

Old Westbury, Long Island, New York

Green Eyes and Freckles

Gentlemen: I married him years ago in another land in another time because I loved him passionately, with abandon and with all the strength and depth of my immature being. I loved him because he had blond wavy hair, green eyes and a freckled face. When we were together we were incredibly happy. He said he loved me and that he needed me and so we were married. I wanted to make him happy.

He is still five feet nine and although the blond waves are thinning and he has long since outgrown the G.I. uniform hanging in the attic closet, the nearness of him makes me feel alive and the green eyes charm and beguile me as they did when I first became aware of them. I still want to make him happy.

I did not know him then and he is not completely known to me even now. Because unlike myself he is not loquacious, I find him full of surprises. His mind to me is like Pandora's unopened box. Now and again the lid is lifted and out comes something totally unexpected. It might be hope or something not quite so agreeable. No matter, I am not alarmed if what I discover is not to my liking.

He is all man and when womanlike I would make changes in him he indulges me to a point and beyond that he will not relinquish by one iota his individuality or his manhood. I cannot coerce him and I would not respect him if I could. He is a constant challenge.

I shall always be grateful to my husband. No other man has seen fit to accept me as I am or to let me go my own way with complete trust. He has granted me these two great kindnesses.

He is a house painter and he is not clever. He will never set the world on fire and not everybody likes him, but he pleases me. Yes, it's as simple as that, he pleases me and when I am pleased I am happy. You just can't help loving someone who makes you happy. He can make me feel like Aphrodite and he can fill me with despair, but with him all my senses are alive. In the evening when he greets me in overalls covered with paint and a kiss that wafts turpentine, believe me, I am living and that's why I love him.

I would not for my part change my husband by one single jot. However, for his own happiness, I would make one change. He can be tactless; I would have him be a little more discreet so that he may not be misunderstood.

IRENE W. BURMEISTER

Milwaukee, Wisconsin

"Will it Make a Difference?"

Dear Editors: I was in the unusual position of knowing, before I was married, that I would never have children. The verdict came as the result of a hereditary disorder discovered during an operation two months before I was eighteen. When my doctor explained the complicated case history, a door closed that every little girl opens when she picks up her first doll. I resigned myself to a lonely life, for surely every man wanted a wife who could give him children. CONTINUED ON PAGE 169

LOVE My Wife

he loves me. Knowing that changes everything else:
he good things in life are more satisfying;
he mistakes, suddenly become unimportant."

JACQUES LOWE

"As I watched my wife putting on her face for our Golden Wedding celebration, I got that same joyous feeling I had when I first saw her at nineteen."

really doesn't matter where we live." . . . "My art swelled and my throat hurt ——" . . . "Please ublish all the letters."

There is an expression used by members of the ociety of Friends. When something seems to ■ riend to be fitting to his own needs or thoughts or elings, he says, "It speaks to my condition." The ousands of wonderful, happy letters we have re-ived have spoken to our condition, and your re-onse tells us that they also speak to yours.

So here are ten more of the original letters which em to us as funny, heart-warming, wise and tear-arting as the ones first printed. We wish we could ublish all of the hundreds we received, and maybe, om time to time, in the letter columns we will.

BRUCE AND BEATRICE GOULD

Too Young to Marry

Dear Sirs: Many would say that we were too young to marry, and in a way we were. She was eighteen and I was twenty; we had little money, just my savings account of about $128, and I had held a regular job for only about four months. No security, you see. Neither of our families were really "with" us. But we were in love.

Sixteen years later, I am a happy husband, and father of four fine children, two boys for me, two girls for her. It's still hard to tell in a few words why we are still in love, but permit me to present just a few reasons:

She's the shepherd who alerts her flock, and guides them to church on Sunday morning . . . the mother who knows that coloring picture books with her children is more important than the dinner dishes being done "right now" . . . the companion that has the time to listen to her husband's troubles, and do the things she can to help, and the wisdom to accept that which neither can control . . . the partner who will, if necessary to the economy of the family, work an eight-hour factory shift, in addition to the burdens of a home and family, without complaint . . . the sweetheart, greeting with open arms and a loving kiss the husband returning after any absence, long or short . . . the "date" ready for her boy to call, waiting, well groomed and clean . . . the lover, who enjoys the sexual passions of a married life, and tells her husband so . . . the "in-law" who accepts her husband's family, treats and loves them as her own . . . the WIFE, in all the meanings of the word.

Sure, there have been days when tempers flared out of control, and bitter words were spoken. And angry nights, through which both tossed and turned, both lonely, and each too hurt and proud to tell the other so. Subtract those, if you will, and there are left to us still many happy years.

Oh, yes, there are habits that she has that I might change. Our home could be cleaner, on occasion, than it is. She could be a better hostess if she tried. Her habit of saving everything (papers, sacks, string, plastic bags, pencils too short to use, magazines—sometimes I swear she has every issue of the JOURNAL ever issued—bits of cloth, all the old clothes we ever wore out) is, to say the least, disconcerting at times.

But, on the whole, isn't the total more important than the component parts? I think so. Divorce courts? Abolish them for all I care, and let me continue toward the future, her hand in mine.

Sincerely, R. E. BRAHAM
Bell Gardens, California

More of What She Was

Dear Editors: I never thought much about why I love my wife until recently, and the thinking resulted from a spontaneous reply to a question from a young lady. She knows that my work brings me into constant contact with women of many vagaries, temperaments and energies. After a particularly trying moment, the lady asked me, "How do you leave all this every day and then go home to still another woman?" I answered, "It's easy. My wife is not just another woman. She's my salvation."

At the time I did not know that Mary Baker Eddy had characterized salvation as "Life, Truth, and Love understood and demonstrated above all." That's a big order for any human being full of human frailties and constantly buffeted by them. But it's packed into the neat hundred-pound frame of the woman who is my wife.

Essentially, I suppose, my wife is the same girl I married seven years ago this summer. That's good, because I married her for what she was then, not for what she might become. And she has become even more of what she was, if that is possible. The beauty of maturity has been added, and will continue to add, I know.

In modest and quiet dignity my wife has been my springtime lover, my genial hostess, my immaculate housekeeper, my mental sparring partner, and the affectionate disciplinarian of my children. She is an unvocal critic who holds firmly onto my feet when I fly through the air with grand thoughts and impossible dreams.

Financially, we're probably below average, and yet we seem to stay in the black with greater ease than most people we know. We don't miss the advantages of money. My wife taught school while I finished college, but she was definite about it. "It's school first. After that you're on your own, because when we have a family, we'll have to take the responsibility." She hasn't worked since, because we don't feel obligated to give the children "everything we missed." We give them what they need with love and affection and security. My wife says she didn't marry me for money. "My happiness is just being your wife." She does it well.

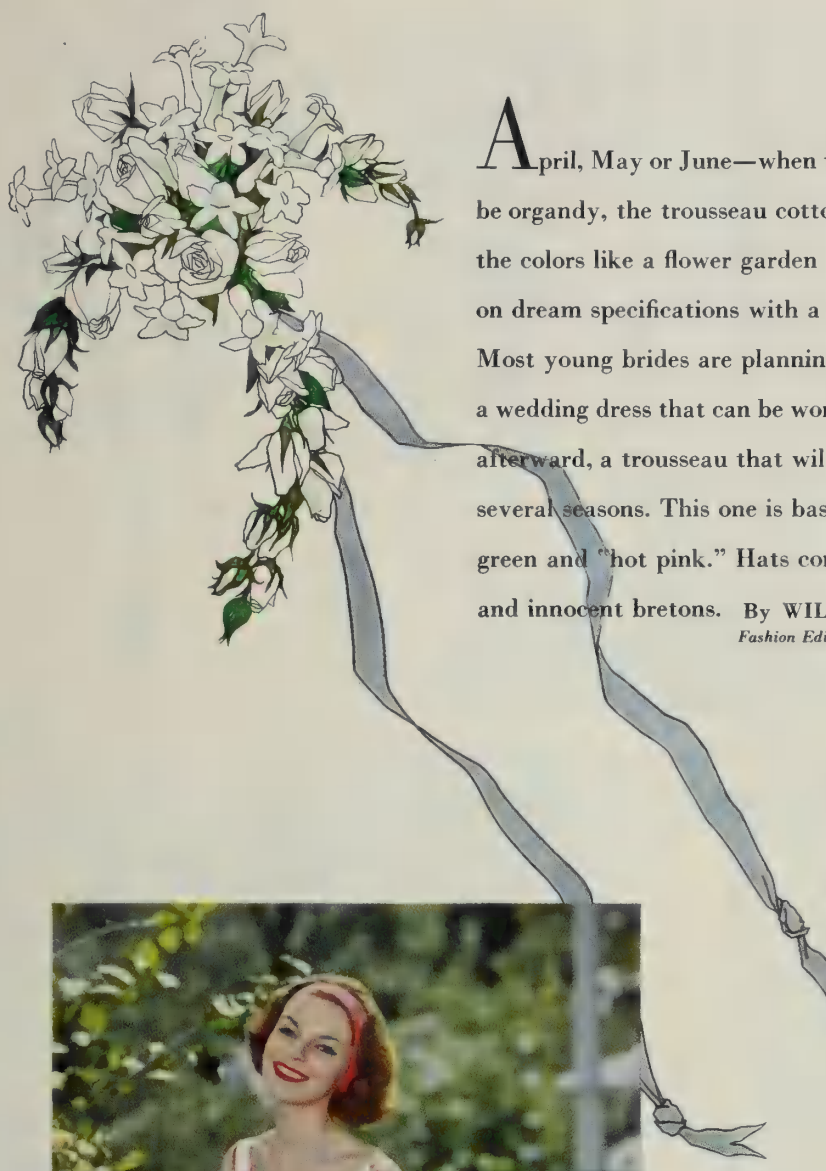
Three mothers were standing around whispering when I came out of Sunday school with my four-year-old daughter. One of them came forward. "Where does your wife buy your little girl's clothes?" she asked. "We've admired them so long." My pride was endless when I answered, "But she doesn't buy them. She designs and makes them."

She hides her other accomplishments. She studied voice at the Juilliard School of Music, and many of our friends don't know she can sing. She's adequate as an artist, and her current interest is ceramics. The house is full of ash trays. She says she's trying to balance an education in history, but it keeps cropping up in her reading.

Perfect wife? She has her faults. She never leaves anything where I put it. I wouldn't let her out of the house with my wallet unless it was empty. She doesn't always appreciate my sense of humor, and I heard her label my descriptive speech as "earthy" the other night. She doesn't make friends easily, because she can't be what she calls "gushy." She thinks it isn't always honest, and people sometimes misunderstand this attitude. There's a danger in spreading oneself too thin, she says. But when everything CONTINUED ON PAGE 173

I DO

The wedding dress is worn for a dinner dance with a short navy-blue silk-taffeta jacket.



Short dress for a small wedding, printed surah, around $50.00, by Rappi. A bow-veil.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

The bride arrives in a cloud of heavenly blue or white tulle. Her dress is a camisole-top organdy and Swiss embroidery worn with a jacket and embroidered overskirt—the "something blue" appearing again in a taffeta petticoat. Her flowers and crownlike headdress are forget me-nots and lilies of the valley. Wedding dress by Rappi, veil by Sally Victor. Wedding dress, $89.95. Bride's bouquets, around $20.00

LOVE A WEDDING

IN THE SPRING

April, May or June—when the wedding dress can be organdy, the trousseau cottons and silks, the colors like a flower garden . . . the entire affair on dream specifications with a down-to-earth dollar. Most young brides are planning in this way—a wedding dress that can be worn to dance in afterward, a trousseau that will be a wardrobe for several seasons. This one is based on blue and green and "hot pink." Hats consist of ribbons, veils and innocent bretons. By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

HAL REIFF

Blue-and-green printed Dacron, $19.95, by Jerry Gilden—a going-away jacket dress, perfect to wear all summer with bow veil.

White cotton with pink cabbage roses, $12.95, by Jerry Gilden. Pink velvet headband and green T-strap slippers.

Pink cotton-tweed overblouse dress for all day long, around $25.00, by Stella Sloat. Young and pretty with a straw breton by Miss Ruth, a silk handbag by Belle Nathan.

A gay checked silk dress for spring or summer weekends or any day in town, easy shirtwaist style. $33.90, by Jeanne Campbell.

White wool-and-nylon all-occasion coat, $45.00, by Morris Metzger.

DRAWINGS BY RICHARD HANLEY

Overblouse and slacks of strawberry-pink linen, $21.90, by Jeanne Campbell.

Packable printed cotton knit, around $14.95, by Jonathan Logan.

HAL REIFF

Bright sapphire-blue silk-shantung dress and jacket, around $30.00, a going-away suit by Jonathan Logan.

I DO
LOVE A WEDDING
IN THE SPRING

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Above: This silk-shantung shirtwaist dress is a seasonless fashion she will wear for years; $25.00, by Jonathan Logan. Left: Blue-and-green basket-weave checked cotton casual by Ted Feld, around $35.00. White pumps by Rangoni.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

APRIL

The fashion of the green print, fresh and cool, in a slim silk dress with a long matching jacket. distinguished costume by Pauline Trigere.

The full three-tiered skirt looks new and young. This dress by Galanos is in mist-gray organza. Jeweled earrings.

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Above: Full-blown garden roses on silk crepe, a slim bodice with a full skirt by Galanos. Can be worn with rose-red or green kidskin slippers. Notice the short, dancing-school kind of white kid gloves. Right: Polka-dot georgette jacket dress for important luncheons, daylight dining. Wear it for midsummer with a big black hat in sheer straw. By James Galanos.

PRINTS

stay on through the summer

James Galanos designs beautiful full-skirted prints, gives them first place in fashion. This hydrangea silk with the graceful low back is one of the loveliest. Worn with matching silk slippers.

Best-Loved Cottons

Topping our list of best-loved cottons are bright flowered prints, delicate embroideries and unusual stripes. The basic cloth might be a sparkling cotton satin, a crisp sheer, a cotton knit or co-ordinates in different weights printed to match. For inspiration, we are showing you eight ways of using them. As you can see, we like both the slim and the full silhouette . . . your figure and your choice of fabric will determine which is best for you.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

GOLD BANGLES BY JOSEPH BORLEY

This slim, modified chemise dress is made in a cotton knit and bound with washable cotton braid. Vogue Design No. 9465. Buy matching sweater.

SANDALS BY JEAN BANDLER

Giant roses on voile and cotton satin combine in a sheer shirt and slim print slacks. The blue cotton-satin wrap-around overskirt matches too. These fabrics also come in shades of red and yellow. All, Vogue Design No. 9475.

BELT BY HEN KING

Printed flower stripes make this redingote design over a plain sheath. Vogue Design No. S-4880.

Two shades of green is a happy combination for a chemise dress. Vogue Design No. 9473.

Clovers embroidered on a satin-striped sheer make this enchanting pale pink dress. The borders meet at the midriff and are used again on the sleeves. Vogue Design No. 9476.

This beautiful black-and-white-striped cotton satin is enhanced by black novelty braid following the lines of the gored skirt. It trims sleeves too. Vogue Design No. 9464.

The coolest, sheerest plaid in shades of blue is cut on the bias and boasts a nine-yard-round skirt. It has bell-shaped sleeves and a wide bias fold at the neckline. Add a narrow satin belt and a bunch of violets. Vogue Design No. 9471.

SHOES BY BEN SOMMERS

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

One of the favored color combinations of the season is yellow with orange. Over this delightfully simple printed cotton-satin dress we have put a yellow organdy overskirt bound in the dress print. Have a parasol made to match. Vogue Design No. 9472.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 94. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

FRANCES PELLEGRINI

A wide satin ribbon winds around this "Chanel" hairdo, ties underneath in back. Hair is approximately 3" to 4" in length, curls softly at the sides, with sheer bangs to brush across forehead. Hair design by Michel Kazan.

DRESS BY MATTY TALMACK

Want a Lift?

TRY A

These spring nosegays, sewed to their own gold hairpins, enhance any sleek hairdo, such as this Psyche-knot arrangement. Hair design by Enrico Caruso. Flower pins by Mr. Rex.

One of the most glamorous ways to make yourself feel and look like a new woman is to change your hairdo. A sweep of bangs to reframe your face, new width and waves to update prettily a "same old me" pageboy, flowers or ribbons to soften the effect of a sleek arrangement—these are the touches that can make you feel refreshingly different, and prompt friends and family to exclaim. "You've never looked prettier!" If you love the idea of something new a-head—but can't count on your own judgment 100 per cent—then get the advice of a professional expert or someone else whose taste you admire and trust. From this spring's short, brushed-up "Chanel" arrangements to the modified "bouffants," select a style that will put you in fashion . . . prettily so!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

Pretty order for long hair. Top section of hair is combed back and ends are wound into a baby knot, secured with pins, and topped off with a velvet bow. Sides and back fall in soft, loose waves. Hair design by Enrico Caruso.

NEW HAIRDO!

Classic and feminine, this modified "bouffant" is flattering to most any type of face. Front and side sections are set on rollers to achieve height at forehead, wide, loose waves for sides; back is set in large pin curls so that ends will brush up into fullness. Hair design by Michel Kazan.

DRESS BY JOSEF LIARDI

Another version of the short "Chanel" look—this time all hair is set (rollers for front, large pin curls for sides and back) to achieve a feathery, up-brushed effect. Hair is three to four inches in length all over head.

Pompadour pageboy—smooth and sophisticated. To achieve height and fullness, all hair is set on large rollers. Hair is brushed up and away from forehead; sides are turned under and brushed forward to frame face softly. Hair design by Enrico Caruso.

DRESS BY KAREN STARK

Bright red yarn with ribbon bows, bun shaped, to accent a simple, upswept hair arrangement. Perfect for converting a casual hairdo into elegant simplicity. Designed by Mr. Rex.

The "new" house seen across a collector's garden, once the foundations of an old barn.

Dream House for us

On a small scale,
we have everything we wanted—comfort, convenience, beauty, and our grandchildren.

By GRACE L. ROOSEVELT

HAANEL CASSIDY

On a warm spring morning, breakfast on the balcony, overlooking lovely garden. Grandchildren will come spilling across the lawn from "old" house.

There was no question that the house had become too large for us, but we had lived in it for thirty-five years, brought up our four children there—watched the trees and the shrubs we planted mature and the house change to our changing needs—and we loved every bit of it. It was therefore only slowly, and painfully, that we first recognized, then accepted, the fact that, with the children gone, we were rattling around in an old house which was losing its life before our very eyes. For many months this took the form of such complaints from my husband as, "Everything always gets lost in this house," and for me a feeling of desolation when I walked through the empty bedrooms and thought of the time when they were bursting with young life.

In point of fact, our house was not a large one, but an old farmhouse, built about 1770. By the time we bought it several families had lived in it and made a good many alterations and additions. We, of course, added further till it held not only our family but many, many little visitors, together with our older guests and outlying members of the family and later, at the time I am writing about, any of our married children with their babies who cared to come for a few weeks' visit during the summer. As the children settled into their more or less permanent homes, these visits became rarer and it naturally became a problem to get extra help when these visits occurred and not be overstaffed when we were alone. Strange to tell, my children, although accustomed to doing everything in the way of housework in their own homes, felt they had come for a rest when visiting us and remained sublimely unconscious that things could have and had changed at home. The difference between the way we still lived and the way they lived seemed so abysmal that I was constantly being told that it would be impossible for me to understand their problems.

Actually the difference was equally great in our parents' way of life and ours. I am not speaking of such things as clothes, or the differences in moral standards and taste, but in the way they lived. For instance, when we entertain we never have more than three courses, whereas I can remember my father, before even a small dinner party of say eight or ten, taking out the bottles of wine for the many different courses, and ranging them on the sideboard in their proper order. There was sherry for the soup, white wine for the fish, Bordeaux for the entree, Burgundy for the roast, champagne for the sweet and port for the savory.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

Flowers from the garden, old treasures delight the owners, welcome the visitor in the large living room.

The "glass" room is alive with light and shadow. Cool by day, warmed by the fireplace at night, it is a perfect place for entertaining.

Subtle colors and beautiful antiques, gathered over the years, glow in a modern setting.

Spring

To begin the meal: a tureen of steamy goodness, curried-chicken soup.

Sterling serves as the background for a colorful all-on-a-platter entree.

Springtime is shad time. Time for the mildly flavored, tenderly meated big fish. And time, too, for an even greater delicacy, shad roe. Whether you live on the coast where the annual running of shad brings fresh roe to market, or inland where canned roe is available in almost every grocery, plan a superlative luncheon or dinner. Shad roe, in itself, is elegant—and deserves elegance in both accompaniments and table appointments. Though expensive, shad roe rates once-a-year feasting.

Perfect prelude for your party dinner: curried chicken in a new role—soup, color-sparked with firm slivers of tomato and bright dots of minced parsley, a savory soupçon to prepare appetites for the pièce de résistance to come, shad roe, butter-browned, mellow and moist. Arrange the entree on one big platter, your finest silver or china. The center of attention, roe, topped with frizzled bacon, golden and crunchy. Add a border of bite-sized potato balls reddened with paprika; clusters of green peas, fragrant of fresh mint and orange. Parsley, slim lemon wedges, crisp radish roses complete the picture. For dessert, meringue graduates gracefully from the pie and comes into its own as Meringue Royal topped with swirls of strawberry whipped cream and a sprinkling of luscious berries.

A memorable meal this. The kind that prompts recipe requests. Yet it's easily prepared so you can be at your best for company.

The soup takes time to prepare. But do it ahead, then heat it with the diced chicken meat so it will be steaming and spicy come meal-serving time.

CURRIED-CHICKEN SOUP: The day before the party, cut a 3-pound chicken into portions and brown in ¼ cup melted butter. Add ¼ cup each chopped onion, chopped celery and diced carrots, and 2 sour apples, peeled, cored and sliced. Cook the vegetables and fruit until slightly brown. Stir in 1 tablespoon flour and 1½ teaspoons curry powder. When well blended, slowly add 2 quarts cold water, stirring until well mixed. Add 1 cup diced tomato and the following seasonings: 2 whole cloves, ½ green pepper, chopped fine, 1½ tablespoons salt, 1 teaspoon minced parsley and ⅛ teaspoon each pepper and mace. Cover and cook slowly until the chicken is tender. Remove the chicken, cool and then chill it well in the refrigerator. Strain the soup, forcing the vegetables through a sieve. Cool and keep refrigerated. The next day, when the chicken is well chilled, skin it and dice the meat. Store diced meat in the refrigerator until time to heat the soup for serving. Before heating the broth, remove the layer of hard fat on the top. Heat broth to simmering, add the chilled, diced chicken meat and heat for about 10 minutes more. Serve very hot garnished with chopped parsley and thin slivers of the firm part of tomato. Makes 10 to 12 servings (save any leftover for a family luncheon later).

For all its elegance and delicacy, shad roe can be prepared easily, even by the inexperienced. Just remember: easy does it. Handle the fragile roe gently at all times. It's best done like this: lightly dusted with flour, then pan-broiled until brown-golden and served with bacon, a bit of crispness for contrast.

SHAD ROE WITH BACON: If you alert your fish market several days before the party, they'll probably be able to get you fresh roe, 5 pairs for 8 people, since it's so rich. Otherwise, you may have to buy the shad and separate the roe from it (simply bone and freeze the fish for use later on). Melt ½ pound butter in a heavy skillet. Separate the roe from 5 shad—roe come in pairs, so you'll have to break the two apart very gently—or use 5 cans shad roe. If you CONTINUED ON PAGE 175

Shad Feast

Once-a-year feasting with friends around a table fragrant of roses and lilacs: tribute to spring.

STUART-FOWLER

MENU

CURRIED-CHICKEN SOUP

SHAD ROE WITH BACON

POTATO BALLS

PEAS WITH MINT AND ORANGE RIND

ROYAL MERINGUE DESSERT

COFFEE OR TEA

(Planned for 8)

Sauce COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

STUART

Springtime companions: garden-tender asparagus tips topped with hollandaise, smooth, rich and golden.

There's something about a sauce: mystery, a subtle fragrance that tantalizes, suggests, yet tells you nothing explicit, that leaves you tasting and tasting again, trying to detect the secrets within. Each ingredient should complement the others so that none dominates, so that all mingle beautifully with the companion dish.

To the French, a sauce is the heart of the kitchen. Fish, they say, merely broiled or baked, is fish. But top it with a sauce rémoulade and you've created a dish. A dish exciting, a dish elegant. These masters have developed more sauces than there are days in the year—so many, in fact, that someone once commented, "The French have a sauce for it." And if they do, their sauce is generally the best. Collected here are some of the best: the best from M. Jean Vergnes, chef of New York's Colony Restaurant; the best from our own JOURNAL kitchen. Sauces perfect for spring dining—for delicately flavored fresh fish, for succulent and garden-tender vegetables, for desserts as fragrant as the new season itself.

ABBOT MILLS

Sauce secrets: Chef Vergnes shows Jane Engel.

TO GIVE FISH FINESSE

Rémoulade, a cosmopolitan cousin to tartar sauce, a glamorous garniture for fillets, sea-food cocktail and broiled lobster: Mix 1 cup mayonnaise with 1 teaspoon chopped fresh tarragon or ¼ teaspoon of the dried. Add 1 clove garlic, crushed, 1 teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon capers, 1 tablespoon minced parsley and 2 small pickles, finely chopped. Makes about 1 cup.

Dill Sauce: Tart of lemon, fragrant of dill, a smooth, custardy sauce, just right for salmon, scallops and other "gifts from the sea." Make a medium cream sauce using 3 tablespoons butter, 3 tablespoons flour and 1½ cups chicken broth. Cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. It should be about the consistency of a soft custard. Season with ¼ teaspoon salt, a pinch of pepper, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 1 teaspoon grated onion and 1 teaspoon chopped fresh dill or ¼ teaspooon dried dill. Taste and add more of anything it might need. Makes 1½ to 2 cups.

Cucumber–Horse-radish Sauce: A bit of cool crispness adds interest to bland sea food. Peel 2 cucumbers and remove seeds. Chop fine. There should be about 1⅔ cups. Mix with 1 cup mayonnaise, 5 teaspoons prepared horse-radish, 4 teaspoons prepared mustard, 1 teaspoon salt and a dash of red pepper. Blend well. Makes 2⅔ cups.

TO DRESS SPRING VEGETABLES IN WELL-SEASONED FINERY

Béarnaise Colony: From Jean Vergnes, of the Colony Restaurant, comes this best-yet béarnaise, a sauce creamy, fragrant of fresh herbs—a flavor natural for cauliflower, broccoli, asparagus (all grilled meats and sea food too). Cook all together in a saucepan 2 very finely chopped shallots, 1 tablespoon finely chopped fresh tarragon (or ½ teaspoon dry) with ⅓ cup white wine vinegar. Season with ¼ teaspoon cracked black pepper. Cook until almost all the vinegar is cooked away. Beat 5 egg yolks with 2 tablespoons water. Stir in tarragon-shallot mixture and heat over simmering water, beating constantly with a wire whisk or perforated spoon until creamy and thickened (it should be about the consistency of a boiled icing). Cool slightly. Then add slowly ½ pound melted, skimmed butter, beating well all the while. Strain the sauce. Now add 1 tablespoon each very finely chopped parsley and tarragon (or ½ teaspoon dry tarragon) and a few drops lemon juice. Season to taste with white pepper and salt. Makes about 2 cups sauce.

Poppy-seed Sauce: Simple to make, a buttery sauce lightly dotted with poppy seeds to serve over asparagus, broccoli, cauliflower or celery root. Melt 2 tablespoons butter with 1 tablespoon olive oil. Stir in 2 teaspoons poppy seeds and cook slowly for 2 to 3 minutes. Add the juice of 1 lemon, salt and cayenne pepper to taste. If you like, just before serving, add 2 tablespoons small croutons. Makes about ½ cup.

Hollandaise: A classic from the Colony kitchen, mellow, rich, yet relatively foolproof. In the top of a double boiler whip together 5 egg yolks with 2 tablespoons water; heat slowly and continue beating until the sauce is creamy and about the consistency of a boiled icing. Remove from heat and cool slightly. Then, a tablespoon at a time, add ½ pound butter, melted and skimmed, beating well after each addition. Flavor with the juice of 1 lemon and, if you like, a dash of hot red-pepper sauce. Makes about 2 cups.

Beurre Noir: Easiest of all sauces, an exciting vegetable accompaniment which becomes—with a few capers—a sauce superb for sea food. Melt 1 stick butter and brown. Stir in 2 tablespoons white wine vinegar (and 1 teaspoon capers if sauce is to be used with sea food). Makes about ½ cup.

Sauce Soubise: For party potatoes, this quick and easy sauce, an artful compounding of flavors. Chop 2 onions and cook gently in 1½ tablespoons butter until tender. Do not let them brown. Blend in 1 tablespoon flour. Add ¾ cup milk gradually and stir until thickened. Season with salt, pepper and a pinch of marjoram. Makes about ¾ cup.

FOR DESSERTS TO RELISH—AND REMEMBER

Sauce Vanilla: A classic among custards, this sauce is as genuinely vanilla as the bean itself. From the Colony. Simmer 2 cups milk with 1 vanilla bean, split lengthwise, for 5 minutes. Combine 6 tablespoons sugar with 4 egg yolks and ¼ teaspoon salt. Pour a little of the hot milk into the sugar-egg mixture, blend well, and then stir into the hot milk. Heat slowly in the top of a double boiler, stirring constantly, until the mixture will coat a silver spoon (leave the vanilla bean in the sauce—it will continue to add to the flavor). Serve warm over unfrosted cake, a dessert soufflé or ice cream. Makes 2 cups.

Berry Velva: Red as a berry and as flavorfully fresh, a satiny sauce for ice cream and dessert soufflés. Wash and clean 1 pint fresh strawberries. Sprinkle with 1 cup sugar. Put in a saucepan, cover and simmer very slowly for 10 minutes or until berries are tender. Strain through a fine sieve. Add 2 teaspoons lemon juice (more if you like a tarter sauce) and 2 tablespoons strawberry jelly. Heat, stirring constantly, until jelly is melted and blended with the purée. Can also be made with raspberries and raspberry jelly or blackberries and blackberry jelly. Makes about 1½ cups.

Chocolate Sauce: Fudge-rich and thick, truly a sauce for chocolate lovers to dream upon. Put 3 squares unsweetened chocolate, ¼ cup butter, 1½ cups confectioners' sugar, 9 tablespoons or 1 small can evaporated milk and a bit of salt in the top of a double boiler. Cover and heat over boiling water. Stir together well when chocolate has melted. Cook 30 minutes, stirring now and then. Add ½ teaspoon vanilla. Makes about 1 pint.

Sauce cooking is an art. But it needn't be a difficult one. Simply learn the rule of sauces: The duty of a sauce is to enhance, not to overwhelm. Then success will be yours.

Campbell's brings you 3 NEW SOUPS

TRY ALL THREE!

This is the best table news you've had in years! 3 new and different, wonderful and ready Campbell's Soups. Turkey Noodle! Minestrone! Chicken Vegetable! Each made to special Campbell recipes, with all the care and skill that have made Campbell's Soups the most famous of all. Ask your grocer for all 3—treat your family to one of our new Campbell's Soups, today.

Have you had your soup today?

M'm! M'm! Good! Nourishing good!
Gives you vitamins, proteins—minerals, too!

NEW! Turkey Noodle Soup

Here's a turkey noodle soup that's really great! Whole-turkey soup, with full-flavored, long-simmered broth . . . choicest pieces of tender turkey and enriched golden noodles that melt in your mouth. A new Campbell's Soup that's sure to please every member of the family.

NEW! Minestrone Soup

Easy to tell why this Italian-style vegetable soup is good! Look at all the things that make it good! Fine beef stock. Carrots, potatoes and tomatoes. Celery, peas and beans. Turnip greens and mustard greens. Spaghettini, zucchini, a zip of cheese. That's Campbell's Minestrone!

NEW! Chicken Vegetable Soup

Here's a brand-new combination of flavors . . . Campbell's own blend of chicken and broth, ribbon noodles, peas, potatoes, tomatoes and celery—something very extra special to the taste! A soup so nourishing and good—you'll be mighty glad Campbell's makes it!

CANCER 1958

What is the outlook?

While cancer is still one of our nation's greatest health problems, several recent developments are very encouraging.

• For some time the mortality rate from cancer among women has been declining. The total decrease is substantial in degree —no less than 15% in the last ten years alone among several million women ages 25 to 74.

▪ The proportion of cancer patients surviving 5 years or more after diagnosis has measurably increased.

Such facts indicate that still greater gains are possible. In this connection, the American Cancer Society states:

"One half of all cases of cancer could be saved with present knowledge if individuals would seek medical attention early enough, and if the latest and best means of diagnosis and treatment can be made more generally available."

So, pending a major break-through against this disease, you are the first line of defense against cancer. And here are the things you should do:

1. Know cancer's seven warning signals. They are listed above. Should one of these signals appear, no time should be lost in seeing your doctor.

2. Have regular health examinations. According to the American Cancer Society, in 99 out of every 100 people examined, no cancer is found. Many cancers occur in parts of the body which a general practitioner can readily examine. Should you notice changes in normal body functions between examinations, have another check-up.

Cancer's Seven Warning Signals

1. Any sore that does not heal.
2. A lump or thickening in the breast or elsewhere.
3. Unusual bleeding or discharge.
4. Any change in ▪ wart or mole.
5. Persistent indigestion or difficulty in swallowing.
6. Persistent hoarseness or cough.
7. Any change in normal bowel habits.

3. Avoid any treatment except your doctor's. Cancer is cured only by skilled physicians using surgery, X-ray, radium and other forms of radiation. In many forms of cancer, the majority of cases can be saved when diagnosed early and properly treated.

Current research on the causes of cancer, its prevention and treatment, gives even greater hope for the future. But it is still important for you to be alert to cancer's danger signals and get prompt treatment should one of them occur.

COPYRIGHT 1958—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.

Please send me the free booklet "What You Should Know About Cancer," 4-58-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

ICE PALACE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

I'd appoint you a Cabinet member. Secretary of Beauty. You'd send bunches of beauty delegates over to Russia, they'd send bunches over here. No more war. The Russians keep sending over those bulletheaded fellows with eyes like mean oysters. Who loves them? Nobody."

Perhaps, casually, an Outsider undergoing the Visitors' Treatment might say, "Where's your home, Miss Storm? You certainly don't look like an Alaskan."

They did not know that Christine Storm had been known to Alaskans since the day of her fantastic birth. She had become a legend.

"I don't know how you think Alaskans should look. But I'm an Alaskan."

"That right! Born right here in Baranof?"

"I was born in a caribou in a blizzard up in the Wood River country."

Baffled, smiling uncertainly, the visitor might catch the word "caribou" and cling to it. "Caribou? Let's see now, there's a town called Caribou, I think it's in North Dakota though. Or was it Canada I saw it?"

"I didn't mean a town called Caribou. I meant a caribou."

"I don't get it."

"A caribou is a huge sort of reindeer and I was born inside of one that my father shot when he and my mother were caught in a blizzard on a hunting trip. I wasn't due for another three months, but they say my mother was one of those dauntless girls—a kind of Alaska version of the Scott Fitzgerald type that was the fashion then. Grandpa Kennedy—her father—had sent her to Vassar. Anyway, what with the blinding blizzard and the stumbling around, and no shelter, and only the dog sled, I started ahead of time. Even if my father had had a chance to build a snow-block shelter, there wasn't time. By some miracle he shot a caribou. He slit the caribou's belly and gutted it and put my mother inside on the furs from the sled; it was blood-warm for a little while, and sheltered, and it kept her from freezing, and me too. And that's where I was born."

"Now let me get this. There was a caribou handy, and he shot it and slit it and gutted it, you said, and then your mother ——"

"My mother died. I don't know why I didn't, but I didn't."

"Now look here, Miss Storm, I may be what you Alaskans call a—what's that word?—uh—che——"

"Cheechako. We here in Alaska pronounce it cheechawker; it comes from a word in the Chinook language, it means ——"

"I know what it means. Same as tenderfoot in the West. But I don't buy that story of yours, Miss Storm, cheechawker or no cheechawker."

But then, even the girl's appearance had a tinge of incredibility. Her eyes were black, her hair golden. Baffled by the unusual combination, strangers assumed that the yellow hair was tinted. The eyes were long, narrow, and ever so slightly pinched at the outer corners. The skin was warmly golden; but this, too, was complicated by a faintly pink touch on the rather high cheekbones. Most people considered her quite a beauty, but the cynical said, "Not with that jawline, you could break your knuckles against that, and your heart too. A lot have. Heart, I mean. Ott Decker, and they say that son of Dave Husack in Seattle, and practically every young guy in the territory. But a lot of them think she's too bossy and independent. I'll say this for her: anybody who knows her will say she isn't stuck-up. I guess Bridie Ballantyne saw to that."

Bridie Ballantyne, in her own way, was perhaps as well known as Chris. Though no one knew her exact age, it was roughly estimated at between sixty-five and seventy. She lied about it or ignored it.

In a region of almost fanatic joiners, Bridie Ballantyne was a member in good standing of practically every group banded together in gregarious Baranof. She appeared weekly on the local television program. She knew the town from the spanking-new airport at one end to the primeval tundra at the other; from the latest rookie's frightened bride arriving at Kinkaid Air Force Base to the most desiccated sourdough in his leaky log cabin in the weeds at the edge of town. She belonged to the Baranof City Council and there was talk of her running for Territorial Congresswoman against Shaw Gavin, a hard-core politician of twenty-five years' standing.

Though Bridie's interests were myriad, her chief delight was the job of piloting visitors around town. She invited them for a cup of tea or a mouthful of sherry in her cluttered one-room apartment at the Ice Palace. She loved company, she loved Baranof, she loved life.

The Ice Palace. Its real name was the Kennedy Building, but no one called it that. The Ice Palace. They loved it, they bragged about it. Czar Kennedy had built it as he had built most of the town's show places. On the corner of Gold and Polaris was the Miners' National Bank, Czar Kennedy, President; just across the street the Kennedy Block housed the town's largest motion-picture theater; a drugstore, a hardware store, a supermarket. Solidly situated halfway down the street stood the three-story offices of the Baranof Daily Lode. Czar Kennedy, President and Publisher, the masthead read.

When he had built the Ice Palace the citizens of Baranof thought this a sheer bravura gesture. Fourteen stories high, with the wilderness stretching away thousands of miles in all directions. The Ice Palace was a paying concern from the day it opened, as was every Czar Kennedy enterprise. It was Alaska's first apartment house. There never was a vacancy unless a tenant accommodatingly died, rashly built a new house, or left permanently for Outside.

Circling in by plane, you could spot the Ice Palace before the town itself came into focus. Almost at the water's edge, built of pressed glass-composition blocks, it gave back the icy mountains as good as they sent, glitter for glitter—or almost as good.

As though further to emphasize the incongruity of a sizable skyscraper in that tableau of snow, tundra, sea, glacier and forest, there nestled at the base of the edifice a weather-beaten log cabin.

"I bet that Czar guy didn't build the log shanty, anyway."

"He did, though. More than fifty years ago, and he lived in it in the old Gold Rush days with his pardner Thor Storm. Pardner then, that is."

"More of a landmark now, I suppose. Nobody living in it."

"Nobody but just merely the granddaughter of old Czar Kennedy herself is living in it. Christine Storm. Chris, everybody calls her. She lives there all alone."

"Where's the rest of her family?"

"That's all the family she's got. Just two grandfathers. Unless you count Bridie Ballantyne, and she's no more relation to Chris than she is to everybody else in town. Czar Kennedy, he just about owns Baranof, and a big chunk of Alaska besides. Everything he touches turns to gold. Czar owns the daily paper—the Lode, it's called. Thor runs a weekly with Paul and Addie Barnett—it's called the Northern Light. They're always battling, the two old boys, they've been battling for fifty years."

"Tough on the girl, I should think that would be."

"Sure is. But she had it tough from the day she was born. Thor's son married Czar's daughter, see. They're both dead. The mother died when Chris was born—no use going into that, nobody believes it anyway, only Alaskans. Her father had his scalp torn off by a bear."

"What are you giving me!"

"I don't expect you to believe it."

"Uh-huh. And this Bridie, I suppose she was spewed up by a whale, like Jonah or something. And now she lives in a log cabin too."

"You don't see Bridie living in any log cabin. The Ice Palace is quaint enough for Bridie."

"Is that what folks call it? The Ice Palace?"

"Mostly we do. Its real name is the Kennedy Building."

Nick, the proprietor of the Caribou Café, ad been responsible for the nickname by hich the Kennedy Building was locally known. n the day the building was opened with for- al festivities, Nick mischievously had ar- nged an arresting display in his restaurant indow. Carelessly piled in a sizable heap ere Alaska native stones and metals. There ere glittering quartz and mica, dull green de, chunks of mottled marble, lumps of coal. ingling with these lowly members of the ative geological family were stones streaked ith silver, lumps flecked with gold, chunks ined with copper; a scattering of tungsten, ickel, cobalt, chrome, tin. It all added up to n interesting miniature display of the mineral esources of Alaska.

Topping the haphazard mound was a large ttered sign:

STONES
Contributed by Tenants of the
ICE PALACE
As They Have
NO FURTHER USE FOR THEM

After that it never was called the Kennedy uilding. Newcomers ssumed that Ice Palace as the building's real ame.

For that matter, Ott Decker might have ex- lained that Czar Ken- edy's real name wasn't Czar; but this change ad occurred half a entury ago, and no one emembered it. Signing or his claim, he had written with a Spen- erian flourish "Z. Ken- edy." His Massachu- etts Bible-reading par- nts had named the hild Zebedee, after the ather of the apostles James and John.

In the territory's fre- netic Gold Rush days newcomers were not asked personal ques- tions. It was not consid- ered good manners, or even healthy. But some- one, glancing at the sig- nature, had said, face- tiously, "Z.? What's that stand for? Ze o? You come to the right place."

Kennedy's new-found friend, Thor Storm, had spoken up in his rather precious accent that was more British than American. "I say it stands for Czar—minus the C. Czar Alex- ander Second of Russia got seven million dol- lars for this icehouse. Let me introduce the new Czar who's going to own it if his plans come true. Gentlemen, your new ruler! Czar Kennedy the First!"

Someone in the crowd pressing around the official table in the crude land office had summed up the speaker's towering frame, the great shock of blond hair, the farseeing blue eyes of the seaman, together with the signa- ture—Thor Storm—on the claim book's page.

"Where did you come by that la-di-da talk, Swensky?"

The blue of Thor's eyes had darkened to steel gray. "Thor is my name, after another big Swensky. He was a blacksmith, among other things. Perhaps you've heard of him. He lived in a place much like this. Valhalla, it was called."

But they didn't know what he was talking about. No one remembered his prediction which, in a measure, came true. Baranof today boasted that Czar Kennedy was the only mil- lionaire in Alaska. "That is, living in Alaska," they sometimes added cynically. "The big boys in Seattle and San Francisco and Wash- ington, they just live off it."

Chris had a bad time trying to adjust her emotional life to the strange circumstance in which she spent her babyhood, her childhood, her girlhood. Three months with Grandpa Thor Storm, three months with Grandpa Czar Kennedy, and over again until she came of age. Other children had families—mother, father, sister, brother.

"My family is grandfathers," she announced to her teacher on the very first day of her Alaska school life. She was six.

"I know," her teacher had said in a voice that oozed sympathy. "You poor little thing, I know all about it."

"I'm not poor," Chris had declared. "Grandpa Kennedy is the richest man in the world, and Grandpa Storm is the smartest, so I'm not poor."

Later—not too late—Chris understood. Dur- ing her college years at the University of Washington, in Seattle, she had an opportu- nity to compare the world Outside with that of the lonely far-off empire Alaska. Outside emerged a bad second. But then by that time her friends said, not altogether jokingly, that she was neurotic about Alaska. In love with it. "Chris thinks love and life are Alaska," they said.

She could not explain—because she did not realize—that this strange deviation of hers was the outcome of her bizarre childhood. No two men could have regarded love and life more differently than the two who had reared her.

THE BLUE FIRE OF APRIL

By ROSEMARY CLIFFORD TROTT

Who watches blue fire
Burn over hill and glen
Will cool the old fever
That comes to maids and men.

Who plants a blue garden
Will have a place in spring
Where he may calm the senses,
And let the spirit sing.

There was a queen at Sandringham,
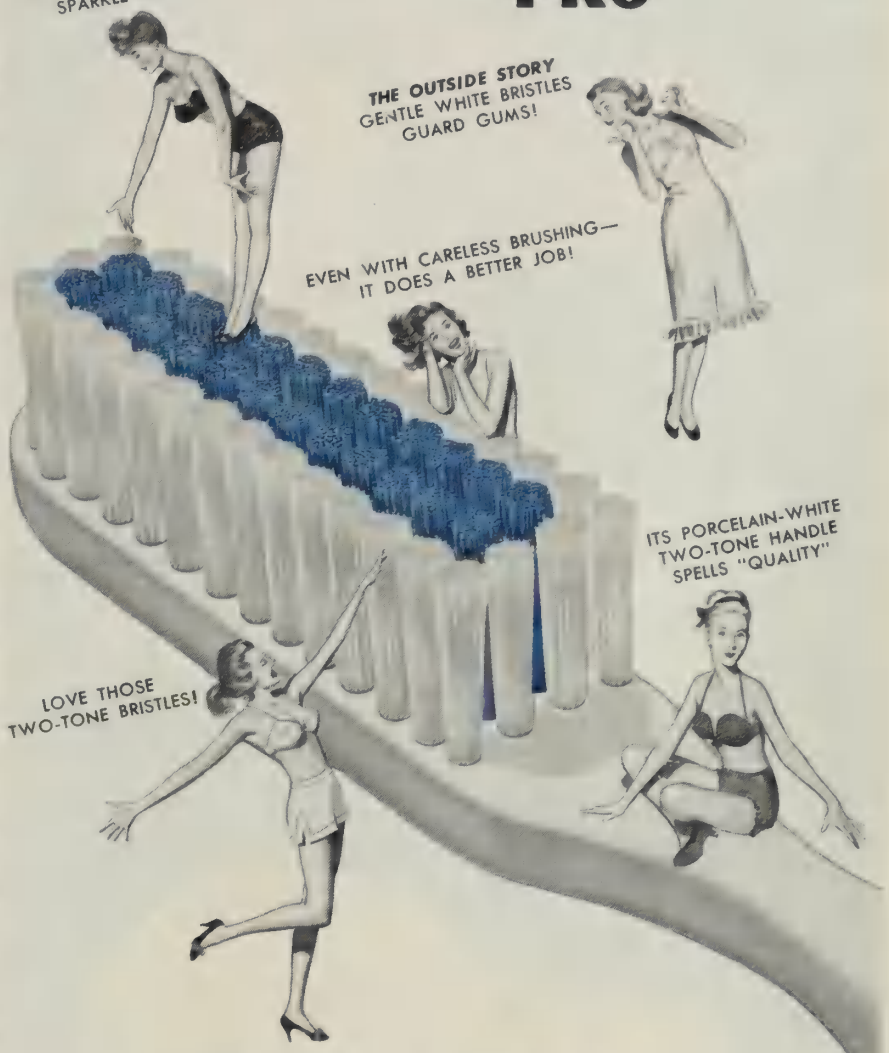
Who gave blue buds away
As I would give all coolness
If my love came back today.

Everyone who could be stirring was out tak- ing advantage of the hour or two of winter's lemon-colored daylight. The Gold Street office workers, the Federal Building employees, the shop clerks skittered across the icy sidewalks for the morning coffee break. Housewives mar- keting at a brisk trot stared resignedly at printed signs in the su- permarket bins that read Steak $2.29 a lb.; Milk, 65 cts. Qt.; Eggs, $1.23 doz.; Cauliflr 81 c.; Bread, 64c. loaf. They looked again at the money in their purses and thought longingly of summer when the milk and home-grown vegetables would be coming in by truck from Matanuska or by short- trip bush plane instead of by the long, costly air freight from Out- side.

School children at their desks stared long- ingly out at the ice-sheathed schoolyard. It would be too dark, too dangerously cold for sliding or skating by the time school was out.



Air pilots counted on those two hours, hurtling in from Seattle with the big four- engine jobs, or from up north in the twin- engine DC-3's or the little single-engine Cess- nas or Pipers. Big or small, they usually tried to make the run before the darkness came down again. Still, pilots from Kinkaid and Morgenstern Air Force bases said they would almost rather fly by Arctic night than by snow- dazzled day. But then they were a race apart; everyone knew they were transformed from pink-cheeked lads to supermen, once they buckled into their gear and crawled into the cockpit. They screeched through the air in jets, day or night, flinging their lives into the constellations like gods, wing-tipped.

Bridie Ballantyne, walking up Gold Street from her apartment at the Ice Palace at eleven this winter morning, was dressed as you might see women garbed on Michigan Boulevard in Chicago, or Madison Avenue, New York, or Sutter in San Francisco. No one knew how she did it, but there she was mincing along, a small garnet velvet hat atop the carefully coiffed steel-gray hair. A good Pribiloff seal coat. White gloves. A handsome black suède bag. Coquettish black suède pumps. Her step, what with the icy streets and her own high spirits, was a sort of prance with a slight swing. Old-timers who loved her said this was a relic of the day when, a girl of eighteen, she had whisked as student nurse through the corri-

Imagine a Tooth Brush
... THE TALK of the TOWN!

But there never was another brush like the NEW double duty

BY PRO

The new Double Duty Tooth Brush by Pro-phy-lac-tic is the greatest advance in dental care since nylon bristles were invented! Its hard INSIDE bristles polish teeth clean and bright. Its soft OUTSIDE bristles massage gums safely, automatically, all the while you brush. The Pro Double Duty does a better job for teeth and gums with any method of brushing—even if you brush your teeth carelessly and incorrectly. Unconditional money-back guarantee. Get one at your favorite store today.

Your smile will say it's better!

THE NEW PRO
double duty
TOOTH BRUSH

Pro-phy-lac-tic Brush Co., Florence, Mass.

Only Beauty Tone bulbs give you

GLAMOUR

Soft tinted light...not harsh gaudy color!

Now you can bathe your home in beauty without drowning it in colored light. Westinghouse Beauty Tone™ bulbs have a flattering light that comes from a coating within the bulb, not from harsh outside paints. You get a soft, subtle tint that calls attention to you and your rooms, not to the light. The color can't scratch or chip off; the light is soft enough to cut glare, bright enough for restful reading. Look for softer Westinghouse Beauty Tone . . . the tinted bulbs that flatter you! In 60, 75, 100, 150 watts and 3-way sizes.

YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse

BEAUTY TONE BULBS

dors of the old Seattle hospital. The evil and envious said, nurse my foot, she was a waitress in a lunchroom on Skid Row down by the Seattle docks. Political enemies said that the swing and the prance were left over from the period of her first Baranof days when the town was a crazy new mining camp.

She herself had written her life story, breezily, with perhaps an occasional assist in the grammar department from Chris Storm or from Addie and Paul Barnett, editors and reporters on Thor Storm's weekly.

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer had bought it, published it and syndicated it. The digest magazine called Look Alive had used it in its Stranger Than Fiction department.

With the money received from this lone literary effort she had achieved three almost lifelong wishes. She bought for herself a pair of smallish clear blue-white diamond earrings and it was said she wore them even to bed; she took a trip to Honolulu in midwinter and was, on her return, more chauvinistically Alaskan than ever, if possible.

For the third part she donated a neat sum toward the Baranof College Scholarship Fund. "For an Eskimo student," she stipulated. "One of those smart kids can take an engine or a watch or any mechanical thing apart and fix it and put it together again. Natural-born mechanics, I've seen 'em at it. Engine instinct. God knows where they came by the knack of it."

Her costume this frigid morning had been planned for the airport arrival of a group of Distinguished Visitors, to be followed by the Baranof Chamber of Commerce luncheon at Nick's Caribou Café. Everyone she passed greeted her: "Hi, Bridie!" . . . "Miz Ballantyne!" . . . "See you at the luncheon?"

They wore fur parkas, the hoods pulled forward so that their faces were all but obscured, but Baranof spoke to Baranof, no matter how deeply hooded in wolf. They were accustomed to seeing Bridie dressed like a fashion-magazine cover, miraculously unfrosted. Younger and hardier citizens would not have dreamed of venturing out in such garb.

Passing in cars or on foot, her fellow townsmen were concerned a bit as they saw her waiting to be picked up by the others of the reception committee. "You aim to freeze yourself into a totem, standing there?" . . . "Give you a lift, Bridie?"

A young woman stepped briskly along the snow-ridged sidewalk, a three-year-old by the hand, a one-year-old in the gocart. The faces of all three blossomed out from the fur-bordered parka hoods, fresh and glowing and unexpected as tundra flowers.

Bridie peered down at the new-minted face almost hidden in the cart. "The new one? Look at the cut of him, would you, in that parky! The spit of his dad. And how is Augie?"

"It's a girl. And my husband isn't Augie. Lowell. I'm Mrs. Lowell Kramer."

Bridie caught this challenge deftly, she fished a name up from the swarming depths of her memory. "Who else, of course! Who else but little Lorine, as if I didn't mind the day you stepped off that plane—black winter—how long ago was it now?—four—all right, call it five years ago—and you scared he wouldn't be there to meet you from the air base and in another way scared he would, and there he was at the airport waiting in his uniform, and off we went to the church. And a prettier wedding I never did see."

The girl laughed, half amused, half vexed. "Lowell isn't Air Force, he's a construction worker, we were married back home in Dakota and this one"—she pointed to the older child—"was born before I ever got here. I stepped off the plane, my husband had never seen him, he was so excited ——"

"Oh, well, make nothing of it," Bridie said airily, as though it had been the girl who was in error. "You're here and happy, and that's what counts." She looked sharply at the young woman. "Two, and another one coming. Three's a nice number, four is better ——"

A car came to a stop at the curb. Another, just behind it, halted with a screech. Windows were lowered, there were hallooing and beckoning, a girl at the wheel of the first car stuck her head out the window. A black-eyed blonde in a white fur parka, its white wolf hood dramatically framing her face. "Bridie! We called for you at the Ice Palace. Waited and waited. You said you'd be in the lobby at eleven."

"Did I now, Chris!" The feet, in the smart black suède pumps, made nothing of the snowy distance between sidewalk and car. "I had an errand, very particular it was, and I made sure you'd pick me up here at the corner."

Ott Decker emerged from the first car, scurried round to hand Bridie in. The front window of the second car was lowered. Czar Kennedy's silver head was poked out. Peering just behind it was Oscar Bogard, mayor of Baranof.

Czar Kennedy's benevolent face, his gentle voice chided her. "Come in here where you belong, Bridie, with the old sourdoughs. You can have the whole back seat to yourself, like the queen you are."

With one gesture, Bridie's white-gloved hand rejected this courtly offer. "I'm riding with the young fry." She scrambled into the broad front seat beside Chris.

Bridie patted the head of the girl in the white parka, gave a straightening jerk to her own hat that had gone askew as she clambered in. Suddenly she leaned forward to stare at the vehicle's pale orchid hood. "Say, whose car is this, anyway, you're driving, Chris? It sure ain't yours, unless you've bought a new one or Czar's gone wild and given you one, not likely."

"Mine," Ott Decker said plaintively. "My brand-new Thunderbolt. And don't ask me why I let her drive it to the airport. Except she busted her own. And I'm nuts about her."

Chris' voice was soft and low. Some said this was a trick she had learned from old Czar.

"Bridie Ballantyne, you know perfectly well I've never hit anything, and I've been driving since I was fifteen, haven't I?"

"Then what does Ott mean—you busted up your car!"

"Something hit me. Yesterday I was driving down past Mile Forty and a moose charged right out at me from the woods. I never saw anything so silly; I thought for a minute that I'd be out in the snow and the moose would be in the front seat, driving. It was a close thing; he damaged the radiator and broke a headlight. And my spirit, of course. I never thought a moose would hunt me."

Bridie pointed in the direction of the fast-vanishing car ahead of them. "I wish I had those two men here this minute. I got up and told them last week's city-council meeting, I said, more moose around this winter than I've seen in fifty years, they'll be promenading down Gold Street next. Oh, no, they said, and anyway that's the wrong kind of publicity to give out about Alaska. Ott, why'n't you Chamber of Commerce people do something?"

"Do! You'll have to speak to God. It's the record cold. There's nothing in the woods for them to eat so they come out looking for handouts. You can't shoot every moose that shows its head the other side of a tree."

"Who all's coming?" Bridie interrupted briskly. "The General, of course, but he isn't rightly a general any more, is he, now that he's vice president and chairman of the board, no less, of National Fish Pack Company? Seventy-five thousand a year, I hear he's pulling down. He a general now, anyway?"

"A general once is a general always," Ott assured her.

Bridie jerked at her skirts and scuffled her feet impatiently in the way she had when she scented news. "Who else? The General, window dressing for the Seattle crowd. Dave Husack must be coming or Czar Kennedy wouldn't be down meeting the plane. And of course Sid Kleet. Where Dave is, there's Sid just behind. Let's see now. There's Wilbur K. Distelhorst—the nerve of them in Washington! Sending just an assistant instead of the top boy. There's a fine sample of the Department of the Interior for you!"

"Wilbur K. Distelhorst," Chris interrupted dreamily. "I love to say it. It's like something out of Dickens. Or Sinclair Lewis."

"Look, Chris, let me drive, will you?" Ott Decker said. "We're a little late. Can't even see Czar's car. I think I hear the plane."

For the first time Chris tensed a little at the wheel. She risked a quick searching glance at Ott Decker's face. A boyish flush suffused it as she eyed him.

n a big girl now, Ott. You're nervous as egroom. Are you importing some choice l from Outside? Object matrimony?"

ldie yelped, "Ott!"

o. And you know why, so don't needle Chris."

ldie began to breathe heavily with the in- and exhaust of a steampipe about to . "Ott Decker, if you don't tell us this min- hat you're being so sneaky about ——" ll right." He threw his arms wide in a ges- of revelation. "Czar kept it under wraps. g Husack's coming. Bayard. And that e's going to marry—or supposed to. And supposed to stay six months in Alaska. eir apparent getting acquainted with his le subjects, I suppose."

ere was silence in the car. Even Bridie momentarily speechless. Then she drew ong whistling bronchial breath of one who out to blast. Ott Decker raised a restrain- and.

Vait a minute. I haven't finished. Nobody vs this, Chris. Nobody but your Grandpa , and Paul and Addie Barnett. And, of se, Czar's whole crowd, and they don't v Thor knows."

ris began to laugh, not very merrily. ll, we'll have a field day with that." She ped, stiffened at the wheel. "But we went ess yesterday. Did they know it then?"

They didn't know until last night. It must been too late, they distribute this noon."

Ott Decker! If ve known about all along ——" tell you I haven't. ldn't I tell you, is? That isn't all. ng Husack's only ing a month or so , to get the feel of ska in the winter. t's what they said. feel. Then Outside June or July, and k here and we're posed to do the real led tour, Barrow Juneau, with you peroning, Bridie. You window-dressing, is. Unless he marries in the meantime. But isn't the idea. Just wait, you two."

ridie jerked her hat forward, a characteris- gesture of utter irritation. "Wait for what? at is the idea?"

I'm the idea, I suppose," Chris said quietly.

Partly. But this is real old melodrama. y're grooming young Bay for the big-time e. They aim to have him appointed gover- of Alaska. Youth, see, in the saddle."

n, as Bridie again opened her mouth, ow wait a minute. You haven't heard the f. A couple of years in all, he resigns on e excuse, then he's back in Seattle and they him for Congress. Then senator. Then, by time he's maybe forty or forty-five, he's idate for the first President of the United tes to come out of the Great Neglected rthwest Empire." He leaned forward and red hard at the silent girl at the wheel. "You nk she'll run the White House O.K., Chris? those lovely state dinners?"

Bridie found voice again. "Fine time to be ling us, Ott Decker. And for Chris ——"

"I tell you I didn't get wind of it until half hour ago when I was calling the Ice Palace. ound out Dave Husack wasn't staying at ar's house. They've reserved the four rooms y call the Governor's Suite on the top or."

"Four," Chris said quietly. "That's a bed- m for old Dave, one for Bay, and a sitting m. And a bedroom for her."

knew it!" Bridie crowed. "I had a hunch is morning early something was on the fire. ust thought I'd go up and check the Ice Pal- e VIP suite. I knew Sid Kleet alone didn't te it, even with that Distelhorst along, and usack generally always stays at Czar's place. e minute I laid eyes on it I smelled some- ing funny. Sitting room, three bedrooms, essing room in the big one, two baths, flow- s in vases. Who gives Dave Husack flowers? d as soon give flowers to a Kadiak bear. The idal suite if I ever saw it. But who's the ide? I said."

They were in sight of the airport now, a gay toy in a sparkling white setting, dotted with other tiny silver-bright toys.

Chris' gaze was straight ahead as she guided the car toward the parking space. "Does Grandpa Kennedy know about the Ice Palace?"

"He made the arrangements."

"You knew."

"Look, Chris," Ott said miserably, "I'm Chamber of Commerce secretary. My job is to go along with the people who run this town. I think the territory's being had, but if I'm going to buck the big boys, why, I can resign. Czar didn't want this news around for a lot of reasons and one is that Thor's weekly went to press last night and Czar counted on a beat for this afternoon's Lode. He's got it."

"Thanks, chum."

Desperately: "Look, Chris, marry me and we'll get out of here. I can get the C. C. secretary job in Topeka any day I want it."

"Indelicate!" Bridie shouted. "Asking a girl to marry you in front of a third party."

Ott hugged her as he handed her out of the car. "I'd marry you, too, if I was young enough, Bridie. But I just couldn't go your pace."

He rushed around to the other side of the car, but Chris was already making for the building. Over her shoulder she said, "I wouldn't be too sure if I were Grandpa Czar. Paul and Addie have a mukluk grapevine." A roar rent the blue. "There they are." A loud-speaker blared. The mountains hurled the sound back into the crystal air. "Pan American Number Six-two-nine arriving from Seattle, Gate Two. . . . Arctic Clipper Number Three-seven-five for Nome, Kotzebue, Oogruk—"

Ott opened the heavy door that led to the crowded waiting room. He looked at the girl and she at him; her hand touched his arm and rested there a moment. "Thanks, Ott dear."

"I could be mistaken."

"No. Grandpa's never forgiven me for not marrying Bay. This is his way of punishing me. Or something."

"How scheming can an old man get? Thor going to be here?"

"You know he doesn't go in for reception committees."

Inside the waiting room were warmth, movement, a shimmer of excitement. Baranof was a crossroads between Russia and the United States, between Japan and the United States, between the North Pole and the United States. The main concourse today—and every day and night, VIP's or no VIP's—was bursting with men and women and children and infants in arms waiting to hurl themselves into the clouds. Slim lads in Air Force uniforms. In the lunchroom ham and eggs and waffles and steaks and coffee appeared and disappeared like props in a conjurer's trick. The loudspeaker trumpeted again.

Passengers for Point Barrow. . . . Number Six-eight-nine arriving Gate Three. . . . Fairbanks, Anchorage, Seattle leaving —— Passengers Cordova . . . Sitka . . . Ketchikan . . . Juneau. . . . Passengers for the North Pole.

Even in that crowded room it was easy to distinguish the arresting figure of Czar Kennedy. He stood tall and erect in a world of six-foot men. But it was the head that gave him distinction. Above the benevolent face your eye was caught by the spectacularly beautiful hair, wavy, abundant, vigorous. Its natural mixture of white and steel gray imparted a silver-blue tone.

The three late-comers made their way through the crowd toward the beacon of that distinguished head. Ott darted out to the runway gate where the big brass stood stoically in Arctic full-dress splendor: the very best leather, the very best fur, the goldenest gilt in the uniformed world.

Czar Kennedy and Oscar Bogard stood near the exit as Chris and Bridie came toward them. Ott, rushing in now, reported the plane's imminent landing.

"Well, Bridie," Czar Kennedy said, "you would have done better to ride along with Oscar and me after all. We had time for a cup of coffee."

"I never touch the stuff. Tea is my tipple. You know what! I'd like to come down here and spend the whole day sometime. Just visit around and watch the people and the planes in and out, it's better than a movie."

"Oh, now, Bridie," Ott jeered. "You trying to make out you're just a little girl from the farm? You fly all the time; you're whizzing in and out of Baranof like a bluebottle."

"Back east, when I was a little tyke," Czar mused, aloud, "we used to go down to the depot to see Number Eleven come in, the big-city train with Pullmans. It's the same thing, planes or trains, today or yesterday."

Oscar Bogard cut short this little reminiscence. "Here's the Barnetts," he announced.

Chris Storm's hands were outstretched toward the approaching couple. "Paul!" she called. "Addie!" The intelligent civilized faces beamed affection upon her as they made their way toward the group.

Oscar Bogard greeted this couple with an unconvincing joviality. "What're you folks doing down here! Meeting friends?"

No one in the history of man has made so triumphantly as Jesus that appeal to the human heart which liberates life from the dominations and deceits of environment, and bestows upon it the increasing consciousness of the immortality of spiritual values.

"GENTLEMAN WITH A DUSTER"
Seven Ages
Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons

"Literary Twosome." For an 8" by 10" full-color print of this original photo by Walter Chandoha, send 25¢ in coin and one Puss 'n Boots label to Cat Pictures, Dept. J-48, Box 6586, Chicago 77, Illinois. Offer good only in U.S.A.

"Health improved, pep doubled on a regular diet of Puss 'n Boots"

Natural whole-fish diet best for both cats and kittens

To the above comment from her letter, Mrs. J. R. H. of Atlanta, Georgia adds: "A short time ago, our cat and her kittens seemed lacking in pep and energy. We saw an improvement almost as soon as we put them on Puss 'n Boots regularly. You should see them now—sleek and sassy and full of life!"

You can quickly see the difference Puss 'n Boots makes in the well-being of kittens and cats. Made from fresh-caught whole fish—including the protein-rich fillets—it supplies an abundance of vitamins, minerals, calcium and other vital nutrients. Also includes tasty cereals, plus extra Vitamin B_1 for energy, appetite and good digestion.

See for yourself the benefits of feeding Puss 'n Boots regularly. Start your pet on this nutritious whole-fish diet soon.

CHECK YOUR CAT against these characteristics of healthy cats fed regularly on Puss 'n Boots:

GROWTH AND VIGOR from the high-quality proteins in Puss 'n Boots.
GOOD APPETITE from the extra Vitamin B_1 in Puss 'n Boots.
NORMAL REGULARITY from the selected cereals in Puss 'n Boots.
STRONG BONES from the calcium and phosphorus in Puss 'n Boots.
SILKY FUR from the natural oils and minerals in Puss 'n Boots.
LIVELY ENERGY from the all-round nutrition of Puss 'n Boots.

How the Natural Life Balance of WHOLE FISH is Retained in Puss 'n Boots COSTLY FILLETS, rich in essential, high-quality proteins. Usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

LIVER AND GLANDS, for minerals and vitamins. Vital for health. Often extracted for medicinal use, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

BONE STRUCTURE, for valuable calcium and phosphorus. Made soft, crumbly and digestible, and retained in Puss 'n Boots.

PUSS'n BOOTS

Rich in the nutrients that are rich in health

Packed in 8-oz. and 15-oz. sizes

Win a 1958 Corvette or a Mink Stole or any of 185 other valuable prizes, in Puss 'n Boots $25,000 "Write the Title" CONTEST! Get details and FREE entry blank from your grocer.

Coast Fisheries Division of The Quaker Oats Company, Chicago 54, Illinois

THE AMERICAN GIRL SHOE

the "dollars more" look... in black patent leather fashion excitement far beyond the live-on-a-budget prices

$6.99 to $10.99 prices slightly higher South, West and Canada

... Street, Boston, Mass. • Div. Consolidated National ... Corp. • Also made in Canada by Ludger Duchaine, Inc., Que.

Addie Barnett of the crisp red hair and the lively retort met this in character. "On the contrary."

Paul Barnett, tall, stooped, spectacled, might have passed for a postgraduate summer college student if it were not for the slight graying at the temples. Slow of speech, almost drawling, his utterances often took on a misleading mildness. "You haven't forgotten that Addie and I get out a weekly paper, have you, Oscar?"

"Not likely. I get more mention in one issue of your weekly than in a whole month of Czar's daily. Not better—but more."

"It's nice to know you read us, Oscar. How did you like Thor's editorial this week?"

Oscar's little eyes narrowed. "You keep on with stuff like that against Czar, you'll lose what little advertising you got."

In each weekly issue of the Northern Light there appeared a Thor Storm editorial and a column of astonishingly unstilted, often witty and always courageous comment called—somewhat lamely—Deep Freeze. Served... from this receptacle were odds and ends p... cal, casual, personal, pungent. Their o... was attributed to no one in particular, b... was known that Paul and Addie Barnett, ... Storm and even Chris Storm contribu... Sometimes ... Thor Storm local editorial f... its way into the editorial pages of such big ... dailies as the New York Times, the San F... cisco Call, the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

Ott Decker was herding them to the run... gates. The little group stood in the brief ... winter light, their faces turned toward ... moving shining thing in the sky, brighter t... the Arctic sun itself.

Addie Barnett leaned close to Chris. "H... you heard about Bay Husack and the gi... I tried to get you on the telephone."

"Yes."

"Do you mind if I let Czar know that ... and I know? Before they land? It's mean, ... I can't resist it."

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERN... ON PAGES 80 AND 81.

Vogue Design No. 9465.	One-piece dress; 10–16 (31–36). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9475.	Shirt, skirt and slacks; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. S-4880.	Redingote and one-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. 9473.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9476.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9464.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9472.	One-piece dress and overskirt; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9471.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.

"Go ahead."

A little apart stood Kinkaid Air Base big brass. It unbent just a little in the direction of Alaska's First Citizen. "Mr. Kennedy," they said. "How are you, sir?"

Czar's hand went to his head in a semimilitary salute. "General," he said, with a kind of sweet solemnity. "Colonel . . . Major ——"

Now the sky monster roared toward them, it touched on tiptoe. The aluminum steps were rushed up to its shining side.

The plane door opened. Two hostesses stood in the doorway, one blond, one brunet, coolly pretty, very smart in their blue tailored uniforms and their slim high-heeled pumps.

The General was the first to emerge. Just behind him loomed Dave Husack, vast, opulent. For a moment he blotted out his shadow, but it followed him as always, for where Dave Husack stood or walked, there was Sid Kleet in his footsteps. Slight, pale, impassive, Sid Kleet was a general too. But industry, not war, was his science.

Down the steps, their heels clattering on the bright metal; pausing a moment for the photographers. Now the doorway framed the businesslike figure of Wilbur K. Distelhorst. He glanced at the welcoming committee, at the impressive brass, at the photographers, at the fish-bowl faces swimming behind the big plate-glass windows of the airport waiting room. He then shook hands with the two pretty airplane hostesses and began a leisurely descent of the stairs. The effect was that of a one-man parade. You just heard his first reply to the question put to him by the Daily Lode reporter, "I'm here for just one reason. To learn. To learn all about your wonderful ——" when two handsome young people appeared in the doorway: a man and a woman.

"Look at that! She's got on a mink coat!" Bridie Ballantyne exclaimed.

"Why not?" Chris retorted. "Wouldn't you wear one if you had it?"

"Not if I was her, I wouldn't. I'd dress plain as a post."

"It just means she's tough-fibered and honest, in her own terms," Chris said. "Out for blood and doesn't hide the switchblade."

"I guess they're really wearing those hats this winter," Bridie concluded mournfully, "if she is. It sure makes mine look dated."

Chris had not seen him in two years. She had not seen Dina Drake or Dave Husack or Sid Kleet in all that time. The future Mrs. Bayard Husack, after all, Chris mused. Then, cattily for her, She's certainly earned it.

The Air Force closed in on the General; the committee enveloped Dave Husack, Sid Kleet, Wilbur K. Distelhorst. Young Husack and the mink-coated girl stood momentarily outside the cluster.

A shade too heartily Bayard Husack said, "Hello, Chris! It's great to see you, you're looking lovely as always, here's Dina dying to see you. And Dina you've met Mrs. Ballantyne, haven't you, at least you've heard me talk ——"

Yes, and you're talking a little too much this minute, Chris thought. The two young women looked at each other, their hands met. The conventional smile arranged itself on their faces, they looked at each other, the tall black-haired girl whose eyes were an unexpected blue, the blond girl with the startling black eyes.

"It's wonderful to see you again. What an enchanting coat," Dina Drake said. "And the hood. If Paris could see it they'd announce the new Alaska look."

"It's a parka," rather lamely. "We pronounce it parky. Don't ask me why."

"All that white fur! It's so dramatic. Like a costume in a musical."

A poker term came to Chris' mind. You've tipped your hand early again, as usual. Well, if that's the way you want to play.

"Everybody wearing mink in Seattle I suppose, Miss Drake," Bridie observed blandly.

"This?" Miss Drake glanced down at herself absently. "I got this last winter in New York." She removed her hat, collapsed it in some magic way, and thrust it into her coat pocket. She then drew over her head a soft, mammoth mink hood which had lain draped below the neckline of the sumptuous garment. The modeling of the face and the look in the eye were, perhaps, too modern and too motivated for that soft fur frame. Ott Decker, emotionally vulnerable but no fool, bustling up to herd the group indoors, peered politely at the fur-framed face. A dish, he decided, and lots of style, but she looks like the wolf in Red Ridinghood.

"Miss Drake," Bay was explaining, "is dad's second secretary. I mean Miss Gurkin wouldn't come, she's a bit vintage anyway for a jaunt like this, and of course mother couldn't possibly, so ——"

Whew! Chris thought. Elaborate. Aloud she said politely, "And how is your mother, Bay?"

But Mayor Bogard was shooing everyone into the waiting room. "Any you folks like a cup of coffee? The luncheon's twelve-thirty but you prolly got up before breakfast ha-ha!"

Dave Husack held up a protesting palm. "They fed us every minute on that plane from the time we left Seattle." In the vast golden-brown cashmere topcoat he looked like a miraculously trained Alaska Kadiak brown bear balancing on its hind legs.

Now his small, somewhat bloodshot eyes encountered the amused gaze of Christine Storm. He put one great fur-gloved paw on Chris' shoulder, with the other he patted her cheek. "Chris!" he bellowed. "How's Alaska's Joan of Arc?"

Very low, without moving his lips, Czar Kennedy said to Mayor Bogard, "Get going."

Obediently Bogard called, "Now then, folks! Let's get organized. Let's see, now. Mr. Husack, if you'll come this way ——"

But now Ott Decker, the expert organizer, took over. He had collected the baggage stubs, he had handily placed the luggage, he waved a hand toward the waiting cars.

"In, everybody! I'll break trail if you'll follow. The parade is just starting. Plenty of room; the General's gone with the base group, he'll join us later at luncheon. Mr. Husack—Dave, that is—you're with Czar, of course, and you, too, Mr. Distelhorst, and Sid Kleet, naturally. Bridie, I know Paul and Addie'll be happy to take you in. Bayard Husack and Miss—uh—in my car, I hope, if that's all right with you ——"

Czar Kennedy made no move to order these arrangements, he wasted no energy on such details. But a disturbing mistake seemed to have been made. The Barnetts' shabby car already was to be seen scooting down the airport road. Bridie Ballantyne, seated between Dave Husack and Sid Kleet, was queening it in the back of Czar's car; and in some mysterious way Wilbur K. Distelhorst was snugly ensconced between Dina Drake and young Husack in Ott Decker's orchid equipage which was on the point of leaving.

"Get out!" Czar said to the bewildered Bogard beside him. "Tell Distelhorst he belongs in this car."

But when Bogard had hurriedly clambered out and had conveyed this message, standing at the Decker car window and apparently encountering good-natured but stiff resistance, he turned his head to look piteously back at Czar.

"Says he's doing fine." He floundered back to the Kennedy car.

The two airplane hostesses emerged from the waiting-room door and hailed a yellow taxi at the curb. Now a third figure, smart in the blue uniform of a pilot, came through the doorway.

"Ross!" Chris called to him. "Ross! Want a lift?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 98

Woman's sphere is the home, and the home, too, is the sphere of man. The home embraces everything we strive for in this world. To get and maintain a decent home is the object of all our best endeavors.

HELEN KELLER
Out of the Dark
Published by Doubleday & Company, Inc.

You can not brush bad breath away... reach for Listerine!

Listerine Stops Bad Breath 4 Times Better Than Tooth Paste!

Here is why you can not brush away bad breath! Germs in the mouth cause 9 out of 10 cases of bad breath (halitosis) and no tooth paste kills germs the way Listerine Antiseptic does. Listerine kills germs on contact, by millions—stops bad breath four times better than tooth paste. Gargle Listerine full-strength every morning, every night.

Reach for Listerine

...Your No. 1 Protection Against Bad Breath

We've found a way

The heart-warming

But now you can make them so and choose from four entirely

Do you remember how good they were—the hot muffins your mother used to whisk out of the oven? The very sight of them warmed your heart. Just slightly crusty on the bottom. Bursting with light yellow goodness above. And when you picked up a steaming muffin—and broke it open—remember how tender and light, and fine-textured it was? With these new Betty Crocker mixes you can bake just such glorious

NEW ORANGE MIX—they're lightly, delicately flavored with the warm sunny essence of fresh-picked oranges. A new taste-tempter in muffin mixes!

NEW DATE MIX—you'll find delicious little pieces of softened dates sprinkled through each cloud-light muffin. So rich and moist it needs no spread or jelly.

o bring to you...

muffins of long ago!

sily with my new mixes...
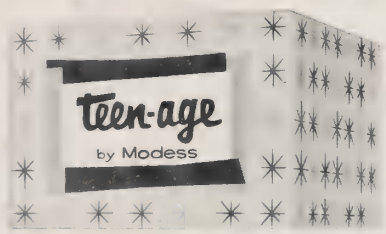
fferent flavors– Betty Crocker emade muffins. But quickly! In a twinkling they're out of the pack- nd into the pan—even if you've never baked a muffin before. Try one of the new Betty Crocker Muffin Mixes. See how your home- e muffins make supper a happier, warmer, more festive meal.

ew muffin mix box contains two separate laminated packets. Each one holds gh mix for six average-size muffins. For small families, one packet is plenty.

Betty Crocker's New Muffin Mixes are guaranteed to come out perfect, or send box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minnesota, and General Mills will return your money.

NEW CORN MIX —you'll notice that they're finer-textured, more moist than most . . . with the wonderful pure corn taste that goes so happily with butter.

NEW RAISIN-BRAN MIX —this fine, old-time favorite was a chore for your mother. Now you can stir and bake while the coffee perks.



Written just for you, mother...

When a daughter grows up, the booklet "How Shall I Tell My Daughter?" can be of infinite help to a mother.

Written with a sensitive insight into the mother-daughter relationship, it answers a daughter's questions clearly, sympathetically.

Send for your copy today— free from the makers of Modess® Sanitary Napkins and Belts and Teen-Age by Modess.

Created just for your daughter...

New Teen-Age by Modess, the only napkin designed specially for young girls, is slimmer in contour for complete comfort. Super absorbency, without extra bulk, for sure protection. Exclusive cover in dainty pastel design.

Look for Teen-Age wherever Modess is sold.

Director of Education,
Personal Products Corporation,
Box 5832-4, Milltown, New Jersey

Please send me a free copy of the booklet "How Shall I Tell My Daughter?"

Name_____
(PLEASE PRINT)

Street_____

City_____ State_____

(OFFER GOOD ONLY IN U. S. A. AND CANADA)

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 95

The man held up a hand in greeting; he smiled. The olive skin, the white teeth in contrast, the light of recognition in his eyes gave him a look of almost startling brilliance. He hesitated a moment, then he walked swiftly to the car.

Ott Decker, at the wheel, asked, "Where you in from, Ross?"

"Nome-Kotzebue-Oogruk run."

"Pile in."

Chris slid nearer Ott Decker so that there was space for a third passenger in the wide front seat. "In! In! We've got precious freight here, and they're not used to our climate." As he entered, and the car moved off, she made the introductions expertly, over her shoulder. "Miss Drake, you've met Ross. In Seattle—remember? . . . Mr. Distelhorst—Ross Guildenstern, as in Hamlet. Mr. Distelhorst of the Washington Department of the Interior. . . . Bayard Husack of the Seattle Husacks, no less, you know him too. . . . Ross Guildenstern is one of the pet pilots on Arctic Circle Airlines, Mr. Distelhorst."

The bronze young man with the Nordic name removed his blue cap and turned his head toward the three in the rear seat. His vigorous hair was like another cap, black, thick, stiff. "You had us strolling around in the air there for a while, waiting for you to come in. Who was the big brass?"

"General, that's who," boomed Distelhorst. "General Cass Baldwin." He cleared his throat, he peered right, he peered left, hunching low in the seat. "This is going to be mighty interesting. Now then. I'm here to get the feel of this country. I'd like to get a line on you young folks, it's you youngsters that will have to carry on when the torch is handed to you."

As though they were alone in the car Bay Husack said, "You haven't changed a bit, Chris."

Her sparkling face looked over her shoulder toward him a moment. "Not even for the worse?"

"Well"—grudgingly—"perhaps just a little."

The two laughed together then, spontaneously, as at some old private joke. An almost indiscernible stir of resentment seemed momentarily to move Dina Drake and Ott Decker.

Wilbur Distelhorst was not a man to waste time in silence. He released a barrage of interrogation. Population . . . industry . . . legislature . . . local government . . . Baranof College enrollment . . . Fish gold timber oil food clothing daylight temperatures.

"—— one thing, I understood it would be dark all day, this time of year, why it's real bright, just how much daylight do you ——"

Ott Decker, at the wheel, tossed the answers over his shoulder:

"We have plenty of daylight. Of course December and January are kind of dark, but the sun doesn't set until about—well, it's about noon now—it'll set about two o'clock."

Chris Storm turned to look straight at Distelhorst. "Another interesting thing about Alaska is the people."

"People?"

"I think," Chris persisted, "you'll find the Alaska people interesting too."

"Fine! Fine! I'm here to learn. Here to learn about this great empire of the North." He leaned forward and with one gloved forefinger prodded Ross Guildenstern in the back. "Now you, young man, in the pilot's uniform. What nationality are you—if you don't mind my asking? I've got a pretty good guess, but you tell me."

As Guildenstern turned his head Dina Drake thought, He's absolutely thrilling when he smiles. Photogenic. Pictures.

"I don't mind," Ross said. "I'm an American. North American."

Distelhorst shook his head a little, but tolerantly. "Well, now, you might say the North American Indian is an American, but at the same time, why ——"

"You sure might," Ott Decker agreed, forgetting for an instant his Chamber of Commerce secretarial role. A ripple of laughter—a giggle, in fact—escaped Chris.

Ross explained pleasantly, "My mother was part Eskimo. My father was Danish. That explains the name. Guildenstern."

"You don't say!" Distelhorst took out a notebook and, somewhat handicapped by his fur-lined gloves, scribbled industriously. "Well, now, how long you been here?"

"I've been here all my life. Except during the war, of course."

"No, no. You Eskimos, I mean. How long you been here in Alaska? Way before the Russians, that's for sure. I've been reading up on Alaska, the Russian occupation and so forth. That was back in—let's see now ——"

"Eighteen sixty-seven," Bay Husack said.

"That's right—'67," the questioner agreed. "How long did you say you Eskimos been here? Way before '67, that's for sure."

His head turned slightly toward his interrogator, a gleam shot from Ross' eyes. Silent Eskimo laughter. But the profile view seemed serious; his tone was soft, courteous. "We were here before the Russians, yes. The Russians first took possession in 1729, I think. We Eskimos were here in 1000 B.C.—or earlier."

"Yeh? That's interesting —— Heh, wait a minute! What d'you mean—B.C.!"

"Before Christ," Ross replied politely.

"Who you kidding? You giving me the old tenderfoot routine? What's that you call 'em—cheechakos or something?"

"No, sir. We were North Americans before it was known as North America. Perhaps we crossed over when the Diomedes weren't islands at all, but a peninsula. Nobody knows. Of course there are artifacts and traces and so on. We've been here—well, anyway twenty-five hundred years. That we know of, I mean."

Wilbur K. Distelhorst looked sharply at the smart uniform, the lively intelligent face, the Seattle haircut, the Air Force ring on the gloveless brown hand stretched along the back of the seat behind Chris.

"Well, say, gosh!" He began to scribble again in the notebook. "This is going to make quite a report. You ever live up there, young man? I mean up there in the blubber country—you might say, the North Pole region?"

The fingers along the seat back beat a little tattoo for just a moment. The white fur hood and the dark head turned, faced each other, turned away; the hand lay quietly along the back of the seat. "Uh—not the North Pole exactly. Of course the North Pole has become a kind of junket lately. But it's a bit rugged for everyday living—even for Eskimos. I used to live up in the northern section of Alaska. Oogruk, the village is called. It's on the Bering Sea. Some of my folks still live there—cousins, and my grandmother and a brother and his wife and children. Blubber country? That's a new name for it, sir. Very amusing."

They were in the town now, briefly bright and sparkling. The brand-new orchid-colored car crunched crisply over the feathery snow. Others flashed past it—red green blue pink gray cream. The new four-story Federal Building came into view, solid stone and cement, many-windowed.

"Look! Look!" Dina came to life. Arour the Polaris Street corner dashed a team twelve Huskies pulling a dog sled guided by fur-clad man who alternately ran behind t sled or lightly flipped one of its runners.

Even Bay Husack was moved to utteranc The anachronistic outfit ran alongside the ca the faces of the occupants stared out at t bronze-skinned smiling man.

"Chris, you think of everything," B Husack said. "But how did you get him to tin in on that split second?"

"What nonsense!" Chris retorted briskl "He won the dog-sled races yesterday. It w the last day of the Winter Festival. You shou have come in time for it. He's just showi off."

Ott Decker had slowed down. The dog sl was coming alongside now. Ross Guildenste lowered the car window. "Hi!" he called to t man on the sled runner. "I hear you won o yesterday."

"Hi!" the broad bronze face, half hidden the fur hood, now flashed with the brillian of the warm friendly smile. "Sure did."

"How much?"

"Seventy miles. Four hours, thirteen mi utes, five seconds. Rough going."

"Stout fella!" Ross shouted; and closed t window. "My cousin," he explained over h shoulder to the three in the back seat. "Har Noyakpuk. He lives up in Wiseman. Ott, dr me off at the corner of Bonanza, will yo Thanks for the lift. Thanks a lot, Chris." turned to face the visitors, his manner, tone correct. "Good-by. I hope you will enj your visit in Alaska." He opened the do stepped out, raised a hand in farewell, was

They turned the final corner. The Ice Pal came into view.

"Say!" Distelhorst exclaimed inadequate

"Look!" Dina's voice, the elegance gained, had a note of incredulity. "A l cabin. It's a prop, of course."

Quietly Chris said, "No, there are a lot log cabins in Baranof."

Ott Decker took over in his Chamber Commerce capacity. "That's the Kenne Building. We call it the Ice Palace. It's apartment house—kind of like an apartme hotel, really."

"Say!" Distelhorst exclaimed again. "W had the nerve to build it? Heh, wait a minu don't tell me. Was it ——"

"That's right. Czar Kennedy."

"Look! There are curtains and everythi in the log cabin," Dina said. "I know abo apartment hotels, but nobody lives in the l cabin, do they?"

"Well—yes," Ott Decker said. "It's be lived in by one person and another for t past fifty years or more."

"Who in the world is crazy enough or p enough to have to live in it now?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

"It's an ancient custom from before television known as eating at the table."

RESERVE RIGHT NOW FOR THE PERFECT SHOW IN TODD-AO!

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN'S

SOUTH PACIFIC

Premiere Engagements:

NEW YORK — NOW!
Criterion

MIAMI BEACH — NOW!
Sheridan

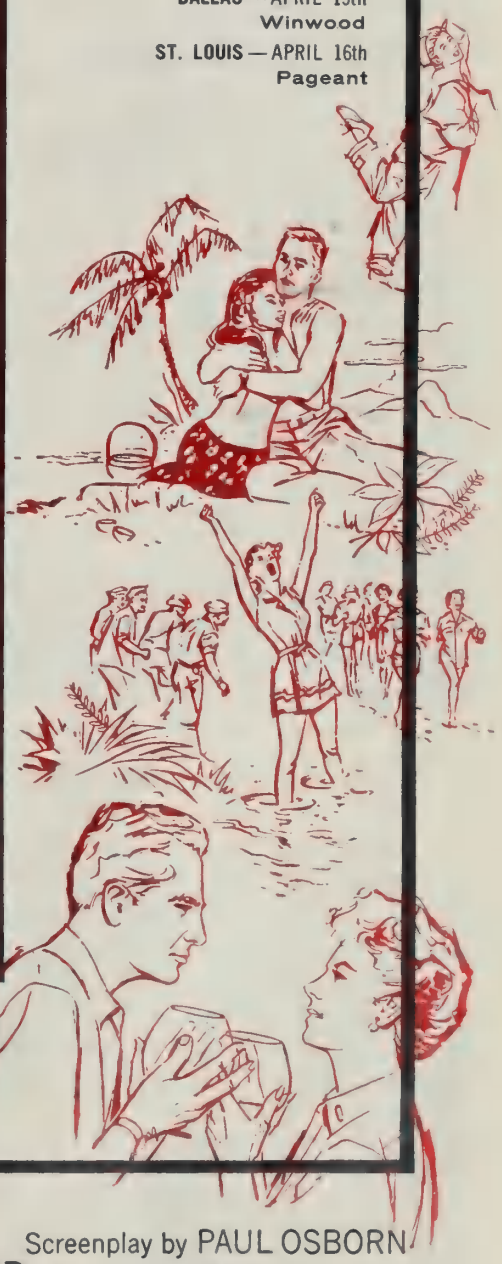
CHICAGO — NOW!
McVickers

PHILADELPHIA — NOW!
Midtown

WASHINGTON — APRIL 1st
Uptown

BALTIMORE — APRIL 1st
New

CLEVELAND — APRIL 2nd
Loew's Ohio



PITTSBURGH — APRIL 7th
Nixon

BOSTON — APRIL 8th
Saxon

DETROIT — APRIL 9th
United Artists

DALLAS — APRIL 15th
Winwood

ST. LOUIS — APRIL 16th
Pageant

PRODUCED BY BUDDY ADLER

DIRECTED BY JOSHUA L. LOGAN

COLOR BY TECHNICOLOR

Screenplay by PAUL OSBORN
Produced at 20th Century-Fox
A MAGNA Production

STARRING
ROSSANO BRAZZI · MITZI GAYNOR · JOHN KERR featuring

RAY WALSTON
JUANITA HALL

Announcing the NEW

Sunbeam

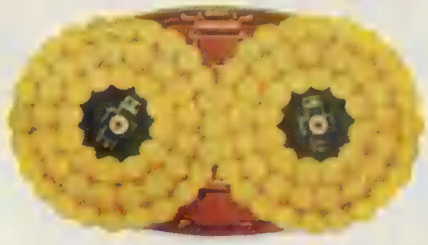
ELECTRIC

FLOOR CONDITIONER

IT'S THE BEST WAY TO

STOP THIS and... ENJOY THIS

...AND KEEP ALL YOUR FLOORS BEAUTIFUL!



Takes hard work out of cleaning your floors. Waxes evenly for full floor protection. Polishes and buffs to a deep rich lustre. Results have a professionally cleaned look.

Puts new beauty and protection on all your floors—and does it easier, faster, and better. Sunbeam's counter-rotating action scrubs cleaner, waxes more evenly, polishes smoother and buffs brighter—even cleans your carpets with professional results! A quick buffing puts a rich lustre on waxed floors—even on floors waxed with a "self-polishing" wax. Has powerful Sunbeam built quality motor. Complete with two scrubbing-waxing brushes, two polishing brushes, and two buffing pads. Only $54.40

Rug Cleaning Attachment available. Only $9.95

Works under cabinets

Covers full 12" path

©S. C. ©SUNBEAM, MIXMASTER *Suggested Retail Price.

Look for the MARK OF QUALITY Sunbeam Famous for MIXMASTER, Frypan, etc.

Sunbeam Corporation, Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Illinois ■ Canada: Toronto 18

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

"I am," Chris said. "At least, I do."

Every branch of the big spruce in front of the cabin was etched in light snow dry as cotton trimming on a Christmas tree. The walk was neatly shoveled. In the yard a cream-colored Malemute with a black muzzle like a mask set up a keening as they drove past.

"Alone?" Dina asked, a shade too roguishly.

"Nobody's alone much in Baranof. We're company crazy. Breakfast, lunch, dinner. Come in tomorrow morning and I'll give you sourdough pancakes and bacon and coffee and Alaska raspberry jam and rose-hip jelly. And orange juice. And lovely coffee."

"No cream," Ott Decker added as they stopped at the Ice Palace entrance.

Chris laughed ruefully. "No cream. But lovely canned milk."

The yellow taxi containing the two airplane hostesses drew up just ahead of Ott's car. The girls in their twin blue topcoats and their pert caps and smart pumps stepped out into the snow, they paid the taxi driver and scurried into the Ice Palace.

The taxi crunched away from the curb. "Here we are!" Ott announced somewhat unnecessarily. "You're putting up here, Mr. Husack—you and the lady and your father, of course. Mr. Distelhorst, sir, you're at the Pole Star Hotel. The luncheon's here in the banquet room in about half an hour, ladies. Now let's see, I think these are yo rs and these are yours and these are yours and these ——"

Now the second car drew up behind them, Bridie Ballantyne's face peered from the window. Hurriedly Ott continued, "I'll help with some of these bags, we don't have bellboys in Alaska except maybe Anchorage and Juneau. Chris"—he looked uncertainly at her—"want to come along and see if these folks are comfortable?"

She assumed her best Outside manner. "So sorry. I'll have to leave you."

Bayard put a hand on her arm. "But we're going to see you at the luncheon, aren't we? And how about that breakfast invitation you dangled?"

"Breakfast!" Dina interrupted sharply. "I'm not the breakfast type."

"Not even for sourdough pancakes?" Chris urged sweetly.

Distelhorst interrupted this discourse. He had noticed that, although the second car was being relieved of its luggage, only Bridie Ballantyne and Oscar Bogard had descended from it. "They putting up here, you say? Kleet and Husack?"

"That's right," Decker said. "Hey, wait a minute, Oscar. I'll give you a hand with those."

Dina Drake, in the Ice Palace doorway, turned. She took a step or two toward the car. "Mr. Husack, I'll be waiting, of course, in case you have some last-minute notes." Then, primly, "Mrs. Ballantyne will go up with us. Please don't be late." It was not so much a plea as a command. Czar Kennedy gazed at the girl through the car window. A long speculative look. The car moved off.

Bridie Ballantyne hitched her hat forward and took over. "Well, now, here we are and up we'll go and you'll get yourselves comfortable. I know what it is, those hours on the plane."

Ott deposited his load in front of the closed elevator door, pressed a button. "You coming along, Bridie, or you want to be dropped off at your floor?"

"Coming along, of course," Bridie chirped.

The great metal door slid open. A spate of fur-clad figures spewed out, babies, children, men, women in parkas, almost uniform except for size. Obligingly the unattended elevator waited while the new load was crammed into its capacious maw. Then, slowly, the great door slid shut. Ott Decker pressed a button, the thing began to ascend majestically.

The three emerged. "Here we are!" Ott announced fatuously; began to wrestle with the luggage. Bridie swept the narrow passageway with a welcoming gesture that seemed almost to banish the dim lights, the grim painted walls, the utility cement floor, and by some magic of her own deck it with satin damask and porphyry and glittering crystal chandeliers.

"This way," she announced. "You've got the Governor's Suite, no less." Her agile step made nothing of the corridor's turns.

The door of the suite stood open. A big square room with a room opening off it on either side. Modern bleached furniture, chintz, red roses in a vase, a bowl of fruit wrapped in cellophane and tied at the top with a twist of scarlet.

"Why, it's quite nice!" Dina Drake said. "I mean ——"

Bay Husack caught it deftly. "This is wonderful! Roughing it in Alaska. Dina, look at those roses!"

Somewhat abruptly—for her—Bridie carried on with her role as professional welcomer. "Quite nice or wonderful, either way it's the best we got, and anybody doesn't fancy what's inside, why, they sure can't complain about what's outside, with old McKinley staring you in the face."

Dina began ostentatiously to open luggage. She did not glance at Bridie, she flung back the luggage tops. "I wonder if you'll excuse me, Mrs. Ballantyne. I'll have to change before lunch."

Bridie made a clucking sound of dismay as she scudded toward the door. "Ott, come on. The poor child hasn't even had a chance to powder her nose." At the door she turned and peered back at the slim arrogant girl; then at the little heap of luxuries so carelessly thrown on the couch—the soft supple handbag, the soft supple gloves, the soft supple caramel mink coat.

"All the girls will be there today," Bridie said. "The office crowd and the wives and the clubs and so on. If you want to give the Baranof girls a treat, wear what you're wearing. If they had a suit like that they'd never take it off, only to sleep. Here in Alaska we keep track of what they're wearing Outside, but we don't always get to wear it. That mink coat of yours—dear, it's like looking in the jewelry-store windows in Seattle. Well, good-by now."

Bay Husack did an unexpected thing. Unexpected even by himself. He came over to Bridie in the doorway and he put an arm around her and kissed her on both cheeks. He smiled down at her.

"Pardon my display of passion, madam, but I think you're gorgeous. I've heard you were, and you are."

Bridie blushed, then, like a girl. "My, that was nice." She straightened her hat. "Who from?"

"From Chris, of course," Bay Husack told her, "thousands of years ago, when she was in Seattle."

"Folks, we're all due at the luncheon at twelve-thirty and it's twelve-fifteen this minute," Ott Decker announced crisply. "I'll move along and break trail for you, but don't be late now, will you? Please."

"Not for the world," Dina said brightly.

The woman bending over the open luggage and the man who came back into the room were silent until the thud of Ott's heavy boots and the chatter of Bridie's heels had ceased to sound on the corridor floor. He came to the window and stood there looking out over the white town and the icy waters and the improbable peaks. Already, at midday, it was almost twilight, the long winter night was descending.

She came over and stood beside him. "Creepy." And shivered.

"Seattle just a few hours ago. And now we're in another world."

"Oh," she said. "Oh, the wonder of it!"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 102

FROM THE CHINESE

When wings are grown, birds and children fly away.

One generation plants the trees—another gets the shade.

Do not pray for gold. Pray for good children, happy grandchildren.

What makes simple dishes simply delicious?

...the Liquid Spice

that makes food flavors come alive!

RENCH TOAST. Add 2 tbsp. BRER RABBIT to egg and milk ixture. Beat. Dip in white-bread slices. Fry. Here's flavor at doesn't whisper—it shouts. Good! Good! Try it . . . reakfast, lunch, dinner or TV snack time.

SPANISH RICE. Open 1 large-size can of Spanish Rice and add 1 tsp. BRER RABBIT. That's the flavor touch. Serve piping-hot with grated cheese or crumbled crisp bacon on top. BRER RABBIT makes the tasty difference.

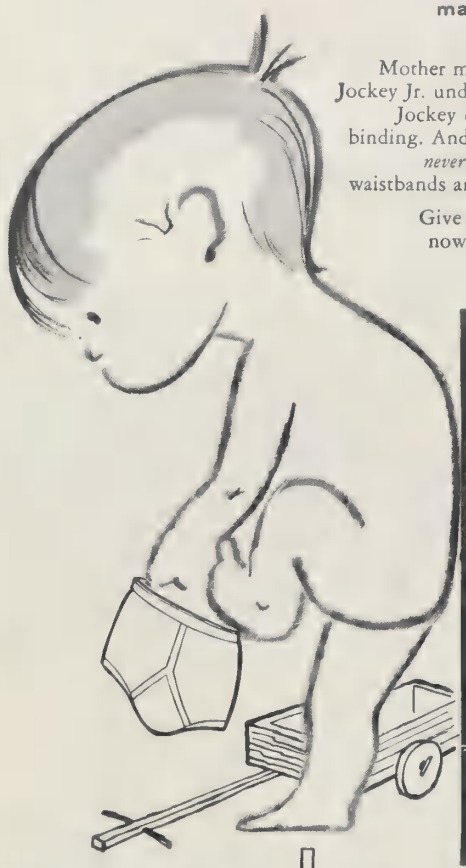
FRANKS 'N' BEANS. Fill casserole with 2 large cans baked beans. Add 2 tbsp. BRER RABBIT, 3 tbsp. minced onions, a pinch chili powder. Place whole or cut-up franks on top of beans and bake. Provides four delicious servings.

AMB PIE. In a casserole, combine 2 cups cooked diced eat with 1 can cream soup. Add minced parsley and onions, tbsp. BRER RABBIT. Top with bread crumbs—dot with utter. Bake until sauce bubbles and crumbs brown.

CHOP SUEY. Open 1 can prepared Chop Suey. Add 2 tbsp. BRER RABBIT and soy sauce to taste. Serve on hot rice. BRER RABBIT brings out the tasty flavor touch that makes this Chop Suey "restaurant good." Be ready with "seconds."

CURRIED APPLES. Cut 2 large apples into ½" slices. Blend 2 tbsp. BRER RABBIT, 1 tsp. curry powder, 3 tbsp. butter, ⅛ tsp. salt. Spread this mixture on the apples. Broil 8-10 min. without turning. Tart-sweet! Alive with flavor!

ARDI GRAS BROWNIES. Add 3 tbsp. BRER RABBIT and ¼ tsp. cinnamon to your brownie-mix batter. Follow baking irections on the package. One taste and you'll agree— RER RABBIT does something wonderful to chocolate.



BRER RABBIT MOLASSES—the liquid spice that makes foods tastier, more full-bodied. Add a little spice to your cooking with tart-sweet BRER RABBIT with the green label. For table use, try milder-flavored gold label BRER RABBIT.

MOLASSES MAGIC COOKBOOK! 22 pages filled with easy ideas to dress up, flavor up old favorites . . . lots of new recipes, too, for cakes, desserts, meats, vegetables. Write: Ruth Jordan, c/o Brer Rabbit, Box A-580, New Orleans, La.

Brer Rabbit Molasses

Let's start from scratch with Jockey Jr.® underwear BRAND
made only by Cooper's®

Mother makes sure that he starts off right with Jockey Jr. underwear. Tailored especially to fit him, Jockey coverage does away with all gaps and binding. And soft, gentle Jockey brand knit fabric never causes chafing! Heat-resistant elastic waistbands and leg openings last wash after wash.

Give your lad a break, and introduce him now to Jockey Jr. underwear! Remember: comfortable boys are happy boys!

known the world over by this symbol ® sold in 98 countries • Cooper's, Incorporated, Kenosha, Wisconsin

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

He waved toward the overwhelming spectacle outside the window. "Come on now, Dina, you can't be sneery about that!"

"Do you think she'll change her mind, after two years? I hope not, because I'm going to marry you."

"Do you want to know the truth?"

"Not as a rule. This once, maybe."

"She's in love with something else."

"Something?"

"She's in love with Alaska." He placed his arm about her shoulders, carelessly, his eyes still on the mammoth splendor outside.

"Well, I'm not, if that's any comfort to you. So if they're grooming you to be the first President of the United States to come from the great Northwest twenty years from now, don't count on settling down in Alaska with me." She turned in the circle of the arm about her shoulder and kissed him.

"Thanks," he said. "I'll do the same for you sometime."

In Czar Kennedy's house on the water front there was comfort and even luxury, gauged by Alaska standards. There was not one single object of beauty or interest. Though he owned entire ledges of jade, there was not even a chunk of the gray-green stuff as a desk paperweight. No native masks or brilliant bits of handiwork adorned the walls or shelves. No intricately carved Eskimo ivories, no paintings by Lawrence, none of the Eskimo Ahgupuk's slyly simple ink lines.

It was not that he disliked these evidences of a crude but vital civilization. He simply was not interested in them.

Sometimes, when a friend or a visiting VIP expressed an interest in a piece of ivory or stone or intricately patterned fur, he would stare at it impassively.

"It's real interesting," he said. "All that stuff. But not around the house. That junk's for museums."

Czar's marriage was carefully planned, as was every move he made. He had married the plain daughter of Einar Wendt, the Tacoma lumberman. She was older than Czar, gaunt and prim. Even her father's substantial wealth had not tempted the high-spirited lads of Tacoma, Seattle, San Francisco. She was an easy conquest for the romantic-looking, soft-talking, ambitious Kennedy. Einar Wendt himself had been early impressed with this up-and-coming young Alaskan.

"You two young people won't be living in Alaska for long," Einar Wendt had said, smiling tolerantly. "Baranof's pioneer stuff, but you're too smart to waste your time there, Zeb." He never called his son-in-law Czar, as did everyone else. "You really belong in a city like Tacoma here, I'd like to work you into the business. Twenty years from now I may want to start to kind of take it easy. If you and Myrt have been living here for, say, ten years before that, why, that's where you step in."

Czar Kennedy appeared to be considering this, modestly, amiably. He was thinking, Why, you old fool, twenty years from now, if you're alive, you'll be working for me, I'll own your business and you too.

Czar Kennedy and his bride set up housekeeping on a grand scale for the Alaska of that day. A four-room frame house, one of the few carpenter-built houses in the town. With the years the original four-room house had burgeoned into eight rooms, the bridal furniture had been twice replaced as Czar's interests widened and his income kept pace. Now the overstuffed chairs and couches were self-descriptive, the thick brown carpets silenc the footfall, the brick-red draperies and t mammoth lamps were a background for t household's unique treasure, a Steinway gra piano, for years the only grand piano Baranof.

Myrtle Kennedy adored her handsome a successful husband and hated Alaska to t day she died. She blamed this savage count for the tragedies in her life, as well she migh Certainly her daughter, the one child of h marriage, met her sordid end because of Her mental and emotional equipment was n strong enough to meet this horror.

It had been Thor who had gone up to fetc his grief-stricken son and the newborn infan The baby was brought to the Kennedy hous It was agreed that this was the natural have for her. Certainly Thor Storm's womanle cabin was not the place. And Christophe Storm, the young widower, was numb wit guilt and sorrow. He absented himself fro Baranof for days at a time. "Off hunting," th town said. "Or says. Off alone. Even Tho don't know where."

The grapevine of gossip and conjectur spread and became a canopy that enshroude the Kennedy house "They say Myrtl doesn't even look at th baby. Now, they've g Bridie in. Well, she use to be a nurse in Seattl didn't she? They sa Bridie keeps the baby room boiling hot an feeds her from a med cine dropper. That the second one in th family Bridie raised u She was the one looke after Christopher Storn when Thor brought hin down from up north a baby, wrapped up i wolfskins. Nobody eve got the real story o that. They say Tho married a girl up there her mother was Eskim and her father was a Polish fur trader."

But Baranof accepted all this as it had, fo years, accustomed itself to the fantastic contrasts of life in Alaska. On the surface there was the life of any conventional American small town. Church on Sunday, card parties, ice cream and layer cake; school, business, club meetings. Underneath all this, and surrounding it, loomed a menace greater than pioneers had ever endured in the history of this dramatic America. Here Nature was the killer, like a living murderous enemy surrounding a stockade—Nature, and Distance, and Loneliness and Cold.

It was in the spring following his wife's death that Christopher Storm had gone with his friend, Len Fraser, on the bear-hunting trip. They were after brown Alaska bear, those monolithic creatures said to be the largest carniverous animal on earth.

The two men, experienced hunters both, had momentarily separated. They had left their boat and gone inland. Christopher Storm must have come unexpectedly upon the monster. Perhaps, startled by the sound of humans in that wilderness, it was instinctively protecting its cubs. Alone and caught off guard, young Storm had scarcely time to raise his gun and fire. He aimed between the eyes. The monster came on, its speed was incredible. He fired again. The animal came on.

"Len!" the man called as he fled now. "Len! Len!" Christopher felt the creature upon him. With the first movement, with a gesture that was almost playful, the mammoth paw lifted the man's scalp and tore it off as a skin might be peeled from an orange. When Len, hearing the shots and the cries, crashed through the brush Christopher Storm was still conscious and even fairly articulate. Fraser picked him up and even managed to reach a nearby cabin just before he died. In a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 104

THE SILENT WOMEN

By MARY KENNEDY

Women who have made a stern choice, given up hope,
lived without love for the privilege of giving,
of being near the object of their love,
yet bound to silence . . .
these women have relinquished beauty, but have taken on a glory, an ennobling not apparent to them.
They have turned themselves into pillars to hold up the roof of the world.

Rain tomorrow?

© 1958, THE CREAM OF WHEAT CORP.

That's "Cream of Wheat" weather.

Guard your family with hot "Cream of Wheat"

A nourishing hot cereal containing protective vitamins and minerals kind of muted scream, while he still was conscious, he begged, "Shoot me! Len, for God's sake! Shoot me!"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 102

It was after this second horror that melancholia settled like a numbing drug over Czar Kennedy's wife. She had no interest in the infant Christine, in her husband, in her household. Czar took her to Tacoma. There they ministered to her with such unavailing means as science and the medical arts commanded. There, briefly, she continued to live, and there she died.

So there was Czar Kennedy in his roomy overstuffed house on the water front, and there, incredibly, was the infant Christine, watched over by the indomitable, the omniscient Bridie Ballantyne.

Now, almost a quarter of a century later, Czar lived alone in the house except for the dour servant, Gus, who cooked, cleaned, drove the car when needed. There were times when Czar did not use his house for a week, two weeks. He had an office and a small bedroom on the top floor of the Lode Building. Baranof said he took refuge there when the cold and fishy eye of Gus became too depressing.

It was to Czar's house that the three men fled—Dave Husack, Sid Kleet and Czar himself, though the Chamber of Commerce luncheon hour gave them barely fifteen minutes of grace. They were like small boys crawling under the porch or into the woodshed to hatch their plots. The big, crowded, empty living room awaited them.

"What'll it be?" Czar asked. "Bourbon, Dave? Sid?"

Husack and Kleet drank, tossing the amber stuff down their throats with one quick backward jerk of the head, the gulp of water, the exhaled breath.

"We've barely got fifteen minutes," Czar said. "Gus, you come in here at twelve-thirty sharp and remind us." He had poured himself a bourbon, carried it to his chair. He did not drink it. "Just who's this girl, anyway?" he said. "I know who she is. But who is she?"

Dave Husack shifted his big frame in the deep chair. "Now, Czar, I told you all that, she's a smart girl, you wouldn't think a girl looks like she does could be so smart. Her mother and Louise were school friends in Kansas City. She's crazy about Bay too. That's what gave me the idea. All right, she's my assistant secretary, but no hanky-panky."

"Mink coat."

"Louise's—or was. You know Etta Gurkin's getting too old for these jaunts, and crotchety; of course Etta's a crackajack secretary when it comes to business details and so on, but the going's too rugged on trips for a woman her age."

"I didn't ask you for a sketch of Etta Gurkin; I've known that old battle-ax for twenty-five years. Who is this girl, Dave?"

"Oh. Well." Dave Husack slumped in his chair. "She's no tramp. Her folks are fine people. Anyway, she had two years of college and then she came east to New York, she did some modeling, and she had a couple of little jobs in the movies—what they call an extra, I guess—and then she went back to modeling—fashion modeling, that is. She got to be one of the biggest models in the Paxton Agency, she could go back there tomorrow, she's as nice and sweet a girl as you'd ——"

"Married at one time, wasn't she?"

"She was. You wouldn't want a kid who ——"

"Older than she looks, isn't she?"

"Well, personally, looking at her ——"

A gently tolerant laugh from Czar. "M-m. Looking at her with my eyes, impersonally, the way you'd look at any strictly business proposition, what would you say? Twenty-seven? Twenty-eight, outside figure?"

Dave shrugged. "Thereabouts. She don't look over twenty-two."

"Eyes," Czar said. "Eyes." His right foot began to waggle now as it dangled, the right knee crossed over the left. "You fit her up with that coat and so on, Dave? That's a real nice coat."

"Say, she's the girl supposed to be marrying Bay, what do you think I'd fix her up with! We're paying her good for this, Bay don't know that. You know why she's here and she knows why, and it looks like everybody'll know why pretty soon if we don't look out. Well, Bay's consented to go through with this little hocus-pocus, set him up for governor of Alaska and so on, so Chris will maybe change her mind about him, marry him. He's still stuck on her—if he's stuck on anybody. Dina's made a play for him for two-three years now."

"Why, you're real touchy, Dave, a person would think you were the one supposed to be in love with the girl." His hand went to his head, he ruffled the silver plumes of his hair. "Truth is, I don't know as I really go along with this little plan."

"What's that!" Husack yelled. "Last month in Seattle ——"

"I know, I know. But I'm not sure that I can see my granddaughter mixed up in a plant like this. She's difficult at times, but this little sight-seeing tour, with that girl supposed to drive Chris crazy with jealousy! Why, say, Chris is too smart for that. That's like a movie plot in the old days before the talkies came in. Christine is headstrong and impractical sometimes, but she isn't dumb."

"Why, you double-crossing fool!" Dave Husack pulled his huge bulk out of the deep-cushioned chair. "I get this all set, I haul Bay up here, we know we can get this whole thing set so we'll have the whole territory sewed up, from Juneau to Barrow, and from Bristol Bay to Demarcation Point. All of it. Fish and fur and oil and metals and timber."

"Got it now," Czar said sweetly.

"We'll have it cinched for the next God knows how long," Dave told him. "Twenty-five years. Fifty."

"I sometimes wonder why we do it," Czar mused. "You've got more money than you know what to do with now."

"Czar, who do you think you're talking to! Don't try to make with that dreamy stuff. Not with me. This is Dave Husack. Remember?"

Also available in Calcium form

New table bottles for Sucaryl

Make weight-watching even more pleasant

Sucaryl always did make it a lot easier for you to cut down the calories. It's the calorie-free sweetener that tastes so like sugar you actually can't taste the difference.

Now, in the new Raymond Loewy-designed bottle, Sucaryl invites itself right into your prettiest table-setting. Sucaryl Tablets for hot coffee or tea. Sucaryl Solution for fruit, cereal and iced drinks, as well as all kinds of cooking. They're at your drug store now.

Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Illinois and Montreal, Canada.

Sucaryl®

Non-Caloric Sweetener—No Bitter Aftertaste

e was breathing hard, and thumping his oys, boys!" said Sid Kleet.

e had quietly taken a sheaf of papers out s brief case.
harm, gentlemen. Charm, charm, reber. You are supposed to work it that ake it up with Czar, he's the charm denent," Dave said sulkily.

ust please remember," Kleet continued, a patient teacher, "that this is the biggest
yet. You've got the Northwest sewed up, can sew up the whole country. Only ve got to start now and keep going. Bay important and your granddaughter isn't rtant. It's us. There'll be plenty of young ws presidential timber four—eight—ve years from now. The young guys are g in for politics nowadays. What you want mebody young for front man and us older to pull the strings. Young, they can take unishment. The old ones crack up. You a kid like Bay, start him out governor of ka, then Washington State congressman, the Senate, he's well known by that
——"

By that time I'll be a nice ninety-eight, if alive," Czar said.
'll be alive!" bellowed Husack. "I don't w about you two mealymouths, but I'll be
."
The way you look," Czar observed mildly, say you're likely to fall down with a ke this minute, Dave, if you don't watch

Yes, and I'll bet you would like ——"

It is singular how impatient men are with overpraise of others, how patient with overpraise of themselves, and yet the one does them no injury while the other may be their ruin.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

he putty-faced Gus stood in the doorway.
is half past twelve o'clock," he said. He beto gather up the glasses as though the m were empty.
Etta Gurkin," said Czar musingly as they ked toward the car. "I never believed in ping a secretary around that long. They w too much. Get them married off—or ry them. Maybe you can't fire Etta. Maybe
's got too much on you—or something.
l this girl too."

wo long tables and a connecting shorter formed the U-shaped luncheon board sic in the world of Chambers of Com-ce. Nick's new Caribou Café banquet m just accommodated the guests, on this aordinarily crowded occasion. There in doorway, a one-woman reception commit-stood Bridie Ballantyne. Some atavistic petitive urge had compelled her to change hat. Dina Drake, probably. The garnet et was now periwinkle blue.
Well, now, it's grand to see you, you didn't w up the last luncheon, I guess it takes a eral and a couple of millionaires from tside to haul you away from the furniture iness. . . . Howdy, General, glad you made you're at the head table of course, all the sts of honor. . . . Dave, you and Czar look the you-know-what just swallowed the ary, look out the feathers don't stick in r throat. . . . Sid, you're up at the speakers' le there next to Dave, of course, little helphands. . . . Oh, Miss Drake dear, don't e off your mink till you're seated, the girls uld miss a treat."
n the stir and hubbub there was a curious ntheartedness. Alaska loved a gathering—gathering. The big room seemed to shimr and shift with a sort of electric vibrance.
ly the big boys sitting at the speakers' table d the tired joyless faces of the terribly sucsful.
There was the General, resigned to the owledge that National Fish now was his b present and future, no matter how gliting and martial his past. There sat David Husack, his color too high for basic health, and looking the more sanguinary in contrast to the imposing silvery head and the El Greco pallor of Czar Kennedy beside him. At his left Sid Kleet. Wilbur Distelhorst, disgruntled and peevish, with a sheaf of penciled notes. Oscar Bogard, overfriendly, moved from one to another of the seated guests of honor.

Only Bayard Husack and Dina Drake had the look of vitality that comes of youth and beauty and curiosity. Just before entering the room she had said, "I don't care what arrangements they've made, I want you to sit next to me."

"You going to be difficult?"

"Yes."

"Why did you come to Alaska at all, if you feel that way?"

"For the ride. And because I'm mad for you. And I want to be First Lady fifteen years from now."

"You'd be ideal in the White House—you and Mrs. Abe Lincoln."

A centerpiece of fresh flowers ornamented the guest table. They had been flown in from Outside. Like the human freight, they had emerged intact though slightly yellow around the edges.

A small pasteboard box stood just in front of Dina Drake's plate. Oscar Bogard tapped the little box with a playful forefinger. "Something pretty for you, little lady."

She looked at the box remotely.

"Open it," Bay said, very low. "You're supposed to wear them."

She lifted out the two exotic flowers on their pale green stem, pale golden orchids with a mink-brown lip.

"Orchids in Alaska in midwinter!" Bay said. "Well, what do you know!"

Dina scarcely lowered her voice. "I never wear flowers. I hate orchids."

Sid Kleet leaned forward. Very quietly he said, "I'd pin them on if I were you—unless you hate the young man next to you too."

"COFFEE-BREAK" OFFER!

Easy instructions in this coupon! MAIL IT TODAY!

PREAM, Box #3, Clinton, Iowa

Please send me 25¢ in cash for which I enclose: one label from New Economy Size Pream (or two labels from Regular Size Pream) one label from any instant coffee or one inch of metal winding strip from any coffee can or the front half of any coffee bag.

PLUS

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

Limit 1 per family. Offer good in U.S., Alaska, Hawaii, and Canada. Expires May 31, 1958.

IMPORTANT! If your store doesn't yet have New Economy Size Pream, use 2 labels from Regular Size Pream.

SAVE 25¢ on your favorite coffee

...and discover New, Large Economy Size PREAM delicious coffee "creamer"!

EXTRA ECONOMICAL!
New Economy Size Pream "creams" up to 70 cups of coffee . . . costs so much less than other coffee "creamers."

EXTRA CONVENIENT!
Pream stays fresh without refrigeration. Always handy for coffee . . . and cooking, too!

EXTRA CREAMY!
Pream® is made entirely from pure country cream and other milk products. Naturally—it's delicious! So . . . if you like your coffee "with," you'll love it with Pream.

©1958. H. C. Moores Co., Columbus 16, Ohio

"I always give St. Joseph Aspirin For Children. Its safe, gentle action is so effective." Dorothy Collins

DOROTHY COLLINS (Mrs. Raymond Scott)
Famous Star of Television, and daughter Deborah

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children acts so quickly, yet gently, to ease headache and feverishness of childhood ills. It's approved by more doctors for fever and pain than any other medication for children.

Accurate dosage assured without cutting or breaking tablets—no messy liquids to measure. Children like its pure orange flavor. No wonder it's America's mother-and-child favorite!

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

...and for my family's adult aspirin needs, I always buy regular St. Joseph Aspirin

EXTRA MONEY!

EARN extra money by selling subscriptions to Curtis publications and other popular magazines in your spare time. For details write to CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY, 316 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

ONLY

Welsh

MAKES THE WORLD FAMOUS

"Boodle-Buggy"

CARRIAGE! BASSINET! TRAVEL BED!

IN 1958 FASHION FABRICS IN LOVELY PASTELS, PLAIDS AND DARK TONES

At Leading Stores

WELSH CO., ST. LOUIS 4, MO.

She picked them up, pinned them to her suit lapel with a single vicious jab.

The two arms of the U-shaped table missed nothing. The women seemed almost audibly to drink in Dina Drake's coat, gloves, bag, suit. They themselves were smart in wool or jersey dresses and suits, their coiffures followed the general line and style of Dina's hair, though a less expert hand had molded them.

Chris Storm, Bridie Ballantyne and Ott Decker always avoided being trapped at the speakers' table. From choice they sat below the salt. Ott Decker was seated between the two women. Chris' white fur parka was draped over the back of her chair. Her hatless head was like a golden torch lighting this end of the long table, as Czar's magnificent crown flared white at the other end of the room.

"Biggest luncheon crowd we've ever had," Ott said.

"Best show, too," Bridie said. "Look at their faces. Kind of sizing things up."

Ott looked at Chris. "The crowd's puzzled about Bay Husack. They can't figure out what he's doing here. And that girl."

Bridie leaned toward Decker. "You going to eat your roll, Chris? I'm starved, up since six and only tea and a slice of whole wheat. Look, Chris, you going to actually go through with this?"

The lovely serious face sparkled now with mischief and gaiety. "I can hardly wait to see the mink coat floundering around in a ten-foot snowbank in Oogruk."

"You mean you think they'll go up there, this time of year?"

"Bay's supposed to see Alaska, isn't he? Isn't that the plot of the piece?"

Bridie turned her head toward the speakers' table, as though to confirm her opinion of the handsome sulky young man and the arrogant girl seated there, side by side.

"Good-looking and rich and no sissy—I don't know how you turned him down in the first place."

"Yes, you do."

"I bet there isn't a girl in the whole Northwest wouldn't grab him. If I was your own ma I wouldn't know what to advise you, looking at him now."

"Haven't I had too much advice all my life?"

"I guess you have, at that. Czar pulling you one way, Thor the other. Look what it's come to now."

There was the clink of metal on glass as Mayor Bogard rose and tapped for order. The young, alert faces turned toward him like a battery of lights. He spoke in the platitudes of the commanded and ungifted.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Members of the Baranof Chamber of Commerce. Honored guests. We have with us. It is my great pleasure. One who. Known to all of you. Magnificent record. War. And now ——"

The General rose, and they remembered him in the days of his command. "Friends . . . this vast empire called Alaska . . . nature has indeed been lavish . . . we of the world of business and economics and others at the helm of the nation's political ship of state . . . the welfare of this magnificent territory at heart ——"

General Cass Baldwin, vice president and chairman of the board of National Fish Pack Company, sat down to respectful applause.

"Dave next, I bet," Bridie said. "Czar won't talk, he's too smart."

In the dining-room doorway a little knot of people had gathered. They were quiet, polite, orderly. They stood there out of curiosity, interest or because, late in making application, there had not been space for them at the luncheon table. Craning, Chris Storm could just glimpse Addie Barnett near the doorway, and behind her the ugly, beautiful, civilized face of Paul Barnett.

Then, to her surprise, Chris caught sight of the merry face of Ross Guildenstern. Her gaze met his, her eyebrows went up in questioning. He grinned mischievously. "Why, there's Ross!" Bridie exclaimed.

"What's he doing here?" Decker snapped. "At a Chamber of Commerce lunch!"

"Why not? He flies a commercial plane, doesn't he?" Chris retorted.

"Well, folks, I guess I don't have to spend any valuable time introducing our next speaker. I'd rather save the time for him. You all know what Dave Husack stands for ——"

Grinning, he looked fondly at Dave and waited for the applause. Oddly, it came late. In that split second of unexpected silence a woman's voice spoke crisply from the crowd in the doorway.

"It isn't a patch on what Alaska's standing for."

There was a ripple of shocked but irrepressible laughter. It was plain that the remark had not been meant for the public ear.

"That was Addie Barnett," Chris whispered. "She'll feel awful."

Dave Husack stood up, an imposing figure, his high color even rosier than usual. His voice was smooth, his manner folksy, his tone blandishing.

"Alaskans! Fellow Americans! Pioneers! I want to thank the little lady who made that timely little remark. If I could have chosen it as an introduction I would have—yes, you good and wonderful people have stood for a lot of things from a wise government and a well-intentioned group of national men of business. And you have grown impatient and fretful at times. And why? For the same reason that a strong healthy willful child is impatient at the restraints laid upon it by devoted and wise parents. If properly guided, however, by a benevolent and wise father ——"

"But, papa!" shouted a resonant voice from the crowd in the doorway. "I'm over fifty years old, I know the facts of life, I want to live before you kill me with the greed you call paternalism."

"Oops! Here we go!" said Ott Decker.

"It's Grandpa Storm, of course," Chris said. "I hoped he wouldn't, this time." But her face was brilliant with a smile of anticipation.

Dave Husack faltered, stopped. He turned a look of outraged dignity upon Oscar Bogard. "Mr. Chairman!"

There was a stir in the doorway. A towering figure came forward. Every head in the room swung toward him.

"Excuse me, will you, if I interrupt for just a minute? I haven't been asked to speak here today, and I'm not going to make a speech. I just want to distribute a few copies of this week's Northern Light."

"Now, Thor!" Oscar Bogard remonstrated. "This is an outrage! You can't start all that again."

Under his arm Thor Storm carried a sheaf of newspapers, neatly folded. In a region of tall men his height was notable. The frame was big-boned, unburdened by fat. The hood of his parka was pushed back, its border of wolf formed a nimbus above the gold-and-silver hair, the pink cheeks, the startlingly blue eyes. Moving swiftly, he placed a neat bundle of newspapers at the end of each long table.

"Just pass these along, will you, one to a person? They're folded to the editorial page."

His manner was genial, his tone conversational, his enunciation curiously cultivated and charming. "It won't be news to yo Dave; or you, Sid; and certainly not to yo Czar, old pardner, as they used to say in tho Rex Beach books. But it will be news to th rest of you Chamber of Commerce people ar all Alaska. You won't find it in this afte noon's Baranof Daily Lode." Suddenly h stretched forward his great right arm, his for finger pointing, he looked strangely like prophet of old as he stood there. "Baya Husack!" he thundered.

But this time it was Czar Kennedy who i terrupted, his voice leisurely, almost purrin "Just a minute, Thor. I can have you arreste you know, for causing a disturbance in a pu lic place."

Thor Storm turned a beaming face towa Kennedy. "Will you do that, Czar?" His to now was earnest to the point of entreaty. "I consider it a favor. Paul and Addie here wou send it out A.P. and every newspaper in th United States would run it. Canada too. D that, will you please, Czar?"

Oscar Bogard's clashing of metal again glass as he attempted to restore order sounde like the efforts of a Swiss bell ringer. "Gentl men! Gentlemen!" He thwacked the tab with the flat of his hand. "This is not Alas of the nineties! This is Alaska today." H turned his gaze away from the offender. "Ge eral, my apologies. Commissioner, please b lieve that this is not the way Alaskans beha We may be a little crude and even rough ways, but our manners ——"

"Slaves!" roared Thor Storm. "Worn Second-class citizens of the greatest demo racy in the world! Voteless taxpaying m and women of Alaska, and your fathers a mothers before you for sixty years. Manne Manners! Wholesale plundering by them f another fifty years, or freedom for you! Re it! Read it! Read it!"

There was a rustling like the sound of a su den wind rushing through the leaves of a fo est as the members of the Baranof Chamber Commerce opened the pages of the Week Northern Light and began to read.

Chris Storm plucked her white parka fro the back of her chair and came over to th patriarchal giant facing the room. She link her arm through his. She looked up at him.

"Let's go now. You were wonderful, b you know the doctor said you weren't to g excited. Let's go now."

Dina Drake had been concentrating on th application of a fresh coating of lipstick, h gaze intent on her own reflection in the ti mirror. Now she glanced up. "What's the ma ter? Is he crazy or something?"

"Like a fox," Bay Husack said.

(To be Continued)

"When my wife says 'Now!' she means it!"

Win a lovelier figure!

Prizes include all-expense trip to Paris for two and Paris originals, and 151 Complete Courses in famous

slenderella* salons

Mustn't miss this!—Get in mail before May 31—

ENTER Libby's EASY

SLIM-DOWN SWEEPSTAKES

GRAND PRIZE—Win a complete course at Slenderella, the fabulous new slenderizing system . . .

PLUS 2 weeks' trip to Paris for two (expenses paid)—with $1000.00 spending money added . . .

PLUS 2 original ensembles made in Paris.
(or the Slenderella course plus $5000.00 in cash. See rules)

150 MORE PRIZES: Complete Slenderella course in the salon nearest your home plus $25.00 in cash. (See rules)

JUST FINISH IN 25 WORDS OR LESS THIS STATEMENT:

"*I would like to win a Slenderella course because*_____"

HURRY! ENTER TODAY! MAY 31 IS FINAL CLOSING DATE. Enter Libby's Slim-Down Sweepstakes and win a complete course from Slenderella—the world-famous slenderizing system.

And starting now, drink Libby's non-fattening Tomato Juice—the Slim-Down Cocktail—3 times a day. Never thin or watery, Libby's is the satisfying juice that quenches between-meal hunger. It's the twice-rich tomato juice: rich in flavor . . . rich in vitamins. And all for just 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass!

*Service mark, Slenderella Systems, Inc.

READ THESE EASY RULES:

1. The contest is open to all women 18 years of age or over living in continental limits of the United States, except employees of Libby, McNeill & Libby, Slenderella International and their advertising agents.

2. Write your entry on a plain piece of paper or on the official Libby Slim-Down Sweepstakes entry blank obtainable at grocery stores. Attach a label from any size can of Libby's Tomato Juice to each entry and mail to Libby Contest P.O. Box 1200, Chicago 77, Illinois.

3. Send as many entries as you like. All entries must be postmarked before midnight May 31, 1958.

4. THE GRAND PRIZE WINNER will start her Slenderella course in the beautiful new Slenderella Salon in Paris under the direction of Princess Irene Mdivani. The winner will finish her program at the Slenderella Salon in the U.S.A. nearest her home.

5. 150 OTHER WINNERS will each receive a complete Slenderella course in the salon nearest her home plus $25.00 in cash to use toward transportation costs.

6. "Complete Slenderella Course" is defined as: the number of visits to Slenderella required to bring the winner's figure to the proportions required by her proper dress size as determined by the Slenderella figure analysis.

7. Prizes will be awarded to contestants whose entries are considered by the judges most original, unique and apt. There will be duplicate prizes in case of ties. The contest will be judged by R. L. Polk & Company. All entries become the property of Libby, McNeill & Libby.

STUART

Your chef-d'oeuvre of the evening meal, a veal-and-ham casserole—a fragrant potpourri of enticing flavors set out on the buffet with your very best china and silver.

GOOD-TIME BUFFET for 8

$1.00 per person

By MARGARETTA STEVENSON

Here is party food to lighten a hostess' heart! You can serve dinner to eight people for under $10 and do it with a meal so delicious and so special that you'll greet your guests with contagious gaiety! At the center of our miracle-working menu is a memorable main dish—tender layers of veal and ham baked in an herby mushroom-and-tomato sauce, with flavor and aroma worthy of a famous chef. Crisp, cold green-bean-and-onion salad, drenched in tangy French dressing, makes a perfect companion to the veal; dessert is a fluffy, delectable Bing-cherry frost. A meal your guests will remember!

A fresh-as-spring appetizer:

CUCUMBER-RADISH CANAPÉS. Use unsliced bread; cut thin slices and trim into 24 rounds. Spread rounds with ¼ cup mayonnaise to which 1 small clove garlic, crushed, has been added, and which has been seasoned with a generous pinch of dill. Top each canapé with a thin slice of peeled cucumber. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and garnish with a bit of mayonnaise and a slice of radish. Fold the canapés and secure with a toothpick.

The surprise element in this delicious party dish is the sauce. The elusive flavor of meat stock, tomato paste and herbs lifts this entree out of the ordinary and into the hostess-with-a-flair class.

VEAL-AND-HAM STACK. Dip 1½ pounds veal, cut for scallopine, in bread crumbs, then in a mixture of egg and milk and then in bread crumbs again. For the egg-and-milk mixture use 1 slightly beaten egg and ½ cup milk. Fry the breaded veal in a little margarine until crisp and golden. Brown 1½ pounds thinly sliced, cooked ham in a little margarine also. For the sauce, sauté ¾ pound sliced fresh mushrooms until golden, in 3 tablespoons margarine. Add two 8-ounce cans tomato sauce, ¾ cup chicken stock, ½ cup slivered, toasted almonds, and stir well. Season with 1 teaspoon each orégano and seasoned salt, ¼ teaspoon each mace, thyme and rosemary. Simmer for 10–15 minutes to blend flavors. Arrange in a casserole a layer of ham, veal and a little sauce. Repeat. Cover and bake in a slow oven, 300°F., for 1 hour.

GREEN-BEAN-AND-ONION SALAD. Cook 2 packages of the new, frozen, whole green beans according to package directions. Be careful not to let them get overdone. Drain and allow to cool and chill. Or you can chill and drain 2 cans whole, blue lake green beans. Wash, drain and break up salad greens. Curly chicory with lettuce tastes fresh and springlike. Put leaves in a plastic bag, close with an elastic band and store in the refrigerator to get crisp and chilled. About 1 hour before serving, marinate the beans in 1 cup sharp French dressing. Add 1 peeled and thinly sliced red onion. Drain well and arrange on salad greens. Garnish with radish roses.

A delectable dessert, you will agree, and one you can serve any time of the year, since it uses canned fruit.

BING-CHERRY FROST. Let 1½ pints vanilla ice cream get a little soft. Whip 1½ pints heavy cream. Add the softened ice cream and continue whipping until the mixture stands in soft peaks. Flavor to taste with 2–3 teaspoons rum extract. Divide evenly into two freezing trays and freeze until set. Meanwhile, drain 1 No. 2 can Bing cherries. Chill the fruit. To the juice, add 1½ tablespoons cornstarch mixed with 1½ tablespoons sugar. Heat and stir until thickened. Chill. Heap spoonfuls of frozen cream in a serving bowl. Spoon the fruit and sauce over all and garnish with mint sprigs if you like.

For the DATE BARS I use a wonderful date-bar mix. It is really good and so very easy to do. Whenever I've served them, guests have asked for the recipe.

MENU

CUCUMBER-RADISH CANAPÉS

VEAL-AND-HAM STACK
RICE

GREEN-BEAN-AND-ONION SALAD

BING-CHERRY FROST
DATE BARS

COFFEE

For a deliciously light dressing, blend ¼ c. tomato juice with 1 cup Kraft Mayonnaise. Grand on tossed grapefruit and avocado salad

Easy way to give salads your personal touch

Just blend KRAFT MAYONNAISE with tomato juice, chicken broth, fruit nectar ...or whatever your fancy suggests. Presto...a brand new dressing!

Velvet texture Kraft Mayonnaise is the smoothest, easiest-mixing mayonnaise you ever tried. Creamier, fluffier, it's specially made to blend with other ingredients . . . never curdles or separates.

Kraft's is true mayonnaise, made with lots of eggs and extra egg yolks, too. But it takes more than eggs to make mayonnaise mix like Kraft's. Only Kraft's own blend of oils and special beating process can give such velvet texture.

Get a jar today and have fun creating dressings of your own. Easy does it, with velvet texture Kraft's!

No other mayonnaise mixes like velvet texture Kraft's!

He said: Terribly sorry, old dear. It's early but I must toddle.

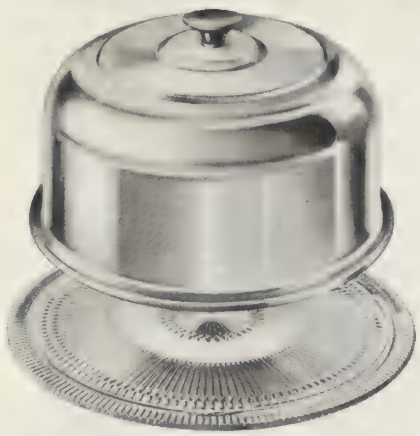
He meant: Gad! The air in here is like a ruddy fog. I've had it!

She Must Have Used An Ordinary "Cover-Up" Deodorizer!

This couldn't have happened with air-wick

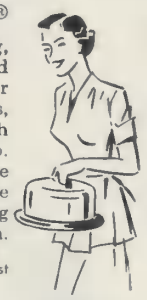
Did you know that America's leading home deodorizer is the world's leader, too? The popularity of Air-Wick has spread all over the world—to Spain, Italy, England... sixty-two countries in all!

People of all nationalities depend on Air-Wick because it has been proven 3 times as effective... faster... more pleasant to use.



Use handy wick or speedy spray... deodorize the Air-Wick way!

Your cakes stay fresher!



IN EVEREDY CHROME CAKE COVERS

KAKE-TOTER®

Gleaming cover keeps big, family-size cakes fresh and tasty for days. Wonderful for use in the home, or at picnics, barbeques, outings, church suppers. Easy to carry, too. Cover locks to chrome base plate with just a twist of the handle. Base useful as serving tray. 13¼" dia. In Gift Carton. No. 9920 $5.25 in East

KAKE-SAVER®

Sparkling, king size chrome cover fits snugly into groove of beautiful decorated glass plate to protect the moist tastiness of your cakes. Glass base plate is footed, making the Kake-Saver easy to pick up and carry. 12½" dia. In Gift Carton. No. 9910 $4.50 in East

KAKE-SAVER Jr.® Standard size swirl chrome cover holds cakes, pies, etc. 11½" diameter decorated glass plate. In Gift Carton. No. 9905 $3.75 in East

Ask for these beautiful, easy-to-clean Everedy chrome cake covers at your favorite housewares counter. Kake-Savers are also available at slightly higher prices in real Copper finish. If your store is out of stock, write us at once. Ask for free booklet showing over 50 popular-priced Everedy Housewares.

EVEREDY

THE EVEREDY CO. • FREDERICK, MD., U. S. A.

Craftsmen in CHROME ▪ COPPER • STAINLESS

PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST'S WIFE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 67

"The rest is in the hands of God," he said, and went to wash.

He hadn't asked her why the stove was unlit. It wasn't the sort of thing he asked. He was superbly indifferent to the daily trivia which so occupied his wife.

Jerry wandered into the alcove where Richard usually worked. He picked up an object. "What's this? Looks like a miniature blowtorch."

She explained that Richard used it to melt the wax on the canvas.

"A rough medium," said Richard, coming back. His dark brown eyes touched hers, and he kissed her hello on the cheek. Then he picked up his glass of wine. "But you can work miracles with it. If you heat the wax on the canvas, the colors run into one another. When it's hardened, you can fool around with a palette knife and take off what you don't want. But it's hard to control."

"Just a tiny bit," said Carol.

He grinned. "O.K. So sometimes it gets out of hand. But give me another year, and I'll be doing wax miniatures on the head of a pin."

Another year, she thought. Artists moved in a leisurely world where time was measured in progress, not in months and years. Certainly not in dollars and cents. In two years Richard had sold three oils for the staggering total of $150. But was he discouraged? Were his spirits downcast? No, sir. At this very moment, he was beaming from ear to ear.

She left the alcove. She would lie down on the couch-bed for a few minutes. The coals in the stove, those stubborn, uninflammable lumps, had finally caught fire, and she could feel the beginning of warmth in the room.

"The Egyptians worked miracles with it," Richard was saying. "There're encaustics from the second century with the colors as pure as the day they were painted."

Jerry looked enthusiastic. His plain, longish face always took on animation when Richard was around.

He respected Richard because he knew Richard was a better painter than he was. Richard was the acknowledged leader of their group. When he spoke, everyone listened. All the ineffectuals, the almost talented, got their strength from Richard. He was the rock in their lives too. They spoke to him, and while they did believed what they were saying. It was not what Richard had, but what he lacked. He lacked self-doubt and fear. She had lived with him for over three years, and she knew the horror world of ugliness which she had glimpsed today would never exist for him.

"Reckon I'll see you at Kennedy's tomorrow," said Jerry, pulling on his coat. "Remember, it's after dinner."

"When else?" said Richard. "Thanks for the tray, Jerry."

"Nothing to it." He shook Carol's hand. "À bientôt."

She and Richard were alone. He was still in the alcove. When he came out, she would tell him. Calmly and rationally.

"Did you see your letter?" he asked, bending over his drawing board.

She took her mother's letter from the mantel and opened it. She knew what was inside: news of progress. Her family was almost indecent when it came to moving forward. They cared about the most vulgar things, like owning their own homes, raising and educating their children. It had taken only two years of poverty in Paris to make her the biggest materialist of them all. What was the moral? It couldn't really be just a simple thing divided down the center by fear, with Richard on one side and her on the other. She folded the letter up. Richard, still at the drawing board, was figuring with pencil and paper. She remembered the months in the States, before they'd come here, when the last thing she'd see at night would be Richard, his back to her, at his board, his short, wiry hair shining blue-black beneath the solitary fluorescent light. The only sound would be the tap of his brush from time to time as he rinsed it in the glass.

In those days, he'd taken every free-lance job he could get, to save enough money to come to Paris. He received a very small sum every month from his late mother's estate, and he had estimated that if he could earn the passage to Paris plus about two thousand dollars they would be on their way. They hadn't quite saved two thousand, and the trip over had been in winter on a ship that took twelve days, but it had been a marvelous adventure.

And now? The adventure had long since faded. They were still living on what they had when they came. There had been none of the extra cash they had somehow, unconsciously, expected. There was no way to earn one thin franc. She was an excellent stenographer, had been for four years in the States, but this interested not one soul in Paris. But then, why couldn't she give English lessons, and why hadn't she thought of it before? It was then she discovered she must get in line behind a few thousand other Americans in Paris with the same idea.

"Did you know Louis is getting married?" said Richard.

She didn't answer. Somehow tonight she must tell him she was leaving.

"Louis is buying my suit," said Richard.

No need to ask which suit. There was one decent suit left, a navy-blue serge, worn twice a year, generally when friends of friends or relatives came to France and looked them up. For two days she and Richard did all the best night clubs on the right bank, all the worst ones in Montmartre, and guzzled champagne. Then, the high life over, the suit went back into moth balls.

"I won't let you sell it," she said.

"Then we don't buy coal this month."

"No, I won't let you sell it," she repeated. Indignation surged through her like strength. For the moment, she had forgotten her decision to leave him. All she knew was that she would not become like her neighbors in poverty, beaten and hopeless. She began to walk up and down, restless with anger. "You can't sell your last good suit. You haven't a thing left. You've sold everything. It's not fair."

"How about you—the best-dressed woman on the left bank?" said Richard.

"I don't count, because I complain about it. I always complain, but you don't. You don't even seem to care, but I know you do. Your camera meant so much to you, and yet you sold it without a word. How can you give in so easily? Why don't you fight?"

He didn't reply, and she knew she was defeated. Richard had nothing to complain about. His last good suit didn't matter to him. Poverty didn't matter to him. He would pass ugliness on the street and not see it. He was fat and contented, sitting back picking his teeth, because he was making progress with his painting.

She was alone. The long gray days were for her only. Richard was complete in himself. He could use financial success and recognition, but he didn't need them. Success was an extra frill, and so was marriage.

For three years she and Richard had lived in harmony. She had considered her marriage a successful one because there had been so little quarreling and so much understanding. Now she saw with a frightful clarity that there had been no real marriage at all. She alone had been involved in it. Richard had never felt strongly enough to be anything but the perfect husband. He had never stooped to the common emotions the way she had. For three years he had lived apart. It was not the hardship that had finished their marriage; it was the fact that she had had to face it alone.

Now, this was right. Now she could begin to hate him. Now she could leave him and know there was nothing to regret.

She said, "If I left you, you wouldn't have to sell your suit or another thing. You could manage alone on that money you get every month from your mother's estate."

"Don't talk nonsense," he said mildly, his back still toward her.

"But you could manage, couldn't you?" she asked. "And I want to leave."

Now he turned in his chair. "Are you serious?"

"Yes, with or without you, I'm going back to the States." Her voice quavered, but she kept on. "You could get a good job in commercial art again, and we'd have some kind of a future."

"Future? At a desk job?" He half shook his head. "If we leave Paris, we have no future. I know it's rugged here for you. Don't think I don't know, but give me a chance." He sighed tiredly. "Rose-covered cottages take time to build."

"I don't want a rose-covered anything," she said. "All I want is to be hopeful again. I've tried to be, but I'm always alone and always afraid. It's different with you. You have some kind of shield that protects you against poverty and hopelessness."

She went to the cupboard and took out the necessary supplies for supper. "Will you go back with me?" she asked.

She didn't look at him. She waited for him to answer, but he was silent, unmoving.

Finally he said, "I can't."

She went to the door of the kitchen. "After supper I'll phone Betty Endicott," she said. "I'll stay with her till mother cables me the boat money."

He said nothing.

She went into the kitchen. So the great moment was over. The marriage blessed with harmony and understanding was over.

In the kitchen there were two hot plates and a basin with cold running water. She put on a large pot of water to boil, for spaghetti, and began to peel mushrooms.

How quiet it had been at the end. No bickering or quarreling. If she had wanted to be hysterical, the finish would have been hysterical. But she had conducted it in a ladylike fashion, and Richard, of course, had not been involved.

Dear Mother: Richard is a worthless, sĕlf-centered egotist. He's worshiped so long at the shrine of his own talent that nothing, not even the sound of our marriage breaking into pieces, can break the spell. He's sorry I'm miserable, but not sorry enough to keep me from taking the next boat.

She bent her head against her arm. It was hopeless. She could not hate Richard. The decision was hard enough without hatred too.

She was weeping when he came in.

He lowered the flame under the saucepan. "Don't you think you'd better put the spaghetti in?"

He didn't wait for her answer. He broke the spaghetti in two and slid it into the pan.

He turned to her. "Why are you crying? I should think you'd be glad to get out."

She wiped her eyes. "I am." She started to peel the mushrooms again.

"Just mushrooms and spaghetti?" he asked.

"And cheese and onions."

"What about the sausage?"

"It's for tomorrow."

"You're a funny one," he said. "There won't be a tomorrow. You're leaving me."

"All right. Then get the sausage." She began to slice the mushrooms into a frying pan.

When he came back, he said, "You know, when I was walking with Jerry today, we passed a pastry shop. I saw some meringue glacés in the window, and I thought I'd get you some. Then I thought you'd probably skin me alive for spending the money. Well, I thought it over, and I spent the money. The reason I don't have the meringue glacés now is that Jerry was with me. I had to offer him some, because, after all, he'd gotten the tray for me. And first thing you know, the greedy little so-and-so had eaten every last one up. He was starved."

She started to laugh. Richard watched her for a moment, and then he was laughing too.

He said, "I knew how mad you'd be to think I'd spent money on pastry for Jerry, so I didn't even bring the paper bag home. So I have no proof."

"What does it matter?" she said. She had stopped smiling.

He said, "It matters a lot. More than all the sold and unsold paintings in the world. It matters more than Jerry or the cold or my last good suit. It's the love between two people. I thought over what you said in the other room. You were right, honey. I do have a shield that protects me against poverty and hopelessness. And if you go, you'll be taking it with you. You're my shield."

He went to her and took her hand lightly. "I've really fallen down on the job, I guess," he said. "You've kept me going so long, but I haven't done a thing for you. I've felt so sure about your always being here that I never think about it. I never think of you as a separate person. That's the truth, honey. You're part of me. So if you go to the States, I'll have to go too. Ad layouts won't kill me. I've done them before. I'll do them again."

He put his arms about her, and they stood there for a moment, with only the sound of the water bubbling behind them.

She wanted to believe him, she needed to. She knew the words he had just spoken had been hard for him. He had spoken them to please her and comfort her. But did he mean them?

At last she stirred and said unhappily, "Why pretend? You know you'd be miserable if you went back."

"I'd be worse here alone. Supposing I could stick it and kept on here working. Supposing I finally had my one-man show with the critics in my back pocket. Supposing I really hit it. How would it be? Like nothing." He smoothed the soft hair back from her forehead. "I never thought it through before, but it would be like nothing. I'm not working for flattery or even money. I'm working for you. Someday I want to buy a car and drive to Spain, Italy and Austria. And I want you next to me, sitting in the front seat eating meringue glacés. That's all I want."

Up to a certain point it is good for us to know that there are people in the world who will give us love and unquestioned loyalty to the limit of their ability. I doubt, however, it is good for us to feel assured of this without the accompanying obligation of having to justify this devotion by our behavior. ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

She still didn't know. She said, "I wish I could believe you."

He smiled. "Don't believe me. Just wait and see. I'm going back with you. Whatever happens, I don't want you to be afraid or alone any more. We'll stay together, and we'll come out all right."

He released her. "I want to be a painter. You want to be a happy wife. Those ambitions aren't so impossible, are they? I can think of much more impossible things . . . like sitting on nails or getting elected President. So we'll go to America. I'll still paint, and you'll be a happy wife."

"We don't have to decide right now," she told him. "After dinner we'll decide just what to do."

Some people, in snug little homes, might think she was foolish. They might argue that no woman could love a man through poverty and wretchedness, but they would be wrong. Even when she had tried to hate him, she had loved him. And now he had come back to her, and she didn't feel shut off from him any more. He was her strength, and when she felt apart from him, the world was ugly and frightening. So how could she ever cross an ocean and leave him?

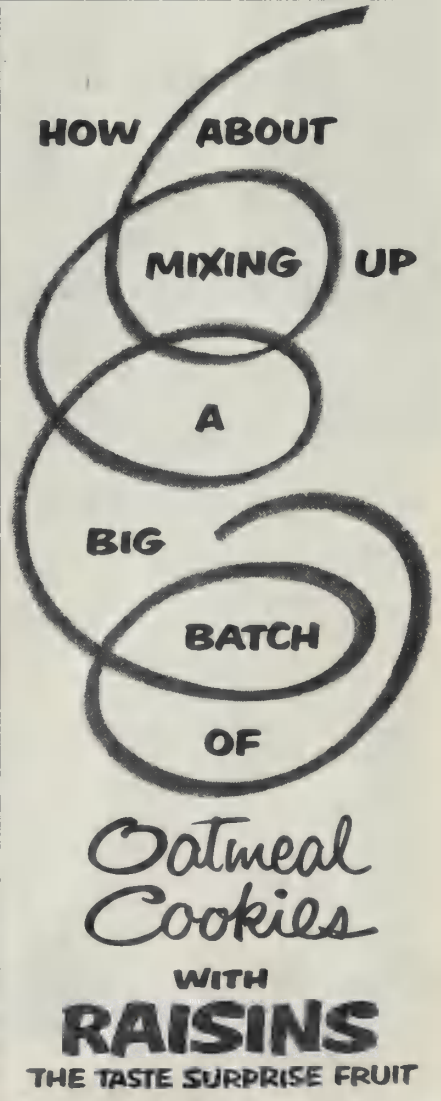
Her fear and weariness were vanishing like mist before day. All because he thought he needed her. His need gave her hope. Her hope was coming back to her.

He said, "All right, we'll decide after dinner." He went over to sniff at the mushrooms and onions.

She stirred the spaghetti, and when she turned around she saw him in the other room, clearing the table.

Dear Mother: Well, I flubbed the big farewell scene. I forgot most of my lines, and I never did get to the place where I could slam the door. But it doesn't matter. Richard has come back to me. He needs me only a little, but I need him always.

She went to the door and said, "We'll keep the sausage for tomorrow. O.K.?"



He raised his head. "O.K." END

NO OTHER ANTISEPTIC
not even iodine
IS SO EFFECTIVE
YET SO SAFE!

Johnson & Johnson First Aid Cream fights infection without stinging.

Cuts, burns, abrasions heal faster because it doesn't burn or harm tissue. Greaseless, stainless.

The modern first aid treatment for the whole family.

Johnson & Johnson

DREAM HOUSE FOR US

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 84

Brandy was served the gentlemen after the ladies had left the table. I know that my mother often spoke of the equally great change in the way she was brought up compared with her mother, and she has told me that my grandmother, born and brought up on the island of Fayal in the Azores, as the daughter of the American consul, never had put on her own stockings, or indeed any other garment, without the help of her maid—in fact, it took two little Portuguese maids to get each lady of the family ready for a reception of VIP's or a formal dinner party.

We talked of selling and moving to a smaller house, but I could not bear the thought of moving away from my second daughter's little family who were occupying what had formerly been our gardener's cottage. This situation, however, was brought to a head when she proceeded to have two more babies in one year and it became perfectly apparent that she would have to move even if we didn't. To me, the obvious solution was for us to move into the cottage and let them have the big house, but when I suggested this to my husband, he flatly refused even to consider the idea. No place for his books, or his guns, or his fishing things—in fact, no place for any of the things he wanted around him for the last stretch. I gave this up and suggested building an apartment over the garage—with no guest rooms, just a sitting room, a bedroom for me and a beautiful den for him with just everything he had ever wanted. This he sniffed at the way a dog sometimes does at a bone, pretending he is not going to eat it, not picking it up right away, but never leaving it quite alone. I realized I was up against a matter that would take expert salesmanship and bided my time. To my surprise, the children were even harder to sell: they thought the house would be too much for them, they could never keep it up; I would mind if they changed it all around to suit their needs, put baby swings and pens on my pretty lawn and little fences here and there; and before they finally graciously agreed to give it a try, I do not believe there was a house for sale or rent in all Long Island that they had not investigated.

About this time when everything was in a state of flux and uncertainty, my husband and I went to the flower show and there we saw a glass room, with a blue plastic roof, through which streamed the bright lights from overhead, giving an effect of sunlight, and glass louvers, controlled by little handles which, when turned, opened and closed the horizontal panes of glass. In front of these windows were boxes full of flowering plants, while on glass shelves pretty pieces of colored glass reflected other lights. "This is what we want in our new home," Archie exclaimed, and from then on I knew I was safe. That night we made the decision to build over the garage.

The garage consisted of a rather cheaply built, wooden-shingled building which held four cars. Over this were one bedroom, bath and one very large sort of rumpus room. Here were nailed various trophies collected through the years and which ranged from a huge skin of a boa constrictor to a letter of marque and reprisal signed by George III which had been sent to my father-in-law when he was President. There was also a model of a Zamboango outrigger canoe, the original of which had been given to Archie by Captain Sallston, who, in a burst of enthusiasm, had persuaded him to sail it down to Long Island. Captain Sallston explained that he knew all about them in the South Seas. About nine o'clock I was notified that they had been fished out of the East River, very wet and subdued but safe.

We chose our architect with the utmost care, as we realized what a tough job it was and that it would take a very clever and ingenious one indeed to overcome the natural disadvantages of the site we had chosen—down in a hollow, no view, surrounded with old stumps, brambles and dead trees, situated directly on the road where, during the last ten years, small developments had brought over fifty new houses. We decided to ask Freddy King, who was not only a top architect, but also happened to be an old friend, keeping our fingers crossed that it would not mean the end of our beautiful friendship. Actually, this almost did happen when Archie came home one night and told me that, with what seemed to me the utmost perfidy, Freddy, the first time he saw him alone, had advised him as a friend under no circumstances to build over the garage. To put things in a nutshell, to build over the garage would be, according to Archie, like "pouring water down a sewer." I must admit that I was considerably taken aback by this and for almost twenty-four hours gave up the idea. Then I decided that it must be the garage or nothing for the following reasons: first, this was within easy walking distance of even my youngest grandchild; and second, it would be near my beloved garden in which I had put so much of myself for so many years. With a shrug and an attitude which plainly said, "On your own head be it, but don't ever say I didn't warn you," Freddy agreed to draw up the plans. From the first we adored them and found he had put in everything we wanted, only infinitely better.

The plans were as follows: A rather short flight of stairs leads up beside the garage doors into a small hall which opens to the left into a large living room, thirty by eighteen feet.

MARGINAL NOTE ON A MILK BILL

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Oh, I could buy mink in the latest fashion,
And other such luxuries,
If I could but learn to control my passion
For foolish necessities!

The ceiling is vaulted, which gives the effect of as high a ceiling as possible, given the limitations of the rafters, and so on. The street is blocked out by closing off the windows on this side. On the right is a large fireplace, copied from the one in the old house with the original hand-carved rope edging and, in place of a mantel, the original seahorses and dolphin which we had had carved for us years before. The dolphin was an enlarged copy of the insigne from the gig of the President's summer yacht, The Dolphin. Our original idea had been to panel the room to match the mantel in pickled pine, but when we found what this would cost, we thought of the water running down the sewer and compromised on a textured plywood which resembles little sticks of bamboo and could be pickled to match the pine panels of the fireplace.

A picture window was put directly opposite the fireplace, looking out onto my garden and opening onto a small balcony. The balcony is large enough to hold at least four around a small table. Beside the fireplace French doors open into the glass room, which really is a dream. It has a Bermuda fireplace—that is, with the opening about two feet from the floor—flower boxes on two sides and sofas on the third. Frosted glass hides the street. The blue plastic overhead is very effective, and even on the darkest day gives a feeling of blue skies and sunlight. We look right into the woods, which we are slowly clearing of stumps and ugly vines and trees. We plan to leave the ferns and wild flowers which already grow there and add such things as bloodroot and arbutus.

My bedroom is a perfectly charming room with windows on two sides, a bathroom and closets on the third, while my beautiful old Adam bed fills the fourth. Facing the bed is a Dutch door which opens onto a terrace with a small retaining wall in front toward the woods. Back of the terrace I have done a good deal of planting, largely rock plants and so-called ground cover, with bulbs, ferns and lady's-slippers on the edge of the wood.

Finding that plants were terribly expensive on Long Island, I conceived the brilliant idea of motoring to a nursery in New England where plants cost about one third less. Not wanting to take the long trip alone, I invited a friend to go with me and this involved spending the night on the way. We stopped for a very expensive lunch and this, together with the gas and other incidentals I bought along the way, made the hundred plants I bought and brought triumphantly home cost only a little bit more than if they had been bought on Long Island. However, this gave my husband and the various friends he told it to so much pleasure that I was glad, in the end, that I had made such an exhausting expedition.

After we had accepted the plans, weeks of horror followed when drawings on thick blue paper and others on thin white paper and awful estimates passed across our vision as though on an assembly line. Each time we cut out some of our original expensive ideas we managed to think up some absolutely necessary thing which cost even more than we had cut out. I was surprised to find that Archie cared a great deal about built-in closets in his room, while he in his turn was simply amazed to find how much I cared about pink fixtures in my bathroom. Although constantly threatening that I would end—as indeed I still may—in a home for the indigent, I stuck out for the things that would make a real difference to our peace and comfort in our old age and pointed out the saving it would be to live by ourselves. We could get on for some years with little or no help. The laborsaving devices, consisting of our modern kitchen, an opening into the glass room where logs can be passed through from the truck, places to store wood behind the brick fronts of our Bermuda fireplaces, tiles in the front hall, linoleum on the kitchen and bathroom floors, all paint and wallpaper treated not to show stains left by little fingers, an electric one-man saw for clearing the woods and, above all, NO GUEST ROOMS—all would reduce the expense of extra labor.

I shall not even attempt to describe the actual move. After one has lived in one place for thirty-five years, a good deal accumulates, and I must confess that there were corners in the attics—and there are three—and even, to my shame, drawers in cupboards and tables that had remained undisturbed for years; and—oh, dear!—the books! Talk about "agonizing reappraisals," they were nothing to the awful decisions we faced daily—sorting, eliminating and choosing. Often we changed overnight and felt we just could not part with this or that. Finally endless trips with things like china, lamps and books, which for such a short distance seemed foolish to crate, were over and the movers arrived for the furniture and such. I may say in passing that this was just as much of a production and cost as much as if we had moved to New York. At long last the time came when we ourselves moved and, exhausted, threw ourselves onto our old beds in their new locations.

I shall never forget the first morning I awoke and looked out my door toward the old woodshed, half hidden by vines and on up the hill. It was a pretty morning and the sun was shining through the leaves in little patches and I realized that I had been hearing the cooing of the mourning dove and the sharp cry of the jay for quite a while before I was thoroughly awake. I had closed my eyes once again and was thanking God for my lovely new home when I heard a little noise and there, peering in my back door, were my three small granddaughters, still in their nightgowns, looking like angels and trying, oh so hard, not to wake me. My cup was full. Dreams don't often come true, but mine had.

END

NEW! INSTANT ICE SERVICE!

New Frigidaire Freezer-Refrigerator Zips Out Ice Cubes by the Score—at the Flick of Your Finger—Then Automatically Stores Them, "Frosty-Dry" in Big Pull-out Bin

So Easy—It's Child's Play. Instant Ice Service is standard equipment on all Cold-Pantry Models—optional, at slight extra cost, on all other 1958 Frigidaire Refrigerators.

Like enough cubes on hand so that you'll never be caught short again? Like 'em handy—"frosty-dry," without prying or dunking?

Then get set for a wonderful surprise.

With new Frigidaire Instant Ice Service, you can have 100 cubes ready for any occasion. Enough for dozens of tall drinks! You can free those cubes fast, by the score. Merely flip a lever and serve them "frosty-dry" (never melted together) from a party-size, pull-out serving bin.

Want to see more Sheer Look Pluses? Notice how those famous Roll-to-You Shelves almost hand foods to you.

Look how that big Pantry-Door provides a place for everything — even half-gallon milk cartons!

See that giant Picture Window Hydrator with its new Humidity Control—plus faster-chilling Flowing Cold.

More? Of course there's more! Visit your Frigidaire Dealer, he's waiting to show you this week.

Model CP-144-68 shown in Charcoal Gray

'58 FRIGIDAIRE

REFRIGERATORS WITH THE NEW SHEER LOOK—PLUS!

Stunning Beauty of the New Sheer Look has made it America's most wanted, most imitated styling. Blends beautifully into any kitchen décor, gives a custom-made look without usual remodeling costs. Take your pick of 4 fashion-fresh Sheer Look colors, sold by Frigidaire at the price of white.

GM GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY

Celebrating 50 Years of General Motors Leadership

SEE "The Patrice Munsel Show" on TV

LIVE BETTER ELECTRICALLY

Frigidaire— America's favorite Refrigerator serving more American homes than any other make

A kitchen for the Rest of our Lives

A friendly kitchen, planned for two to use while enjoying family and friends gathered around the family-room fireplace.

Bob Bagg is as much at home in the kitchen as Louise—salads, his specialty.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON Homemaking Editor

For this month's kitchen we take you inside a sweet and snug New England home with a hilly view, seven miles from Westfield, Massachusetts. Just a year ago Bob and Louise Bagg bought a piece of the old Lyman farm—wooded to attract the birds they love, and looking out across open fields and meadows to Mount Pomeroy in the west. There was even a little brook rambling across the place which Bob has enlarged to make a pool for the birds. Now the three-bedroom house is finished and painted a soft spruce green to blend with the tall trees and the native laurel, blueberry and juniper, carefully spared when the bulldozer carved out the roadway and the basement.

The kitchen is very special because it was so thought out from the beginning. A year ago, Louise wrote of her plans: "Oh, happy prospect! In the thirtieth year of our marriage and the fiftieth year of our lives—and coinciding with our tall son's release from the Army and entrance into graduate school—we have purchased an acre of land and plan to start building in March.

"This kitchen has to be right—right for our way of life. We have a lovely home

Plan shows sociable arrangement of kitchen and keeping room. Louise had written: "I do need a spot to tot up the grocery bill or jot down a recipe given over the phone." Desk along one wall supplies the need. There is china and linen storage at right of fireplace.

A—cabinet on wheels B—refrigerator C—tray rack D—sink E—dishwasher F—oven G—cooking top H—breakfast counter J—cleaning supplies K—desk L—pass-through and storage.

Here's the cruising cabinet, now wheeled up next to the stack-on refrigerator and freezer units that needed no work of building in. Sink and dishwasher are farther at right, followed by storage cabinets of sky-blue tint. A delicate herb-patterned wallpaper is used on the kitchen wall and on one wall (not pictured) of the sitting room.

STUART

"Butternut is one of the most beautiful—and neglected—of New England woods," Bob told us. Luckily, they found a well-seasoned stock. Its warm tones now panel the sitting-room part of the kitchen, where the fireplace is framed with bird and flower tiles, and the hearth is native stone. Captains' chairs, an easy chair, a cherry table, a peaceful view greet visitors. Louise's wheeled cabinet rolls in from the kitchen with the food, back again at dishwashing time. For portable cooking—"one of our pet hobbies"—the electric and automatic Dutch oven is a joy.

"I like to look at mountains while I scramble eggs." Louise's hope was met in an angled cooking corner, free form, that doesn't cut off her view. The cooking top placed this way even allows for a small semicircled breakfast counter, a tall cleaning cupboard beside it. Now as she works she faces the fireplace, and can talk with Bob and any visitors on hand. Butternut is echoed in the kitchen by the wall cabinets.

A can opener mounted on brackets slides outward when needed, slides back under cabinet afterward—Louise finds it a great convenience.

Cleaning cupboard fits next to snack counter. Long-handled tools are at convenient height over drawer. Sliding trays above hold small items.

now, but it is too large and without adequate storage space. We feel a great longing to simplify our lives."

After spending some time in Westfield, it was clear the Baggs wanted to simplify to make time for their many hobbies. Both Bob and Louise have challenging jobs. In addition, Bob makes wood sculptures, carves stone and paints in water color. Louise is an active member of conservation groups and garden clubs. The two together share a love of wildlife and birds in particular.

Cooking is another twosome hobby. "Bob is an inspired cook—he never likes to clean up afterward," Louise told us. At any rate, when he is around no one else can make the salads.

The outstanding feature of the house is a family sitting room (or "keeping room," as old New Englanders would have it). The kitchen is on one side and the dining area with fireplace and a wide-view window on the other. The flavor of the room is New England traditional—and rightly so. Eight generations ago Bob's ancestors settled nearby on the banks of the Connecticut River. Louise's grandmother was a real "white birch"—local name for a family which has lived in the vicinity as long as anyone can remember.

But the kitchen is modern, with the kind of convenience that makes work easier and simpler. For instance, the refrigerator-freezer combination is actually two separate appliances stacked with fresh-food section at the top. As much as CONTINUED ON PAGE 174

Cutting board is set right into a counter top, secured with a metal ring. In the cabinet below, a swing-out shelf brings utensils forward.

Nothing frees your hands quite so beautifully as a KitchenAid dishwasher by Hobart. While you take time for living—for family, friends, the worthwhile things—your KitchenAid takes on your clean-up as no other dishwasher can.

For no other offers you the performance features you find in this, the finest made: Racks designed for "can't miss" loading. Hobart's revolving power wash arm that gets your tableware hospital-clean. A separate blower-dryer for that cloudless sparkle you want dishes to have. All this in standard cabinet width—you're not robbed of precious kitchen space.

Ask your dealer to show you the new KitchenAid. You'll find just the model to go with your kitchen, as surely as it goes with your way of life. And see the new food preparers and the electric coffee mill—they're KitchenAid, too.

See the new KitchenAid! Write Dept. KM, KitchenAid Home Dishwasher Div., The Hobart Manufacturing Co., Troy, Ohio. In Canada: 175 George St., Toronto 2.

..time for a KitchenAid®

The Finest Made...by Hobart

The World's Largest Manufacturer of Food, Kitchen and Dishwashing Machines

COCKTAIL TIME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

the only human souls that came in sight were a couple of shopgirls and a boy in a cloth cap. He was confident that before long something worthy of his Brazil nut would emerge from the Demosthenes Club, which stands across the street from the Drones. He had often lunched there with his wife's half brother, Sir Raymond Bastable, the eminent barrister. In almost no place in London does the tall silk headgear flourish so luxuriantly.

"Sap my vitals," he said, enlivening the tedium of waiting with pleasant small talk, "it's extraordinary how vividly this brings back to me those dear old tiger-shooting days in Bengal. The same tense expectancy, the same breathless feeling that at any moment something hot may steal out from the undergrowth, lashing its top hat. Ha!"

The door of the Demosthenes had swung open, and there had come down the steps a tall, stout, florid man of middle age who wore his high silk hat like the plumed helmet of Henry of Navarre. He stood looking about him for a taxicab.

Pongo repeated his stricken-duck impersonation. "For heaven's sake, Uncle Fred! You can't pot that bird's hat!"

"Can't?" Lord Ickenham's eyebrows rose.

"But it's old Bastable."

Lord Ickenham had not failed to observe this, but the discovery did nothing to weaken his resolution. Though fond of Sir Raymond Bastable, he found much to disapprove of in him. He considered the eminent barrister pompous, arrogant and far too pleased with himself. To have his top hat knocked off with a Brazil nut would, in Lord Ickenham's opinion, make him a better, deeper, more lovable man. "Yes, there he spouts," he said.

"He's Aunt Jane's brother."

"'Half brother' is the more correct term. Still, as the wise old saying goes, half a brother is better than no bread."

"Aunt Jane will skin you alive, if she finds out."

"She won't find out. But I must not waste time chatting with you, my dear Pongo. I see a taxicab approaching, and if I do not give quick service, my quarry will be gone with the wind."

Narrowing his gaze, Lord Ickenham released the guided missile, little knowing, as it sped straight and true to its mark, that he was about to enrich English literature and provide another job of work for a number of deserving printers.

Yet such was indeed the case. Sir Raymond Bastable's novel Cocktail Time was directly inspired by the accurate catapultmanship of Pongo Twistleton's Uncle Fred.

Having finished his coffee and accepted the congratulations of friends with a modesty that became him well, the fifth Earl ("Old Sureshot") of Ickenham, accompanied by his nephew Pongo, left the club and hailed a taxi, directing the charioteer to convey them to Lord's Cricket Ground. As the cab rolled off, Pongo drew a deep breath and sat staring before him with unseeing eyes.

"You seem pensive, my boy," said Lord Ickenham. "Something on your mind, or what passes for it?"

Pongo spoke in a low, toneless voice. "I was thinking of a problem that came up at the Drones the other night."

"Oh, yes?"

"It was this. If you have a crazy uncle, are you better off if he lives in London or if he's down in the country and just blows into town for occasional visits?"

"And what decision was arrived at?"

"Well, some said one thing and some another. You see the point. If he lives in London, there he is, if you see what I mean. But his loopiness is sort of spread out thin. Whereas, cooped up in the country with no way of working it off, he . . . what is it? Begins with a g."

"'Generates' is, I imagine, the word you are groping for. Cooped up in the country, you feel, he generates a store of loopiness which expends itself with terrific violence on his rare visits to the center of things."

"That's right. Well, that's the problem we were discussing. Pretty moot, don't you think?"

"Very moot, indeed. I am not surprised that the Drones Club debating society were unable to be unanimous. But for you, of course, the question must have been a purely academic one." Lord Ickenham paused. "Good heavens," he said, for a bizarre thought had struck him. "Can it be that you are thinking of what occurred in the smoking room just now?"

"Yes, it jolly well can."

"It struck you as odd that I should have knocked off Raymond Bastable's topper with a Brazil nut?"

"It struck me as loopy."

"My dear boy, that was not loopiness, it was altruism. One has to do the decent thing and spread sweetness and light as far as in one lies, and I knew that he needed a Brazil nut in the topper.

"You know, Pongo, the whole trouble in this world is the way fellows deteriorate as they grow older. Time, like an ever-rolling stream, bears all their finer qualities away, with the result that the frightfully-good chap of twenty-five is changed little by little into the stinker of fifty. Yes, yes, I know what you are going to say. 'Absurd! Look at you, Uncle Fred. Every day in every way you have got better and better.' Quite true, but I am a rare exception. 'Look,' I say in my turn, 'at Raymond Bastable.' Thirty years ago, when he came down from Oxford, where he had been a popular member of the university Rugby-football team, Beefy, as we used to call him, was a fourteen-stone ray of sunshine. And what is he now? The passing of the years has turned him into what a mutual friend of ours—Elsie Bean, who once held office as housemaid under Sir Aylmer Bostock at Ashenden Manor—would call an overbearing dishpot. What he needs, of course, is a wife."

"Ah," said Pongo, who had recently acquired one, "now you're talking. If he had someone like Sally ——"

"Or like my own dear Jane. It was the worst thing that could have happened to Beefy when Barbara Crowe handed him his hat."

"Barbara Crowe? Isn't she a movie star or something?"

"Certainly not. She's a partner in Edgar Saxby and Sons, the literary agents. Ever heard of them?"

"No."

"Well, I don't suppose they've ever heard of you, which evens things up. I've known Barbara for years. She's the widow of an old friend of mine, Jimmy Crowe, who was killed in the war. I introduced her to Beefy, and was delighted when she told me that they were planning to put up the banns. And then I heard that it was all off. Terrible pity. She's lovely, she's got a wonderful sense of humor, and her golf handicap is well in single figures. Just the wife for Beefy. She would have made him human again. But it was not to be. . . . What did you say?"

"I said 'Bad show.'"

"And you could scarcely have put it more neatly. It's a tragedy. Still, there's always a bright side. If things are not all that one could wish on the Bastable front, they're fine in the Johnny Pearce sector. I see a bright and prosperous future for him."

"Who is this girl he's marrying?"

"I told you at lunch. Belinda Farringdon, commonly known as Bunny."

"No, I mean who is she? What does she do?"

"She's a commercial artist."

"Any money?"

I have never seen a badly dressed woman who was agreeable and good-humored.

HONORÉ DE BALZAC

"I imagine not. Still, what's money? You n't take it with you."

"No, but you can do a lot with it here."

"True. And one of the things you can do th yours," said Lord Ickenham, as they ew up at Lord's, "is pay the cab."

They entered the ground, and Pongo, corally invited to remain at his uncle's side, ivered a little and said he would prefer to pushing along.

For some little while after parting from his phew, Lord Ickenham proceeded to saunter ther and thither, meeting old acquaintances id exchanging amiable civilities. Many of ese old acquaintances had been contemoraries of his at school, and the fact that ost of them looked as if they would never e a hundred and four again was a reminder the passage of time that depressed him, as r as he was capable of being depressed. It as a relief when he observed approaching m someone who, though stout and florid id wearing a top hat with a dent in it, was least many years from being senile. He eeted him warmly.

"Beefy, my dear fellow!"

"Ah, Frederick."

Sir Raymond Bastable spoke absently. He as sufficiently present in spirit to be able to y "Ah, Frederick," but his mind was not n his half brother-in-law. He was thinking f the modern young man. At the moment hen Lord Ickenham accosted him, there had ist risen before his mental eye a picture of ie interior of the Old Bailey, with himself in wig and silk gown cross-examining with itiless severity the representative of that ubspecies who had knocked his hat off.

When the hat he loved had suddenly parted om its moorings and gone gamboling over ie pavement like a lamb in springtime, Sir aymond Bastable's initial impression that it ad been struck by a flying saucer had not sted long. A clapping of hands and the ound of cheering from across the street drew is attention to the smoking-room window of ie Drones Club and he perceived that it framed a sea of happy faces, each split by a six-inch grin. A moment later he had seen lying at his feet a handsome Brazil nut, and all things were made clear to him. What had occurred, it was evident, had been one more exhibition of the brainless hooliganism of the modern young man.

With a powerful effort, Sir Raymond removed himself from the Old Bailey. "So you're here, are you, Frederick?" he said.

"In person," Lord Ickenham assured him. "Wonderful, running into you like this. How's everything at home? Phoebe all right?"

"She is quite well."

"And you?"

"I also am quite well."

"Splendid. You'll be even better when you're settled at Dovetail Hammer. Jane tells me you've taken Johnny Pearce's Hammer Lodge place there."

"Yes. I shall be moving in shortly. Your godson, isn't he?"

"That's right. You'll find Johnny a pleasant neighbor. He's a capital young fellow."

"Young?"

"Quite young."

"Then tell him to keep away from me," said Sir Raymond tensely. "If any young man attempts to come near me, I'll set the dog on him."

Lord Ickenham regarded him with concern. "Why this bilious attitude toward the younger generation? Doesn't youth with all its glorious traditions appeal to you?"

"It does not."

"Why not?"

"Because some young thug knocked off my hat this afternoon."

"You shock and astound me. With his umbrella?"

"With a Brazil nut."

"These are deep waters. Who was this fiend in human shape?"

"All I know is that he belongs to the Drones Club, which to my lasting regret is situated immediately opposite the Demosthenes. I was standing outside the Demosthenes, waiting for a cab, when something suddenly struck my hat a violent blow, lifting it from my head. I looked down, and saw a Brazil nut. It had obviously been thrown from the room on the ground floor of the Drones Club, for when I looked up the window was full of grinning faces." Sir Raymond started. A thought had occurred to him. "Frederick!"

"Hullo?"

"Frederick, I invited you to lunch with me at the Demosthenes today. You declined because you had a previous engagement at the Drones Club."

"Yes."

"Did you take your after-luncheon coffee in the smoking room?"

"I did."

"Then you must have seen everything that occurred and can identify the individual responsible for the outrage."

It was plain that Lord Ickenham was impressed by this remorseless reasoning. He stood musing for a space in silence, a frown of concentration on his brow.

"Difficult always to reconstruct a scene," he said at length, "but as I think back, I do dimly recall a sort of stir and movement at the window and a group of young fellows clustered about someone who had . . . yes, by Jove, he had a catapult in his hand."

"A catapult! Yes, yes, go on."

"He appeared to be aiming with it at some object across the street. Do you know, Beefy, I am strongly inclined to think that this object may have been your hat."

"Who was he?"

"He didn't give me his card."

"But you can describe his appearance."

"Let me try. I remember a singularly handsome, clean-cut face, but—no, the vision fades. Too bad."

"I'd give a hundred pounds to identify the fellow."

"With a view to instituting reprisals?"

"Exactly."

"Well, it's for you to decide, of course, but it's rather difficult to see what you can do. You can't write to the Times."

"Why not?"

"My dear fellow! It would be fatal. Jane was telling me the other day that you were going to stand for Parliament. Think of the effect of a letter to the Times. You know what the British voter is like. Let him learn that you have won the Derby or saved a golden-haired child from a burning building, and yours is the name he puts a cross against on his ballot paper; but tell him that somebody has knocked your topper off with a Brazil nut and his confidence in you is shaken. I don't defend this attitude, I merely say it exists."

It was Sir Raymond's turn to muse, and, having done so, he was forced to admit that there was truth in this. "Well," he said, "I do not intend to let the matter rest. I shall most certainly do something about it."

"But what? You might . . . no, that wouldn't do. Or . . . no, that wouldn't do, either. I confess I see no daylight. What a pity it is that you're not an author. Then you would be on velvet."

"I don't understand you. Why?"

"You could have got these views of yours on the younger generation off your chest in a novel. Something on the lines of Evelyn Waugh's Vile Bodies—witty, bitter, satirical and calculated to make the younger generation see itself as in a mirror and wish that Brazil nuts had never been invented. But in your case, of course, that is out of the question. You couldn't write a novel if you tried for a hundred years. Well, good-by, my dear fellow. Sorry I could not have been of more help."

He tripped away, and Sir Raymond was conscious of a mounting sense of indignation. He strongly resented that remark about his not being able to write a novel if he tried for a hundred years. Who was Ickenham to say whether he could write a novel or not?

Anything in the nature of a challenge had always been a spur to Sir Raymond Bastable. All through the rest of the day and far into the night he brooded smolderingly on Lord

CONTINUED ON PAGE 119

"I Couldn't Get Along Without My Kitchen Telephone"

You'll say so, too, once you know the convenience of a telephone right beside you in the kitchen. It saves a lot of steps and time. Saves you!

No need to leave the baby or the kids or the roast or whatever you're doing to make a call. No need to rush to another room to answer the telephone. You just reach out your hand and there it is!

A kitchen telephone is so convenient when you need that "telephone break" from your household chores. Other favorite locations are the bedroom, den, recreation room and workshop.

Easy to get. Wonderful to have. Just call the Business Office of your local Bell Telephone Company.

MODERN HOMES HAVE HANDY PHONES

Bell Telephone System
IT'S FUN TO PHONE

CONVENIENCE IN COLOR. You'll love the way a color telephone brightens up the kitchen. There's a choice of attractive colors in both the regular instrument and the special wall-type shown above.

Magic for meatless menus ... real Italian-style

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® Spaghetti Dinner

This 12-minute dinner features a mushroom sauce prepared just as in the Italian Lake Country—plus quick-cooking spaghetti and tasty cheese. Makes 3 hearty, delectable servings for about 15¢ each. Treat your family this week!

Complete in one box

Now available in Canada

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 117

kenham's tactless words, and rose from his d next morning with his mind made up.

Write a novel? Of course he could write a ovel, and he would.

But though his theme was ready to hand nd his rage continued unabated, there were oments in the weeks that followed when nly the iron Bastable will kept him from ving in and abandoning the project. How- er, came a day when Sir Raymond was able point at a mass of typescript on his desk, e top sheet of which was inscribed:

COCKTAIL TIME

BY

ANTHONY BLUNT

His whole soul had gone into Cocktail ime—a biting title with its sardonic implica- on that that was all the younger generation ved for—and he knew it was good. It was n infernal shame, he felt, that circumstances ompelled him to hide his identity under a seudonym.

As, of course, they did. A man who is oping for the Conservative nomination at ottleton East has to be cautious. You cannot xpect to get far on the road to Downing treet if you come up with something like orever Amber.

And he was forced to admit, as he skimmed hrough its pages, that in both tone and sub- ance Cocktail Time had much in common ith Miss Winsor's masterpiece. Sex had rept into it in rather large quantities, for, hile exposing the modern young man, he ad not spared the modern oung woman. Cocktail ime was unquestionably utspoken in one or two pots—particularly Chap. 3. A Raymond Bastable evealed as the man behind Chap. 13, and the some- hat less outspoken Chaps. 0, 16, 20, 22 and 24, could ever hope to receive the omination for the impend- ng parliamentary election at Bottleton East.

Nothing is so dangerous as being too modern. One is apt to grow old-fashioned quite suddenly.

OSCAR WILDE

Into the early vicissitudes of Sir Raymond's rain child it is not necessary to go in any reat detail, for it had much the same experi- nces as any other first novel. He sent it to ope and Potter, and it came back. He sent t to Simms and Shotter, and it came back; o Melville and Monks, and it came back. Why it should eventually have found jour- ey's end in the offices of Alfred Tomkins, td., one cannot say, but it did, and they ublished it, with a jacket featuring a young an with a monocle in his right eye doing the ock 'n' roll with a young woman in her tep-ins.

After that, as is customary on these occa- ions, nothing much happened. The Peebles ourier called it not unpromising, the Basing- toke Journal thought it not uninteresting, nd the Times Literary Supplement told its eaders that it was published by Alfred Tom- ins, Ltd., and contained 243 pp. Apart from hat, it received no critical attention.

But Fame was merely crouching for the spring. At two minutes past five one Tuesday fternoon the venerable Bishop of Stortford, ntering the room where his daughter Kathleen at, found her engrossed in a novel entitled Cocktail Time. Peeping over her shoulder, he was able to read a paragraph or two. She had got to the middle of Chap. 13. At 5:05 sharp he was wrenching the volume from her grasp, at 5:06 tottering from the room, at 5:10 in his study scrutinizing Chap. 13 to see if he had really seen what he thought he had seen.

He had.

At 12:15 on the following Sunday he was in the pulpit delivering a sermon on the text "He that toucheth pitch shall be defiled" (Ecclesiasticus 13:1). The burden of his address was a denunciation of the novel Cocktail Time, which he described as obscene, immoral, shocking, impure, corrupt, shameless, graceless and depraved.

It was not to be expected that such an event would pass unnoticed. The popular press did it proud, and there was joy that morning in the offices of Alfred Tomkins, Ltd. Full statistics are not to hand, but it is estimated by competent judges that a good bishop, denouncing from the pulpit with the right note in his voice, can add between ten and fifteen thousand to the sales.

Mr. Prestwick, the senior partner, read the Express, the Mail and the Mirror, and within five minutes of his arrival at the office was on the telephone to Ebenezer Flapton and Sons, printers, urging Ebenezer and the boys to drop everything and start rushing out a large new edition. Cocktail Time, which Alfred Tomkins, Ltd., had been looking on as just another of the stones the builder had refused, was plainly about to become the head stone of the corner.

But there was no corresponding joy in the heart of Sir Raymond Bastable as he paced the lawn of Hammer Lodge. In writing Cocktail Time, he had had a malevolent hope that he would be starting something, but he had never expected to start anything of these dimensions, and the thought that chilled him to the very spinal marrow was this: Would that pseudonym of his be an adequate safeguard?

If there is one thing the popular press of today is, it is nosy. It tracks down, it ferrets out. Anthony Blunt becomes front-page news, and it is not long before it is asking who is this Anthony Blunt? It wants photographs of him smoking a pipe or being kind to the dog and interviews with him telling the world what his favorite breakfast cereal is and what he thinks of the modern girl. It institutes inquiries and discovers that nobody has ever seen the gifted Blunt. At this very moment, Sir Raymond felt, a dozen reporters must be sniffing on his trail, and the contemplation of the appalling mess in which he had landed himself made him writhe like an Ouled Nail stomach dancer.

He was still busily writhing when the voice of Peasemarch, his butler, spoke softly at his side. Peasemarch always spoke softly when addressing Sir Raymond Bastable.

"I beg your pardon, Sir Raymond."

The author of Cocktail Time came slowly out of the uneasy dream in which he had been sustaining the role of the stag heated in the chase. "Eh?"

"It is madam, sir. I think you should come."

"Come? What do you mean?"

"To madam's room, sir. I am afraid she is not well. I was passing her door a moment ago, and I heard her sobbing," said Peasemarch.

A wave of exasperation and self-pity flooded Sir Raymond's tortured soul. Phoebe, he was thinking, would start sobbing at a time like this. For an instant he was inclined to counter with a firm refusal to go within a mile of madam's room. Then kindlier feelings prevailed, or possibly it was just curiosity. He accompanied Peasemarch and found his sister sitting up in bed, dabbing at her eyes with something that looked as if it might have been at one time a pocket handkerchief.

Except that her ears did not stick up and that she went about on two legs instead of four, Phoebe Wisdom was extraordinarily like a white rabbit, a resemblance heightened at the moment by the white dressing jacket she was wearing and the fact that weeping had made her nose and eyes pink. As Sir Raymond closed the door behind him, she uttered a loud, gurgling sob.

"What on earth's the matter?" he demanded.

Another sob shook the stricken woman. "Cossie!" said his sister.

"Oh, Cosmo? What about him?"

"He says he's going to shoot himself."

Sir Raymond was in favor of this. Cosmo Wisdom, the fruit of the unfortunate marriage Phoebe had made twenty-seven years ago, was a young man he disliked even more than he disliked most young men. Algernon Wisdom, Cosmo's father, during the greater part of his futile career had been what he euphemistically described as "between jobs," and

O-Cedar's swivel socket steers to any position—speeds dusting of hard-to-reach places

O-cedar "Every-Which-Way" mops

in nylon or cotton

O-Cedar "Every-Which-Way" dust mops feature the "Magic-Action" Swivel Socket . . . adjust to any position at a flick of the wrist . . . twist in and out of hard-to-dust places . . . steer around chair and table legs . . . glide easily under low, heavy furniture. Pads remove quickly for easy washing.

Just a twist of the handle adjusts pad to dust a 50% wider path.

Choice of Beautiful Colors

Available in pink, yellow, blue or white 100% virgin nylon yarn only $3.95. In attractive pink, yellow or white fine spun cotton yarn, $2.95. Ask for the O-Cedar mop that goes "Every-Which-Way."

Exclusive "Magne-Static" action of nylon yarn attracts dust like magic.

Insist on a genuine

O-Cedar Dust Mop

50 YEARS OF QUALITY O cedar

O-CEDAR

Chicago, Illinois—Division of

AMERICAN-MARIETTA COMPANY

O-Cedar of Canada, Ltd., Stratford, Ontario

A-M

FREE Lovely SCATTER RUGS
Up to $16 Value... Just for Trying Room Size Olson Rugs. If Not Pleased, Return for Refund ... Keep Scatter Rugs

Like Over 3 Million Customers, You, Too, Can Have...
Finer RUGS
the Magic Olson Way
by Sending Us Your OLD RUGS, CARPET, CLOTHING

OLSON picks up your materials at your door by Express or Freight! No expense to you! In about one week we will send you the thickest, most luxurious Reversible Broadloom Rugs or Wall-to-Wall Carpet you've ever seen for so little money. You save up to one-half the Magic Olson Way!

YOUR CHOICE of lovely, up to date Tweeds, Solid Colors, Florals, Early American and Oriental patterns, Ovals... regardless of colors in your materials. ANY SIZE up to 18 feet wide, seamless, any length. Easy Monthly Payments if desired. Our 84th Year. Rush Coupon or Postcard for exciting, full color FREE Rug and Decorating Catalog—49 Model Rooms—plus FREE RUG COUPON.

FREE! to Every Reader
Mail Rug & Decorating Book, Free Rug Coupon.
Your Name.....
© ORC
Address.....
Town..... State.....
OLSON RUG CO., Dept. E-37
CHICAGO 41 ILLINOIS • NEW YORK 1 NEW YORK • SAN FRANCISCO 8 CALIFORNIA

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE WATER MASTER
America's Largest Selling
TOILET TANK BALL
Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.
75c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE
Higher in Canada

Almost Everyone Uses
Selfix HOOKS

NO NAILS! NO TOOLS! NO SCREWS!
Just MOISTEN with WATER
STICK 'EM UP!
On Tile • Plaster Wood • Glass
HOLDS 15 LBS.
2 for 25c
Satisfaction guaranteed or your money refunded. In decorator colors—white, pink, yellow, green, turquoise, red, black. So easy to use! At 5c and 10c and Hardware Stores—or write for address of nearest store. SELFIX PRODUCTS CO., DEPT. 33, 223 W. Erie Street, Chicago 10, Ill.
COMMENDED BY PARENTS MAGAZINE

GOTTSCHALK'S metal sponges

For 45 years, housewives' favorite for cleaning and scouring utensils, tiles, metal, porcelain and enamelware, floors, woodwork. Efficient, long lasting, harmless to hands and fine finishes. Sold everywhere—demand original Gottschalk's Metal Sponges. Metal Sponge Sales Corp., Phila. 40.

Cosmo took after him. "We must do something about poor Cossie," were words frequently on his mother's lips, and Sir Raymond would say in the unpleasant voice which he used when addressing hostile witnesses that he had no desire to be unduly inquisitive, but would she mind telling him what precisely she meant by the pronoun "we"?

The most recent attempt on his part to do something about poor Cossie had been to secure him a post in the export-and-import firm of Boots and Brewer of St. Mary Axe.

"What has he been doing?" he asked. "Why have Boots and Brewer dismissed him? They have, I take it?"

"He doesn't say so. He just says he wants two hundred pounds."

"Don't give him a penny."

"He doesn't want a penny; he wants two hundred pounds."

"Let him want."

"But he'll shoot himself."

"Not a hope," said Sir Raymond, with a wistful little sigh as the bright picture the words had conjured up faded. "For heaven's sake, stop worrying. All that letter means is that he thinks he may get a tenner out of you."

"He says two hundred pounds."

"They always say two hundred pounds. Well, I can't stand here talking. I shall miss my train. Take an aspirin."

"What, dear?"

"Take an aspirin. Take two aspirins. Take three," said Sir Raymond vehemently, and whirled off like a tornado to the car which was waiting to convey him to the station.

Of the several appointments he had in London that day the first was lunch with Lord Ickenham at the Demosthenes Club. His guest was late, and to while away the time he went to the center table and picked up a paper. One glance at its front page, and he had dropped it as if it had bitten him, and was tottering to the nearest chair. It was not often that he indulged in alcoholic stimulant before lunch, but he felt compelled now to order a double dry martini.

He had just finished it when Lord Ickenham was shown in, all apologies. "My dear old Beefy, sorry I'm so late. I started walking in plenty of time, but I met Barbara in Bond Street."

"Who?"

"Barbara Crowe."

"Oh?"

"She asked after you. Affectionately, I thought."

"Oh?"

Lord Ickenham regarded him disapprovingly. "It's no good saying 'Oh?' in that tone of voice, Beefy, as if you didn't care. You know perfectly well that one word of encouragement from her, and you would be at her side, rolling over on your back with all your paws in the air."

"Well, really, Frederick!"

"I'm fond of you, Beefy, stuffed shirt though you have become after a promising youth and young manhood. I want to see you happy."

"Very good of you. Cocktail?"

"If you'll join me."

"I have had one."

"Have another."

"I think I will. Phoebe upset me this morning. Her son Cosmo appears to have been getting into trouble again. You know him?"

"Just sufficiently to duck down a side street when I see him coming."

"He is trying to borrow two hundred pounds."

"You don't say? Will he get it?"

"Not from me."

"Is Phoebe distressed?"

"Very."

"And I suppose you yelled at her. That's your great defect, Beefy. You bark and boom and bellow at people. Not at me, for my austere dignity restrains you, but at the world in general. Used you to bellow at Barbara?"

"Shall we change——"

"I'll bet you did, and it was that that made her break off the engagement. But, from the way she was speaking of you, I got the impression that your stock was still high with her. Why don't you look her up and take her out to lunch? And just to show her you're not such a fool as you look, tell her that you are the author of the best-selling novel, Cocktail Time. That'll impress her."

It is rarely that the smoking room of a club in the West End of London suddenly springs into spasmodic life, with its walls, windows, chairs, tables, its members and its waiters pirouetting as if Arthur Murray had taught them dancing in a hurry, but that was what the smoking room of the Demosthenes seemed to Sir Raymond Bastable to be doing now. It swayed and shimmied about him like something rehearsed for weeks by a choreographer.

"What—what do you mean?" he gulped.

Lord Ickenham, usually so genial, betrayed a little impatience. "Now come, Beefy. You aren't going to say you didn't? My dear fellow, to anyone who knows you as I do, it sticks out a mile. At least three scenes in the thing are almost literal transcriptions of stories you've told me yourself. You've used the Brazil-nut episode. And apart from the internal evidence, we have the statement of Jane."

"Jane?"

"She came to London one day on a shopping binge and thought it would be the half-sisterly thing to do to look you up, so she called at your house. You were out, but Peasemarch let her in and parked her in the study. After nosing about awhile, she started, as women will, to tidy your desk, and shoved away at the back of one of the drawers was a brown paper parcel from the publishing house of Simms and Shotter, dispatched by them to Anthony Blunt. She mentioned this to me on her return. So you may as well come clean, Beefy. You are this Blunt of whom we hear so much, are you not?"

No woman does her housework with real joy unless she is in love—and a woman may go on being quietly in love for fifty years almost without knowing it. D. H. LAWRENCE

"Yes, I am."

"Well, I don't see what you're groaning about."

"But, Frederick, suppose it comes out?"

"What does it matter if it comes out?"

"Good heavens, it would mean the end of any hope I have of a political career."

"Well, why do you want a political career? Have you ever been in the House of Commons and taken a good square look at the inmates? I wouldn't mix with them for any money you could offer me."

"Those are not my views. I have set my heart on getting that nomination for Bottleton East, Frederick. And there isn't a chance that they will give it to me if it's in all the papers that I wrote a book like Cocktail Time."

"Why should it be in all the papers?"

"These reporters. They find things out."

"Oh? Yes, I see."

Lord Ickenham was silent for some moments. From the frown of concentration on his forehead he appeared to be exercising that ingenious brain of his. "You must find some needy young fellow who for a consideration will consent to take the rap."

Sir Raymond sat up with a convulsive jerk, spilling his glass. For the first time since breakfast that morning he seemed to see dimly, like the lights of a public house shining through a London fog, a ray of hope.

"Don't you know any needy young fellows, Beefy? Why, of course you do. Your nephew, Cosmo. You say he wants two hundred pounds. Give it him, and tell him he can stick to all the royalties on the book, and the thing's in the bag."

Sir Raymond breathed deeply. "Frederick," he said, "you have solved everything. It's a wonderful idea. I don't know how to thank you —— Yes?"

A waiter had materialized at his side, one of the waiters who a short while before had been dancing the shimmy with the walls, the tables and the chairs.

"A gentleman to see you, sir."

"Who is he?" Sir Raymond asked.

"A Mr. Cosmo Wisdom, sir."

"Beefy," said Lord Ickenham, raising his glass congratulatorially, "it's all over but the shouting. The hour has produced the man."

It was in uplifted mood and with buoyant step that Sir Raymond a few moments later entered the small smoking room, where visitors at the Demosthenes were deposited. He found his nephew huddled in a chair, nervously sucking the knob of his umbrella, and once again experienced the quick twinge of resentment which always came to him when they met. A social blot who was always having to have something done about him had, in his opinion, no right to be so beautifully dressed. Sir Raymond also objected to his beady eyes and his little black mustache.

"Good morning," he said.

"Oh—er—hullo," said Cosmo, standing on one leg.

"You wished to see me?"

"Er—yes," said Cosmo, standing on the other leg. "Er—uncle, I don't want to bother you, but I wonder if you could . . . if you could manage . . . if you could see your way to letting me have ——"

"What?" Sir Raymond adopted the second of the two manners that got him so disliked by witnesses in court, the heavily sarcastic. "Can it be that your visit has something to do with the letter I found your mother bedewing with her tears this morning? I gather that you need two hundred pounds."

Actually, Cosmo needed two hundred and fifty, but he could not bring himself to name the sum. And anyway, though his bookmaker, to whom he owed two hundred, must be paid immediately, his friend Gordon Carlisle, to whom he was in debt for the remainder, would surely be willing to wait for his money.

"Er—yes. You see ——"

Sir Raymond was now enjoying himself. "With the deepest respect," he said, "you are in error. I do not see. Boots and Brewer pay you a good salary, do they not?"

"I wouldn't call it good. I keep running short. If I don't get two hundred quid today, I don't know what I shall do. I'm half inclined to end it all."

"So your mother was telling me. An excellent idea, in my opinion, but she does not see eye to eye with me on that point. Two hundred pounds is a lot of money, but it is just possible that I might be able to manage it. What do you want it for?"

"I owe it to a bookie, and he—er—he's making himself rather unpleasant."

"I can readily imagine it. Bookies are apt to get cross on occasion. Well, I think I can help you out."

"Oh, uncle!"

"On certain conditions. Let us speak for a while of current literature. Have you read any good books lately, Cosmo? This novel Cocktail Time, for instance?"

"The thing there was all that in the Express about this morning? No, I haven't read it yet, but I'm going to. It sounds hot stuff. Nobody seems to know who wrote it."

"I wrote it."

This was so obviously a whimsical jest that Cosmo felt it only civil to smile. He did so, and was asked by his uncle not to grin like a half-witted ape.

"I wrote it, I repeat. I assume that you can understand words of one syllable. I wrote Cocktail Time. Is your weak mind able to grasp that?"

"Oh, rather. Oh, quite. But ——"

"But what?"

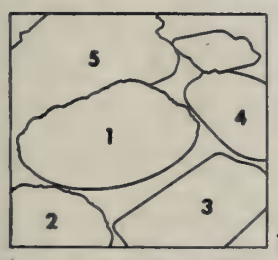
"Well, I'll be damned!"

"And so shall I, if it ever comes out."

"Is it as bad as all that?"

"It is not bad at all. It is not, however, the sort of book which a man in my position is expected to write. If those reporters find out that I did write it, my political career will be ruined."

"It's a bit near the knuckle, you mean?"



"Exactly."

Cosmo nodded intelligently. The thing was beginning to make sense to him. "I see."

"I suppose you would. Now, the thought that immediately flashes into your mind, of course, is that you are in a position on parting from me to hurry off and sell this information

CONTINUED ON PAGE 122

Five Easter ways to

Brighten the plate with Ocean Spray

1. Deep-Glazed Ham. Have canned ham sliced before baking and fruit-glaze flavor seeps 'way in! While ham heats, glaze with ½ cup brown sugar and 1 can juicy Ocean Spray Whole Cranberry Sauce mixed together.

2. Quick Easter Ham. Pour 1 can of Ocean Spray Whole Cranberry Sauce between 2 thick slices of pre-cooked ham and over the top. Bake 30-40 minutes. Tangy Cranberry Sauce complements today's mild ham – tenderizes, too!

3. Funny-Bunny Salad. Happy surprise for children! Cut roll of velvety Ocean Spray Jellied Cranberry Sauce in half lengthwise. Use 1 piece, curved side up, for the face. Cut other piece in half lengthwise, and arrange, curved sides down, to make ears. Add carrot eyes and nose and jaunty celery-strip whiskers. Tip ears with cream cheese.

4. Ham Roly-Polies. Wrap boiled ham around strips of Ocean Spray Jellied Cranberry Sauce, brush with melted butter, and heat briefly under broiler. (Ocean Spray won't melt!)

5. Roast Turkey, Buffet Style. Slice cold roasted turkey right to the bone, but do not remove. Put out on buffet with both kinds of Ocean Spray, so guests can choose.

Cheery! Cranberry Juice Cocktail

Wake up with spirited Ocean Spray Cranberry Juice Cocktail at breakfast. (No mixing, no shaking – just pour!) Peps you up at any hour of the day. At all supermarkets.

JELLIED OR WHOLE BERRY

Now in Canada, too.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

to the gutter press for what it will fetch. But it would be a shortsighted policy. You can do better for yourself than that. Announce that you are the author of Cocktail Time——"

"Eh?"

"I want you to give it out that it was you who wrote the book."

"But I never wrote anything in my life."

"Yes, you did. You wrote Cocktail Time. I think I can make it clear even to an intelligence like yours that our interests in this matter are identical. I regain my peace of mind, and you get your two hundred pounds."

"You'll really give it me?"

"I will. My contract calls for ten per cent of the published price, and after all this fuss in the papers I should imagine that the thing might sell—well, say ten thousand copies. I suppose it would work out at between six and seven hundred pounds."

Cosmo blinked as if something had struck him between the eyes. "And I get it?"

"You get it. Everything can be quite simply arranged. I would suggest a letter to each of the papers which have commented on the affair, hotly contesting the bishop's views, and revealing yourself as Anthony Blunt. If you will come to the writing room, I will draft something that will meet the case."

The announcement two days later that Cosmo Wisdom was the author of the novel Cocktail Time, now at the high tide of its notoriety, had, as might have been expected, a number of repercussions. It was, to name one of them, the work of an instant for J. P. Boots, of Boots and Brewer, on arriving at his office to summon the young man and inform him that his services, such as they were, would no longer be required.

Alfred Tomkins, Ltd., wrote him an affectionate letter telling him to come up and see them sometime, and an equally affectionate letter came from Edgar Saxby and Sons, recommending Cosmo to place his affairs in the capable hands of the Saxby organization (offices in London, New York and Hollywood), and this Cosmo, stirred by the Saxbys' almost lyrical eloquence on the subject of American, French, German, Italian, Swedish stage, film and television rights, decided to do.

Two little girls, Marlene Rackstraw, aged ten, and Lana Cootes (twelve), wrote asking for his autograph, saying that he had long been their favorite author and they had read all his books. He was invited to speak at the East Dulwich Debating Society. An anonymous donor sent him a tract. And Ivor Llewellyn, president of the Superba-Llewellyn Motion Picture Company, about to return to California after a visit to London, told his secretary to go out and buy a copy of the book for him to read on the plane.

Finally, Mrs. Gordon Carlisle, breakfasting in the sitting room of the flat which she shared with her husband, opened her morning paper, started and, lifting her attractive head, shouted, "Hey, Oily!"

"Yes, sweetie?"

"Cummere," said Mrs. Carlisle, and there entered from the bedroom a tall, slender, almost excessively gentlemanly man in a flowered dressing gown, who might have been the son of some noble house or a Latin-American professional dancer.

Actually, he was neither. He was a confidence-trick artist whose virtuosity won him considerable respect in the dubious circles in which he moved. American by birth and residence, he had brought his wife to Europe on a pleasure trip.

Gertrude ("Sweetie") Carlisle was a strapping young woman with bold hazel eyes and a determined chin. These eyes were now flashing. It was plain that what she had read had stirred her.

"Listen, Oily. Didn't you tell me you won fifty pounds from a guy named Cosmo Wisdom the other night?"

Mr. Carlisle nodded. "Yes, but he didn't pay me. Turned out to be one of these forty-dollar-a-week City clerks. They fool you by dressing like dukes."

"He was holding out on you. Read this."

"Read what?"

"This stuff in the paper about him having written this book they're all talking about. He's got oodles of money. It's a best seller."

Mr. Carlisle took the paper, scanned it and said, "Well, I'll be darned!"

"Where does he live?"

"Down Chelsea way. One of those side streets off the King's Road."

"Then have a bite of breakfast and go see him."

"I will."

It was getting on for lunchtime when he returned and there was nothing in his face to indicate whether his mission had had a happy ending or the reverse. The better to succeed in his chosen career, Oily Carlisle had trained his features to a uniform impassivity which often caused his wife annoyance.

"Well?" she said.

"Rustle me up an old-fashioned, will you, sweetie?" said Oily. "My tongue's hanging out."

Mrs. Carlisle rustled him up an old-fashioned, and having done so said "Well?" again. "Did you see him?"

"Yes, I saw him, and I said I'd been expecting to hear from him before this, because wasn't there a little matter of a hundred and fifty dollars or so he owed me?" Oily lit a cigarette and put his feet on the table. "He couldn't raise it, he said. 'Oh, no?' I said. 'How about this book of yours? The money must be pouring in like a tidal wave.'"

"What did he say to that?"

"Said it wasn't any such thing. These publishers pay up twice a year, and it would be months before he could touch. I said, 'Too bad. Sweetie will be vexed,' I said; 'she generally hits people over the head with a bottle.' And I told him about you and me and the vase."

"Oh, honey, we've forgotten all that."

"I haven't. Forgiven, yes. Forgotten, no. I can remember, just the same as if it had been yesterday, how it feels to get hit on the back of the head with a vase containing gladioli,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 124

the well-fed ✻ Bridegroom

STUART

Beef stroganoff: a hearty dish to keep a new husband happy.

MARK SHAW

✻

The Well-Fed Bridegroom is a cookbook written by Margaret Williams and published by Doubleday and Company, Inc., Garden City, New York.

By MARGARET WILLIAMS

Aside from love, good food is the cornerstone of a happy household, and I feel that in the beginning of a marriage, with so many adjustments to make, there is very little time—and certainly not the experience—to plan and integrate meals.

Right at the start I must say something about economy: Buy the best you can within your budget; it is better to buy top-grade hamburger than a poor steak. Money spent on good food is well spent, not only in terms of satisfying the inner man, but also why waste time on the preparation of mediocre ingredients?

Effort, however, is an essential part of any dish; without it I firmly believe that good cooking cannot be achieved.

Love and care are ingredients as important as salt and pepper. After all, feeding the master of the house is one of your major jobs.

So take your time. Plan and prepare a good, round meal. Set it on the table, warm and colorful. Then sit down to enjoy it—with your husband.

You might try something like this:

Beef Stroganoff
Parsley Potato Balls
Tossed Salad
Marinated Bananas with Strawberries
Coffee

Try to get your butcher to cut the meat for this dish. It may be difficult for you to make him understand you want the little strips really thin, about ½″ wide and 3″ long, but try your best. Be sure he cuts the meat across the grain, otherwise it'll be tough. You want good lean beef for this, sirloin preferred.

FOR THIS MEAL YOU'LL NEED: 1 pound lean beef sirloin, 1 small can mushrooms or ¼ pound fresh, canned beef bouillon or bouillon cubes, 1 onion, 1 cup commercial sour cream, 3 medium potatoes, 1 head lettuce, 2 tomatoes, 2 bananas, 1 package frozen strawberries.

YOU SHOULD HAVE ON HAND: butter or margarine, flour, tomato paste, dry mustard, brown sugar, French dressing.

TO PREPARE THE MEAL:

1. Sprinkle the meat with a mixture of 1 teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon pepper and let it stand for about 2 hours.

2. Heat 2½ tablespoons butter in a pan and sauté the beef, covered, for about 12 minutes over high heat, stirring occasionally.

Slice ¼ pound fresh mushrooms (or 1 small can) and add to the beef; at the same time pour in ⅓ cup canned bouillon or stock made with bouillon cube. (See directions on container of cubes for use.) Cook this mixture about 10 minutes, until beef is tender.

Drain off almost all the liquid before you transfer the meat to a double boiler. Have the water in the under part simmering.

In another pan, heat 1½ tablespoons butter and cook 2 teaspoons minced onion in it until it just begins to change color.

Stir in 2 teaspoons flour, ⅔ cup sour cream, and 2 teaspoons tomato paste.

Blend this combination together and pour over the meat and mushrooms in the double boiler. Cook for 5 minutes more.

3. About 30 minutes before serving, wash 3 medium-sized potatoes and peel. With a ball scoop, make potato balls. Put potatoes on to cook in salted, boiling water. Cover the pan.

4. In a small skillet, warm 1 tablespoon butter. Add 2 tablespoons finely minced parsley. Roll cooked potatoes in parsley butter. Keep warm until ready to serve.

5. Wash 2 tomatoes well, core and cut into ½″ cubes. Prepare a small head of lettuce, tearing the leaves into medium-sized pieces. Lightly toss together the tomatoes and lettuce. Dress salad with French dressing.

6. Peel 2 bananas and quarter lengthwise. Squeeze over the bananas the juice of ½ orange to keep them from turning dark. About 1 hour before you are ready to use, set out 1 package frozen strawberries to thaw.

The bananas are for dessert. So serve the meal. Then, when you're ready for dessert, put the coffee on, and top the bananas with the partially thawed frozen strawberries.

I have deliberately avoided some of the more complicated techniques of the kitchen. I think you have enough to attend to without losing your disposition over a fallen soufflé or trying to plan an elaborate four-course dinner full of last-minute details.

Keeping calm and cool is not the least accomplishment of a cook—or a bride!

WIN YEAR'S SUPPLY OF GROCERIES

for naming your favorite

Fruit-Blended Oatmeal

WONDERFUL NEW TASTE! Just add canned fruit to oatmeal during cooking

Try pineapple, applesauce, or peaches for an exciting new taste in oatmeal. To enter contest, give a name to the Fruit-Blended Oatmeal you like best. Win free groceries!

FRUIT-BLENDED OATMEAL: Follow oatmeal recipe on package for 4 to 6 servings. During cooking, stir in 1 cup canned crushed pineapple, applesauce or sliced peaches. Serve with milk or cream.

EASY CONTEST RULES: Use entry blank shown, or one from your dealer or a postcard.

Entries will be judged on basis of originality, suitability and aptness. Decisions of judges final. Duplicate prizes awarded in case of ties. All entries must be your original work.

All entries become property of The Quaker Oats Company and may be used by it in any manner. None can be returned. Winners' entries, names and pictures may be used in advertising and promotions by The Quaker Oats Company. Prize winners will be notified by mail promptly upon completion of judging. Complete list of winners on file at The Quaker Oats Company, Chicago, Illinois. Contest subject to all Federal and State regulations. All persons in U.S., its territories and possessions may enter except employees of The Quaker Oats Company, its Advertising Agencies, the contest judges, and their families.

1160 chances to win in Quaker Oats' "FREE GROCERIES" CONTEST

10 GRAND PRIZES . . . . YEAR'S FREE GROCERIES (UP TO $1,500 WORTH)
Next 50 Winners. . . . . Month's Free Groceries (Up to $125 Worth)
Next 100 Winners . . . . . Week's Free Groceries (Up to $30 Worth)
Next 1000 Winners . . . . . $5 in Cash

Just jot down a name—as simple as "Hawaiian Oatmeal Surprise" "Applesauce Delight"—"Peach Blossom Oatmeal."

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are exactly the same

"FREE GROCERIES CONTEST" Box 5525, Chicago 77, Illinois

Name for my favorite Fruit-Blended Oatmeal is:

My name is ____
(Please print)

Address ____

City ____ Zone ____ State ____

All entries must be postmarked on or before Midnight, May 31 and received by June 14, 1958.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

and I described the symptoms to him. He turned greenish."

"And then?"

"Then he came clean and spilled the whole works. Said that he didn't write that book at all."

"And you believed him?"

"Sure I believed him, after I'd heard the rest of it. He said his uncle wrote it. His uncle's a guy called Sir Raymond Bastable. Big lawyer, going in for politics, and knew that if it came out that he had written this Cocktail Time thing, he'd be ruined."

"Why?"

"Seems in England you can't mix writing that sort of book with standing for Parliament. So he got our Mr. Wisdom to say he'd done it. Well, I said to myself, 'Here's where I touch the big money.'"

"I don't get it."

Oily smiled an indulgent smile. "Look, sweetie. Use your bean. You're this Bastable character. You write a book, and it's too hot to handle, so you get your nephew to take the rap, and the papers run a big story about it's him that wrote it. Well, what do you do when you get a letter from the nephew saying he's been thinking it over and his conscience won't let him go on with the rap, so he's going to tell the world it wasn't him who did it, it was you? Here's what you do—you pay up. And you get charged as much as the traffic will bear."

Mrs. Carlisle's eyes widened. "Will he write the letter?"

"He's done it. I've got it right here in my pocket. I said I'd mail it for him. Very enthusiastic he was. He said his uncle's got all the money in the world—you know what they pay these big lawyers—and there isn't a chance that he won't cough up prac'lly anything."

"Protection money."

"That's right, protection money. So I dictated the letter and brought it away with me. And I loaned him twenty more pounds. He said he wanted to celebrate. . . . Now what?" asked Oily, noting that a cloud had passed over the face of the moon of his delight.

"I was only feeling what a pity it is you'll have to split with him. You will, I guess?"

"That's what he guesses, too, but, ask me, he's guessing wrong. I'm taking the letter to Bastable after lunch—at a place called Dovetail Hammer—and I shall want the money right down on the counter. Of course it's just possible I may decide to give Wisdom his half, but I doubt it, sweetie, I doubt it very much."

The 3:26, Oily decided, was the train to take to Dovetail Hammer. It would give them time for lunch at the Ritz, and Gertie, all enthusiasm, begged him to lead her to it.

It was at about the moment when they were sipping their coffee that Lord Ickenham, who had been taking the midday meal with his nephew Pongo at the Drones, looked out the window at the Demosthenes across the way and heaved a sigh.

"Boo!" said Pongo.

"I beg your pardon?"

"Just trying to startle you. Said to be good for hiccups."

"It would take a lot more than that to scare an intrepid man like me. Anyway, that was not a hiccup, it was a sigh."

"Why were you sighing?"

"Because I felt a pang, occasioned by looking across the street at the Demosthenes Club. It brought my semi-brother-in-law, Beefy Bastable, to my mind. You have probably forgotten the incident, but about a year ago, seated in this window, I shot his topper off with a Brazil nut."

"Gosh!"

"Ah, I see you remember. Well, I had hoped that the experience would have proved a turning point in his life, making him a gentler, kinder Beefy, more patient with and tolerant of his sister Phoebe. I was too sanguine."

"Isn't he patient with and tolerant of his sister Phoebe?"

"Far from it. According to Peasemarch, his butler, with whom I correspond, his manner toward her is still modeled on that of Captain Bligh of the Bounty. Of course he could make out a case for himself, I suppose. Phoebe, poor lost soul, has a way of putting her head on one side like a canary and saying 'What, dear?' when spoken to which must be very annoying to a man accustomed to having one and all hang upon his lightest word. It is when she has done this some six or seven times that, according to Peasemarch, Beefy shoots up to the ceiling in a sheet of flame and starts setting about her regardless of her age and sex. Peasemarch says it wrings his heart to listen with his ear to the keyhole. You don't know Bert Peasemarch, do you?"

"No."

"Splendid chap. About as much brain as you could put comfortably into an aspirin bottle, but what are brains if the heart be of gold? I first met him when he was a steward on the White Star-Cunard. Later, he came into some property and settled down in a village near Ickenham. Then, if you remember, war broke out and I joined the Home Guard, and whom should I find standing shoulder to shoulder with me but Bert Peasemarch. We saw it through together. I grew to love Bert like a brother, and he grew to love me like a brother. I got him his job with Beefy."

"I thought you said he came into property."

"Quite a bit of it, I understand."

"Then why did he want to buttle?"

"Ennui, my dear boy, the ennui that always attacks all these fellows who retire in their prime. My Coggs coached him, and when Coggs said the time was ripe, I unloaded him on Beefy."

"How did he get on with him?"

"I think he found him something of a trial. But that was before Beefy moved to the country. You knew he had taken Johnny's Hammer Lodge, didn't you?"

"Yes; nice bit of luck for Johnny."

"And, let us hope, for Beefy also. Who knows that living in the country will not improve him out of all knowledge? The quiet rural life does have a wonderful effect on people. Take me. There are times, I admit, when being cooped up in Ickenham makes me feel like a caged skylark, though not of course looking like one, but there is no question that it has been the making of me. I attribute to it the fact that I have become the steady, sensible, perhaps rather stodgy man I am today."

"Well, I can't see it."

"See what?"

"All this about old Bastable becoming a different man. According to you, he still bites pieces out of his sister."

"Give him time. I think Beefy will improve. If Barbara Crowe hadn't returned him to store, he would already have become a reformed character."

"I doubt it."

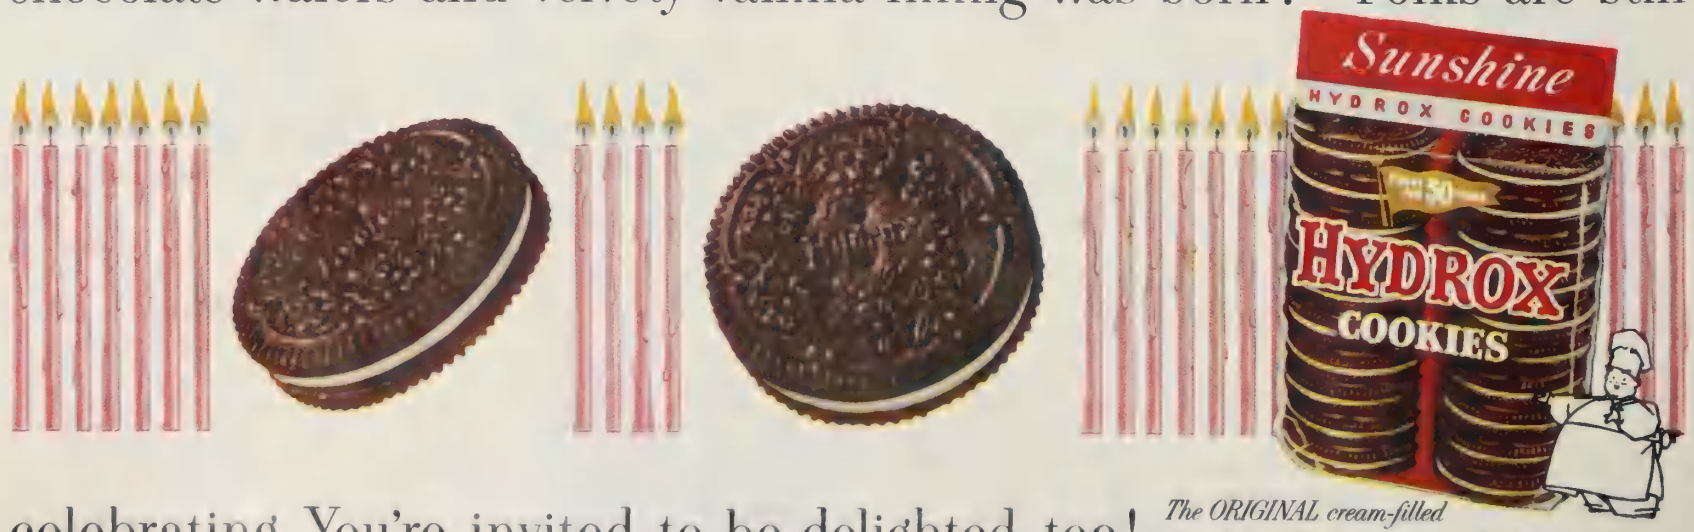
"I don't. I am convinced that, married to her, he would today be the lovable Beefy of thirty years ago. When you get to my age, my dear Pongo, you will realize that what's wrong with the world is that there are far too many sundered hearts in it. That's why I'm worried about Johnny."

"Doesn't he like being married?"

"He isn't married. That's the whole trouble. He's been engaged to Bunny Farringdon for more than a year, but not a move on his part to set those wedding bells ringing out in the little village church. She speaks to him of buying two of everything for her trousseau and begs him to let her have the green light, but all she gets is a 'some other time.'"

"Tell me more about this. Isn't she getting fed up?"

"Distinctly so. I was having lunch with her yesterday, and the impression I received was that she was becoming as mad as a wet hen. Any day now I expect to see in the Times an announcement that the wedding arranged between Jonathan Twistleton Pearce, of Hammer Hall, Dovetail Hammer, Berks, and Belinda Farringdon, of Plunkett Mews, Onslow Square, South Kensington, will not take place."



"What do you think's at the bottom of it? Money? Johnny's pretty hard up, of course."

"Not too well fixed, I agree. The cross he has to bear is that Hammer Hall is one of Happy HYDROX to you! Fifty years ago, this beloved blending of richest chocolate wafers and velvety vanilla filling was born! Folks are still celebrating. You're invited to be delighted, too!

The ORIGINAL cream-filled chocolate cookie. for fifty years the finest made!

those betwixt-and-between stately homes of England, so large that it costs a lot to keep up but not large enough to lure the populace into packing sandwiches and hard-boiled eggs and coming to inspect it at half a crown a head. Still, what with running it as a guest-house and writing those suspense novels of his, he should be in a position to get married. Especially now that he is getting quite a satisfactory rent from Beefy for the lodge. I don't think money is the trouble."

Pongo drew thoughtfully at his cigarette. "I don't often get together with Johnny these days," he said. "It just struck me that the reason he's jibbing at jumping off the dock might be that he's met someone else down at Dovetail Hammer."

"Do you know Dovetail Hammer?"

"Never been there."

"I thought you hadn't. It isn't a place where you meet someone else. There's the vicar's daughter, who is engaged to the curate, and the doctor's daughter, betrothed to a chap who's planting coffee in Kenya, and that, except for Phoebe and Johnny's old nurse, Nannie Bruce, exhausts the female population. It's not possible for his heart to have strayed."

"Well, something must have happened. You'd better talk to him."

"I intend to, like a Dutch godfather. And now, Pongo, stand out of my way, or I'll roll over you like a juggernaut. If I miss that train, there isn't another till five-forty."

Unless your destination is within comfortable walking distance, the thing to do on alighting from the train at Dovetail Hammer is to nip out quick and make sure of getting

Time deals gently with those who take it gently. ANATOLE FRANCE

the station cab. (There is only one—Arthur Popworth, propr.)

Lord Ickenham, who had been there before and knew the ropes, did this. He had just bespoken Mr. Popworth's services and was about to enter the vehicle when there emerged from the station a gentlemanly figure crying, "Hey, taxi!" Oily Carlisle had lingered on the platform, seeking information as to where Sir Raymond Bastable was to be found.

Lord Ickenham, always the soul of consideration, did not particularly like Oily's looks, but he was humane. "If you are going my way, sir," he said, "I shall be delighted to give you a lift."

"Awfully kind of you, sir," said Oily in the Oxford accent which he had been at some pains to cultivate for professional purposes. "I want a place called Hammer Hall."

"My own objective," Lord Ickenham told him. "Are you staying there?"

"No, just run down to see a man on business. Hammer Lodge, the porter said the name of his house was, and it's somewhere near the hall."

"Just before you get there. I'll drop you."

"Frightfully kind of you."

"Not at all, not at all. It all comes under the head of spreading sweetness and light."

A feeling of irritation began to grip Oily. He found his companion's manner frivolous. In his vest pocket there nestled a ring made of what looked like gold, in which was set a large red stone that looked like a ruby. It seemed the moment to produce it.

Oily Carlisle had not always been a man at the top of his profession, selling stock in nonexistent copper mines. He had started at the bottom of the ladder as the genial young fellow who had found a ruby ring in the street and was anxious to sell it, and a touch of sentiment led him to carry on his person always this symbol of his beginnings.

Fingering it now, he said, "Take a look at this."

Lord Ickenham did so, and felt a pleasurable glow stealing over him. His, in the years before he had succeeded to the title and was an impecunious younger son, had been a varied and interesting career. To meet once again an optimist who—unless he was sadly wronging this sleek and shiny fellow traveler—hoped to sell him a ruby ring he had found in the street carried him back to those good old days.

"My word!" he said admiringly. "That looks valuable. How much did you give for that?"

"Well, I'll tell you," said Oily. "It's rather an odd story. You're not a lawyer, by any chance, are you, sir?"

Lord Ickenham said he was not.

"Why I asked was, I was walking along Piccadilly this morning, and saw this lying on the sidewalk, and I thought you might be able to tell me if findings are keepings in a case like that."

"Speaking as a layman, I should say most certainly."

"You really think so?"

"I do indeed. You want to sell it, I suppose?"

"If it's not against the law. I wouldn't want to do anything that wasn't right."

"Of course not," Lord Ickenham said. "Naturally. About how much were you thinking of charging?"

Oily, too, had now begun to feel a pleasurable glow. "That's where I can't seem to make up my mind," he said. "If it's genuine, I suppose it's worth a hundred pounds or so, but how's one to tell?"

"Oh, I'm sure it's genuine. Look at that ruby. Very red. I think you would be perfectly justified in asking fifty pounds for this ring."

"You do?"

"Fully that."

"Would you buy it for fifty pounds?"

"Like a shot."

"Then ——"

"But," proceeded Lord Ickenham, "for the fact that as a purchaser of ruby rings from chance-met strangers I am unfortunately situated. Some time ago my wife decided to take

Cherries, bananas, pecans, syrup — Riced lime Jell-O® gelatin dessert — Peppermint-chip whipped cream — Pineapple-mint

Light as a bubble...and bubbling over with dessert ideas!

So fluffy-light . . . no other pudding is so creamy delicious, yet so light—so easy to digest, never heavy.

So versatile . . . when you add toppings, sauces, nuts, fruits! Thrifty, too—36 individual dessert servings in every box.

So good for you . . . made with fresh eggs-n-milk, yet not loaded with calories. See new quick recipe on box!

Magic, too, in fruit pie fillings!

Use tapioca instead of cornstarch or flour thickeners. Tapioca bubbles burst in oven heat—for juicy consistency that's never "runny." Won't cloud flavor or color! Recipe on box.

TODAY'S QUICK-AND-EASY MINUTE TAPIOCA

A fine product of General Foods

FREE

"HIS & HERS"

PAINT PACK

from

LUMINALL

MIRACLE PAINTS for every purpose

1. Famous Satin Luminall
The concentrated interior paint with bonus quart per gal.

2. Exterior House Paint
Durable, high-gloss beauty for all wood exterior surfaces.

3. Outside Luminall
For brick, concrete, masonry, asbestos shingles—all climates.

4. Luminall Satin Enamel
Applies like paint, dries flawlessly to hand-rubbed finish.

5. Alkyd Flat Wall Enamel
Rich, smooth enamel that applies easily on all interiors.

6. Ready-To-Use Luminall
Easiest paint to use on all interiors. Washable. Durable!

7. Alkyd Non-Fade Trim Colors
Hard gloss for all wood or metal sash, doors, shutters.

8. Luminall Porch & Floor Enamel
High gloss for all floors, inside or outside, heavy duty.

9. Concrete Floor Paint
Quick-dry, tough finish for floors, patios. Easy to use!

10. Luminall Dri-Rite Enamel
Interior & exterior luster for yachts, machinery, furniture.

11. Semi-Gloss Wall Finish
Kitchen-bath-trim enamel to match alkyd flat colors.

Millions of happy users know Luminall Paints apply easier, look better, last longer, cost less per square foot. That's why they're called "Miracles"!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Circle for color card on above paints

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11

'HIS & HERS' PAINTING PACK
Great idea! Real color chips for her selection. Practical how-to-paint-it suggestions for him. A free Painting Pack!

Luminall Paints, Dept. D, Chicago 9, Ill.

Please send me free painting packs on items I have circled, with no obligation to me.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State____

LUMINALL PAINTS
Finest in Finishes
Chicago 9 Newark 5 Los Angeles 1 Dallas 7

over the family finances and administer them herself, leaving me just that little bit of spending money which a man requires for tobacco, golf balls and so on. So I have to watch the pennies. My limit is a shilling. If you would care to settle for that, you have found a customer. Or, as this warm friendship has sprung up between us, shall we say eighteen pence?"

Oily was too much the gentleman to use bad language, but the look he gave his companion was not at all the sort of look he ought to have directed at anyone with whom he had formed a warm friendship.

"You make me sick," he said, speaking the words with no trace of an Oxford accent.

It was in jovial mood that some moments later, having dropped the stowaway outside Hammer Lodge, Lord Ickenham stepped from the station cab at the door of Hammer Hall.

The ordinary visitor to the ancestral home of the Pearces stands on the top step and presses the bell and, when nothing happens, presses it again, but these formalities are not for godfathers. Lord Ickenham walked right in, noting as he passed through the spacious entrance hall how clean, though shabby, everything was. Nannie Bruce's work, he presumed.

Like so many country mansions, Hammer Hall showed unmistakable signs of having seen better days. There were gaps on the walls where tapestries had hung, hiatuses along the floor where chests and tables were missing.

Lord Ickenham sighed and made his way to the room down the passage where Johnny Pearce, when not interrupted by Nannie Bruce, wrote those suspense novels which helped, though not very much, to keep Hammer Hall's head above water.

It was apparent that she had interrupted him now, for the first thing Lord Ickenham heard as he opened the door was her voice, speaking coldly and sternly: "I've no patience, Master Jonathan. . . . Oh, good evening, your lordship."

Nannie Bruce, a tall, gangling light heavyweight with a suggestion in her appearance of a private in the Grenadiers dressed up to play the title role in Charley's Aunt, was one of those doggedly faithful retainers who adhere to almost all old families.

"You are in your old room, your lordship," she said. "I'll be going and seeing to it. So I'll be glad if you would kindly speak to her, Master Jonathan."

"She does her best, Nannie."

"And a poor best it is!" said Miss Bruce.

The door closed behind her, and Johnny Pearce, a personable young man with a pleasant but worried face, sat jabbing moodily with his pen at the sheet of paper on which he had been writing. Lord Ickenham eyed him with concern.

"What was all that?" he asked.

"The same old thing. Another row with the cook."

"She has them frequently?"

"All the time. Cooks never stay here more than about five minutes. They can't stand Nannie."

"She is a bit testing, I suppose, though a useful person to have around. However, it is not of Nannie and cooks that I wish to speak," said Lord Ickenham. "I saw Bunny yesterday."

"Oh, did you?"

"Gave her lunch. Smoked salmon, poulet en casserole and a fruit salad. She toyed with them in the order named. In fact, the word 'toyed' overstates it. She pushed her plate away untasted."

"Isn't she well?"

"Physically yes, but spiritually considerably below par. Why don't you marry the girl, Johnny?"

"I can't!"

"Of course you can. Better men than you have got married. Myself for one. Nor have I ever regretted it."

"You don't understand. I'm in a jam."

Johnny Pearce quivered as he spoke, and passed a feverish pen over his brow. The sternness of Lord Ickenham's demeanor softened a little.

"Tell me the whole story," he said. "Why can't you get married? You haven't got some incurable disease, have you?"

"That's just it. I have."

"Good heavens! What?"

"Nannie Bruce."

"What on earth do you mean?"

"Have you ever had a faithful old nurse who stuck to you like a limpet?"

"Never. My personal attendants generally left at the end of the first month, glad to see the last of me. But what have faithful old nurses got to do with it? I don't follow you."

"It's perfectly simple. Nannie Bruce has been here for twenty-five years—nearer twenty-seven—and she runs the place. Do you suppose that, if I get married, she's going to step meekly down and hand over to my wife? Not a hope."

"Nonsense."

"It isn't nonsense. You saw her in action just now. A perfectly good cook melting away like snow on a mountainside, and why? Because Nannie will insist on butting in all the time and criticizing. And it would be the same with Bunny. Is she going to enjoy being interfered with and ordered around, treated

I SHALL COME TO YOU

By BARBARA SHOOK

I shall come to you, my love,
When April is a mist
Free and morning-kissed.
When loving is as strong
And here as children's song.

I shall come on sandals
Slim as blades of grass,
Delicate as glass,
Light as your breath upon my brow,
When always becomes now.

as a sort of half-witted underling? And her sniff. You know the way she sniffs."

"Bunny?"

"Nannie."

"Oh, Nannie. Yes, she does sniff."

"And that hissing noise she makes, like a wet thumb drawn across the top of a hot stove. It would drive a young bride potty. I know, you're going to say why don't I get rid of her?"

"Exactly," said Lord Ickenham, who was.

"How can I? I can't throw her out on her ear."

"But couldn't you pension her off? Surely she would not want a fortune. A couple of quid or so a week ——"

"I know exactly what she wants. Three hundred pounds. Cash down."

"It seems unusual. I should have thought a weekly dole ——"

A sort of frozen calm descended on Johnny Pearce, the calm of despair. "I did offer her a weekly dole."

"And she refused?"

"No, she accepted. That was when I felt justified in proposing to Bunny. I ought to have told you, by the way, that she's engaged to the policeman."

"Bunny?"

"Nannie."

"Oh, Nannie. What policeman would that be?"

"The one in the village. There's only one. His name's McMurdo. McMurdo won a football pool last winter. Three hundred pounds."

"And why was that a disaster?" asked Lord Ickenham. "I could do with winning a football pool myself. Wasn't Nannie pleased?"

"No, she wasn't. Her pride was touched, and she said she wasn't going to marry any man who had three hundred quid salted away unless she had the same amount herself. She said her Aunt Emily had no money and married a man with a goodish bit of it and he treated her like an orphan child. None of that for her, Nannie said."

"But, dash it, my dear Johnny, the two cases are entirely different. Nannie, with a weekly income, wouldn't be in her position at all. Didn't you point that out?"

"Of course I did, a hundred times, but do you think it's possible to make Nannie see reason, once her mind's made up? Either she had three hundred pounds, or all bets were off. And that's how matters stand today," said Johnny.

"And you have no means of raising that three hundred? How about the furniture?"

"I've come to the end of the things I'm allowed to sell. All the rest are heirlooms, except the fake walnut cabinet, of course, Great-Uncle Rupert's gift to Hammer Hall."

"That eyesore!"

"I can sell that without getting slapped into gaol. I'm putting it up for auction soon. It might fetch a tenner."

"From somebody astigmatic."

"And even a tenner's worth having these days. But, as you are about to point out, that would still leave me two hundred and ninety short. Have you ever robbed a bank, Uncle Fred?"

"Not that I can recall. Why?"

"I was just thinking that that might be the simplest way out. But, with my luck, if I bust the Bank of England, I'd find they hadn't got three hundred quid in the safe. Now, if you don't mind buzzing off and leaving me, I'll be getting back to Inspector Jervis."

"Yes, it's time that I was moving. The big chief said I was on no account to fail to pay my respects to Beefy Bastable. I shall be back in an hour or so and shall then be wholly at your disposal."

With a wave of the hand, Lord Ickenham tilted his hat slightly to one side and set off across the park to Hammer Lodge.

There was a thoughtful frown on Lord Ickenham's brow and a pensive look in his eye as he skirted the lake, on the other side of which Hammer Lodge lay.

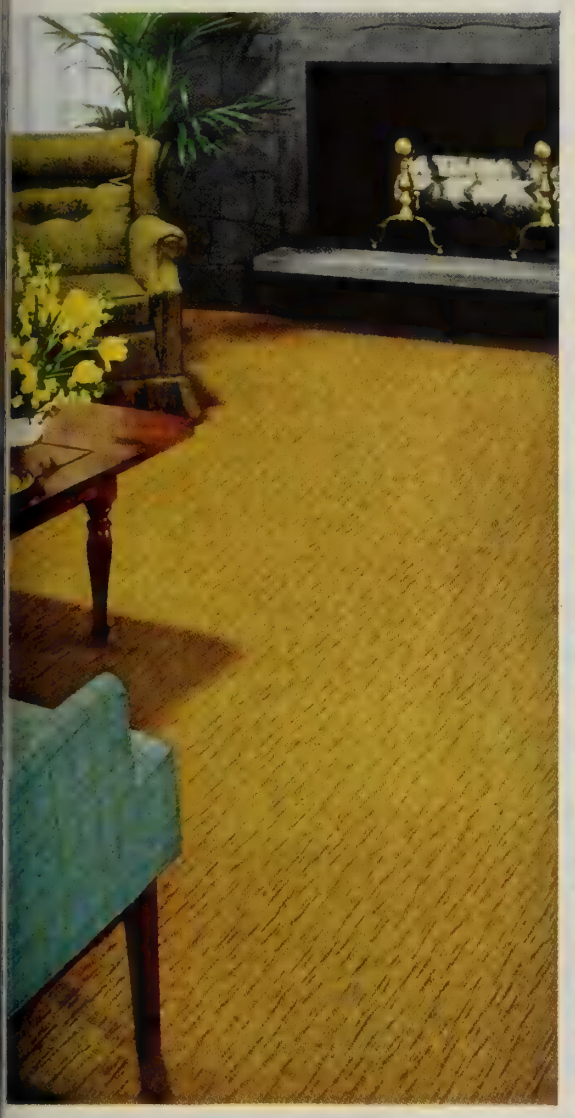
He was concerned about Johnny. He was not on intimate terms with Nannie Bruce, but he was sufficiently acquainted with her personality to recognize the impossibility, once her mind was made up, of persuading her to change it. If Nannie Bruce wanted three hundred pounds cash down, she would get three hundred pounds cash down, or no wedding bells for Officer McMurdo. And as Johnny did not possess three hundred pounds, the situation had all the earmarks of an impasse. It is not too much to say that, though his hat was on the side of his head and his walk as jaunty as ever, Lord Ickenham, as he rang the front doorbell of Hammer Lodge and was admitted by his friend Albert Peasemarch, was mourning in spirit.

Butlers come in three sizes—the large, the small and the medium. Albert Peasemarch was one of the smalls. Short and somewhat overweight for his height, he had a round, moonlike face, in which were set, like currants in a suet dumpling, two brown eyes. A captious critic would have commented on the entire absence from these eyes of anything like a gleam of human intelligence; but to anyone noncaptious this would have been amply compensated for by their kindliness and honesty. His face, usually disciplined to a professional impassivity, melted into a smile of welcome as he recognized the visitor.

"Oh, good evening, m'lord."

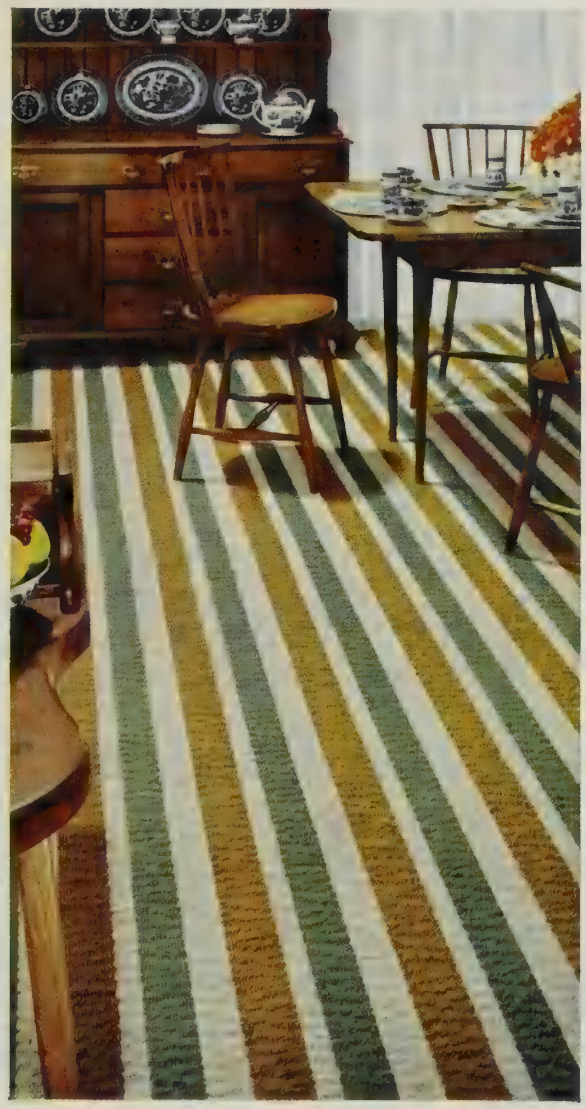
"Hullo, Bert. You're looking very roguish. Is the old folk at home?"

"Sir Raymond is in his study, m'lord, but a gentleman is with him at the moment—a Mr. Carlisle."



"I know the chap you mean. He's probably trying to sell him a ruby ring. Well, if the big shot is tied up in conference, we've time for a spot of port in your pantry, and very agreeable it will be after a hot and dirty journey. You haven't run short of port?"

"Oh, no, m'lord. If you will step this way, m'lord."



"This," said Lord Ickenham some moments later, "is the real stuff." He lowered his glass. "Listen, Bert. This 'm'lord' stuff. I've been

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

Here's why modern homemakers prefer carpet–13 to 1

Only carpet gives you so much for so little! It's true – you can have wall-to-wall carpet in two rooms for as little as $18 to $20 a month, including padding and installation – and take 24 months to pay. Two exciting room-size rugs with padding cost as little as $13 to $15 a month.

For selecting carpet there's no place like home! There you can see how each sample looks with your decor, how the color and texture look with your other furnishings. Your store's representative can use his decorating knowledge to help you choose. Call your store today.

There's a new world of style and color in today's rugs and carpets! American machines and manufacturing methods have created a fascinating range of color, style and fibers – more value than ever before. Your store will be happy to help you choose the rug or carpet that's best for you.

So many women are discovering the beauty, comfort, warmth, quiet and easy care that carpet brings—on budgets just like yours.

If you've been wanting new rugs or carpet – and putting off buying them – there's no need to wait any longer. For as little as $10 a month you and your family can start now to enjoy the extra warmth and comfort, the blessed quiet and an end to tedious scrubbing and waxing that rugs or carpet bring. And, carpet made in America is backed by the skill and facilities of the world's leaders in carpet manufacturing. Drop in at your store – or ask them to send a representative to your home with samples. You'll be so glad you did.

For further information to help you in your choice, send for your free copy of "How To Buy Your Rugs And Carpets Wisely." It answers all of the questions women ask most about rugs and carpet – how can I judge quality? Should I buy wall to wall or rugs? How can I estimate how much my carpet will cost? Clip and mail the coupon today.

For your protection, be sure that the rug or carpet you buy is backed by the knowledge, the facilities and the integrity of an American manufacturer. Look for the label of:

ARTLOOM • BARWICK • BEATTIE • BIGELOW • CABIN CRAFTS-NEEDLETUFT • DOWNS
IRTH • GULISTAN • HARDWICK & MAGEE • HIGHTSTOWN • HOLMES • KARASTAN
EES • MAGEE • MASLAND • MOHAWK • MONARCH • PHILADELPHIA CARPET
OXBURY • SANFORD • ALEXANDER SMITH

CARPET INSTITUTE, INC., 350 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 1, N. Y.

CARPET INSTITUTE, INC., Department 1B
350 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, New York
Gentlemen: Please send me my free copy of "How To Buy Your Rugs and Carpets Wisely."

Name_____
Address_____
City and State_____

Home means more with carpet on the floor — more comfort • quiet • safety • beauty • easier care meaning to speak to you about it. I'm a lord, yes, no argument about that, but you don't have to keep rubbing it in all the time. We know what lords are. Anachronistic parasites on the body of the state is the kindest thing you can say of them. Well, a sensitive man doesn't like to be reminded every half second that he is one of the untouchables, liable at any moment to be strung up on a lamppost or to have his blood flowing in streams down Park Lane. Couldn't you substitute something matier and less wounding to my feelings?"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

"I could hardly call your lordship 'Ickenham.'"

"I was thinking of 'Freddie.'"

"Oh, no, m'lord."

"Then how about 'old man'?"

"Certainly not, m'lord. If your lordship would not object to 'Mr. I.'?"

"The ideal solution. Well, Bert, how are things in the home now? Not much improvement, I gather from your letters. Our mutual friend still a little terse with the flesh and blood, eh?"

"It is not for me to criticize Sir Raymond."

"Don't come the heavy butler over me, Bert. You may speak freely."

"Then I must say that I consider that he treats madam very badly indeed."

"Bellows at her?"

"Almost daily, Mr. I. More so now than ever. Madam is distressed because Mr. Cosmo has written this book there is so much talk about. She disapproves of its moral tone. This makes her cry a good deal."

"And he ticks her off?"

"Most violently. I sometimes feel I can't bear it any longer."

"Why don't you hand in your portfolio?"

"And leave her? I couldn't."

Lord Ickenham looked at him keenly. "Hullo!" he said. "What's this?"

Albert Peasemarch remained for a moment in the process of what is commonly known as struggling for utterance. Finding speech at length, he said in a low, hoarse voice, "I lov her, Mr. I."

It always took a great deal to surprise Lor Ickenham. Whereas another man, hearing th cry from the heart, might have leaped in h chair and upset his glass of port, he merel directed at the speaker a look full of sym pathy and understanding. His personal feelin that loving Phoebe Wisdom was a thing b yond the scope of the most determined Rome he concealed.

"My poor old Bert," he said, "tell me a When did you feel this coming on?"

A dreamy look came into Albert Peas march's eye. "It was our rheumatism that fir brought us together," he said.

Lord Ickenham cocked an inquiring eye brow. "I'm not sure I quite got that. Rheu matism, did you say?"

"Madam suffers from it in the left shoulde and I have it in the right leg, and we fell int the habit of discussing it. Every mornin madam would say, 'And how is your rheu matism, Peasemarch?' and I would tell he and I would say, 'How is your rheumatism madam?' and she would tell me. And so went on."

"I see. Naturally if you tell a woman da after day about the funny burning feeling your right leg, and she tells you about th curious shooting sensation in her left shou der, it forms a bond."

"And then last winter ——"

"Yes?"

A reverent note crept into Albert Peas march's voice. "Last winter I had influenz Madam nursed me throughout my illness."

No one is exempt from talking nonsense; the misfortune is to do it solemnly. MONTAIGNE

"Smoothed your pillow? Brought you coo ing drinks?"

"And read Agatha Christie to me. As something came right over me, Mr. I., and knew that it was love."

Lord Ickenham was silent for some m ments, sipping his port. His heart went out Albert Peasemarch. Dashed unpleasant must be, he was feeling, for a butler to fall love with the chatelaine of the establishmen Having to say "Yes, madam," "Very goo madam," "The carriage waits, madam" an all that sort of thing, when every fiber of h being was urging him to tell her that she w the tree on which the fruit of his life hung an that for her sake he would pluck the sta from the sky.

"Taken any steps about it?" he asked.

"Oh, no, m'lord—I mean Mr. I. It would be proper."

"This is no time to mess about, bei proper," said Lord Ickenham bluffly. "Ca get anywhere if you don't take steps."

"What do you advise, Mr. I.?"

"That's more the tone. I don't suppo there's a man alive better equipped to adv you than I am. I'm a specialist at this sort thing. In your case, the relationship betwe you and the adored object being somewh unusual, one will have to go rather careful The Ickenham method, for instance, mig seem a little abrupt."

"The Ickenham method, Mr. I.?"

"I call it that. Just giving you the bi outlines, you stride up to the subject, gr her by the wrist, clasp her to your bosom an shower burning kisses on her upturned fa You don't have to say much—just 'My mat or something of that sort—and, of course, grabbing by the wrist, don't behave as if y were handling a delicate piece of china. G firmly and waggle her about a bit. It seldo fails, but in your case, as I say, it might better to edge into the thing more gradual I think that as a starter you should bring h flowers every day, wet with the morning de And when I say 'bring,' I don't mean ha them over as if you were delivering a par from the stores. Put them secretly in her roo No message. An anonymous gift from a m

THE TRADING STAMP:

Its savers are an army of monitors who help keep food prices competitive

There's a difference between the behavior patterns of women who save trading stamps and of those who do not save them. This difference has been brought out in recent university and research institute studies.

These studies show that the housewife who saves stamps tends to be a more careful shopper than the woman who does not save stamps. Her decision to shop at a store which gives trading stamps represents a greater alertness to bargains. And, she continues to check the wisdom of her choice by comparing prices, often down to fractions of pennies.

A market which believes it can pay for stamps by hiding as little as a 2% increase in prices has to reckon with an army of comparison shoppers who monitor prices daily. All it takes to have this policy backfire is detection by a few shoppers who studiously compare advertised prices not only in newspapers but on their shopping rounds.

In her own way, the American housewife is as sensitive to values as a professional economist. So, it is no coincidence that whenever trading stamps are attacked, her voice is among the strongest coming to their defense. And, it is also no coincidence that more than 30,000,000 families, alert to the discomforts of inflation, collect trading stamps as a means of securing extra savings.

★ ★ ★

REFERENCE: "Competition and Trading Stamps in Retailing." Dr. Eugene R. Beem, School of Business Administration, University of California.

This message is one of a series presented for your information by
THE SPERRY AND HUTCHINSON COMPANY, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York.
S&H pioneered 61 years ago in the movement to give trading stamps to consumers as a discount for paying cash.
S&H GREEN STAMPS are currently being saved by millions of consumers.

ous worshiper. Wait!" said Lord Ickenham. hought had come like a full-blown rose, hing his brow. "Isn't there a language of vers? I'm sure I've read about it some- ere. I mean, you send a girl nasturtiums or elias or whatever it may be, and it signifies ere is one who adores you respectfully n afar,' or 'Watch out, here comes Albert!' something. You've heard of that?"

Oh, yes, indeed. There are books on the ject."

Get one, and make of it a constant com- ion." Lord Ickenham mused for a mo- nt. "Is there anything else? Ah, yes. The . Has she a dog?"

A cocker spaniel, Mr. I., called Benjy."

Conciliate that dog, Bert. There is no r way to a woman's heart than to get in d with her dog."

He broke off. Through the window of the try he had seen a gentlemanly figure pass by. The boss' conference has concluded," he l, rising. "I'd better go and pass the time day. You won't forget, Bert? An atmos- re of the utmost cordiality where the dog jy is concerned, and the daily gift of vers."

Yes, Mr. I."

It's bound to work," said Lord Ickenham, t went along the passage to the study re, he presumed, Sir Raymond Bastable uld still be—gloating, possibly, over the y ring he had purchased.

He was right about Sir Raymond's being in study, but wrong about the ruby ring. His f brother-in-law was sitting huddled in a ir with his head between his hands, and outward appearance mirrored perfectly emotions within. At about three-fifteen on November afternoon at Oxford, when the versity Rugby-football team was playing rdiff, a Welshman with a head constructed parently of ivory had once butted Sir Ray- nd Bastable in the solar plexus, giving him illusion that the world had suddenly come an end and Judgment Day set in with usual severity. It had happened thirty years , but the episode had never faded from his memory, and until this evening he had always looked on it as the high spot of his life.

Some five minutes previously, when Oily Carlisle, producing Cosmo Wisdom's letter, had revealed its contents and gone off to give him, as he explained, time to think it over, it had been eclipsed.

Lord Ickenham came into the room, concern in every hair of his raised eyebrows. "Beefy!" he cried. "My dear old bird, what on earth's the matter? You look like a devastated area."

It took Sir Raymond some little time to tell him what the matter was, for he had much to say on the subject of the blackhearted villainy of his nephew Cosmo and also a number of pungent remarks to make about Oily Carlisle. As he concluded the recital of their skulduggery, his audience, which he had held spellbound, clicked its tongue.

"We should have foreseen this," he said. "We should have told ourselves that it was madness to place our confidence in anyone like young Cosmo, a twister compared with whom corkscrews are straight and spiral staircases the shortest line between two points."

Sir Raymond's reply was somewhat muffled, for he was having trouble with his vocal cords, but Lord Ickenham understood him to say that it was all his, Lord Ickenham's, fault.

"You suggested him."

"Surely not? Yes, by Jove, you're right. I was sitting here, you were sitting there, lapping up martinis like a vacuum cleaner, and I said —— Yes, it all comes back to me. I'm sorry."

"What's the use of that?"

"Remorse is always useful, Beefy. It stimulates the brain. It has set mine working like a buzz saw. You say this fellow is coming back?"

"Of course he's coming back."

"Through those French windows, no doubt. He would hardly ring the front doorbell and have himself announced again. All right, Beefy, receive him courteously and keep him engaged in conversation till I am with you again."

"Where are you going?"

"Never mind. When the fields are white with daisies, I'll return," said Lord Ickenham, and withdrew through the door a minute or so before Oily Carlisle came in through the French windows.

It could scarcely be said that Sir Raymond received Mr. Carlisle courteously, unless it is courteous to glare at someone and call him a slimy blackmailer. What talk ensued was done by Oily, who was in excellent spirits. Cosmo's letter, nestling in his inside coat pocket, made a little crackling sound as he patted it, and it was music to his ears.

He had just outlined the tariff and was suggesting that if Sir Raymond would bring out his checkbook and take pen in hand, the whole thing could be cleaned up promptly and neatly, when the door opened, and Albert Peasemarch appeared.

"Inspector Jervis," he announced and, with an uneasy feeling in his interior, as if he had recently swallowed a heaping tablespoonful of butterflies, Oily recognized in the tall, slim figure that entered his fellow traveler from the station. And noting that his eyes, so genial in the cab, were now hard and his lips, once smiling, tight and set, he quailed visibly.

If Lord Ickenham's eyes were hard and his lips set, it was because that was how he saw the role he had undertaken.

"Sir Raymond Bastable?" he said. "Good evening, Sir Raymond, I am from the Yard."

And looked every inch of it, he was feeling complacently. He was a man who in his time had played many parts, and he took a pride in playing them right. It was his modest boast that there was nothing in existence, except possibly a circus dwarf, owing to his height, or Gina Lollabrigida, owing to her individual shape, he could not at any moment and without rehearsal depict with complete success.

Oily continued to quail. He had never been fond of inspectors. He did not like the way this one was looking at him, and when he spoke he liked what he said even less.

"Turn out your pockets," said Lord Ickenham curtly.

"Eh?"

"And don't say 'Eh?' I have been watching this man closely," said Lord Ickenham, turning to Sir Raymond, whose eyes were bulging like a snail's, "since I saw him on the station platform in London. His furtive behavior excited my suspicions. 'Picking pockets right and left, that chap,' I said to myself. And when I shared a cab with him to Hammer Hall and discovered on alighting that I was short a cigarette case, a tiepin, a packet of throat pastilles and a fountain pen, I knew that my suspicions had been well founded. Come on, my man, what are we waiting for?"

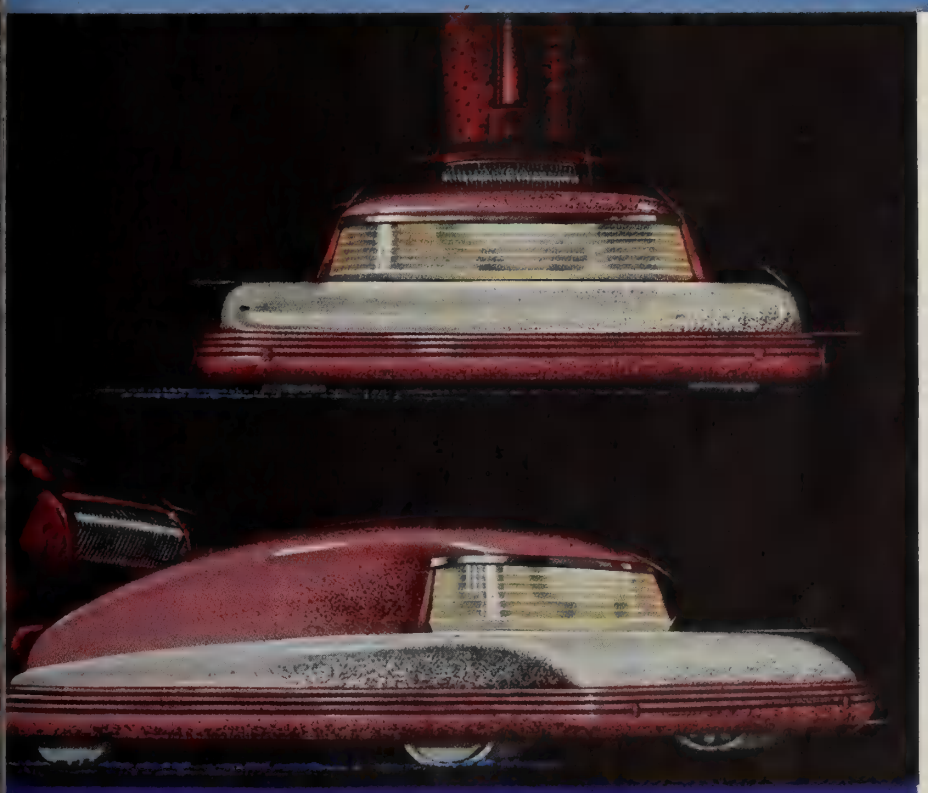
Oily was still gasping. "Are you saying I picked pockets? You're crazy. I wouldn't know how."

"Nonsense. It's perfectly simple. You just dip. It's no use pleading inability. Has the fellow been left alone in here?" he asked Sir Raymond, who blinked and said he had not.

"Ah? Then he will have had no opportunity of trousering any of your little knickknacks. But let us see what he has got."

"Yes," said Sir Raymond, at last abreast. He was always rather a slow thinker when not engaged in his profession. "Turn out your pockets, my man."

Oily wavered. If he had been calmer, it might have struck him that this was a most peculiar inspector. But he was greatly agitated. And perhaps, he was thinking, all English inspectors were like this. His acquaintance with Scotland Yard was a purely literary one, the fruit of his reading of the whodunits to which he was greatly addicted.



It was possibly the fact that Sir Raymond was between him and the window that decided him. Slowly, with a sigh, he emptied his pockets.

Lord Ickenham appeared surprised at the meagerness of their contents.

"He seems to have cached the swag somewhere, no doubt in a secret spot marked with a cross," he said. "But hullo! What's this? A letter addressed to you, Sir Raymond."

"You don't say."

The cleaner with the AUTOMATIC SHIFT

World's best rug cleaner ...plus super suction for every other cleaning job

The free-wheeling new Hoover Convertible launches a new era of high-speed cleaning. As a rug cleaner, it gets out all the dirt in true Hoover style. Then, one click of the converter and it automatically shifts into high for all other cleaning. So get behind the handle of the new Hoover Convertible —the cleaner with the Automatic Shift! As little as $1.50 a week buys this lifetime cleaner.

HOOVER FINE APPLIANCES around the house, around the world

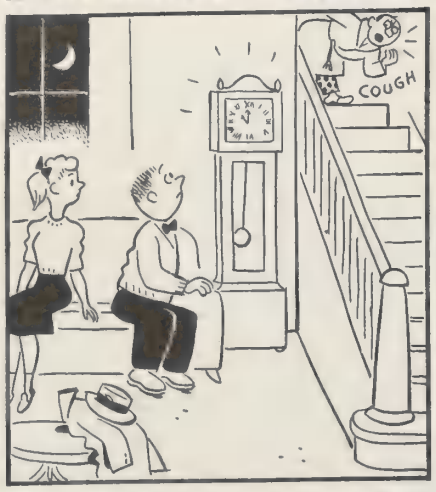
POWER GEAR for carpets

It beats, as it sweeps, as it cleans . . . gets the deep-down dirt no other cleaner can.

SHIFT...



Click in the converter and the motor automatically shifts into high.

HIGH GEAR for everything else

The extra burst of power gives you 50% more suction.

NEW HOOVER® CONVERTIBLE

drugs, rugs, lumber, glass . . .
doors, floors, nurseries, brass?
whatever you need—
Find It Fast In The Yellow Pages
Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy

"Written, I should deduce from a superficial glance, by a man with a small black mustache."

"Well, well!"

"Just what I was going to say myself. Will you press a charge against this man for swiping it?"

"I think not."

"You don't want to see him in a dungeon with dripping walls, getting gnawed to the bone by rats? You string along with the Bard of Avon about the quality of mercy not being strained? Very well. It's up to you, of course. All right, Mr. Carlisle, you may go."

It was at this moment when everything appeared, as Oily would have put it, to have been cleaned up neatly that the door opened again and Mrs. Phoebe Wisdom pottered in, looking so like a white rabbit that the first impulse of any lover of animals would have been to offer her a lettuce.

"Raymond, dear," she said, "have you seen my pig?"

For the past half hour Sir Raymond Bastable had been under a considerable strain, and though relief at the success of his half brother-in-law's intervention had lessened this, he was still feeling its effects. Swaying a little on his base, he said in a low whisper, "Your pig?"

"The little gold pig from my charm bracelet. It has dropped off, and I can't find it anywhere. . . . Well, Frederick, how nice to see you. Peasemarch told me you were here. When did you arrive?"

"I came on the three-twenty-six train. I'm staying with my godson, Johnny Pearce, at the hall. You don't look too well, Phoebe. What's the trouble? Not enough yeast?"

"It's this book of Cossie's, Frederick. I can't imagine how he came to write such a book. A bishop denouncing it!"

"Bishops will be bishops."

Oily had been listening to these exchanges with growing bewilderment. From the first he had thought this inspector an odd inspector, but only now was it borne in on him how very odd he was.

"Say, who is this guy?" he demanded.

"Hasn't my brother introduced you?" said Phoebe. "He is my half sister's husband, Lord Ickenham. You haven't seen my pig, have you, Frederick?"

"Phoebe," thundered Sir Raymond, "get out!"

"What, dear?"

"Get out!"

"But I was going to look for my pig."

"Never mind your pig. Get out!" bellowed Sir Raymond.

Phoebe withdrew, sobbing softly, and Oily confronted Lord Ickenham. His face was stern, but there was a song in his heart. "So!" he said.

"So, what?" said Lord Ickenham.

"I'm afraid you're in a lot of trouble. Impersonating an officer is a serious offense."

"But, my dear fellow, when did I ever impersonate an officer? Wouldn't dream of doing such a thing."

"The butler announced you as Inspector Jervis."

"What the butler said is not evidence. Am I to be blamed because a butler tries to be funny? That was just a little private joke we have together."

"You said you were from the Yard."

"I referred to the yard outside the kitchen door. I was smoking a cigarette there."

"You made me turn out my pockets."

"Made you? I asked you to, and you very civilly did."

"Give me that letter."

"But it is addressed to Sir Raymond Bastable. It belongs to him."

"Yes," boomed Sir Raymond, intervening in the debate, "it belongs to me; and when you talk of serious offenses, let me remind you that interfering with the mails is one of them. Give me that letter, Frederick."

Lord Ickenham, who had been edging to the door, paused with his fingers on the handle. "No, Beefy," he said. "Not yet. You must earn this letter."

"What!"

"I can speak freely before Mr. Carlisle, for I could see from the way he winced that your manner toward your sister Phoebe just now distressed him. I, too, have long been wounded by your manner toward your sister. Correct this attitude. Turn on that brotherly charm. Coo to her like a cushat dove. If I learn from Albert Peasemarch that there has been a marked improvement, you shall have this letter. Meanwhile, I am going to keep it and hold it over you like the sword of—who was the chap?—no, it's gone. Forget my own name next," said Lord Ickenham, annoyed, and went out, shutting the door behind him.

A moment later it opened again, and his head appeared. "Damocles," he said. "Sword of Damocles."

The door closed.

On a sunny morning precisely two weeks after Lord Ickenham had adjusted the Sword of Damocles over the head of Sir Raymond Bastable, the door of Brixton prison in the suburbs of London was opened by a uniformed gentleman with a large key, and a young man in a navy-blue suit emerged. Cosmo Wisdom, his debt to society paid, was in circulation once more. He was thinner and paler than when last seen, and the first act of the authorities had been to remove his mustache.

The law of Great Britain is a smoothly functioning automatic machine, providing prison sentences to suit all tastes. You put your crime in the slot, and out comes the appropriate penalty: seven years, as it might be, for embezzling trust funds; six months for carving up a business competitor with a razor; and for being drunk and disorderly and while in that condition assaulting the police, four-

I never yet met a healthy person who worried very much about his health, or a really good person who worried much about his soul.

JOHN BURDON S. HALDANE

teen days without the option of a fine. Cosmo had drawn the last of these.

When Oily Carlisle in a moment of unwonted generosity had lent Cosmo twenty pounds, the latter, it may be remembered, had expressed his intention of celebrating. He had done so only too heartily. There was a sound of revelry by night and, one thing leading to another, in what seemed almost no time at all he was kicking Police Constable Styles of the C Division, whose manner when Cosmo was trying to steal his helmet had offended the former. Whistles blew, colleagues of the injured officer rallied to the spot, and presently stern-faced men were leading Cosmo off to the local hoosegow.

The first act of your ex-convict after graduating from the Alma Mater is to buy a packet of cigarettes, his second to purchase a morning paper, his third to get the substantial lunch of which he has been dreaming ever since he clocked in. Cosmo had decided to give his custom to Simpson's in the Strand. As he hastened thither, with the picture rising before him of those white-coated carvers wheeling around their massive joints, his mouth watered and a fanatic gleam came into his eyes, as if he had been a python which has just heard the dinner bell.

The paper he bought was the Daily Gazette, and he glanced at it in the intervals of shoveling nourishing food into himself like a stevedore loading a grain ship. Cocktail Time, he noted, had been dislodged from the front page, but it came into its own on Page 4 with the announcement that the book was about to appear in the Daily Gazette as a serial. "The sensational novel by Anthony Blunt," said the announcement, adding that this was the pseudonym of Cosmo Wisdom, a prominent young man about town who was the nephew of the well-known Queen's Counsel, Sir Raymond Bastable.

The roast beef, roly-poly pudding and Stilton cheese had done much to bring Cosmo into a cheerful frame of mind, and this manifesto completed the good work. For obviously, if in the eyes of the Daily Gazette he was still the author of Cocktail Time, it co only mean that his Uncle Raymond, read that letter, had prudently decided to pay price of secrecy and silence. No doubt, Cos felt, there was a communication to that ef waiting at his rooms in Budge Street.

So far, so good. But after he had b gloating happily for some little time over picture of Uncle Raymond at his desk, writ golden figures in his checkbook, the sunsh was suddenly blotted from his life. It occur to him to speculate on the possible activi of his friend Gordon Carlisle during his forced absence. Suppose his friend had ta that letter in person to Uncle Raymond, cash down for it and was already on his back to America, his pockets full of U Raymond's gold. It was fortunate for Cos that he had already consumed his roly-p pudding, for, had he not, it would have tur to ashes in his mouth.

But in envisaging Gordon Carlisle lean on the rail of an ocean liner, Cosmo allowed imagination to mislead him. Oily at this moment in the process of rising f a table on the opposite side of Chez Simp where he had been lunching with his v Gertie.

Cosmo's inexplicable disappearance tried Gordon Carlisle sorely. Scarcely minutes after leaving Hammer Lodge, astute brain had grasped what must be to stabilize the situation, but the scheme c not be put into operation without the as ance of Cosmo. Every day for the past weeks Oily had called at Budge Street, ho for news, and every day he had been away by a landlady who made no secret o fact that she was sick of the sight of him

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, when he heard a voice utter his name turning, found himself gazing into the fa the man he had sought so long, his h leaped up as if he had beheld a rainbo the sky.

"Carlisle!" cried Cosmo exuberantly. down, my dear old chap, sit down!"

His dear old chap sat down, but he di in a reserved and distant manner. The which he fixed on Cosmo was the eye man who intends to demand an explana

"Mrs. Carlisle," he said curtly, indica his companion. "This is the Wisdom sweetie."

"It is, is it?" said Gertie. She, too, see to bring a chill into the summer day. "W have you been all this time?"

It was an embarrassing question. "(er—away," said Cosmo evasively. "As a ter of fact, I've been in prison."

"What!"

"Yes. I went on a toot and kicked a po man, and they gave me fourteen days wit the option. I got out this morning."

A magical change came over the Carl They looked at him now with the sympat eyes of a Mr. and Mrs. who understoo

"So that was it!" said Oily. "I cou think what had become of you, but it were in the cooler —— Things have mite gummed up, Wisdom. You know called Ickenham?"

"Lord Ickenham? Yes. He married uncle's half sister. What about him?"

Oily did not believe in breaking t gently. "He's got that letter."

Cosmo made an odd, gurgling sound water going down a waste pipe. "My l But I don't understand."

"You will."

Gordon Carlisle's narrative of the ha ings at Hammer Lodge was a lengthy and long before it had finished Cosmo' had drooped to its fullest extent.

"But what do we do?" he said hoarse

"Oh, now that I've contacted you, e thing's fairly simple. You just write uncle another letter, saying you've been t ing it over some more and still feel the way about letting everybody know that him and not you that wrote the book you're going to spill the beans in the couple of days or so. Won't that make play ball? Of course it will."

The hearty lunch had dulled Cosmo' a good deal, but they remained bright er

CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

JUST ARRIVED! THE ALL NEW 1958 BEAUTYREST...

with more buoyant firmness than ever before!

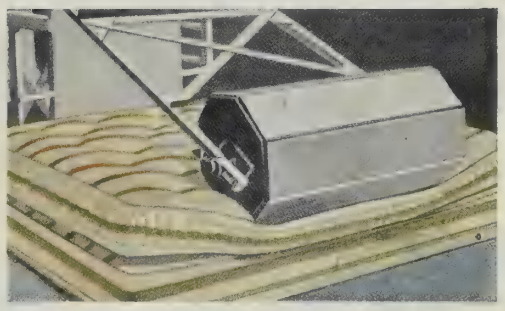
ew comfort! New firmness! 12% greater ring support! And this newest, most rest- l of mattresses actually costs least to own!

MPORTANT NEWS for all who treasure their rest, their comfort, their budget:

w power-packed springs, coiled under ten- n, have added 12% buoyant firmness to the new 1958 Beautyrest*. Greater comfort—and oven to last longer, too!

In torture tests made by the United States Testing Co., Beautyrest lasted 3 times longer than the next best mattress. So the best actually costs least to own!

Your choice of firmness! The new firmer Beautyrest now meets all normal requirements. There's the Extra-Firm Beautyrest for those who need added support. Each only $79.50. Be sure to get a matching box-spring to bring out the best in your Beautyrest.



es slightly higher in Canada.

New Beautyrest springs are power-packed by compressing each under tension. This adds 12% greater buoyant firmness that pushes up under you.

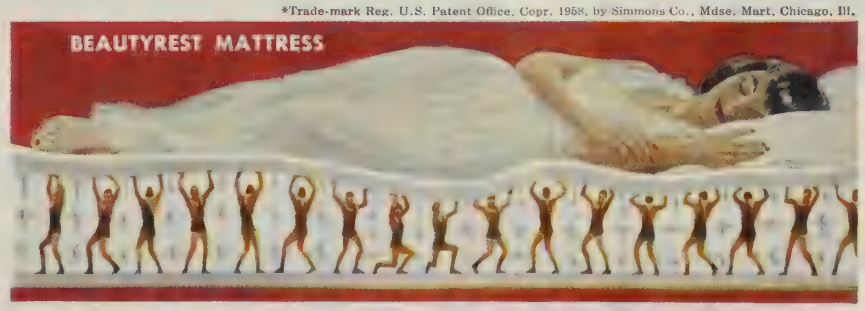
Single-bed comfort in a double bed! Beautyrest alone has separate springs. The heaviest husband cannot disturb his partner's rest.

Longer lasting! Under the pounding of this U. S. Testing Co. roller, Beautyrest lasted 3 times as long as any of the 20 leading mattresses tested.

60,000,000 recordings showed sounder sleep on Beautyrest. This 11-year research used methods developed by the Sleep Research Foundation.



Wake up wonderful

BEAUTYREST by SIMMONS

*Trade-mark Reg. U.S. Patent Office. Copr. 1958, by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

Ordinary mattress made with about 200-300 springs. Wired together, they sag together. They're not free to push up and correctly support the shape of your body. "Sag support" is bad for your back, comfort, and rest.

Beautyrest mattress made with over 800 separate springs. Each is free to push up and firmly support the weight and shape of your whole body. New Beautyrest springs have been power-packed to give 12% more firmness.

The fine art of Staying Lovely

SHE'S quite a composition—this modern woman. For she's learned the art of keepin slim and trim. Her tastes run to lighter, less-filling food and drink—and her figure shows it, delightfully.

Pepsi-Cola is part of her plan, of course. For today's Pepsi, reduced in calories, is never heavy, never too sweet. It's the modern, the light refreshment. Have a Pepsi.

Pepsi-Cola

the Light refreshment

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 130

o enable him to grasp the beauty of the cheme.

"Why, of course! I'll go home and write it ow."

"No, hurry. I see you've got the Gazette here. You've read about the serial?"

"Yes. I suppose Saxby sold it to them. I had letter from a literary agent called Saxby, sking if he could handle the book, and I told im he could."

"Well, the first thing is go see him and get he money."

"And the second," said Gertie, "is slip Oily is seventy smackers. You owed him fifty and e loaned you another twenty. Making sev-nty in all."

"That's right. It all comes back to me."

"And now," said Gertie, speaking with a ertain metallic note in her voice, "it's coming ack to Oily. He'll call around at your place n an hour or so and collect it."

Old Mr. Howard Saxby was seated at his desk in the Edgar Saxby literary agency when Cosmo arrived there. He was knitting a sock. He knitted a good deal, he would tell you if you asked him, to keep himself from smoking, adding that he also smoked a good deal to keep himself from knitting. He was a long, thin old gentleman in his middle seventies with a faraway, unseeing look in his eye, not unlike that which a dead halibut on a fishmonger's slab gives the pedestrian as he passes. Cosmo had the momentary illusion as he encountered that blank, vague gaze that he was something diaphanous that had been hurriedly put together with ectoplasm.

"Mr. Wisdom," said the girl who had led him into the presence.

"Ah," said Howard Saxby, and there was a pause of perhaps three minutes, during which his needles clicked busily. "Wisdom, did she say?"

"Yes. I wrote Cocktail Time."

"You couldn't have done better," said Mr. Saxby cordially. "How's your wife, Mr. Wisdom?"

Cosmo said he had no wife.

"Surely ——"

"I'm a bachelor."

"Then Wordsworth was wrong. He said you were married to immortal verse. Excuse me a moment," murmured Mr. Saxby, applying himself to the sock again. "I'm just turning the heel. Do you knit?"

"No."

"Sleep does. It knits up the raveled sleeve of care."

In the Demosthenes Club, where he lunched every day, there was considerable speculation as to whether old Saxby was as pronounced an old lunatic as he appeared to be, or merely for some whimsical purpose of his own playing a part. The truth probably came midway between these two views. It disconcerts a publisher, talking terms with an agent, when the agent stares fixedly at him for some moments and then asks him if he plays the harp. He becomes nervous, says fifteen per cent when he meant to say ten, and forgets to mention subsidiary rights altogether.

On Cosmo the Saxby manner acted as an irritant. He coughed sharply and Mr. Saxby's head came up with a startled jerk. "Goodness, you made me jump!" he said. "Who are you?"

"My name, as I have already told you, is Wisdom."

"How did you get in?" asked Mr. Saxby with a show of interest.

"I was shown in."

"I see. Tennyson was right: Knowledge comes, but Wisdom lingers. Take a chair."

"I have."

"Take another," said Mr. Saxby hospitably. "Is there," he asked, struck by a sudden thought, "something I can do for you?"

"I came about that serial."

Mr. Saxby frowned. A subject had been brought up on which he held strong views. "When I was a young man," he said severely, "there were no cereals. We ate good wholesome porridge for breakfast and throve on it."

"The serial in the paper."

"Putting the beastly stuff in paper makes no difference," said Mr. Saxby, and returned to his sock.

Cosmo swallowed once or twice. "I came," he said, speaking slowly and carefully, "about that serial story of mine in the Daily Gazette."

Mr. Saxby gave a little cry of triumph. "I've turned the heel! I beg your pardon? What did you say?"

"I came . . . about that serial story of mine . . . in the Daily Gazette."

"You want my opinion of it? I would give it gladly, were it not for the fact that I never read serial stories in newspapers. Years ago I promised my mother I wouldn't, and to that promise I have faithfully adhered. Foolishly sentimental, you will say, but there it is. One has these rules to live by. And now," said Mr. Saxby, putting his sock away in a drawer and rising, "I fear I must leave you. I have found your conversation very interesting, most interesting, but at this hour I always take a brisk constitutional. It settles my lunch. Good-by, my dear fellow, so glad to have met you. Look in again, and next time bring your wife."

For some moments after the old gentleman had shuffled out, the dizzy feeling which came upon so many people after a tête-à-tête with Howard Saxby had Cosmo strongly in its grip, and he sat motionless. Then torpor gave place to indignation. He rose, and pressed the bell on Mr. Saxby's desk so forcefully that the girl who answered the summons did so in something of the manner of an athlete completing a four-minute mile, thinking that at last old Mr. Saxby must have had the seizure the office force had been anticipating for years.

"I want to see somebody," said Cosmo.

Wilting beneath his eye, which was blazing like a searchlight, the underling panted a little, and said, "Yes, sir. Who?"

"Anyone, anyone, anyone!"

"Yes, sir," said the underling, and withdrew. She went to the second door down the passage, and knocked.

"Come in," called a musical voice, a voice like a good brand of Burgundy made audible. "Why, hullo, Marlene, you look agitated. What's the matter?"

"There's a gentleman in old Mr. Saxby's room who says he wants to see someone."

"Can't he see old Mr. Saxby?"

"He isn't there, Mrs. Crowe."

"Left the poor gentleman flat, has he? All right, I'll go and soothe him."

She spoke confidently, and her confidence was justified, for at the very first sight of her Cosmo's righteous indignation sensibly diminished.

It is probable that almost anyone would have looked good to Cosmo after old Mr. Saxby, but in sealing Barbara Crowe with the stamp of his approval he was perfectly justified. Lord Ickenham, speaking of this woman to Pongo, had used the adjective "lovely." Though not quite that, she was undeniably attractive. Brown eyes, brown hair, just the right sort of nose and a wide, humorous mouth that smiled readily and was smiling now.

"Good afternoon," she said. "Is there something I can do for you? They tell me you have been in conference with old Mr. Saxby. Very rash of you. What made you ask for him?"

"He wrote to me. He said he wanted to handle my novel, Cocktail Time."

"Cocktail Time? Good heavens! Are you Cosmo Wisdom?"

"Yes."

"I know your uncle. My name is Mrs. Crowe."

Not moving much in his Uncle Raymond's circle, Cosmo had never seen Barbara Crowe, but he knew all about her from his mother, and looking at her now he was amazed that anyone, having succeeded in becoming engaged to her, could have let her get away.

"How is he?" asked Barbara.

"Uncle Raymond? Well, I don't see very much of him, but somebody who met him two weeks ago said he seemed worried."

"Worried?"

"A bit on the jumpy side."

A cloud passed over Barbara's cheerful face. As Lord Ickenham had indicated, she had by no means thrust Sir Raymond Bastable from her thoughts. "He will overwork. He isn't ill?"

"Oh, no. Just . . . nervous," said Cosmo.

There was a momentary silence. Then Barbara reminded herself that she was a conscientious literary agent. "But you didn't come here to talk about your uncle, did you? You came to discuss business of some sort. I don't suppose you got far with old Mr. Saxby? He likes to come here still and potter about, though supposed to have retired at about the time when Gutenberg invented the printing press. Our only authors who ever see him are those who mistakenly ask for Howard Saxby. I suppose you did?"

"Yes. That was the name on the letter I got."

"It should have been signed H.S., Ju
Young Mr. Howard Saxby is old Mr. H
Saxby's son. He runs things here, much assistance as I am able to He's away today, so I am your on What did you come about?"

"That serial in the Daily Gaz

"Oh, yes. A check for that w more than a week ago. Didn't

"I've—er—been away."

"Oh, I see. Well, it's waiti rooms. And we're hoping t news for you at any m
end."

It had never occurred t was a movie end. "You th sell to the pictures?"

CONTINUED ON

"Are you sure he's just coming over to study with her tonight and not moving in?"

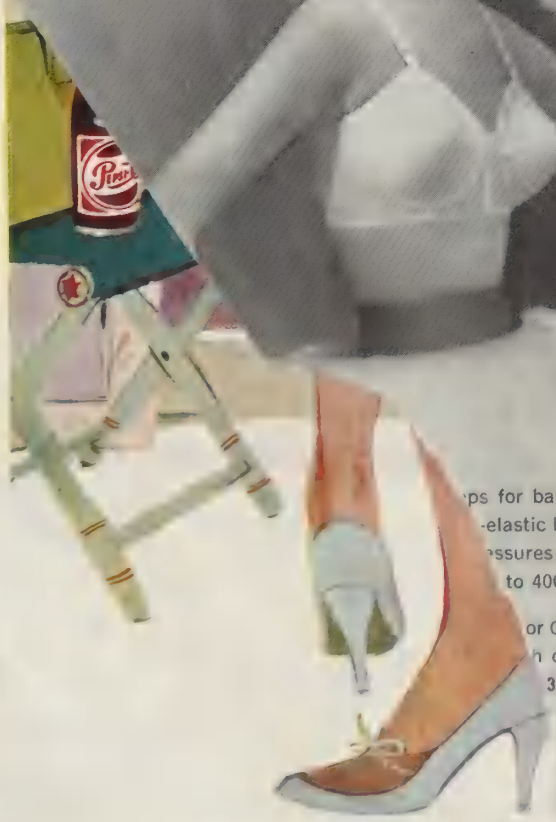
You're Lovelier ...
Color your Hair
SO EASILY—IN MINUTES

NESTLE COLORINSE
Glorifies your natural hair shade with glamorous color-highlights and silken sheen. 12 shades. 29¢

NESTLE COLORTINT
Intensifies natural hair shade OR adds thrilling NEW color. Blends-in gray. Lasts through 3 shampoos. 10 beautiful shades. 29¢

NEW NAIL HARDENER
amazing
a Division of Lanolin Plus, Inc.
nails!

A bra designed just for you



by

Formfit

When a bra fits and flatters . . . feels almost like a part of you, you know you've found the right bra for your figure. And since no one bra can fit everyone, Formfit presents these 4 bras . . . each one styled to do the most for a specific figure. Try all four . . . and find new comfort and new flattery for yourself.

At fine stores everywhere.

…ps for balanced lift with Formfit …-elastic band, plush lined elastic …ssures snug, no-gap fit. Circle- … to 40C in White cotton. $2.50

…or C. "Confidential" No. 281 …h cup. Embroidered White … 3.50

3. Smooth fit and a firm, youthful uplift with "Romance" Bra No. 573. Circle-stitched cups. Bra stays in place all day long thanks to the 2-in. wide elastic band. White cotton in sizes 32A to 44E, $3.00, $3.50, and $4.00

4. High rounded lines with beautiful separation. It's Formfit "Romance" No. 566. Easy-to-wear princess line holds its shape and you beautifully because it's circle-stitched with wonder-working "Nylo-Braid." White cotton in sizes 32A to 38C. $2.00

Y • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • CANADIAN PLANT, TORONTO

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 133

"Our man in Hollywood seems sure it will. He's been sending cables almost daily. The last one, which arrived yesterday, said —— Yes?"

The girl Marlene had entered, bearing a russet envelope. Barbara Crowe opened the envelope and uttered an exclamation. "Well, of all the coincidences!"

"Eh?"

"That you should have been here when this came. It's from our man in Hollywood, and —— Hold on to your chair. He says he has a firm offer for the picture rights of Cocktail Time. Would it interest you to hear what it is?"

It would, Cosmo intimated, interest him exceedingly.

"A hundred and five thousand dollars," said Barbara.

It was a stunned and dizzy Cosmo Wisdom who some quarter of an hour later tottered from the premises of the Edgar Saxby literary agency, hailed a cab and tottered into it. He was feeling rather like a private eye in a novel of suspense who has recently been hit over the head with a blunt instrument.

At the moment when Barbara opened the cable from Hollywood, he had been tilting his chair back, and the convulsive spasm which had resulted when she talked figures had caused him to take a nasty toss, but he had speedily forgotten physical discomfort in the rapture of listening to her subsequent remarks.

For this offer from the Superba-Llewellyn studio was, it appeared, not an end but a beginning. The man in Hollywood would not rest on his laurels with a complacent "That's that." There would now come the bumping-up process—the mentioning to a rival studio that S-L were offering a hundred and five thousand dollars, the extracting from the rival studio of a bid of a hundred and fifty thousand, the trotting back to Superba-Llewellyn with this information and ——

"Well, you get the idea," said Barbara, and went on to speak of one of the agency's clients whose latest work the man in Hollywood had just bumped up to three hundred and fifty thousand. True, Cosmo was feeling as he drove to Budge Street, he could not count on Cocktail Time's bringing in quite as much as that, but even two hundred thousand would be well worth having.

But in every ointment there is a fly. Elated though he was, Cosmo could not but remember that he had written a letter specifically disclaiming the authorship of Cocktail Time, and that this letter was in the possession of Lord Ickenham. Somehow, he must get the fatal paper and burn it.

It was not difficult to sketch out a tentative plan to this end. From Oily, he had learned that Lord Ickenham was staying at Hammer Hall, where paying guests were taken in. His first move must be to become one of these paying guests. A vital document like that letter would presumably be hidden somewhere in the old buster's room, for where else in a country house could anyone hide anything? Once on the spot, he would sooner or later find an opportunity of searching that room.

It was with his spirits high again that he entered No. 11 Budge Street. In the hall he encountered his landlady, Mrs. Keating.

"Why, hello!" she said, plainly surprised. "Where you been all this time?"

"Away," said Cosmo, wondering how often he was going to have to answer this question. "Staying with friends."

"There's a lot of letters in there for you, and there's been a fellow asking for you every day these last two weeks. Carmichael or some such name."

"Carlisle. I've seen him."

"Seemed to think I've nothing to do but answer the bell. You be wanting dinner tonight?"

"No, I'm going away again. I just looked in to pack."

"Where you going this time?"

"Dovetail Hammer, in Berkshire. Forward my letters to Hammer Hall."

"More work," said Mrs. Keating, and went off to the kitchen to attend to whatever it was on the stove that was making the house smell as if a meal were being prepared for a pack of hounds.

Quite a considerable mail awaited Cosmo in his sitting room. The table was piled with letters. Most of them had been forwarded from Alfred Tomkins, Ltd., and he read them with enjoyment—an author is always glad to hear from the fans—but the one that pleased him most was the one from the Edgar Saxby literary agency containing that check. It was one of those fat, substantial checks, and he enclosed it in an envelope addressed to his bank. After which, he went to his bedroom and began packing. He had filled a large suitcase and was standing on the front steps with it, waiting for a taxi, when Oily arrived.

The indications of impending departure which met his eye surprised Oily. "Where are you going?" he asked.

It was a change from being asked where he had been, but Cosmo made his customary answer. "Away. Thought I'd have a couple of days at Bournemouth."

"Why Bournemouth?"

"Why not Bournemouth?" said Cosmo rather cleverly, and Oily appeared to see the justice of this.

"Well, I'm glad I caught you," he said. "What have you done with the letter?"

Cosmo, rehearsing this scene in the privacy of his bedroom, had decided to be nonchalant. "Oh, the letter? I was going to tell you about that. I've changed my mind. I'm not going to write it."

"What!"

"No. I think I'll let things stay the way they are. By the way, I owe you some money, don't I? I wrote a check. I've got it somewhere. Yes, here you are. Taxi!" cried Cosmo, waving.

Oily was still standing stunned among the ruins of his hopes and dreams. "But ——"

"It's no good saying 'But,'" said Cosmo briskly. "If you really want to know, I like being the author of Cocktail Time. I enjoy getting all these letters from admirers of my work. Good-by, Carlisle, it's been nice knowing you. I must be off."

Oily stared blankly after him. Even a high-up confidence artist has to expect disappointments from time to time, but he never learns to enjoy them. In the manner of Gordon Carlisle as, half an hour later, he entered the presence of his wife, Gertie, there still lingered a suggestion of Napoleon returning from Moscow.

Gertie, having listened to the tale he had to tell, expressed the opinion that Cosmo was a low-down double-crossing little rat, which was of course quite true.

"There's something going on," she said. "When he left us, he was going to see his agent, wasn't he? Well, it's as clear what's happened as if he'd drawn a diagram. The agent told him there's been a movie offer."

"Gosh!"

"Sure. And a big one, must have been."

"I never thought of that. You're dead right."

"And he isn't going to Bournemouth. He's going to this Dovetail-what-is-it place to try to snitch that letter off Ickenham because if he can get his hooks on it and destroy it, there's nothing in the world to prove he didn't write the book. So what we do is to go to Dovetail-and-what-have-you and snitch it before he does."

"I get you. If we swing it, we'll be sitting pretty."

"There we'll be, in the middle, with Wisdom bidding for it and Bastable bidding for it, and the sky the limit. And it oughtn't to be so hard to find out where Ickenham is keeping the thing. We'll go through his room with a fine-tooth comb, and if it isn't there, we'll Always behave like a duck—keep calm and unruffled on the surface but paddle like the devil underneath.

LORD BRABAZON

New strength for broken, splitting nails!

Problem nails are most often brittle nails, seriously dried-out from detergents and dishwashing. AMAZING Nail Hardener contains a new ingredient that penetrates the heart of the nail, restores the natural "moisture balance" that makes nails strong.

A dip a day in AMAZING gives you the smoother, longer nails you want. No need to remove nail polish. "Amazing" results in ten days —guaranteed!

10 days of dips

$1.50 plus tax

NEW NAIL HARDENER

amazing

a dip a day for 10 days
ends problem nails!

a Division of Lanolin Plus, Inc.

know he's got it on him. Then all there is to it is beaning him with a blackjack and hunting in his pockets, see what I mean?"

Oily saw what she meant. He drew an emotional breath, and even the most shortsighted could have seen the love light in his eyes. "What a comfort you are to me, sweetie!" he said.

"I try to be," said Gertie virtuously.

It was two days after the vultures had decided to muster at Hammer Hall that a little procession emerged from the front door of Hammer Lodge. It was headed by Mrs. Phoebe Wisdom, who was followed by the local veterinary surgeon, who was followed by Albert Peasemarch. The veterinary surgeon got into his car, spoke a few parting words of encouragement and drove off. He had been in attendance on Mrs. Wisdom's cocker spaniel Benjy, who had "picked up something." Both Phoebe and Albert, having passed the night at the sickbed, were looking in need of rest, but their morale was high, and they gazed at each other tenderly.

"I don't know how to thank you, Peasemarch," said Phoebe.

"It was nothing, madam."

"Mr. Spurrell said that if it had not been for you making the poor angel swallow that mustard and water, the worst would have happened."

"I am glad to have given satisfaction, madam," Peasemarch said, remembering a good line taught him by Lord Ickenham's Coggs at the time when he was being coached for the high office he held. Thinking of Lord Ickenham, he felt how right the clear-seeing peer had been in urging him to spare no effort that would lead to a rapprochement between this cocker spaniel and himself. Unless he was greatly mistaken, there was a new light in Phoebe's eyes. He found his thoughts turning in the direction of what his mentor had called the Ickenham method. Had the moment come for putting this into operation?

He had the drill, he fancied, pretty clear in his mind. How did it go? Ah, yes. Stride up, grab by wrist, waggle about a bit, say "My mate!", clasp to bosom and shower burning kisses on upturned face. All quite simple, and yet he hesitated. And, as always happens when a man hesitates, the moment passed. She had begun to speak of warm milk with a little drop of brandy in it. Mr. Spurrell, the veterinary surgeon, had recommended this.

"Will you heat some in a saucepan, Peasemarch?"

Albert Peasemarch sighed. "Very good, madam," he said.

"And then you ought to lie down and have a good rest."

"I was about to suggest the same thing to you, madam."

"Yes, I am feeling tired. But I want to speak to Lord Ickenham first."

"I see his lordship is fishing on the lake, madam. Could I take a message?"

"No, thank you very much, Peasemarch. It's something I must say to him personally."

"Very good, madam," said Albert Peasemarch, and went off to heat saucepans with the heavy heart of a man conscious of having missed the bus.

What knitting was to old Mr. Saxby, fishing was to Lord Ickenham. He had not yet caught anything, nor was he expecting to catch anything, but sitting in a punt, watching a bobbing float, with the white clouds drifting across the blue sky above him and a gentle breeze playing about his temples, helped him to think, and recent happenings at Hammer Hall had given him much to think about. The recent muster of the vultures had not escaped his notice and, even had it done so, the fact that his room had been twice ransacked in the past two days would have drawn it to his attention.

Except for the nuisance of having to tidy up after these vultures, their arrival had pleased rather than perturbed Lord Ickenham. He was a man who liked to have plenty happening around him and he found the incursion of Cosmo Wisdom, closely followed by that of Gordon Carlisle and wife, a pleasant break in what was at the moment a dull visit. They livened things up. What puzzled him was the problem of what had brought them to Hammer Hall and why, being there, they had ransacked his room. They were apparently searching for that letter of young Cosmo's, but he could imagine no reason for them to consider it of any value. Like Oily, he had seen immediately that Cosmo could write another, which would have precisely the same effect as the first.

Another thing that perplexed him was that they seemed to be on such distant terms with one another. There was no mistaking the coolness that existed between Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle on the one side and Cosmo Wisdom on the other. Very curious.

Lord Ickenham was roused from these meditations by hearing his name called, and perceived Phoebe standing on the shore. Reluctantly, he drew in his line and rowed to land.

"My dear Phoebe," he exclaimed, "you appear to be coming apart at the seams, somewhat, if you don't mind me being personal. What's happened?"

"I was up all night with Benjy, Frederick. The poor darling was terribly ill. He picked up something."

"I'm sorry to hear that. Is he all right now?"

"Yes, thanks to Peasemarch. But I came to talk about something else, Frederick. It's about Raymond."

"Oh, Beefy?" said Lord Ickenham. "Don't tell me he has picked up something?"

"I think he is going off his head."

"Oh, come!"

"Well, there is insanity in the family, you know. George Winstanley ended his days in an asylum."

"I'm not so well up on George as I ought to be. Who was he?"

"He was in the Foreign Office. He married my mother's second cousin, Alice."

"I see. Well, I doubt if the pottiness of a second cousin by marriage is hereditary," said Lord Ickenham consolingly. "I don't think you need have any anxiety about Beefy. What gives you the idea that he has not his full collection of marbles?"

Phoebe brushed away the tears that came so readily to her eyes. "Well, you know how—what shall I say?—how impatient dear Raymond has always been with me. Well, quite suddenly about two weeks ago he changed completely. He became so sweet and kind and gentle that it took my breath away."

"All to the good, I should have thought."

"I thought so, too, at first. But as the days went by I began to get uneasy. Frederick"—her voice sank to a whisper—"he sends me flowers!"

"Flowers?"

"Every morning. I find them in my room."

"Very civil. I see no objection to flowers in moderation."

"But it's so unnatural."

"There is nothing odd about this change in Beefy's attitude, my dear girl. I can give you the explanation in a word: Peasemarch."

"Peasemarch?"

"He is behaving like this to conciliate Albert Peasemarch. An observant man, he noticed Albert Peasemarch's silent disapproval of the way he used to carry on, and realized that unless he mended his ways, he would be a butler short, and nobody wants to lose a butler in these days."

Phoebe's eyes were round. "You mean Peasemarch would have given notice?"

"Exactly."

"But why?"

"Unable to stand the strain of watching you being put through the wringer each morning. No man likes to see a fourteen-stone Q. C. hammering the stuffing out of the woman he loves."

"Loves?"

"Surely you must be aware that Albert Peasemarch worships the very ground you tread on?"

"But—but this is extraordinary."

"I see nothing remarkable in it. When you don't sit up all night with sick cocker spaniels, you're a very attractive woman, my dear Phoebe."

"But Peasemarch is a butler."

"Ah, I see what you mean. You are thinking that you have never had a butler in love with you before. One gets new experiences. But Albert Peasemarch is only a synthetic butler. He is a man of property who took to buttling simply in order to be near you. Do you remember," said Lord Ickenham, giving rein to his always rather vivid imagination, "a day about two years ago when Beefy was standing you and me lunch at the Savoy Grill, and I nodded to a man at the next table?"

"No."

Lord Ickenham was not surprised. "That man," he said, "was Albert Peasemarch. He came to me later—he is an old friend of mine—and asked who you were. It wasn't long before he was pouring out his soul to me. It was love, my dear Phoebe, love at first sight. How, he asked, could he get to know you? I offered to introduce him to Beefy, but he seemed to think that that wouldn't work. We needed some mechanism whereby Albert Peasemarch could be constantly in your society, giving you the tender look and occasionally heaving the soft sigh, and to a man of my intelligence the solution was obvious. Who, I asked myself, is the Johnny who is always on the spot? The butler, I answered myself. Albert Peasemarch, I said, still addressing myself, must become Beefy's butler. A few simple lessons from Coggs and there he was, all ready to move in."

Phoebe was still fluttering. She said she had never heard of such a thing, and Lord Ickenham agreed that the setup was unusual.

"But romantic, don't you think?" he added. "The sort of policy great lovers through the ages would have pursued, if they had happened to think of it. Hullo," he said, breaking off. "I'm afraid I must be leaving you, Phoebe."

He had seen the station cab drive up to the front door and discharge Johnny Pearce.

"My godson has returned," he explained. "He went up to London to give his fiancée lunch, and I am anxious to learn how everything came out."

Beside Johnny Pearce, as he stood on the gravel drive, there was lying a battered suitcase. It signified, Lord Ickenham presumed, the advent of another paying guest, and he was delighted. What with himself, this new arrival and the three vultures already in residence, Johnny in his capacity of jovial innkeeper was doing well. Though, now that he was in a position to study him closely, he had doubts as to whether "jovial" was the right adjective. The young man looked like an innkeeper with a good deal on his mind, and when he spoke his voice was toneless.

"Oh, hullo, Uncle Fred. I've just got back."

"So I see. And you appear to have picked up some luggage. Whose suitcase is that?"

"It belongs to a bloke I shared the cab with. I dropped him at the lodge. He wanted to see Bastable. Saxby he said his name was."

"Saxby? Was he a fellow in the early forties with a jutting chin or a flattened-out septuagenarian who looked as if he had at one time been run over by a steam roller? The latter? Then it must be Saxby Senior, the father of the jutting chinner. I've met him at the Demosthenes Club. How did you get on with him?"

"Oh, all right. Odd sort of chap. Why did he ask me if I played the trombone?"

"That was old Saxby, all right. Every time I meet him, he asks me if I have seen Flannery lately. Who Flannery is I have never been able to ascertain. When I reply that I have not, he says, 'Ah? And how was he?' The day old Saxby makes anything remotely resembling sense, they will set the church bells ringing and proclaim a national holiday. I wonder why he was going to see Beefy. Is he staying with you?"

"Yes. He may be staying some time. He's a bird watcher, he tells me."

"Indeed? I never saw that side of him. Our encounters have always taken place at the Demosthenes, where the birds are few and far between. I believe the committee is very strict about admitting them. Do you watch birds, Johnny?"

"No."

"Nor I. But, pigeonholing old Saxby for the moment, what happened when you met Bunny? How was she? Gay? Cheery? Sparkling?"

"Oh, yes, but it wasn't me she was gay and sparkling with."

Lord Ickenham frowned. "Don't be cryptic, my boy. Start at the beginning. You gave her lunch?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 139

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

Cold war, warming up on the home front: Husband, glancing up from letter he has just opened: "Too bad about what happened to George, isn't it?"

The head of our family suggests that the area under the piano, which he considers waste space, be chicken-wired to make a pen for members of the youngest generation, when here on visitors' visas.

A mother won a son over to the idea of going to bed before his older brother by presenting the following argument: "Suppose there was a baby here, and when the baby was old enough to talk it refused to go to bed before you. Would you think the baby was fair?"

The only difference between a man and a woman driving an automobile is that whatever each does well or poorly the woman does five miles per hour slower.

A small boy said, "I know what I want to be when I grow up—God!"

"Impossible!" replied his father. "There can be only one of us."

To see ourselves as others see us is minor compared with seeing others as they see themselves.

Mother about her twelve-year-old daughter: "She thinks she's 'going steady' because, quite by accident, a certain boy sat beside her during a basketball game and next day, in the hall, greeted her with 'Hi there! What d'ya know?'"

Before woman is completely free another amendment to the Constitution is necessary: "The right to cut, color, curl and wear hair according to individual preference shall not be denied any person because of sex."

Three-way mirror: one that triples the chances of a woman's beginning a diet.

Members of an employment agency went into shock recently; a young girl applied for a housekeeping job with only one stipulation: "I would like to work for a family that owns lots of books; you'd be surprised what you can learn just dusting books."

In the same way that a child should mature to the point of getting as much pleasure from giving as receiving, a person who learns to think for himself eventually prefers giving an idea to having one given.

Beautiful Hair is Healthy Hair

BRECK BANISH

DANDRUFF TREATMENT SHAMPOO*

NEW...A BEAUTY SHAMPOO THAT BANISHES DANDRUFF

This clear golden liquid shampoo has a unique two-way action: it gives your hair a lovely, soft new luster—and with regular use assures you of freedom from dandruff. Clinically tested Breck Banish, containing 22T4, leaves its influence on the scalp even after you rinse. It protects the scalp between shampoos—prevents the formation of new dandruff. Ideal for all the family, Breck Banish is non-drying, pleasantly scented, leaves no harsh or irritating effects. Use it regularly at home or at your beauty shop. Your hair will shine with new beauty. Beautiful hair is healthy hair.

COSTS NO MORE—DOES TWICE AS MUCH . . . Breck Banish gives you both new hair beauty and freedom from dandruff. Available at beauty shops or wherever cosmetics are sold. 8 oz. $1.50

Copyright 1958 by John H. Breck Inc. *Patent Applied For

Enjoy Shirley Temple's Storybook on NBC-TV, April 18th, "Land of Green Ginger—The Adventures of the Son of Aladdin"

JOHN H BRECK INC • MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS • SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS • NEW YORK • CHICAGO • SAN FRANCISCO • LOS ANGELES • OTTAWA CANADA

Unretouched photo of the hands of Mrs. Michyl Veach of St. Louis, Mo. Only right hand was given Jergens care.

No doubt about it...Jergens Lotion STOPS "detergent hands"

Here's proof right from actual scientific tests*. 713 women soaked both hands in detergents three times a day. In several days, left hands, without Jergens Lotion care, became coarse and red. But right hands, treated with Jergens, stayed soft, smooth and lovely. No other lotion similarly tested proved so effective.

Jergens stops all chapping and dryness because it penetrates quickly...doesn't glove hands with sticky film. It actually helps replace natural moisture lost to wind, weather, housework. So don't be caught red-handed...have pretty hands every day with Jergens . . . still only 15¢ to $1.

Notice to doctors and dermatologists—for summary of test, write The Andrew Jergens Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.*

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 136

"Yes, and she brought along a blighter called Norbury-Smith."

Lord Ickenham was shocked and astounded. "To a lovers' tryst? To what should have been a sacred reunion of two fond hearts after long parting? You amaze me. Did she offer any explanation?"

"She said he had told her he was at school with me, and she was sure I would like to meet him again."

"Smiling brightly as she spoke?"

"Yes, she was smiling quite a lot. Norbury-Smith!" said Johnny bitterly. "A fellow I thought I'd seen the last of ten years ago. He's a stockbroker now, richer than blazes, and looks like a movie star."

"Good heavens! Did their relations seem to you cordial?"

"She was all over him. They were prattling away like a couple of honeymooners."

Lord Ickenham drew a sharp breath. "I don't like this, Johnny."

"I didn't like it myself."

"It's the oh-well-if-you-don't-want-me-there-are-plenty-who-do formula, which too often means that the female of the species has decided that she is about ready to call it a day. Do you know what I think, Johnny?"

"What?"

"You'd better marry that girl quick."

"And bring her here with Nannie Bruce floating about the place like poison gas? I wouldn't play such a low trick on her." Johnny paused, and eyed his companion sourly. "What," he asked, "are you grinning about?"

Lord Ickenham patted his arm in a godfatherly manner. "If," he said, "you allude to the gentle smile which you see on my face—I will tell you why I smile. I have big hopes that the dark menace of Nannie Bruce will shortly be removed."

Johnny found himself unable to share this optimistic outlook. "How can it be removed? I can't raise three hundred pounds."

"You may not have to. You see that bicycle propped up near the back door?" said Lord Ickenham, pointing. "Police Constable McMurdo's Arab steed. He's in the kitchen now, getting down to brass tacks with her."

"It won't do any good."

"I disagree with you. I have been seeing quite a bit of Officer McMurdo, and he has confided in me as in a sympathetic elder brother. I was shocked to learn on what mistaken lines he had been trying to overcome Nannie Bruce's sales resistance. He had been arguing with her, Johnny, pleading with her. As if words, however honeyed, could melt the obstinacy of a woman whose mother, I am convinced, must have been frightened by a deaf adder. Action, Cyril, I told him—his name is Cyril—is what you need, and I urged him to cut the cackle and try the Ickenham method."

"What's that?"

"It's a little thing I knocked together in my bachelor days. I won't go into the details now, but it has a good many points in common with all-in wrestling and osteopathy. I generally recommend it to diffident wooers, and it always works like magic. At this very moment Nannie Bruce is probably looking up into Officer McMurdo's eyes and meekly murmuring 'Yes, Cyril, dear'; 'Just as you say, Cyril, dear.' You might go and listen at the kitchen door and see how things are coming along."

"I might, yes, but what I'm going to do is have a swim in the lake. I'm sweating at every pore."

"Keep it clean, my boy. No need to stress the purely physical. Well, if you run into McMurdo, tell him I am anxious to receive his report and can be found in the hammock on the back lawn. Is that the evening paper you have there? Anything of interest in it?"

"Only that movie thing."

"To what movie thing do you allude?"

"About this chap Wisdom's book."

"Cocktail Time?"

"Yes. Apparently all the studios in Hollywood are bidding frantically for the picture rights. According to the chap who does the movie stuff in that paper, the least Wisdom will get is a hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Oh, well, some people have all the luck," said Johnny, and went off to take his swim.

The hammock to which Lord Ickenham had alluded was suspended between two trees some distance from the house, and it was in pensive mood that a few minutes later he lowered himself into it. His godson's words had opened up a new line of thought and the mystery of why there was this sudden muster of vultures at Hammer Hall had been solved.

Obviously, with a hundred and fifty thousand dollars coming to the author of Cocktail Time, Cosmo Wisdom was not going to look favorably on the idea of writing a second letter to his Uncle Raymond, disclaiming the authorship of the book. Equally obviously he would strain every nerve to secure and destroy the letter he had already written. And the Carlisle duo would naturally strain every nerve to secure it first and start Sir Raymond and nephew bidding against each other. No wonder there was that coolness he had noticed between the vulture of the first part and the vultures of the second.

It was a mistake on Lord Ickenham's part to close his eyes in order to brood more tensely on the problems this new development had raised, for if you close your eyes in a hammock on a warm summer evening, you are apt to doze off. A pleasant drowsiness stole over him and his breathing took on a gentle whistling note.

It was the abrupt intrusion of a finger between his third and fourth ribs and the sound of a voice that said "Hey!" that some little while later awakened him. Opening his eyes, he found that Gordon Carlisle was standing on one side of the hammock, his wife Gertie on the other, and he could not fail to notice that in the latter's shapely hand was one of those small but serviceable rubber instruments known as coshes.

She was swinging it negligently, as some dandy of the Regency period might have swung his clouded cane.

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Springtime Moods

Barbara J.'s wardrobe planning and memos to herself are behind her. She has all her spring basics, and right now rests happily (and deservedly so) on her laurels. But—there's one more investment, and this one perhaps the most fun of all to shop for: a dress for spring and summer evenings.

Her only problem now, a very difficult choice to make . . . see if you agree. She finds springtime has a variety of moods, each one more enticing than the last. She contemplates each one in her pursuit of a pretty fashion. Her choice? Fanciful and gay, with the price within the realm of anyone's dream. Her newest addition, just $11.95. By BET HART

A DEMURE and exceedingly pretty springtime look. Yards and yards of black-and-white-plaid silk organza for the skirt . . . a fitted covered-up bodice. This is practically a year-round fashion, Barbara thinks. She could wear it under her red coat, or with almost any one of her jackets or sweaters. Either her black pumps or red sandals would go nicely too. The price, $24.95.

SEPARATES BY MANDEL

A slim sheath, young and SOPHISTICATED, would be the perfect answer for a springtime evening—especially if it had its own flowered overblouse. The sheath, to make from Vogue's "Very Easy to Make" Design No. 9429*. The blouse, in blue-and-turquoise printed flowers on rayon and silk, to buy for $7.95. Barbara thinks the sheath would be pretty in a turquoise satin shantung, but it would lend itself to other fabrics, other colors. (The blouse also comes in shades of reds or yellows.) Barbara keeps this in mind for a possible future addition.

© VOGUE

OVERBLOUSE BY MONA ROSET

For back view, sizes and price, see page 190.*

Perhaps the most ROMANTIC of all: dotted swiss strewn with long-stemmed roses at the hemline and scattered across the bodice. This in two pieces, both for a total of under $19.00. Her red sandals and cherry cardigan would both be pretty accents for this.

DIANE AND ALLAN ARBUS

Barbara's final choice, FESTIVE and GAY. Bright red flowers on cotton with the look of silk. A tiny bodice with a wide neckline dipping low in back. The skirt is slightly belled. Pretty now and for warm summer evenings ahead. Barbara can wear her red strip sandals from last year. She plans to shorten her cherry Orlon cardigan (purchased in January) to waist length—a very pretty costume, and she can still wear the sweater with her other separates. The dress and Barbara's total monthly expenditure, $11.95.

Although there was nothing in the unruffled calm of his manner to show it, Lord Ickenham, as he sat up and prepared to make the party go, was not at his brightest and happiest. However, recognizing that this was one of the times that try men's souls, he did his best to ease the strain.

"Well, well, well," he said heartily, "so there you are! I must have dropped off for a moment. One is reminded of the experience of the late Abou ben Adhem, who, as you may recall, woke from a deep dream of peace, to find an angel at his bedside, writing in a book of gold. Must have given him a nasty start, I have always thought."

The interest of Oily and his bride in Abou ben Adhem appeared to be slight. "Gimme," said Oily. His manner was curt.

"I beg your pardon?"

"You heard. Remember making me turn out my pockets? Let's inspect what you've got in your pockets, Inspector Jervis."

"Why, of course, my dear fellow, of course," said Lord Ickenham, and produced a handkerchief, a cigarette case, a lighter, the notebook in which he jotted down great thoughts when they occurred to him, and a small button which had come off his shirt. Oily regarded the collection with a jaundiced eye, and looked at his wife reproachfully.

"He hasn't got it on him."

Gertie, with her woman's intuition, was not so easily baffled. "Do you think he'd carry it around in his pocket? it's sewn into his coat."

This being actually the case, Lord Ickenham was conscious of a passing regret that Gordon Carlisle had not selected a less intelligent mate. But he continued to do his best.

"What is it you are looking for?" he asked genially. "Perhaps I can help you."

"You know what I'm looking for," said Oily. "That letter."

"Letter? Letter?" Lord Ickenham's face cleared. "Oh, the letter? My dear fellow, you don't suppose I would keep an important document like that on me? It is, of course, lodged at my banker's."

"Oh, yeah?" said Oily.

"Oh, yeah?" said his wife, and it was abundantly evident that neither had that simple faith which we are assured is so much better than Norman blood.

It had become borne in on Lord Ickenham more and more that the situation in which his negligence had placed him was one of considerable embarrassment. Had he been able to rise to his feet, a knowledge of jujitsu, acquired in his younger days and, though a little rusty, still efficient, might have served him in good stead, but his chances of being allowed to exhibit this skill were, he realized, slight. Even under the most favorable conditions a hammock is a difficult thing to get out of with any rapidity.

"I'll tell you ——" he began.

Oily, his manner even curter than before, expressed a wish to be handed Lord Ickenham's coat.

"I'll tell you where you of the criminal classes, if you do not mind me so describing you, make your mistake, and a serious mistake it is too. You weave your plots and schemes, you spend good money on coshes, you tiptoe with them to people's bedsides, but there is something you omit. You don't allow for the United States Marines."

Home—the place where the great are small and the small are great.

Oily was not put off. "Gimme that coat."

"Never mind my coat for the moment," said Lord Ickenham. "I want to tell you about the United States Marines. I don't know if you are familiar with the procedure where these fine fellows are concerned. To put it in a word, they arrive. The reason I bring this up," said Lord Ickenham, hurrying his remarks to a conclusion, for he could see that his audience was becoming restive, "is that, if you glance behind you, you will notice that the United States Marines are arriving now."

And with a friendly finger he drew their attention to Police Constable McMurdo, who, dressed in the authority of helmet and blue uniform, was plodding across the lawn toward them.

"I believe the correct thing to do at a moment like this is to say 'Cheese it, the cops!' and having said it to withdraw with all speed. What a fine, big fellow he is, is he not? . . . Ah, Cyril, were you looking for me?"

"Yes, m'lord. Mr. Pearce said I should find you here. But if your lordship is occupied ——"

"No, it's quite all right," said Lord Ickenham, sliding from the hammock. "We had finished our little talk. I am sure Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle will excuse me. Au revoir, Mr. Carlisle. Mrs. Carlisle, I kiss your hand. At least, I don't, but you know what I mean. I am wholly at your disposal, Cyril."

Police Constable McMurdo was a large man with an agreeable, if somewhat stolid and unintellectual, face, heavily mustached toward the center. He had a depressed and dejected look, and Lord Ickenham needed no verbal report to tell him what must have happened at the late get-together in the kitchen.

"You bring bad news, I fear," he said sympathetically. "The Ickenham method didn't work?"

"No, it didn't."

Lord Ickenham nodded understandingly. "It doesn't sometimes. One has to budget for the occasional failure. From the evidence submitted to my notice, I take it that she busted you one."

"Aa-a-r!" said Officer McMurdo, with feeling. "She said if I ever acted that way again, she'd never speak to me as long as she lived."

"I wouldn't worry too much about that. Women try to kid us that they don't like ardor, but they do. I'll bet at this very moment she is pacing the kitchen floor, whispering 'What a man!' and wishing you would play a return engagement. You wouldn't consider having another pop? Striking while the iron is hot, as it were?"

"I wouldn't, no."

"Then we must think of some other way of achieving the happy ending. I will devote my best thought to your problems."

And also, added Lord Ickenham to himself, to the problem of how to find a safe place to put the letter. A duller man than he would have been able to divine from the attitude of the Carlisle family that things were hotting up.

Old Mr. Saxby, looking like something stationed in a cornfield to discourage crows, stood on the lawn of Hammer Lodge, raking the countryside with his binoculars. At the moment when he re-enters this chronicle they were focused on the island in the middle of the lake.

The explanation of his presence in Dovetail Hammer, which Lord Ickenham had found mystifying, is a simple one. He was there at a woman's behest. He had been properly ticked off by Barbara Crowe for his uncouth behavior to Cosmo Wisdom and sternly ordered to proceed without delay to Hammer Hall and apologize to him.

"No, a letter will not do," said Barbara severely. "Especially as you would be sure to forget to post it. You must go to him in person and grovel. Kiss the hem of his garment. Cosmo Wisdom has to be conciliated. He's a very important person."

"He's a squirt."

"A squirt maybe, but he wrote Cocktail Time, on its ten per cent of the proceeds of which the dear old agency expects to be able to afford an extra week at the seaside this year. So none of your larks."

Mr. Saxby always did what Barbara Crowe told him to, even when it involved getting his hair cut, and he had set out obediently for Dovetail Hammer, consoling himself with the thought that a few days in the country, with plenty of birds to watch, would not be unpleasant. Nice, too, being next door to Bastable. He always enjoyed hobnobbing with Bastable.

Sir Raymond, who did not derive the same uplift from their hobnobbings, received him with a marked sinking sensation. Learning that his old clubmate was not proposing to make Hammer Lodge his headquarters but would be staying at the hall, he brightened considerably, took him out on to the lawn to see the view and, finding that he had left his pipe behind, went back to fetch it. He now returned and found the old gentleman, as has been stated, scrutinizing the island on the lake through his binoculars.

"Watching birds?" he asked, with the heartiness of a man assured that he is not going to have to put Howard Saxby, Sr., up for an indefinite stay.

"Not so much birds," said Mr. Saxby, "as that chap Scriventhorpe."

"Chap who?"

"Scriventhorpe. Flannery's friend. I've met him with you at the club. I think you told me he was your son or brother or something."

Sir Raymond collected his wits, which, as so often happened when he was conversing with Howard Saxby, Sr., had been momentarily scattered.

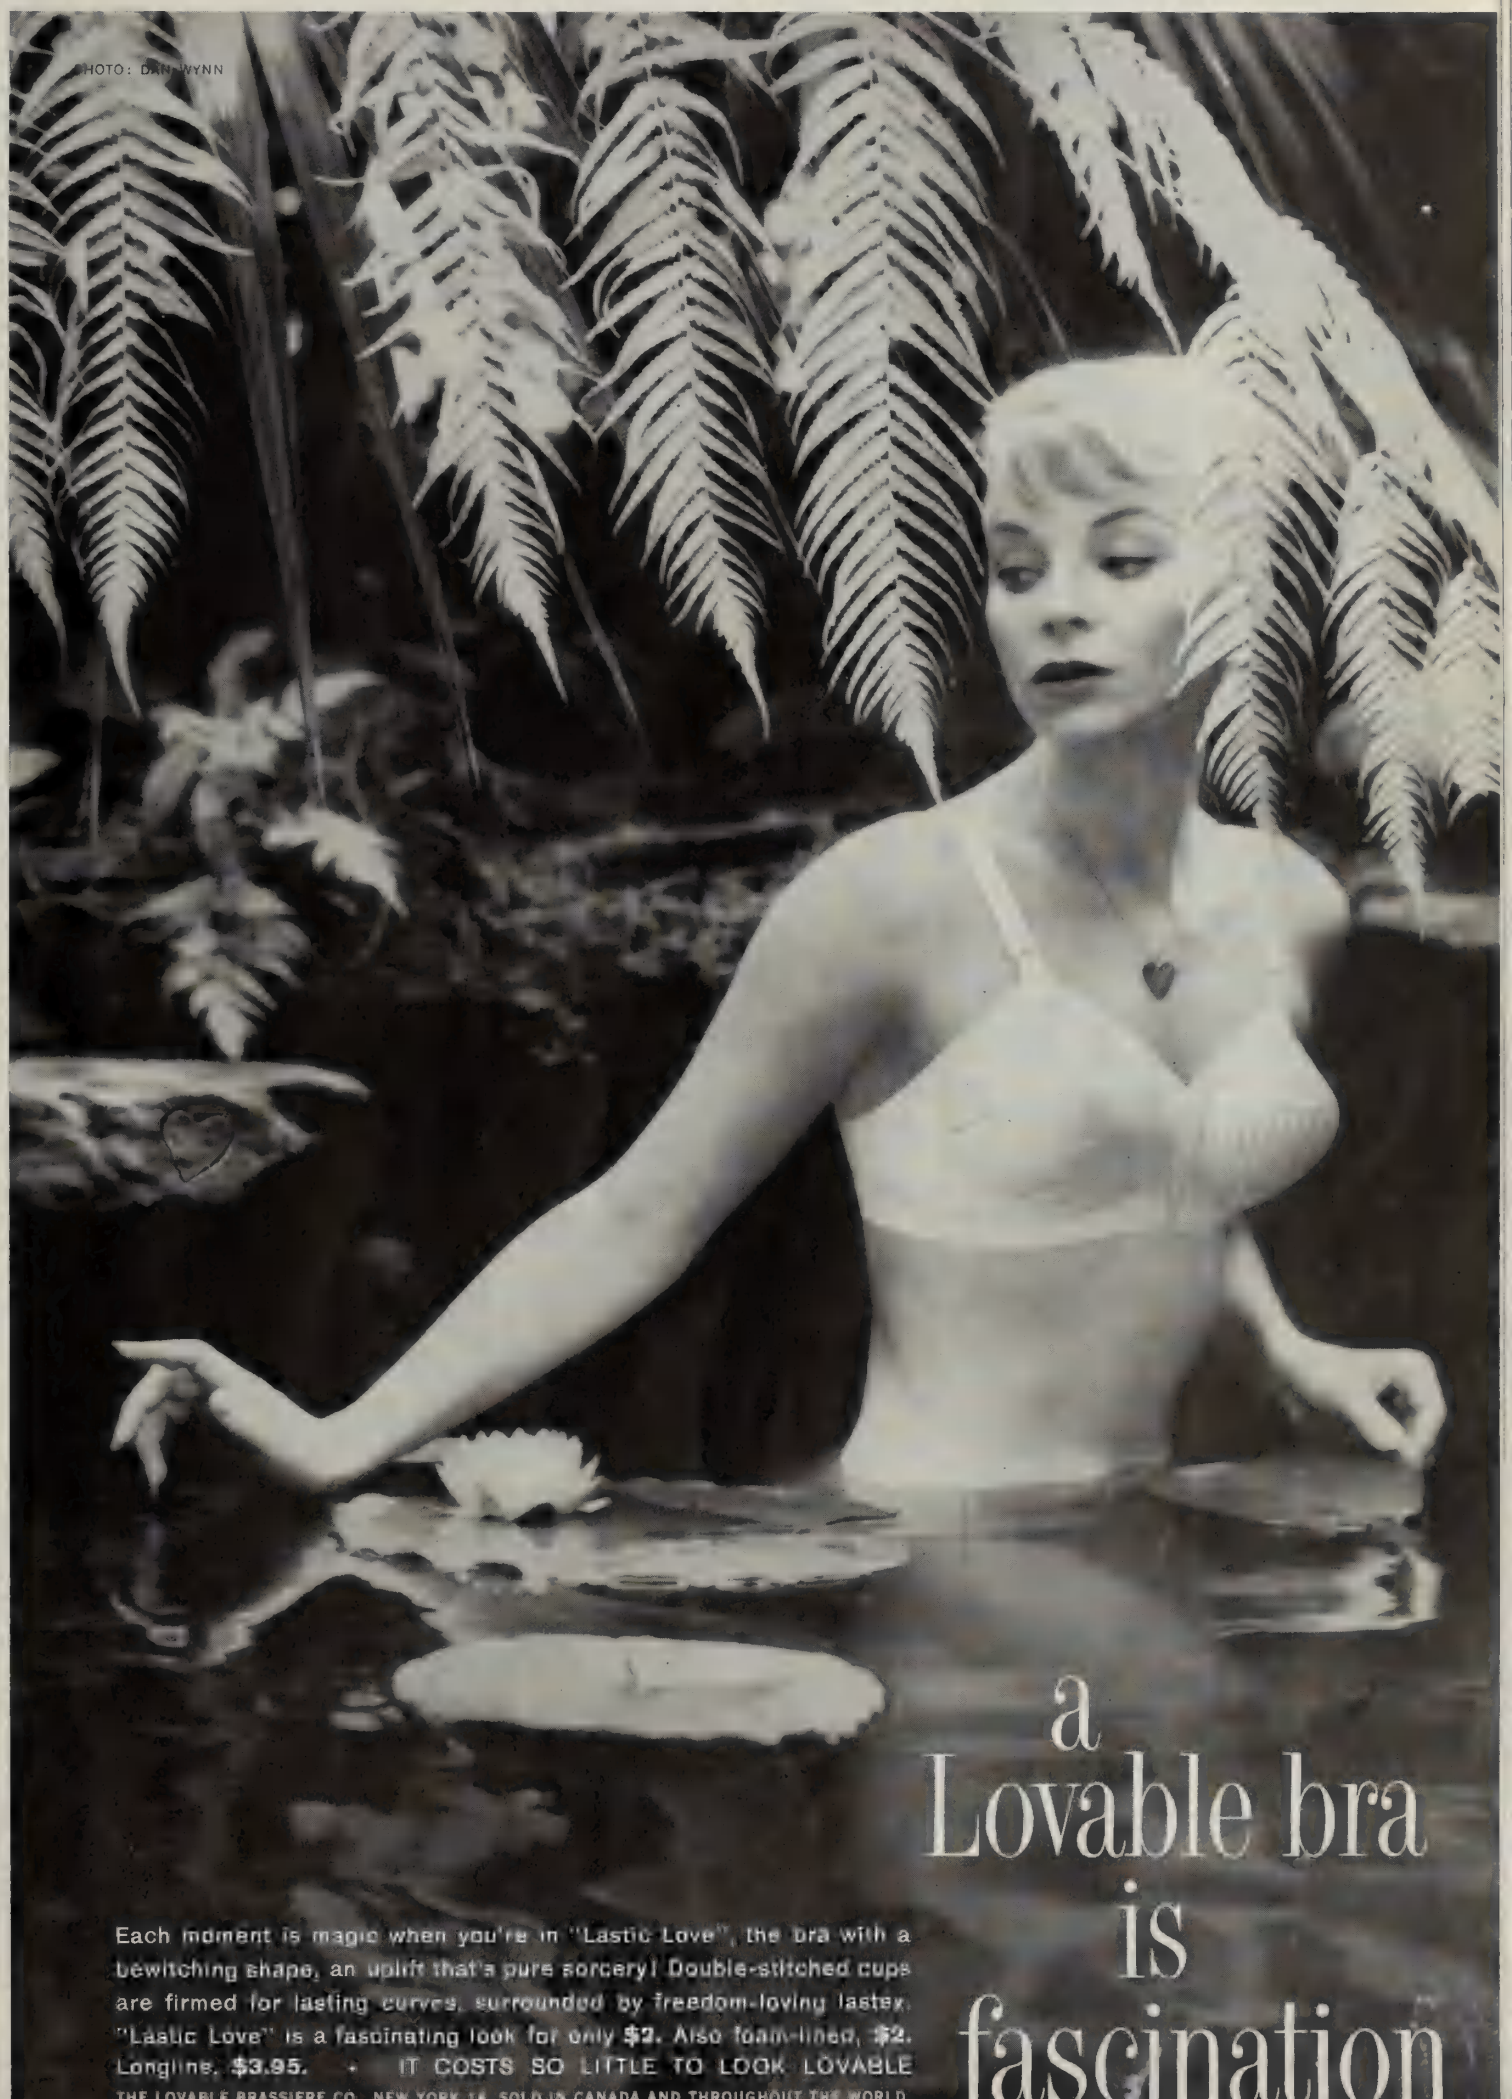
"Do you by any chance mean Ickenham?"

"Didn't I say Ickenham?"

"You said Scriventhorpe."

"Well, I meant Ickenham. Nice fellow. I don't wonder Flannery's fond of him. He's on that island over there."

"Oh?" said Sir Raymond without enthusiasm.



"He's tacking to and fro," proceeded Mr. Saxby. "Now he's crouching down. Seems to looking for something. No, I see at he's doing. He's not looking for ething, he's hiding something.

s got a paper of some kind in his d, and he seems to be burying it."
What!"
Odd. He jumped up just then and ried off. Must have gone back to boat. Yes, here he comes. You can him rowing away."
ir Raymond had never expected
t any observation of this clubmate nis would thrill him to the core, that was what this one had done.
felt as if he had been reclining in electric chair and some practical er had turned on the juice.
he problem of what his relative by rriage had done with the fatal let-was one which for two weeks and re had never been out of Sir Ray-nd Bastable's thoughts. The obvisolution, that Lord Ickenham had den it in his bedroom, he rejected.
h determined bedroom searchers Cosmo Wisdom and Mr. and
s. Gordon Carlisle on the prem-
, such a policy would be madness.
would have thought of some really enious place of concealment—a low tree, perhaps, or a crevice in ne wall. That he would bury the ument on an island, like a pirate the Spanish Main, had never oc-red to Sir Raymond.
Quivering, he grabbed at his comnion's arm, and Mr. Saxby quivd, too, for the grip of those fevered gers had affected him like the bite a horse. He also said "Ouch!"
Sir Raymond had no time to waste ening to people saying "Ouch!"
had seen Lord Ickenham bring his at to shore, step out of it and disap-ar in the direction of the house, and was feeling, as did Brutus, that there a tide in the affairs of men, which, en at the flood, leads on to fortune.
"Quick!" he cried.
"When you say 'Quick' ——" ben Mr. Saxby, but got no further, he was being hurried to where the at lay at a pace that made speech ficult for a man who was getting on years. He could not remember hav-whizzed along like this, touching ground only here and there, since afternoon sixty-three years ago en, a boy of twelve, he had com-ted at a village sports meeting in choirboys' hundred-yard race.

was only natural, therefore, that Sir Raymond bent to the oars, put-g his back into it like a galley slave the old school, silence should have evailed in the boat. Mr. Saxby was ing to recover his breath, and Sir ymond was thinking.
The problem that confronted him
s what to do with the body—viz.,
r. Saxby's. He had brought the old ntleman along because, having witssed Lord Ickenham's activities, he uld be able to indicate the spot ere the treasure lay, but now he s asking himself if this had not en a mistake. There are men—the lt of the earth—who, if they see you arching islands, preserve a tactful ence and do not ask for explanans, but Mr. Saxby, he was con-nced, was not one of these. He be-nged rather to the more numerous ss who want to know what it is all out, and Sir Raymond had no dee for a co-worker of this descrip-n. By the time they reached their stination he had arrived at the con-usion that the less Mr. Saxby saw what was going on, the better.
"You stay in the boat," he said,
d Mr. Saxby thought it a good ea. He was still in the process of ying to recover his breath.
"Woof!" he said, meaning that he lly concurred, and Sir Raymond set t into the interior alone.

Alone, that is to say, except for the swan which was at the moment taking it easy in the undergrowth beside the bijou residence where its mate was nesting. It was unexpectedly meeting this swan that had caused Lord Ickenham to revise his intention of burying the letter on the island and take to his boat with all possible speed. The Ickenhams were brave, but they knew when and when not to be among those present.

For some minutes after his companion's departure Mr. Saxby, whose breathing apparatus had now returned to normal, gave himself up to thought. But though nothing could be fraught with greater interest than a detailed list of the things he thought about, it is better perhaps to omit such a list and pass on to the moment when he felt restored enough to take up his binoculars again. It was as he scanned the mainland through these that he observed Cosmo Wisdom outside the front door of the hall, and the sight reminded him that he was a man with a mission. Long ere this, he felt guiltily, he should have been seeking the young squirt out and kissing the hem of his garment, in accordance with Barbara Crowe's directions. What there was to kiss hems of garments about, he was thinking as, having completely forgotten Sir Raymond Bastable's existence, he started to row ashore, was more than he could tell you. But Barbara Crowe seemed to think there was, and women had to be humored. As he rowed, he was throwing together in his mind a few graceful expressions of apology which he thought would meet the case.

WEINSTOCK-LUBIN
Sacramento, Calif.

BLOCK & KUHL CO.
Peoria, Ill.

BYCKS
Atlanta, Ga.

Rhythm Step

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS, MO.

see AMERICA on a mountainside

...see MOUNT RUSHMORE
In the BLACK HILLS of South Dakota

Shaped in ageless granite, this mightiest of Man's sculptures brings a rush of reverent pride to every American who stands before it. This summer, see unforgettable Mt. Rushmore. Vacation and see America in the mile-high Black Hills of South Dakota!

Write for FREE color booklet

SOUTH DAKOTA DEPT. of HIGHWAYS
H. U. Dixon, Publicity Director, Pierre, South Dakota

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW

Dr Scholl's Super-Sheer 51 GAUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS

NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. Only $12.95 pair. At Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. For booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Ill.

These, a few minutes later, he delivered with an Old World charm. Their reception was what a dramatic critic would have called adequate. Cosmo did not take him to his bosom, but, the wound to his dignity apparently more or less healed, he offered him a cigarette, and they smoked in reasonable amity while Mr. Saxby, always informative on his favorite subject, spoke at considerable length of birds he had watched. It was midway through a description of the peculiar behavior of a sand martin he had once known in Norfolk that he broke off suddenly and said:

"Bless my soul!"

"Now what?" said Cosmo rather sharply.

"Exactly," said Mr. Saxby. "What? There was something Barbara Crowe told me to tell you, and I've forgotten what it was. Now what could it have been? You don't happen to know, do you?"

At the name "Barbara Crowe" Cosmo had given a start. "Was it about the movie end?" he said eagerly.

"The what?"

"Has there been another offer for the film rights of my book?"

Mr. Saxby shook his head. "No, it was nothing like that. Have you written a book?"

"I wrote Cocktail Time."

"Never heard of it," said Mr. Saxby cordially. "I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll go in and telephone her. She is sure to remember what it was. She has a memory like a steel trap."

When he returned, he had a slip of paper in his hand, and was beaming. "You were perfectly right," he said. "It was connected with what you call the movie end. I wrote it down. She said —— Do you know Mrs. Crowe?"

"I've met her."

"Charming woman, though she bullies me unmercifully. You don't know what the trouble was between her and your uncle, do you?"

"No."

"They were engaged."

"Yes."

"She broke it off. Well, who can blame her? I wouldn't want to marry young Bastable myself."

Cosmo spurned the gravel with an impatient foot. "What did she say?"

"Ah, that we shall never know. What do women say on these occasions? 'Take back your ring and letters,' do you think, or something of that sort?"

"About the movie end."

"Oh, the movie end? Yes, as I told you, I have her very words here." He peered at the paper. "She said 'Have you apologized?' and I said yes, I had apologized, and she said 'Did he take you to his bosom?' and I said, 'No, the young squirt did not take me to his bosom, but he gave me a cigarette,' and she said, 'Well, tell him that Medulla-Oblongata-Glutz have offered a hundred and fifty thousand, and our man in Hollywood has gone back to Superba-Llewellyn to bump them up.' Does that convey anything to you?"

Cosmo inhaled deeply. "Yes," he said. "It does."

And suddenly Mr. Saxby, for all his fishy eye and flattened-out-by-a-steam-roller appearance, looked almost beautiful to him.

Sir Raymond Bastable, meanwhile, questing hither and thither like a Thurber bloodhound, had begun to regret that he had not availed himself of his shipmate's co-operation. Having no means of knowing whereabouts on this infernal island Mr. Saxby had seen Lord Ickenham tacking to and fro and crouching down, he was in the position of one who hunts for pirate gold without the assistance of the yellowing map which says "E. by N. 20," "16 paces S." and all that sort of thing. Anyone who has ever hunted for pirate gold will tell you what a handicap this is. The yellowing map is of the essence.

The island was rather densely wooded—or perhaps "undergrowthed" would be a better term—and was rich in spiky shrubs which caught at his ankles and insects which appeared to look on the back of his neck as the ideal rallying ground. He had become very hot and thirsty, and there was a hissing sound in his ears which he did not like. It suggested to him that his blood pressure was getting out of control.

It was as he straightened himself after his thirty-second attempt to find out one of those spots, so common in fiction, where you can see, if you look closely, that the earth here has been recently disturbed, that he found he had wronged his blood pressure. This hissing sound had proceeded not from it but from a swan which had emerged from a bush behind him and was regarding him with unmistakable menace.

It was always important at times like this to understand the other fellow's point of view, and the swan could certainly have made out a case for itself. With the little woman nesting in the vicinity and wanting to be alone with her eggs, it is not to be wondered at that it found intruders unwelcome. Already it had had to take a strong line with Lord Ickenham, and now, just as it was thinking that the evil had been stamped out, along came another human pest.

Sir Raymond, like Lord Ickenham, was not a pusillanimous man. But the stoutest-hearted may well quail before an angry swan. It is possible that Sir Raymond, as he started to withdraw, thought that he was doing so at a dignified walk, but actually he was running like a choirboy intent on winning the hundred-yard dash. His one idea was to return as speedily as possible to the boat in which Mr. Saxby awaited him.

Reaching the water front with something of the emotions of Xenophon's ten thousand when they won through to the sea, he was disconcerted to find that Mr. Saxby was not awaiting him. Nor was there any boat. And the hissing sound was coming nearer all the time.

It was a time for quick thinking, and Sir Raymond thought quickly. A split second later he was in the water, swimming strongly for the shore.

At the hour of 8:45 that night Lord Ickenham might have been observed—and was observed by Rupert Morrison, the landlord, licensed to sell ales, wines and spirits, who was polishing glasses behind the counter—sitting in the saloon bar of the village inn, the Beetle and Wedge, with a tankard of home-brew, watching television.

The statement that Lord Ickenham was watching television is perhaps calculated to mislead. His eyes, it is true, were directed at the screen, but what was going on there made no impression on his mind. His thoughts were elsewhere. He was reviewing the current crisis in his affairs.

Although it was his boast that the Ickenhams were not easily baffled, he could not conceal it from himself that the dislocation of his plans by the recent swan had left him in no slight quandary. With a bird as quick on the draw as that doing sentry-go there, bur ing the letter on the island was obviously n within the sphere of practical politics, ar with two Carlisles and a Cosmo Wisdo prowling around any alternative place for i bestowal would have to be a very safe one. is proof of the knottiness of the problem th in a moment of weakness he actually co sidered doing what he had tried to persua the skeptical Carlisles that he had done ar depositing the document with his bank.

A good deal shocked that he should eve for an instant have contemplated a policy s tame and unworthy of an Ickenham, h turned his attention to the television scree

They were doing one of those spy picture a repeat performance, and he was intereste to observe that the hero was in precisely th same dilemma as himself. Circumstances ha placed this hero—D'Arcy Scriven, of th Foreign Office—in possession of papers whicl if they fell into the hands of an unfriendl power, would make a third world war in evitable, and he was at the moment absolutel dashed if he could think how to hide ther from the international spies who were surgin around him. It was with a sympathetic ey that Lord Ickenham watched D'Arcy runnin about in circles and behaving generally lik a cat on hot bricks. He knew just how th poor chap felt.

Then suddenly he started, and sat up with jerk. "Egad!" he said.

"M'lord?" said Rupert Morrison.

"Nothing, my dear fellow," said Lor Ickenham. "Just egad."

As the saloon bar was open for saying ega in at that hour, Mr. Morrison made no furth comment. He jerked a thumb at the scree

"See what he's done?" he said, alluding t D'Arcy Scriven. "He wants to keep thos papers safe, so he's give 'em to his butler t take care of."

Lord Ickenham said yes, he had noticed.

"I call that clever. Never occurs to 'em tha the butler could have 'em," proceeded Mr Morrison, who had seen the drama the previ ous week, "so they keep after the fellow sam as before. They trap him in a ruined mill an chase him through the sewers, and all the tim he hasn't got the papers, the butler's got 'em Made me laugh, that did."

"I'm not surprised. Have you a telephon here? I wonder if I might use it for a moment," said Lord Ickenham.

Some minutes later, a fruity voice caresse his ear. Albert Peasemarch's mentor, Coggs had advised making the telephone-answerin voice as fruity as possible in the tradition o the great butlers of the past.

"Sir Raymond Bastable's residence. Si Raymond's butler speaking."

"Not the Albert Peasemarch there has bee so much talk about?"

"Oh, good evening, Mr. I. Do you wish t speak to Sir Raymond?"

"No, Bert, I wish to speak to you. I'm a the pub. Can you come here without delay?"

"Certainly, Mr. I."

"Fly like a youthful hart or roe over th hills where spices grow," said Lord Ickenham and presently the Beetle and Wedge's pic turesque saloon bar was made additionally glamorous by the presence of Albert Pease march and his bowler hat.

"Bert," said Lord Ickenham, when Ruper Morrison had supplied the ales he was license to sell and had withdrawn once more into th background, "I hated to have to disturb you after-dinner sleep, but I need you in my busi ness. Let me start the conversational bal rolling by asking you a question. Do you take an active interest in world politics?"

Albert Peasemarch considered this. "Not very active, Mr. I. What with cleaning the silver and brushing the dog ——"

"I know, I know. Your time is very full. Let me put it another way. You realize that there are such things as world politics and that a certain section of the community has the job of looking after them?"

"Oh, yes, Mr. I. Diplomats, they call them."

"Diplomats is right. Well, as I was about to say, the thing to bear in mind is that these diplomats can't get anywhere without papers. No, no," said Lord Ickenham, as his old

CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

NEXT MONTH

● Jonathan was a small boy, alone in an alien land, and very, very frightened. He could not understand why the Chinese Communists had taken his parents away, but he knew, somehow, that his father and mother were dead and could never come back to him. All he had now was the ball-point pen his mother had given him—that, and the ruby. Then kind Mr. Angus appeared and asked him to come to live with him in New York and be his son. So Jonathan sailed halfway around the world toward love and security—only to find himself facing a new kind of terror.

JONATHAN FOUND
By CECIL MAIDEN

complete in the May JOURNAL, condensed from the novel recently published by Thomas Y. Crowell Co.

Instantly your skin takes on a luscious new perfection . . . so velvety you don't even need powder!

Hours later your complexion still looks radiantly fresh. This amazing new liquid make-up never turns greasy!

Glamorous? The most!

Now—a really long-lasting liquid make-up

Its radiant glow never turns shiny . . . so velvety you don't even need powder!

Glow that lasts. Now—you'll never look faded again. Think of it—a beautifully flattering "cover-up" that stays fresh-tinted all day. New Angel Touch won't fade off . . . won't streak or muddy on your skin.

Luscious finish that clings! Now you'll never look shiny again. New Angel Touch is creamy-smoothing—but never greasy. No need to blot up extra oiliness with powder. Angel Touch stays velvety-fresh, lovely without powder.

Squeeze out one drop at a time! Now—no waste, no spilly mess. In heavenly new squeeze bottle that gives just the amount you want. Won't leak in your purse!

Stunning new squeeze bottle

6 "Love-light" shades 59¢ or $1.00 plus tax

POND'S

Angel Touch

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 142

friend mentioned that he always read the Daily Mirror at breakfast, "I don't mean that sort of paper, I mean documents. And you know what I mean when I say documents?"

"Secret documents?"

"Exactly. You follow me like a bloodhound. A diplomat must have secret documents, and he gives these secret documents to trusted underlings to take care of, warning them on no account to let any international spies get their hooks on them."

This seemed reasonable to Albert Peasemarch. "You mean if they got them, they would start ——"

"Precisely. Throwing their weight about like nobody's business and making a third world war inevitable."

"Coo!"

"Remember those chilly nights in the Home Guard? You wouldn't want to go through all that again, would you?"

"I certainly wouldn't."

"Nor I. Not even for the sake of hearing you sing Drake's Drum round the campfire. Another beer, Bert?"

"Thank you, Mr. I. Though I really shouldn't. I have to watch my figure."

"If the document now in my possession falls into the hands of the gang that are after it, you won't have any figure to watch. It'll be distributed in little pieces over the countryside."

To this Albert Peasemarch was prevented from replying by the arrival of Mr. Morrison, bringing up supplies. When the cupbearer had retired and he was able to speak, he did so in the awed voice of a man who is wondering if he can believe his ears.

"What was that, Mr. I.? Did you say you had a document in your possession?"

"You bet I have, Bert. I'm not sure if I ever mentioned to you, when we were comrades of the Home Guard, that I was in the Secret Service. Did I?"

"Not that I can recall, Mr. I."

"Probably slipped my mind. Well, I am, and not long ago the head man sent for me. 'Number X-3476,' he said—the boys call me Number X-3476—'you see this document. Top secret, if ever there was one. Guard it day and night,' he said."

Albert Peasemarch drank beer like a man in a trance. He was finding new horizons opening before him.

"These spies, Mr. I. Are there many of them?"

"More than you could shake a stick at. Professor Moriarty, Doctor Fu Manchu and The Ace of Spades, to name but three. And every one of them the sort of chap who would drop cobras down your chimney or lace your beer with little-known Asiatic poisons as soon as look at you. And the worst of it is that they have got onto that this document is in my possession, and it is only a question of time before they start chivvying me through the sewers."

"You won't like that."

"Exactly the feeling I had. And so, Bert," said Lord Ickenham, "I have decided that the only thing to do is to pass the document on to you and let you take care of it."

Albert Peasemarch was aware of a curious gulping sound. It was only after listening to this odd sound for a moment or two that he realized that it was he who was making it.

"You see the devilish cleverness of the idea, Bert. The blighters will be nonplused. When they chivvy me through the sewers, they'll just be chasing rainbows."

"But, Mr. I.!"

A look compounded of astonishment and incredulity came into Lord Ickenham's face. "Bert! Don't tell me you are faltering? No, no," said Lord Ickenham, his face clearing, "I know you better than that. We old Home Guarders don't draw back when we are asked to serve the country we love, do we? This is for England's sake, Bert."

Albert Peasemarch, having gulped again, said, "But I don't want to be chased through the sewers, Mr. I."

"You won't be. I'll attend to the sewer sequence. How on earth are they to know that you have got the thing?"

"You don't think they'll find out?"

"Not a chance."

That a struggle was going on in Albert Peasemarch's soul was plainly to be seen by anyone watching his moonlike face. Lord Ickenham waited anxiously for the referee's decision. It came after a long pause, in four words, spoken in a low, husky voice, similar in its intonation to a voice from the tomb.

"Very well, Mr. I."

"You'll do it? Splendid. I knew you wouldn't fail me. Well, it's no good me giving you the thing now, for the very walls have eyes, so I'll tell you how we'll work it. Where's your bedroom?"

"It's off my pantry."

"On the ground floor. Couldn't be better. I'll be outside your window at midnight on the dot. I will imitate the cry of the white owl—the white owl, remember, not the brown—and the moment you hear me hooting, you slip out and the document changes hands. It will be in a plain Manila envelope, carefully sealed. Guard it with your life, Bert."

Albert Peasemarch's manner betrayed a momentary uneasiness. "How do you mean, my life?"

"Just an expression. Well, that cleans it up, I think. And now I ought to be leaving you. We must not be seen together. Hark!" said Lord Ickenham. "Did you hear a low whistle? No? Then all is well. I thought for a moment those fellows might be lurking outside."

Albert Peasemarch's uneasiness increased. "You mean they're here, Mr. I.?"

"In dozens, my dear fellow, in positive droves. Still, it all adds to the spice of the thing, does it not?" said Lord Ickenham, and went out, leaving Albert Peasemarch staring with haggard eyes at the bottom of his empty tankard.

Pongo Twistleton, had he been present, would have understood this emotion. He, too, had often experienced that stunned feeling, as if the solid earth beneath his feet had disintegrated, which was so apt to come to those who associated with the fifth Earl of Ickenham. And Pongo, in Albert Peasemarch's place, would have pursued precisely the same policy which now suggested itself to the latter.

"Another of the same, please, Mr. M.," he said, and Rupert Morrison once more became the human St. Bernard dog.

The results were instantaneous—indeed, "magical" would scarcely be too strong a word. Until now, the chronicler has merely hinted at the dynamic properties of the Beetle and Wedge home-brew. The time has come to pay it the marked tribute it deserves. It ran like fire through Albert Peasemarch's veins and made a new man of him—an Albert Peasemarch filled to the brim with the spirit of adventure.

He had had his tankard refilled for the fourth time and was telling himself militantly that any spies who attempted to get fresh with him would do so at their own risk, when the door of the saloon bar opened and Johnny Pearce and Cosmo Wisdom came in.

It was obvious at a glance that neither was in festive mood. Johnny was thinking hard thoughts about his old schoolfellow, Norbury-Smith, and Cosmo was brooding on the letter, asking himself how it could be detached from Lord Ickenham's keeping. It was with distrait listlessness that they put in their order for home-brew.

Rupert Morrison delivered the elixir, and looked regretfully at the television set. D'Arcy Scriven had gone off the air ten minutes ago.

"You've missed the picture, Mr. Pearce," he said.

"What picture?"

"The spy picture that was on the TV just now. It's where this Foreign Office gentleman has these important papers," began Mr. Morrison, falling easily into his stride, "and these spies are after them, so he gives them to his butler ——"

"I saw it last week," said Johnny. "It was lousy. Absolute drivel." So much of his work had been turned down for television that he had become a stern critic of that medium.

"I agree with you, sir," said Mr. Morrison. Actually he had thoroughly enjoyed the picture, but an innkeeper has to suppress his private feelings and remember that the customer is always right. "Silly, I thought it. As if any gentleman would give an important paper to a butler to take care of. It just couldn't happen."

"Oh, couldn't it?" said Albert Peasemarch, rising—a little unsteadily—and regarding the speaker with a glazed but compelling eye.

It is only a man of exceptional self-restraint who is able to keep himself from putting people right when they begin talking ignorantly on subjects on which he happens to be well informed. Albert Peasemarch was not such a man. Knowing that these three were not international spies—in whose presence he would naturally have been more reticent—he had no compunction in intervening in the debate and speaking freely.

"Oh, couldn't it?" he said. "Shows what a fat lot you know about it, Mr. M. It may interest you to learn that a most important paper or document has been entrusted to me this very night by a gentleman who shall be nameless, with instructions to guard it with my life. And I'm a butler, aren't I? You should think before you speak, Mr. M. I will now," said Albert Peasemarch, "sing Drake's Drum."

And, having done so, he slapped his bowler hat on his head and took his departure, walking with care, as if along a chalk line.

The sun was high in the sky next day when Cosmo, approaching by a circuitous route, arrived at the back door of Hammer Lodge and walked in without ringing the bell. He was all eagerness for a word with Albert Peasemarch.

Where Johnny Pearce and Rupert Morrison, listening to Albert Peasemarch, had classified his observations as those of a butler who has had one over the eight, Cosmo had read between the lines of that speech of his. He had divined its inner significance. The nameless gentleman was Lord Ickenham and the paper or document the fatal letter.

He found Albert Peasemarch in his pantry having his elevenses, two hard-boiled eggs and a bottle of beer. Butlers always like to keep their strength up with a little something in the middle of the morning, and at the moment of Cosmo's entry Albert Peasemarch was finding his in need of all the keeping up it could get. The one defect of the Beetle and Wedge's home-brew is that its stimulus, so powerful over a given period, does not last. Albert Peasemarch, who on the previous night had gone out of the saloon bar like a lion, had come into his pantry this morning like a lamb, and a none too courageous lamb at that. His reaction to the sudden noise of Cosmo's "Good morning," spoken in his immediate rear, was to choke on a hard-boiled egg with a wordless cry and soar from his seat in the direction of the ceiling.

His relief on finding that it was not Professor Moriarty or The Ace of Spades who had spoken was extreme. "Oh, it's you, Mr. C.," he gasped.

"Just thought I'd look in for a chat," said Cosmo. "Do go on with your egg. Don't mind me."

It was the beer rather than the egg that appealed to Albert Peasemarch at the moment. He quaffed deeply, and Cosmo proceeded.

"You certainly pulled old Morrison's leg last night with that yarn of yours about the secret document," he said, chuckling. "He believed every word of it. Never suspected for a moment that you were just kidding him."

There was a pause, and during that pause, though it had lasted but an instant, Albert Peasemarch decided to tell all. He was in the overwrought state of mind that makes a man yearn for a confidant with whom he can share the burden that has been placed upon him, and if you cannot confide in the son of the woman you love, in whom can you confide?

"But I wasn't, Mr. C."

"Eh?"

"I wasn't kidding him."

Cosmo stared incredulously at Albert Peasemarch. "You don't mean it's true?"

"Every word of it."

"Well, I'm blowed!"

"It was like this, Mr. C. His lordship sent for me ——" When Albert Peasemarch had concluded his narrative, Cosmo went through the motion of twirling his lost mustache.

"I see," he said slowly. "So that's how it is. He's left you holding the baby. It looks to me as if you were in a bit of a spot."

Albert Peasemarch assented. That, he said, was how it looked to him too.

"I don't suppose these international spies stick at much."

"No, sir."

"If they get onto it that you've got that document, the mildest thing they'll do is shove lighted matches between your toes." Cosmo mused for a space. "Look here," he said, struck with a happy thought. "Why don't you give it to me?"

Albert Peasemarch stared. "You, sir?"

"It's the only way," said Cosmo. "Put yourself in the place of these spies. They'll soon find out old Ickenham hasn't got this document, and then they'll start asking themselves what he's done with it. They know you and he are friends."

"Old comrades. Home Guard."

"Exactly. It'll be obvious to them that he must have given the thing to you."

Albert Peasemarch spoke with an increase of animation, for the scheme was beginning to appeal to him. "I see what you mean, Mr. C. They'd never suspect that you had it."

"Of course they wouldn't. I hardly know old Ickenham. Is it likely he'd give important documents to a fellow who's practically a stranger? Where is the thing?"

"In my bedroom, sir."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

"The man who used to march twenty-five miles in pouring rain and sleep in muddy foxholes now has only to get his feet wet."

1. you take your bills out of the change purse even though you put them into the billfold

2. you carry a purse that's slimmer than ever yet it holds as much as the old-style bulky kind

© 1958 BUXTON INC., SPRINGFIELD, MASS

3. that's why the smart money is going into this new French Purse by Lady BUXTON

best for your money

AVAILABLE IN MATCHED SETS: FRENCH PURSE, $5. CONVERTIBLE® BILLFOLD,® $5. SNAP-TOP CIGARETTE CASE, $3.50. CIGARETTE LIGHTER, $2.50. CONTOUR® KEY-TAINER,® $2.95 ALL PRICES PLUS TAX.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 144

"The first place spies would look. Go and get it."

Albert Peasemarch went and got it. But though Cosmo extended a hand invitingly, he did not immediately place the envelope in it. "There's just one thing, Mr. C. I must have his lordship's permission."

"What!"

"Can't make a move like this without consulting his lordship. But it won't take a jiffy to step over to the hall and get his O.K. Five minutes at the outside."

It sometimes happens at the Beetle and Wedge that a customer, demanding home-brew and licking his lips at the prospect of getting it, is informed by the voice of doom, speaking in the person of Rupert Morrison, that he has already had enough and cannot be served. On such occasions the customer has the feeling that the great globe itself has faded, leaving not a rack behind, and that all is darkness, disillusionment and despair. Such a feeling came to Cosmo Wisdom now.

Was there, he asked himself desperately, no way out, no means of persuading this man to skip the red tape?

There was. Beside the remains of the two hard-boiled eggs there stood a pepper pot. To snatch this up and project its contents into Albert Peasemarch's face was with Cosmo the work of a moment. Then, leaving the suffering man to his sneezing, he shot out into the great open spaces, in his pocket the only proof that existed that he was not the author of Cocktail Time.

But in assuming that in the great open spaces he would be alone, he was mistaken. Scarcely had he reached them when a voice that might have been that of an ancient sheep spoke at his elbow. "Well met by moonlight, proud Wisdom," it bleated, and spinning on his axis, he perceived old Mr. Saxby.

"Oh, hullo," he said. "Nice morning, isn't it? The sun and all that. Well, good-by."

"Let us not utter that sad word," said Mr. Saxby. "Are you on your way to the hall? I will walk with you.

Had Cosmo been an ornithologist, he would have found the old gentleman's conversation absorbing. But, like so many of us, he could take meadow pipits or leave them alone, and it was with something of the feeling he had had when released from Brixton prison that at long last he saw the human porous plaster potter off on some business of his own.

It was in the hall of Johnny Pearce's ancestral home that this happened, and at the moment of Mr. Saxby's departure he was standing beside one of the comfortable, if shabby, armchairs which were dotted about in it. Into this he now sank. The nervous strain to which he had been subjected had left him dazed. So much so that it was several minutes before he realized that he ought not to be just sitting here; he should be acting. The letter was still in his pocket, undestroyed. He took it out and removed its Manila wrapping. First and foremost on the agenda was the putting of it to the flames.

There was a table beside the chair, on it an ash tray and matches. He reached for these and was in the very act of striking one, when he became aware of a wave of some exotic scent that seemed to proceed from behind him. Turning, he perceived Mrs. Gordon Carlisle, and with considerable emotion noted that she was holding, and in the act of raising, one of those small but serviceable rubber instruments known as coshes. At her side, on his face the contented look of one who feels that his efforts are in excellent hands, stood her husband.

It was almost immediately after this that the roof fell in, and Cosmo knew no more.

"Nice work, sweetie," said Mr. Carlisle, viewing the remains with satisfaction. "He isn't dead, is he?"

"Oh, I shouldn't think so."

"Just as well. Gimme the letter. And," added Oily urgently, "gimme that blackjack. Someone's coming."

"Slip 'em in your pocket."

"And have them frisk me and find them there? Talk sense."

Gertie's eyes flickered about the hall. "Look. Dump 'em in that thing over there," she told him.

She alluded to the imitation walnut cabinet, the legacy of Johnny Pearce's Great-Uncle Rupert, which had always so jarred on Lord Ickenham. Oily darted across the hall, opened and slammed one of the drawers, dusted his hands and returned just as Johnny appeared.

Johnny was on his way to get a breath of fresh air after a chat with Nannie Bruce about the new cook. He was in somber mood, having had his fill of Nannie Bruce and paying guests, and the sight of one of these apparently asleep in a chair would have left him uninterested, had not Cosmo at this moment slumped to the floor.

"What's all this?" he said—an observation which should more properly have been left to Police Constable McMurdo, who was down the passage, talking to Nannie.

Gertie was swift to supply the desired information. "My husband and I were passing through on our way to our room when he suddenly keeled over," she informed Johnny. "With a groan."

"More a gurgle, sweetie."

Johnny frowned darkly. Life these days, he was thinking, was just one thing after another. He raised his voice in a passionate bellow. "Nannie!"

Nannie Bruce appeared, followed by Officer McMurdo.

"Nannie, phone for Doctor Welsh. Tell him to come over right away. Mr. Wisdom's had a fit or something. And for heaven's sake, get a move on!"

Officer McMurdo looked at him with a wistful admiration. That was telling her, he felt. That was the way to talk to the other sex. Nannie Bruce, who did not hold this view, bridled.

"There is no necessity to shout at me, Master Jonathan. And I disagree with you when you say that Mr. Wisdom has had a fit. Look

Fashion... with an unforgettable feeling of comfort

BREEZE-COOL MESH. Beautiful designs in lacy, feminine mesh that are sheer flattery. Exquisite examples of the exciting new Arch Preservers now at your retailer's. All with the exclusive Arch Preserver comfort features you love. Most styles $16.95. Others $14.95 to $18.95

Selby
ARCH PRESERVER
Shoes

SELBY SHOE DIVISION OF THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

at the way he's lying, with his legs straight out. My Uncle Charlie suffered from fits, and he used to curl up in a ball." She went to where Cosmo lay, and ran an expert finger over his head. "This man," she said, "has been struck with a blunt instrument!"

"What?"

"There's a lump behind his ear as big as a walnut. It's a matter for the police, such," said Nannie Bruce, eying Officer McMurdo coldly, "as they are. Still, when you say telephone for Doctor Welsh, that's sense. I'll do it at once."

She departed with the dignity of a woman who does not intend to be ordered about but is willing to oblige, and long before she had disappeared Police Constable McMurdo's notebook was out and his pencil licked and poised.

"Ho!" he said. "The great thing here is to ascertain who's responsible for this."

Oily intervened in his suavest manner. "Officer, my wife has told you that as we were passing through the hall, we saw Mr. Wisdom ——"

"Keel over," said Gertie.

"Exactly, with a gurgle."

"Or groan."

"Not to me she didn't mention it."

"Ah, no, it was to Mr. Pearce before you came in. We both received the impression that he had had a fit."

"Then why isn't he curled up in a ball? And how do you account for the lump behind his ear?"

"That surely is very simply explained. He struck his head against the side of the chair as he was keeling over. It is far more probable ——"

There is something of woman in everything that pleases. DUPATY

What was far more probable he did not get around to mentioning, for at this moment Cosmo Wisdom stirred, groaned and sat up. He looked about him with what the poet has called a wild surmise, and said:

"Where am I?"

"Hammer Hall, Dovetail Hammer, Berks, sir," Officer McMurdo informed him. "If you'll just lie quiet the doctor will be here in a moment. You've had some kind of fit or seizure, sir. This gentleman, Mr. ——"

"Carlisle."

"This gentleman, Mr. Carlisle, was passing through the hall, accompanied by Mrs. Carlisle ——"

The mention of that name brought memory flooding back to Cosmo. He rose, clutched the chair with one hand, and with the forefinger of the other pointed accusingly.

"She hit me!"

"Sir?"

"That Carlisle woman. She hit me with a cosh. And," said Cosmo, feverishly through his pockets, "she and that blasted husband of hers have stolen a valuable paper from me. Grab them! Don't let them get away."

Oily's eyebrows rose. "Well, really, officer! One makes allowances for a sick man, but—well, really!"

Johnny Pearce's attention had been wandering. Aware now of raised voices, he came out of his reverie. "What's the argument?" he inquired.

Constable McMurdo brought him abreast. This gentleman here, he said, had made a statement charging that lady there with having biffed him on the napper with a cosh. It did not, he added, seem plausible to him.

Johnny looked at Gertie dubiously. It was Oily who saw the way of proving his loved one's innocence. "This is all very absurd," he said, "but the thing can be settled quite simply. If my wife struck Mr. Wisdom with a . . . what was the word you used, officer?"

"Cosh, sir."

"Thank you. I think you must mean what in my native country we call a blackjack. Well, if my wife struck Mr. Wisdom with an implement of this description, it is presumably either in her possession or mine. All that remains is for you to search me, officer. . . . You see," he said when the arm of the Law had apologetically done so, "not a thing! So we return to our original conclusion that Mr. Wisdom had a fit."

Police Constable McMurdo scratched his head. "Why wasn't he curled up in a ball?"

"Ah, there you take me into deep waters. No doubt this gentleman will be able to tell you," said Oily, as Nannie Bruce returned, ushering in Doctor Welsh with his black bag.

The hall emptied soon after Doctor Welsh's arrival. The doctor supported Oily's theory that Cosmo must have struck his head on the side of the chair, exercised his healing arts and, assisted by Johnny, helped the injured man to his room. Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle, confident that the walnut cabinet held their secret well, went up to theirs. When Lord Ickenham came in from the stroll he had been taking in the park, only Officer McMurdo was present. Lord Ickenham greeted him with his customary geniality.

"Ah, Cyril, old friend. A very hearty good morning to you, my merry constable. Or," he went on, peering more closely, "are you so dashed merry? You seem to have a stern official air. Has a crime wave broken out in these parts?"

Officer McMurdo was only too glad to confide in one for whose I.Q. he had a solid respect. "That's just what I'd like to ascertain, m'lord. Strange things have been happening at Hammer Hall. I still can't see why he wasn't curled up in a ball."

"I beg your pardon?"

"Mr. Wisdom, m'lord. When you have a fit, you curl up in a ball."

"Oh, do you? Nice to know the etiquette. But what makes you think that he had had a fit?"

"That's what the doctor said. He was lying on the floor with his legs straight out."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 149

Picture of a woman ironing her husband's shirts because he wears

Manhattan® MANSMOOTH®

the 100% Cotton Shirt that Needs No Ironing!

No pressing problems for this modern mother . . . she turned the ironing hour into the children's hour. After washing, MANSMOOTH shirts drip dry quickly, smoothly . . . fresh and ready to wear.

Her husband welcomes his MANSMOOTH shirts because they resist wrinkles all day long, thanks to the famous Rate of Recovery process. His enthusiasm for the comfort and convenience of these MANSMOOTH broadcloth shirts is understandable!

MANSMOOTH in fine broadcloth, colored chambray and oxford, $5.95 . . . TROPICAL MANSMOOTH, a lightweight open weave, $5.00. Her Lady Manhattan® MANSMOOTH shirt, $5.00.

P. S. If you prefer sending shirts to the laundry, MANSMOOTH is the only cotton wash 'n' wear shirt that has earned the American Institute of Laundering seal.

THE MANHATTAN SHIRT CO., 444 MADISON AVENUE, N. Y. 22

MANSTAY™ COLLAR permanently sewn-in stays...

PLASTIC TRAVEL HANGER ideal for perfect drip-drying

CONVERTIBLE CUFFS
wear them buttoned or with cuff links

LONG-WEARING SOFT COLLAR AND CUFFS for extra strength . . . smoother drip-dry results

© TMSC 1958

60 SECONDS WITH

SATURA

STARTS A YOUNGER LOOK

Five instant aids to youthful radiance from one great moisture cream.

1. Special elements catch dew from the air to shield against drying by wind and weather.
2. Estrogenic hormones help protect against age lines and sallowness with deep, under-surface moisturizing action.
3. Humidifying formula works directly toward a young and creamy smoothness.
4. Vitamin A guards against flaking indicative of a dry or aging skin.
5. Special emollients slow evaporation from the skin to counteract the lines of age.

Smooth on dewy, pink Satura every night, and use it regularly under make-up. Disappears instantly, starts working instantly. Cream $3.50 and $5. Lotion $5. In Canada, too.

For beauty the modern way...

Dorothy Gray

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 147

'Was he, indeed? Quaint fellows, these doc-
s. Never know what they'll be up to next."
'You misunderstand me, m'lord. It wasn't ctor Welsh that was lying on the floor, it s Mr. Wisdom. And Mr. Carlisle made a tement that—I've got it all in my note-ok—that he and Mrs. Carlisle was passing ough the hall and observed Mr. Wisdom l out of his chair and knock his head on the e of it, causing a lump behind the ear as big a walnut. Some sort of a fit, they thought.
t on regaining consciousness, Mr. Wisdom ued a statement, accusing Mrs. Carlisle of iking him on the napper with a cosh."
'What!"
'Yes, m'lord. Makes it sort of hard to sift evidence and arrive at conclusions, don't
"
He broke off, and his face, which had been e that of a bloodhound on the trail, as-ned the expression of a lovelorn sheep. nnie Bruce had entered. She gave him a ughty look, and addressed Lord Ickenham.
"Your lordship is wanted on the tele-one, m'lord. Sir Raymond Bastable from lodge. It's the third time this morning he's ng up, asking for your lordship."
As Lord Ickenham went down the passage
Johnny's study, where the telephone was, was conscious of a throbbing about the nples and a dazed feeling usually induced ly by the conversation of old Mr. Saxby.
ficer McMurdo's story had left him bewil-red. He took up the receiver, and jumped veral inches when a voice suggestive of a n at feeding time roared in his eardrum.
"Frederick! Where have you been all this ile?"
"Just out, Beefy," said Lord Ickenham ildly. "Roaming hither and thither and enying the lovely sunshine. I hear you've been ing to get me. What's your trouble?"
As far as could be gathered from aural evince, Sir Raymond appeared to be choking.
'll tell you what my trouble is! Do you ow what I saw in the paper this morning?"
"I think I can guess. It was in yesterday's ening paper."
"About Cocktail Time? About these people fering a hundred and fifty thousand for the cture rights?"
"Yes. It's a lot of money."
"A lot of money! I should say it was a lot money. And all going into that blasted osmo's pocket unless you do the decent ing, Frederick. For heaven's sake, give me at letter." Sir Raymond's voice had taken a pleading note. "You can't hold out on e. You must have heard from Phoebe that y behavior these last two weeks has been . . .
hat's the word?"
"Angelic?"
"Yes, angelic. Ask Peasemarch if I've once much as raised my voice to her. Ask anyody."

No need to institute inquiries, Beefy. It is l over Dovetail Hammer that your attitude here Phoebe is concerned has been that of ne brushing flies off a sleeping Venus. But ill this happy state of things last?"
"Of course it will."
"I have your word for that as a man of onor?"
"Certainly."
"How about your political career?"
"Blast my political career! I don't want a olitical career. I want a hundred and fifty housand dollars."
"All right, Beefy. The money's yours. Go nd fetch Albert Peasemarch and put him on ne phone."
"Do what?"
"So that I can tell him to hand that letter ver to you. I had to put it in his charge. Ring p again when you've got him. I don't want to it here holding the instrument."
Lord Ickenham hung up and went back to he hall, hoping for further conversation with Officer McMurdo. But the constable had van-shed. The only occupant of the hall was old Mr. Saxby, who was sitting in the chair re-ently vacated by Cosmo. He regarded Lord ckenham with the eye of a benevolent cod-ish.
"Ah, Scriventhorpe," he said. "Nice to run nto you. Have you seen Flannery lately?"
"I'm afraid I haven't."
"Indeed? And how was he looking? Well, I hope? Is this your first visit to Hammer Hall?"
"No, I often come here. Johnny Pearce is my godson."
"I used to be somebody's godson once, but many years ago. He has a nice place."
"Very."
"And some nice things. But I don't like that imitation-walnut cabinet."
"It's an eyesore, of course. Johnny's getting rid of it."
"Very sensible of him," Saxby said. "You remember what Flannery always says about fake antiques."
Before Lord Ickenham was able to learn what that mystic man's views were on the subject, Nannie Bruce appeared.
"Sir Raymond Bastable on the telephone, m'lord."
"Oh, yes. Excuse me."
It is doubtful if even Miss Bruce's Uncle Charlie, at the peak of one of his celebrated fits, could have exhibited a greater agitation than did Sir Raymond Bastable on this second installment of his telephone conversation with his half brother-in-law. His visit to Albert Peasemarch's pantry, where that unfortunate stretcher case was still sneezing, had left him heavy-laden, stricken and crushed. It is not easy for a man who is sneezing to tell a story well, but Albert Peasemarch had told his well enough to enable Sir Raymond to grasp its import, and it had affected him like a bomb explosion. This, he said to Lord Ickenham, after he had informed him in a flood of molten words what he thought of his nephew Cosmo, was the end.
"The end," he repeated, choking on the words. "The young fellow must have burned the thing by now."
It was probably injudicious of Lord Ickenham to tell him at this moment not to worry, judging from the sounds proceeding from the Bastable end of the wire. But there were solid reasons for his doing so. In a flash he had divined the thought behind Mrs. Carlisle's apparently inexplicable behavior in busting Cosmo Wisdom one with her cosh.
"Listen," he said, and started to place the facts before his relative by marriage. When he had finished, there was a pause occupied by Sir Raymond in making a sort of gargling noise.
"You mean," he said, becoming articulate, "that that bounder Carlisle has the letter?"
"Exactly. So now everything's fine."
There was another pause. Sir Raymond appeared to be praying for strength. "Fine?" he said, in a strange low, husky voice. "Did you say fine?"
"I did. He will be coming to see you about it shortly, I imagine, so what I want you to do, Beefy, is to step out into the garden and gather some frogs. About half a dozen. To put down the back of his neck," explained Lord Ickenham. "I shall be vastly surprised if after the third, or possibly fourth, frog has started to do the rock 'n' roll on it, he is not all eagerness to transfer the letter to you. Years ago, when I was a child, a boy named Percy Wilberforce threatened that unless I gave him my all-day sucker he would put frogs down my back. He got it F.O.B. in about three seconds. Even then I was about as intrepid as they come, but I could not face the ordeal. Off you go, Beefy, and start gathering. Put them in a paper bag," said Lord Ickenham, and returned to the hall.
He found Mr. Saxby pottering about in the vicinity of the walnut cabinet.
"Ah, Scriventhorpe. I've been having a look at this thing, and I found something odd in one of the drawers. You don't happen to know what this is?"
Lord Ickenham looked at the object he was holding up, and started. "It's a cosh."
"Cosh, did you say?"
"That's right."
"The word is new to me. Most interesting. By the way, I also found this letter addressed to Bastable."
Lord Ickenham drew a deep breath. "May I look at it?" he said, his voice shaking a little. "Thank you. Yes, you're quite right. It is addressed to Bastable. Perhaps I had better take charge of it. I shall be seeing him soon and can give it to him."
"A letter of Flannery's once turned up inside the Christmas turkey."
"Indeed? Strange things happen in this disturbed postwar era, do they not? Excuse me," said Lord Ickenham. "I have to telephone."
It was Phoebe who answered his ring. "Oh, hullo, Phoebe," he said. "Is Raymond there?"
"He went out into the garden, Frederick. Shall I fetch him?"
"No, don't bother. Just give him a message. Tell him to stop gathering frogs."
"There must be something wrong with this wire," Phoebe told him. "You sound as if you were telling me to tell Raymond to stop gathering frogs."
"I am."
"Is he gathering frogs?"
"He told me he was going to."
"But why is he gathering frogs?"
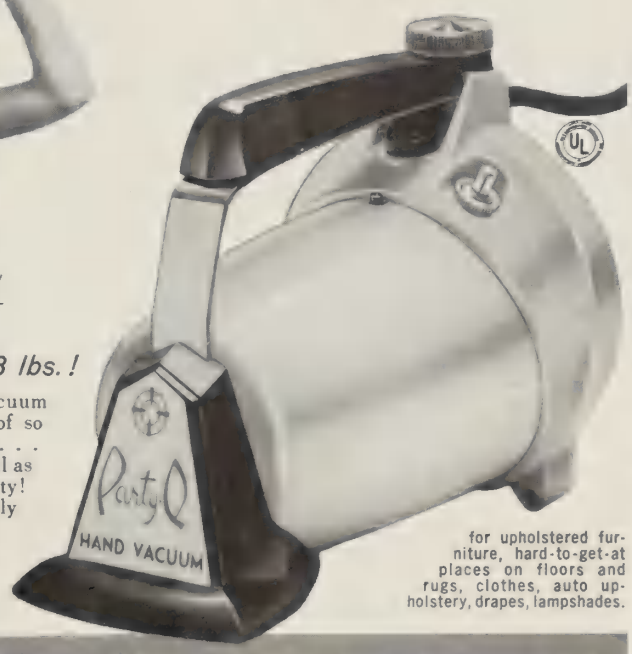
"Ah, who can say? These eccentric barristers, you know. Probably just felt a sudden urge. Good-by, Phoebe. Where are you at the moment?"
"I'm in Raymond's study."
"Well, don't forget that Albert Peasemarch worships the very carpet you are standing on," said Lord Ickenham.
He was humming a gay snatch of melody as he replaced the receiver, for there was no room for doubt in his mind that all things were working together for good. Something attempted, something done; he had earned a mild cigar, and he was smoking it on the drive and thinking how pleasant it was to be away from Mr. Saxby when he found that he was not. The old gentleman came pottering along, having apparently popped up through a trap.
"Oh, Scriventhorpe."
"Hullo, Saxby. I was just saying to myself how nice it would be if you were with me."
"I have been looking for you, Scriventhorpe. I thought it would interest you to hear —— A water ouzel!"
"Worth hearing, are they, these water ouzels?"
"There is a water ouzel over there. I must go and look at it in a moment. What I started to say was that I thought it would interest you to hear that that beastly walnut cabinet has gone. A couple of men came and took it away after you left. I understand it is to be put up for auction."
Lord Ickenham started. "Put up for auction, eh?"
"So they told me. But I doubt if anyone in his senses would give more than a pound or two for it," said Mr. Saxby, and toddled away, binoculars in hand, to look at his water ouzel.
As a rule, men whom old Mr. Saxby relieved of his company were conscious of a wave of relief, but Lord Ickenham hardly noticed that he had gone. His whole attention was riveted on a picture which had risen before his mind's eye, the picture of Beefy and Gordon Carlisle bidding against each other for the imitation-walnut cabinet, the proceeds of the winning bid to go to Jonathan Twistleton Pearce, that impoverished young man who had to have three hundred pounds in order to get rid of Nannie so he could marry his Belinda. He was confident that considerably more than three hundred of the best and brightest would accrue to Jonathan Twistleton Pearce's bank account.
Though there are, of course, drawbacks to everything. In order to achieve this desirable end it would be necessary for him to depart a little from the truth and inform Beefy that the letter was in the cabinet, but an altruist whose mission it is to spread sweetness and light is entitled to allow himself a certain license.

The auction sale was to be held in the village hall, and after lunch on the big day Lord Ickenham, in order to avoid old Mr. Saxby, had taken his cigar to his godson's study. Johnny, his objective a heart-to-heart talk with Belinda Farringdon, had gone up to London.
It was cool and peaceful in the study, but on the fifth earl's face, as he sat there, a frown might have been observed. He was thinking of Beefy Bastable, that luckless toy of fate who—for one of his wealth and determination could not fail to outbid Oily Carlisle at their coming contest—would shortly be parting with several hundred pounds for an imitation-walnut cabinet worth perhaps fifty shillings.
Lord Ickenham could see clearly enough that it was necessary to sacrifice Beefy for the good of the cause, but that did not mean that he had to be happy about it. To distract himself from his sad thoughts, he picked up the copy of that morning's Daily Gazette which Johnny had left lying on the floor. His attention was arrested by one of those large headlines in which this periodical specialized.

REFERENCE Library



OUTDOOR FIREPLACE

What could be nicer on balmy summer evenings than a cook-out in your back yard? Our pattern tells you how to construct an outdoor fireplace from brick, stone or rammed earth—and if you start now and make it a family project, it will be all finished and ready for the barbecue season. It stands 7′ high and has a grill 12″x25″ so there is plenty of room for keeping several orders of hamburgers browning at one time. Flat surfaces on either side provide handy work space for utensils and serving. Ask for pattern No. 1883, and send 25c* to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. *Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

Household Chores... A PLEASURE

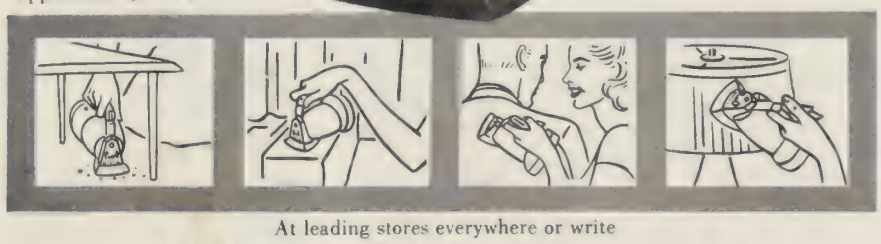
with PARTY-Q
HAND VACUUM CLEANER



The handiest NEW home appliance
... only 3 lbs.!

The Party-Q Hand Vacuum takes the drudgery out of so many household chores . . . saves so much time! Small as your iron. No bag to empty! No filters to change! Fully guaranteed air-cooled motor. A joy to own... a wonderful all-occasion gift every woman will appreciate. $19.95 for upholstered furniture, hard-to-get-at places on floors and rugs, clothes, auto upholstery, drapes, lampshades.

At leading stores everywhere or write PARTY-Q CORPORATION 601 West 26th Street, New York 1, N. Y.

Can't Use MILK????

If for any reason you cannot use regular milk, don't miss all its pleasures and benefits! Join the thousands who have discovered a new, highly nutritious all-vegetable milk—Soyamel® —an instant powder. A delicious drink! Fine in recipes! Has no allergy reactions. Trial 12-ounce can $1.00 ppd. in U.S. (money back if not satisfied). Worthington Foods, Inc., Worthington, Ohio

FOR ONLY 5¢ A DAY MOST WOMEN RESTORE
SPLITTING NAILS WITH KNOX Gelatine

The ONE way shown by medical research and the experience of millions—drinking one daily 5¢ envelope (115-120 grains) of Knox Unflavored Gelatine in bouillon, fruit juice or water. No need for expensive, unproved capsules. Directions in package. Ask your doctor about helping brittle nails with Knox.

TO DOCTORS: For reprints of clinical reports published in medical journals, write Knox Gelatine, Johnstown, N.Y.

AT YOUR GROCER'S

©1958 Knox Gelatine Co.

New DANDRICIDE Rinse Stops Dandruff Longer Than Any Shampoo or Tonic
... or your money back!

Shampoos or tonics merely dissolve dandruff scales, only to have them return in a few days. New Dandricide rinses loose dandruff OUT, really cleans the scalp, fights the fast return of unsightly, itchy dandruff as no shampoo or tonic can!

Concentrated to last longer! Easy to use!

Because it's concentrated, you get 12 Dandricide rinses in a $1.00 bottle. Just mix with water as directed, rinse and that's all! Good for men, women and teen-agers.

Get Dandricide at beauty and barber shops, drug and department stores. $1.00 bottle lasts for months! Dandricide is money-back guaranteed to keep dandruff away longer than any shampoo or tonic you have ever used. Buy a bottle today!

For trial bottle of Dandricide, mail your name and address plus 25¢ to Dandricide Co., Dept. LH4, 114-12th Street, Brooklyn 15, N. Y. and you will receive a generous three-rinse size bottle. Do it now!

$1.00 For a 3 months supply

FRANK, FORTHRIGHT, FEARLESS

it said, and beneath this:

COCKTAIL TIME
Our Powerful New Serial
BY COSMO WISDOM

Begin It Today

"Cor lumme, stone the crows!" whispered Lord Ickenham, borrowing from Albert Peasemarch's noncopyright material. The scales had fallen from his eyes.

Until this moment it had never occurred to him to regard Cosmo Wisdom in the light of a potential bidder for the cabinet. He had supposed him to be, if not penniless, certainly several-hundred-poundsless. It was obvious that he must now revise this view. He knew little of the prices prevailing in the marts of literature, but it was to be presumed that for a serial as frank, forthright and fearless as Cocktail Time a paper like the Gazette would have loosened up on a pretty impressive scale. Cosmo, in other words, was plainly in the chips.

What, then, could be a happier thought than to substitute the opulent young man for Beefy?

Scarcely had he reached this most satisfactory solution of his problem when, glancing out the French window, he saw the young man in person. He was pacing the terrace with bent head and leaden feet, like a Volga boatman. And if anyone might excusably have impersonated a Volga boatman, it was Cosmo Wisdom at this juncture. Behind his left ear there was a large lump, extremely painful if he made any sudden movement. But far worse than physical distress was the mental anguish caused by the thought that the letter which meant everything to him was now in the custody of Oily Carlisle. It is scarcely to be wondered at that when he heard a voice call his name and, raising his head, saw Lord Ickenham beaming at him from the study window, his manner was not cordial. It was, indeed, rather like that of a timber wolf with its foot in a trap.

"Come in here for a moment, will you, Cosmo?" Lord Ickenham said. "I want to speak to you."

"What about?"

"Nothing that can be shouted from the housetops or yelled on terraces. I won't keep you long," said Lord Ickenham. "It's about that letter."

Cosmo's scowl darkened. "Well, you're wasting your time. I haven't got it."

"I am aware of that. Mr. Carlisle has it."

"Curse him!"

"Certainly, if you wish. I don't like the fellow myself. We must baffle that man, Cosmo, before he can start throwing his weight about. He must be foiled and frustrated."

"A fat lot of good saying that," said Cosmo. "How can I foil and frustrate him?"

"Listen attentively, and I will tell you."

The effect of Lord Ickenham's brief résumé of the position of affairs on Cosmo was to cause him to start convulsively. "You mean the letter's in that cabinet?"

"Carlisle certainly put it there."

"And it's up for auction?"

"Precisely."

"I'll go and bid for it!"

"Exactly what I was about to suggest. You will, of course, have to be prepared to bid high. Carlisle is not going to let the thing go without a struggle. How is your voice?"

"Eh?"

"Say 'mi-mi.' . . . Excellent," said Lord Ickenham. "Like a silver bell. The auctioneer will hear your every word. So off you go. Bid till your eyes bubble, my boy, and may heaven speed your efforts."

And now, he was saying to himself as Cosmo hurried away, to find some simple ruse which would remove Beefy from the center of things. The village hall must not see Beefy this summer afternoon.

It was seldom that Lord Ickenham sought for inspiration in vain. Why, of course, he was thinking a few moments later. Y-e-s, that would do it. How simple these things always were, if you just sat back and closed your eyes and let the little gray cells take over. It needed but a quick telephone call to Albert Peasemarch, instructing him to lock Beefy up in the wine cellar, and the situation would be stabilized.

He was about to reach for the instrument, glowing as men do when their brains are working well, when it rang its bell. He took up the receiver.

"Hullo?" he said.

It was Phoebe who replied. As nearly always, she appeared agitated. "Oh, Frederick!" she said, panting like a white rabbit heated in the chase.

"Hullo, Phoebe, my dear," said Lord Ickenham. "What's the matter? You seem upset."

There was a brief pause while she seemed to contemplate the adjective, weighing it as Roget might have done if someone had suggested admitting it into his thesaurus.

"Well, not upset exactly. But I don't know if I am standing on my head or my heels."

"Sift the evidence. At which end of you is the ceiling?"

"Oh, don't be silly, Frederick. You know what I mean. Oh, dear, I do hope Cossie will approve of this step I'm taking. I mean, it isn't as if I were a young girl. I'm nearly fifty, Frederick. He may think it odd."

"That you are joining the chorus at the Hippodrome?"

"Whatever are you talking about?"

"Isn't that what you are trying to tell me?"

"Of course it isn't. I'm going to marry again."

The receiver jumped in Lord Ickenham's hand. "Bert?" he exclaimed. "Has Bert at last cast off his iron restraint and spoken? Are you going to be Lady Peasemarch?"

"Mrs. Peasemarch."

"For a while, no doubt, yes. But a man of Bert's abilities is bound to get knighted sooner or later. My dear Phoebe, this is news to warm the cockles of the heart. What does Raymond think of the proposed union?"

"We haven't told him yet. Albert thought it would be better if he finished his month first."

"Very sensible. It will save Beefy a lot of embarrassment. It's always difficult for a man to be really at his ease with his butler, if he knows the latter is engaged to be married to his sister. Tell me how it all happened."

"Well, I had gone to Albert's pantry to talk to him about poor little Benjy, who is ever so much better, you will be glad to hear. And we got talking, and something Albert said made me think of Raymond. I don't mean I've ever not thought of Raymond, but this something Albert said reminded me of what you had said the other day, about him not having got all his marbles."

"I said he had got all his marbles."

"Oh, did you? I thought you said he hadn't, and it worried me terribly. And I couldn't help it. I broke down and sobbed. And the next thing I knew, Albert was striding up to me and seizing me by the wrist and pulling me about till I felt quite giddy. And then he said 'My mate!' and clasped me to him and ——"

"—— showered burning kisses on your upturned face?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 152

A RED HERRING

The herring was long a staple in the diet of many peoples. Fish that were salted and sun-dried turned dark, while those that were smoke-cured took on a reddish cast.

Landsmen developed a novel use for it. Young hounds had to be trained before they could be effective in hunting; by dragging a pungent fish across country, it was easy to lay a scent for trial runs. So when an animal was diverted from the trail of a fox by some false clue, he was said to follow a red herring. So the name of the smoked fish came to stand for any misleading information or device to throw one off the track.

WEBB B. GARRISON

so good in glass

. . . because glass is so pure it protects the full strength of so many work savers. Because clean, clear glass lets you see the contents . . . just one glance tells you how much remains safely sealed in the glass container. That's why laundry aids—and hundreds of other things we use each day—come packaged in sparkling glass.

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVE., NEW YORK

Now...for the first time

A special laxative for women!

- Regulates without "forcing"
- Works more naturally
- Ideal for a woman's delicate system

Correctol is an entirely new type of laxative...developed especially for you and your delicate system!

Old-fashioned laxatives work by "forcing." Correctol works differently! Even during menstruation, in pregnancy, after childbirth, it gives relief more naturally than any laxative ever before. And women past middle age get the same sure, gentle relief.

The secret of Correctol is a non-laxative miracle regulator—with a wonderful action that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains a small amount of mild laxative—just enough to give regularity a start.

The next time constipation troubles you, try new Correctol. Get the fast relief you want and need—in a gentle, more natural way. Now at all drug stores. 30 tiny pink tablets, only $1.00.

Correctol®

the first laxative especially for feminine use

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ALSO AVAILABLE EVERYWHERE IN CANADA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 150

"Yes. He told me later that something seemed to snap in him."

"I believe that often happens. Well, I couldn't be more pleased, Phoebe. You have done wisely in linking your lot with Bert's. Instinct told you you were on a good thing, and you very sensibly pushed it along. The ideal husband. Where is Bert, by the way? In his pantry?"

"I think so. He was giving Benjy beef extract."

"Will you bring him to the phone? I would have speech with him."

"You want to congratulate him?"

"That, of course. But there is also a little business matter I would like to discuss with him. Just one of those things that crop up from time to time. . . . Oh, Bert," said Lord Ickenham some moments later, "I've been hearing the great news. Felicitations by the jugful, my old comrade, and a million wishes for your future happiness. I suppose you're walking on air and strewing roses from your bowler hat?"

"I do feel extremely grateful for my good fortune, Mr. I."

"I bet you do. There's nothing like getting married. It's the only life, as Brigham Young and King Solomon would tell you, if they were still with us. I wonder if plighting your troth has affected you as plighting mine many years ago affected me. I wanted to go about doing acts of kindness to everybody I met."

"Oh yes, Mr. I., I feel just like that."

"Splendid! Because there's a little routine job I would like you to do for me. Will your future wife be on the premises during the next hour or so?"

"I shouldn't think so, Mr. I. She was going off to this sale in the village hall, and wasn't expecting to get back too soon."

"Excellent. Then there will be no one to hear his cries."

"Cries, Mr. I.?"

"The big chief's. I want you to lock him up in the wine cellar, Bert, and I imagine he'll shout a good deal. You know how people do, when you lock them in wine cellars."

"Do what to Sir Raymond, did you say?"

"Lock him in the wine cellar. I wouldn't call him Sir Raymond, though, now that you are linked to him in such sentimental bonds. It's time you were thinking of him as Ray or Beefy. Well, that's all, Bert. Carry on."

"But, Mr. I.!"

Lord Ickenham frowned. Wasted, of course, on a Peasemarch who could not see him.

"You have a rather annoying habit, Bert, when I ask you to do some perfectly simple thing, of saying, 'But, Mr. I.,'" he said a little stiffly. "It's just a mannerism, I know, but I wish you wouldn't. What's on your mind?"

"Well, the question it occurred to me to ask was ——"

"Yes?"

"Why do you want me to lock Sir Raymond in the wine cellar?"

Lord Ickenham clicked his tongue. "Never mind why. You know as well as I do that the Secret Service can't give reasons for every move it makes. If I were to tell you why, and it got about through some incautious word of yours, a third world war would be inevitable. And I seem to remember you saying that you were opposed to the idea of a third world war."

"Oh, I am, Mr. I. I wouldn't like it at all. But ——"

"That word again!"

"But what I was going to say was, how do I go about it?"

"My dear fellow, there are a hundred ways of luring a man into a wine cellar. Tell him you would like his opinion on the last lot of claret. Ask him to come and inspect the ginger ale, because you're afraid the moths have been at it. That part of the thing presents no difficulty. And the locking in will be perfectly simple. You just shimmer off while his back is turned and twiddle the key. A child of four could do it. Snap into it, Bert, and give me a ring when you're through."

It was some ten minutes later that the telephone bell rang. When Albert Peasemarch spoke, it was in the subdued voice of a nervous novice who has just done his first murder.

"Everything has been attended to, Mr. I."

"He's in storage?"

"Yes, Mr. I."

"Capital! It wasn't so hard, was it?"

"Not hard, no."

"But it has taken it out of you a little, no doubt," said Lord Ickenham sympathetically. "Well, go and lie down and have a nice nap."

Albert Peasemarch coughed. "What I was thinking I'd do, Mr. I., was take the bus to Reading and catch the train to London, and spend the next week or two there. I would prefer not to encounter Sir Raymond until some little time has elapsed."

"From what you were able to gather through the closed door, he seemed annoyed, did he?"

"Yes, Mr. I."

"I can't imagine why. I know dozens of men who would think it heaven to be locked in a wine cellar. Still, no doubt you're right. Time, the great healer, and all that sort of thing. Then this is good-by for the moment, Bert. A thousand thanks for your service and co-operation. And if you're in London long enough, I'll look you up and we'll have a night out together."

Well pleased, Lord Ickenham replaced the receiver and went on to the terrace. He had been there a few minutes, finishing his cigar and enjoying the peace of the summer afternoon, when a car came by and drew up at the front door. The occupant alighted, and he saw that it was Barbara Crowe.

Lord Ickenham would probably have been deeply offended if he had been told that in any circumstances his mind could run on parallel lines with that of Cosmo Wisdom, but it is undoubtedly the fact that the sight of Barbara Crowe set him thinking, as Cosmo had done, what a consummate ass Raymond Bastable had been to let this woman go. In her sports dress, with the little green hat, she was looking more attractive than ever, and nothing could have been more warming to the heart than the smile she gave him as he hailed her.

"Why, Freddie," she said, "what on earth are you doing here?"

"I am staying with Johnny Pearce, my godson, while my wife is in Scotland, visiting some frightful people who knew her as a child. What brings you to these parts?"

"I've come to see Cosmo Wisdom about making some appearances on television. And Howard Saxby, Jr., wants me to bring Howard Saxby, Sr., back. This place of your godson's is a kind of pub, isn't it?"

"Johnny takes in paying guests, yes."

"I'd better book a room."

"Plenty of time. I want to talk to you, Barbara. What I was hoping, when I saw you get out of that car," said Lord Ickenham, having settled her in a deck chair and dropping into one himself, "was that you had come to see Beefy."

Barbara Crowe started. "Raymond? Is he here?"

"Not actually. He lives at the lodge across the park. We might look in on him later. Not just now, for I know he will be occupied for the next hour or so."

Barbara's cheerful face lost some of its cheerfulness. "This is a bit awkward."

"Why?"

"He'll think I'm pursuing him."

"Of course he will, and a very good thing too. It will give him the encouragement he sorely needs. He'll say to himself, 'Well, dash my buttons, I thought I'd lost her, but if she comes legging it after me like this, things don't look so sticky, after all.' Why," asked Lord Ickenham, "do you laugh in that hollow, hacking way?"

"Well, don't you think it's funny?"

"Not in the least. What's funny?"

"The idea you seem to have that Raymond still cares for me."

"My dear girl, he's potty about you."

"What nonsense. He's never been near me or phoned me or written to me since . . . it happened."

"Of course he hasn't. You don't realize what a sensitive plant Beefy is. He would assume that when you gave him the old heave-ho it meant that you didn't want to have any more to do with him, and, though it was agony, he kept away. He should have known

EFFIGY

An effigy, in the original meaning of the word, is something "fashioned" or made to "feign" or represent something else. In modern usage it usually denotes a solid form of a human figure. In the medieval world, when a king or great person died, his likeness, fully dressed as in life, in all his ceremonial attire and decorations, would be carried in the funeral procession, and afterward set up in the proper church. A month at least of this post-mortem glamour was allowed to English kings and queens in Westminster Abbey. In Seville, at the Easter fiesta, a life-sized Virgin is carried in solemn procession, clad in her million-dollar wardrobe of jewels and brocade, to receive the homage of the multitude.

It is uncertain just when or where began the contrasting custom of exposing to public scorn and vituperation the well-known semblance of a familiar individual, usually as an ignominious figure stuffed with straw and carried abroad to the accompaniment of raucous and ribald clamor, to be finally hanged or burned. In England, Guy Fawkes is still being reviled and executed on his anniversary. In some Latin countries in Holy Week, Judas Iscariot is dragged through the streets, scourged, mutilated and burned. Benedict Arnold has been in similar fashion publicly dishonored at many an early Fourth of July celebration. Other American political leaders have suffered the same sort of public recognition.

Effigies of unfaithful wives have played some part as objects of social disapproval. It is told of a French nobleman who had a too-generous wife that he had, posted about his estate, a whole line of ironically lifelike masculine shapes.

To make use of an image or representation as the object of emotion is as old as primitive magic which has been universally known and practiced from remotest antiquity. According to this old way of thought, there always exists a vital and mysterious relation between an actual living being and his shape or effigy, especially if bits of the real person's hair, nails or other parts can be incorporated into the semblance. So it follows that an enemy can be maimed, sickened, tortured or killed by inflicting violence upon his image. A clay or wax figure, pierced with arrows, thorns or nails, or melted in the fire, can bring suffering or death to its original. Japanese girls, if jilted, are said to have nailed little straw shapes of their faithless lovers to a sacred tree, then day by day adding another nail, they day by day shortened the traitor's life. In India, an arrow in the heart of a clay portrait could end the life of a foe.

Modern civilization is supposed to be free from such primitive forms of superstition, but vestiges of them remain in rural or provincial regions. Only recently, on our own American continent, two different effigy burnings have been reported in the newspapers, both in protest against racial injustice. And still today wax puppets, stabbed with pins, are being melted down in the fire of deathless hatred.

MARY K. BLACKMAR

t little or no importance is to be attached these lovers' tiffs. . . . That hacking laugh in! What amuses you?"

"Your calling it a tiff."

"I believe that is the expression commonly d. If it wasn't a tiff, what was it?"

"A terrific row. A pitched battle, which culnated in my calling him a pompous old ffed shirt."

Lord Ickenham weighed this. "I wouldn't e thought Beefy would have objected to t. He must know that he is a pompous old ffed shirt."

Barbara Crowe blazed into sudden fury. "e isn't anything of the sort! He's a lamb."

"That is your considered opinion?"

"Yes, Frederick Altamont Cornwallis istleton, that is my considered opinion."

Lord Ickenham gave a satisfied nod. "So, as Inspected, the flame of love still burns!"

"Yes, it does."

"Well, my dear Barbara, this is extremely tifying. If that's how things are at your l, we ought to be able to fix this up in no e in a manner agreeable to all parties. I ew, of course, that Beefy loved you. That bit of his, when he thinks he is alone, of ying his face in his hands and muttering rbara! Barbara!'"

"He always called me 'Baby.'"

Lord Ickenham started. "Beefy did?"

"Yes."

"Well, you know best. I wouldn't have ught —— But that is neither here nor re. Then no doubt it was 'Baby! Baby!' t he was muttering. The salient point is that muttered. Well, I must everything looks pretty ooth now."

"Not so simple as you nk."

"What seems to be the ficulty?"

"The difficulty, my dear eddie," Barbara Crowe d him, "is that he is determined that Phoebe shall are our little nest, and I'm ually determined that she an't. That's the real rock we split on."

"He wanted Phoebe to live with you?"

"Yes. There's a parsimonious streak in ymond. I suppose it comes from having en so hard up when he was starting at the r. When I suggested that our married life uld run much more smoothly if he gave oebe a couple of thousand a year and told r to go off and take a flat in Kensington, or hatever she fancied, he said he couldn't posly afford it. And, as they say, one word led another. Do you ever lose your temper, eddie?"

"Very seldom," Lord Ickenham told her. 'm the equable type."

"I wish I were. When moved, I spit and atch. He kept saying things like 'We must practical' and 'Women never realize that en are not made of money,' and I couldn't ke it. That was when I called him a pompus old stuffed shirt. . . . Yes?" said Barbara ldly. "Why are you laughing in that hollow, cking way?"

"I doubt if those are the right adjectives to scribe my little ripple of mirth. I laughed cause it always entertains me to see people ssing, as Albert Peasemarch would say, hen there is no necessity."

"No necessity?"

"None whatever."

"God bless you, Frederick Ickenham. And ho is Albert Peasemarch?"

"An intimate friend of mine. What will obably interest you most is the fact that he ll very shortly be marrying Phoebe."

"What!"

"Yes. They fixed it up this afternoon."

"He's marrying Phoebe?"

"He is. This surprises you?"

"Well, it isn't everybody who would want to arry Phoebe, is it? Who is this humble hero?"

"Beefy's butler. Or perhaps, after what he as saying to me on the telephone just now, I ould put an 'ex' before the word. He rather ggested that he was leaving."

"Phoebe's marrying a butler?"

"Somebody's got to, or the race of butlers ould die out. And Bert will be a notable improvement on the late Algernon Wisdom. . . . You spoke?"

"I said, 'Quick, Freddie—your handkerchief!'"

"Cold in the head?"

"Crying. Tears of joy. Oh, Freddie, this solves everything."

"Things have a way of getting solved when an Ickenham takes a hand in them."

"You mean, you worked it? Freddie, I'm going to kiss you."

"There is nothing I would enjoy more, but if you will glance over your shoulder you will see that we are about to have Howard Saxby, Sr., with us. This frequently happens here. . . . Hullo, Saxby."

"Ah, Scriventhorpe."

"Cigarette?"

"No, thank you," said Mr. Saxby, taking needles and a ball of wool from his pocket. "I would prefer to knit. I'm roughing out a sweater for my little grandson. An ambitious project, but I think something ought to come of it."

"That's the spirit. Here's Barbara Crowe."

"So I see. It's an extraordinary thing. I was saying to myself, as I came up, 'That woman has quite a look of Barbara Crowe.' I understand now why there was such a resemblance. What are you doing here, Barbara?"

"I've come to take you home."

"I don't want to go home."

"Howard, Jr., says you must."

"Then I suppose I'll have to. I am sorry I was not here to greet you. I have been down at the village hall, watching that sale. You should have been there, Scriventhorpe. That cabinet ——"

Lord Ickenham sat up alertly. "How much did it fetch?"

"I wish you would not bark at me like that," said Mr. Saxby a little peevishly. "You've made me drop a stitch. I was telling you about the sale, was I not? It was replete with interest. Barbara, there was recently on these premises an imitation-walnut cabinet which was an offense to the eye and worth at the most a few pounds. It was included in this sale of which I speak, and judge of my astonishment ——"

"How much did it fetch?"

Mr. Saxby gave him a cold look. It was never his habit to spoil a good story by hurrying it. "Judge of my astonishment when, after several other objects of equal horror had been put up and knocked down for a few shillings, this cabinet was displayed, and I heard a voice say 'Fifty pounds.' It was this Carlisle, who is staying at the hall. He said 'Fifty pounds,' and I was still gasping with astonishment when another voice said 'A hundred.' It was that young fellow who was in my office the other day, Barbara, the squirt, the one you sent me here to apologize to."

"Cosmo Wisdom."

"Ah, yes. Well, he said 'A hundred pounds!'"

"And to cut a long story short?" said Lord Ickenham.

Mr. Saxby never cut long stories short. "I could scarcely credit my senses. I must emphasize once again that this beastly cabinet would have been dear at five pounds. Yet these two eccentrics persisted in bidding against each other for it, and might have gone on forever, had not a peculiar interruption occurred. I don't know if either of you are acquainted with Bastable's sister?"

"We know her well," said Barbara. "Do get on, young Saxby. Phoebe Wisdom is Freddie's wife's half sister."

"This woman, bathed in tears, approached the squirt, accompanied by the village policeman, and after trying in vain to use a mother's influence to stop him making a fool of himself signaled to the policeman to lead him away, which he did. So Carstairs got the cabinet."

"How much for?" said Lord Ickenham.

"Well," said Mr. Saxby, rising, "I think I will go and take a bath. I got very warm and sticky in that village hall. There was practically no ventilation."

"Hi!" cried Lord Ickenham. "How much did Carlisle pay for the cabinet?"

Mistrust the man who finds everything good, the man who finds everything evil, and, still more, the man who is indifferent to everything. LAVATER

Can you tie this?

You certainly can . . . with crisp Sasheen® the ribbon that makes the "Magic Bow"

Say "Happy Easter" by topping gifts and baskets with a gay "Bunny Bow". Make a "Magic Bow" of Sasheen Brand Ribbon. Fashion eyes, ears and nose of Sasheen and attach with "SCOTCH" Brand Cellophane Tape. For whiskers, snip loops as above. "Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"® Brand Ribbons. Look for them at your favorite store.

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U.S. Pat. No. RE. 23835 © 3M Co.

MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING CO.
...WHERE RESEARCH IS THE KEY TO TOMORROW
3M COMPANY

Don't be a borderline blonde!

Be as blonde as you were born to be!

If your hair was born to be blonde—and isn't—or if you're a brownette with blonde ambitions, fabulous Light and Bright, Richard Hudnut's shining new discovery, is for you! It's a different hair lightener, so easy to use, you can "do-it-yourself" at home. It was designed to bring out all the hidden gold in your hair . . . make you as blonde as you were truly born to be.

Light and Bright is so simple and easy to use; simpler, in fact, than setting your hair! There's no messy mixing. No complicated testing. No worrisome timing. All you do is apply Light and Bright to dry hair, using a brush, cotton pad or small sponge. Then comb through, let dry—and that's it!

Light and Bright works so gently, so gradually, you don't have to worry about getting too blonde too fast. It gives you genuine "color control"! Each time you use Light and Bright, your hair gets a little lighter, a little brighter. Until finally, when you reach just the color that's right, you stop.

Light and Bright contains no harsh ammonia. Instead it's formulated with a special built-in conditioner that helps keep your hair soft and easy-to-manage. You'll really be delighted at the wonderful way Light and Bright makes you a true, natural-looking blonde again with lovely, shining-soft hair! And once this gentle home brightener has brought to light your real blondeness, that drab, mousey look is gone for keeps. Yes, when you use Light and Bright, your glamourous new golden look won't wash out or fade. And Light and Bright is guaranteed by Good Housekeeping.

Don't wait another day. Let gentle new Light and Bright make you as blonde as you were born to be. Get a bottle today—be a blonde beauty tomorrow. Only $1.50 plus federal tax at cosmetic counters everywhere.

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

Advertisement

YOU SAVE

time... work... money... with...

Rid-Jid

COMPLETE COMBINATION

IRONING PACKAGE

INCLUDES:

Rid-Jid Knee Room* ® IRONING TABLE . . . your best buy in ironing comfort. Now equipped with stop-or-go wheels. Offers maximum knee room for really comfortable sit-down ironing . . . 12 instant height adjustments . . . fully ventilated open-mesh top . . . self-adjusting foot.

Rid-Jid AIRFLOW PAD AND COVER SET at ½ price! This new three-layer, one-piece ironing pad and cover set features highly scorch-resistant Silicone cover with Glass-Fiber Poly-Foam pad. Provides faster, cooler, drier ventilated ironing.

EXTRA BONUS . . . Coupons for 2 RID-JID SILICONE REPLACEMENT COVERS at ½ price!

COMPLETE PACKAGE $16.95 at leading hardware and department stores everywhere.

THE J. R. CLARK COMPANY

Spring Park, Minn. ▪ Reading, Pa.

OTHER FAMOUS Rid-Jid QUALITY PRODUCTS: ROLL-OR-TOTE LAUNDRY CARTS
WOOD AND ALUMINUM LADDERS • CLOTHES RACKS

"Oh, didn't I tell you that?" said Mr. Saxby. "Five hundred pounds."

He pottered away, and Lord Ickenham expended his breath in a deep sigh of satisfaction. Barbara Crowe shot an inquiring look at him.

"Why are you so interested in this cabinet, Freddie?"

"It belonged to my godson, who was in urgent need of three hundred pounds. Now he's got it, and a bit over."

"Was it really worth nothing?"

"Practically nothing."

"Then why did Cosmo Wisdom and that other man bid like that for it?"

"It's a long story."

"Your stories are never too long."

"Then here it comes," said Lord Ickenham.

It was, as he had predicted, a long story, but it gripped his audience throughout. It was some moments after he had finished before Barbara Crowe spoke. When she did, it was with a wealth of feeling.

"Cor lumme, stone the crows!" she said.

"I was expecting you to say that," said Lord Ickenham. "I must remember, by the way, to ask Albert Peasemarch what the meaning of the expression is. What crows? And why stone them? However, this is not the time to go into all that. I anticipated that you would react impressively to my revelation, for it is of course a sensational tale. Are you feeling faint?"

"Not faint, no, but I think I'm entitled to gasp a bit. Fancy Toots writing that book! I wouldn't have thought he had it in him."

Lord Ickenham clicked his tongue again. "Haven't you been listening? I said the author of Cocktail Time was Raymond Bastable."

"I used to call him Toots."

"And he used to call you Baby?"

"He did."

"How utterly loathsome! Well, you'll soon be calling him that revolting name again. If, that is to say, what I have told you has not killed your love."

"What do you mean?"

"Lots of people recoil in horror from Cocktail Time. It doesn't diminish your love for him to know that he is capable of writing a book like that?"

"It does not. If anything was needed to deepen my love for Beefy, as you call him, it is the discovery that he has a hundred and fifty thousand dollars coming to him from the movie sale of the first thing he ever wrote. Golly! Think what we'll get for the next one!"

"You feel there will be a next one?"

"Of course there will. I'll see to that. I'm going to make him give up the bar—I've always hated his being a barrister—and concentrate on his writing. We'll live in the country, where he can breathe decent air and not ruin his lungs by sitting all day in stuffy courts. And now," said Barbara, rising from her deck chair, "I think I'll follow our Mr. Saxby's example and have a bath. What's the procedure about clocking in here? Do I see your godson and haggle about terms?"

"He's gone to London. You conduct the negotiations with his old nurse. And I'd better come and help you through the ordeal. She's rather formidable."

If there was a touch of smugness in Lord Ickenham's demeanor as he returned to his deck chair after piloting Barbara Crowe through her interview with Nannie Bruce, it would have been a stern judge who would not have agreed that that smugness was excusable. Thanks to his efforts, Barbara would get her Toots, and Beefy would get his Baby, plus all that lovely cash from the cornucopias of Hollywood. Johnny had got his three hundred pounds, Albert Peasemarch his Phoebe, and it would not be long presumably before Cyril McMurdo got his Nannie Bruce. It was true that both Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle were at the moment probably feeling a little short of sweetness and light. No doubt in due season they would be able to console themselves with the thought that money is not everything an that disappointments such as they had su fered are sent to us to make us more spiritua

After perhaps half an hour had elapsed, h meditations were interrupted by the arrival Johnny Pearce. His manner, Lord Ickenha was amused to see, was gloomy. He woul soon, as Barbara had put it, adjust that.

"Hullo, Johnny."

"Hullo, Uncle Fred."

"Everything all right?"

"Well, yes and no."

Lord Ickenham frowned. "What do yo mean, yes and no? Did you square things wit Bunny?"

"Oh, yes. We're getting married next week.

"And I suppose you're asking yourself wha the harvest will be when she settles down he with Nannie?"

"Yes, that's what's worrying me."

"It need worry you no longer, my dear bo Do you know what happened at that sale th afternoon? You will scarcely credit it, but th cabinet of yours fetched five hundred pounds.

Johnny collapsed into the deck chair which Barbara Crowe had sat. "What!" h gasped. "You're kidding!"

"Not at all. That was the final bid, five hu dred pounds. Going, going, gone, and knocke down to Mr. Gordon Carlisle. So all you ha to do now is go to Nannie —— Why," aske Lord Ickenham, breaking off and regardi his godson with amazement, "aren't you ski ping like the high hills? Why aren't you raisi your eyes thankfully heaven and giving thr rousing cheers?"

A family is the best place in the world in which to learn how to live with other people.

RHODA W. BACMEISTER
All in the Family
Published by Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc.
Copyright, 1951, Rhoda W. Bacmeister

It was some moments b fore Johnny was able speak. "I'll tell you why I not giving three rousi cheers," he said, an laughed in a way whic Lord Ickenham recognize as hollow and hackin "That sale was the vicar jumble sale. I contribute the cabinet to it, glad to g rid of the beastly thing. S not a penny of the five hu dred quid comes to me. It will be applied the renovation and repair of the church hea ing system, which, I understand," said Johnn with another hollow, hacking laugh, "needs new boiler."

Mr. Saxby, feeling greatly refreshed aft his bath, came out into the cool evening a and started to toddle across the park.

Nothing happened when he reached th lodge and rang the front doorbell. The butl appeared to be away from his post, but thin like that never deterred Mr. Saxby. The do being open, he walked in, and having done s raised his voice:

"Bastable! *Bast*able!"

From somewhere in the distance there ca an answering shout. It seemed to proce from the depths of the house, as though t shouter were in the cellar. Very strange, M Saxby felt. What would Bastable be doing i cellar? And then the obvious solution p sented itself. He was having a look at his wi The good man loves his wine, and it is on natural that he should go down from time time to see that all is well with it.

"Bastable," he said, arriving at the cell door.

"Who's that?" a muffled voice replied.

"Saxby."

"Thank God! Let me out!"

"But why don't you come out?"

"The door's locked."

"Unlock it."

"The key's on your side. Turn it."

Mr. Saxby turned it, and there emerged a incandescent figure at the sight of which A bert Peasemarch, had he been present, wou have trembled like one stricken with an agu Lord Ickenham had spoken of men of his a quaintance who would thoroughly have e joyed being locked up in a wine cellar. S Raymond Bastable did not belong to this co vivial class. He was, as Gordon Carlisle ha put it, when speaking of his wife Gert vexed.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 156

New Maytag Lint-Filter Agitator removes lint, dispenses detergent, pumps suds through clothes

New kind of lint-filter—works where the lint is Filters during wash and rinse cycle. Works with Maytag's 926 lint remover portholes to get rid of more lint than ever before possible. Lint-Filter never interferes with loading or unloading clothes.

Built-in suds dispenser is right in the agitator

Pour detergent into agitator. Dispenser sprays fully dissolved detergent into water—automatically. No "globs" of half-dissolved detergent on clothes. 2-cup capacity lets you add water softener if water is "hard."

Agitator pumps sudsy water up through clothes

Creates a steady stream of surging suds water that loosens and lifts out dirt. Gets clothes really clean. And this new Maytag gives you a new kind of gentle thoroughness with automatic washing.

The New Maytag All-Fabric Automatic also offers a new Automatic Rinse Conditioner (softens rinse water) . . . new Pushbutton Water Level Control—saves as high as 2500 gallons of hot water every year! Plus 2 wash speeds, 2 spin speeds, and 3 water temperatures including "cold." In 3 colors and white, with matching "Halo of Heat" Dryer (gas or electric). As little as $3.50 a week. A complete line of Maytag automatics for every budget. Sold in Canada and throughout the world. The Maytag Company, Newton, Iowa.

MAYTAG

All-Fabric AUTOMATIC

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 154

"Where's Peasemarch?" he said, glaring about him with reddened eyes.

"I don't think I know him. Nice fellow?"

Sir Raymond continued to glare to left and right. As the missing member of his staff did not materialize, he glared at Mr. Saxby. "How did you get in?"

"I walked in."

"Did you see a round little bounder with a face like a suet pudding?"

"Not to my recollection. Who is this round bounder?"

"My butler. Peasemarch. I want to murder him."

"Oh, really? Why is that?"

"He locked me in that cellar."

"Locked you in the cellar?" bleated Mr. Saxby, toiling in the rear as his companion, snorting with visible emotion, led the way to his study. "Are you sure?"

"Of course I'm sure," said Sir Raymond, sinking into an armchair and reaching for his pipe. "I've been there for hours, with nothing to smoke. A-a-a-ah!" he said, puffing out a great cloud.

In a voice which would have been more musical if he had not been shouting all the afternoon, he sketched out the plans he had formed for dealing with Albert Peasemarch, should fate eventually throw them together again.

"I shall strangle him very slowly with my bare hands," he said, rolling the words round his tongue as if they were vintage port. "I shall twist his head off at the roots. He got me to that cellar saying he wanted me to look at the last lot of claret, and when I went over to look at it he nipped out, locking the door behind him."

It was a simple tale, simply told, but it gripped Mr. Saxby. "How extremely odd. I have never heard of a butler locking anyone in a wine cellar. I knew one once, many years ago, who kept tropical fish, but that is not, of course, quite the same thing. Do you know what I think, Bastable? There is something in the air here that breeds eccentricity. You see it on all sides. Take the auction sale this afternoon."

It was agony to Sir Raymond to be reminded of the auction sale. But curiosity overcame his reluctance to speak of it.

"What happened?" he asked huskily.

Mr. Saxby slid into his narrative with polished ease. "I must begin by saying," he began by saying, "that at Hammer Hall, where, as you know, I am now residing, there is—or was—an imitation-walnut cabinet, the property of my host, Mr. Pearce. . . . Do you know Mr. Pearce?"

"Slightly."

"Well, this imitation-walnut cabinet stood in the hall, facing you as you entered the front door. I want to impress upon you, Bastable, that this loathsome cabinet was entirely worthless. I was relieved to hear that it was being included in the auction sale which was held at the village hall."

"I know all about the cabinet," said Sir Raymond. "Get on."

"You do bustle me so, my dear fellow. Well, this cabinet came up for auction, and judge of my amazement when I heard Carlisle bid fifty pounds. The next moment a squirt of the name of Cosmo Wisdom had bid a hundred. And so it went. A cabinet, I must again emphasize, of no value whatsoever. Can you wonder that I say that the air of Dovetail Hammer breeds eccentricity? . . . Are you in pain, Bastable?"

Sir Raymond was, and he had been unable to check a groan. "Get on," he said dully.

"How you do keep saying 'Get on.' But I think I see what is in your mind. You want to know how it all ended. Well, just as Carlisle bid five hundred pounds, the squirt's mother with the assistance of the village policeman removed him from the scene, so the distressing cabinet was knocked down to Carlisle at that figure."

Sir Raymond puffed out a relieved cloud of smoke. Everything was . . . well, not perhaps all right, but much more nearly all right than it might have been. He knew Carlisle to be a man who had his price.

"So Carlisle got the cabinet?"

"I told you he did," said Mr. Saxby. "But it seems to me that you are missing the whole point of my story. It is immaterial which of the two eccentrics made the higher bid. What is so extraordinary is that they were bidding in fifties and hundreds for this entirely worthless object. It bears out what I was saying to Barbara Crowe just now."

Sir Raymond sat up with a jerk. His pipe fell from his mouth in a shower of sparks. "Barbara Crowe? Is Barbara Crowe here?"

"She was when I went to take my bath. Looking very well, I thought."

As Sir Raymond picked up his pipe, strange emotions were stirring within him—exultation one of them, tenderness another. There could be only one reason for Barbara's arrival in Dovetail Hammer. She had come to see him, to try to effect a reconciliation. All the old love, so long kept in storage, as if it had been something Albert Peasemarch had locked up in a wine cellar, came popping out as good as new, and in spite of the presence in it of men like Gordon Carlisle and his nephew Cosmo, the world seemed to him a very pleasant world indeed.

That strange tenderness grew. He could see now how wrong had been the stand he had taken about Phoebe's sharing their home. Of course a bride would not want her home shared by anyone, let alone a woman like his sister Phoebe. Wincing a little, he resolved that, even if it meant paying out the two thousand pounds a year she had mentioned, Barbara must be alone with him in their little nest.

He had just reached this decision when Lord Ickenham came in through the French windows and paused, momentarily disconcerted, at the sight of Mr. Saxby.

"Oh, there you are, Saxby," he said. "I was looking for you. Flannery wants to see you."

Mr. Saxby gave an interested bleat. "Flannery? Is he here?"

"Just arrived."

"Why didn't you bring him along?" Mr. Saxby asked.

"He said he wanted to see you on some private matter. I wouldn't keep him waiting. . . . Beefy," he went on as Mr. Saxby ambled off. "I come bearing news which will, unless I am greatly mistaken, send you gamboling about the house and grounds like a lamb in springtime. But before going into that," he said, cocking an interested eyebrow, "I would like, if I may do so without giving offense, to comment on your personal appearance. Have you been rolling in something, or do you always have cobwebs in your hair?"

A cloud marred the sunniness of Sir Raymond's mood. "You'd have cobwebs in your hair if you'd been in a cellar all the afternoon," he said warmly. "Do you know where Peasemarch is?"

Error is none the better for being common, nor truth the worse for having lain neglected. JOHN LOCKE

"I was chatting with him on the phone not long ago and he told me he was going to London for a week or two."

Sir Raymond breathed heavily. "He locked me in the cellar. If Saxby hadn't come along, I'd be there still. The man's insane."

"One of the mad Peasemarches, you think? I'm not so sure. I admit that his behavior was peculiar, but I believe I can understand it. Owing to a singular piece of good fortune which has just befallen him, Albert Peasemarch is a bit above himself this afternoon. Needing an outlet for his high spirits and feeling that he had to do something by way of expressing himself, he chose this unusual course. I suppose he thought you would laugh as heartily as he at the amusing little affair."

"Well, he was wrong," said Sir Raymond. "If Peasemarch were here and I could get my hands on him, I would take him apart limb by limb."

Lord Ickenham nodded. "Yes, I can see your side of the thing. Well, when I meet him I will let him know that you are displeased, and you will certainly get a letter of apology from him, for there is good stuff in Albert Peasemarch and no one is quicker than he to admit it when he knows he has acted mistakenly. But we must not waste precious moments talking of Albert Peasemarch. Prepare yourself for a surprise, Beefy. Barbara Crowe is here."

"It isn't a surprise. Saxby told me."

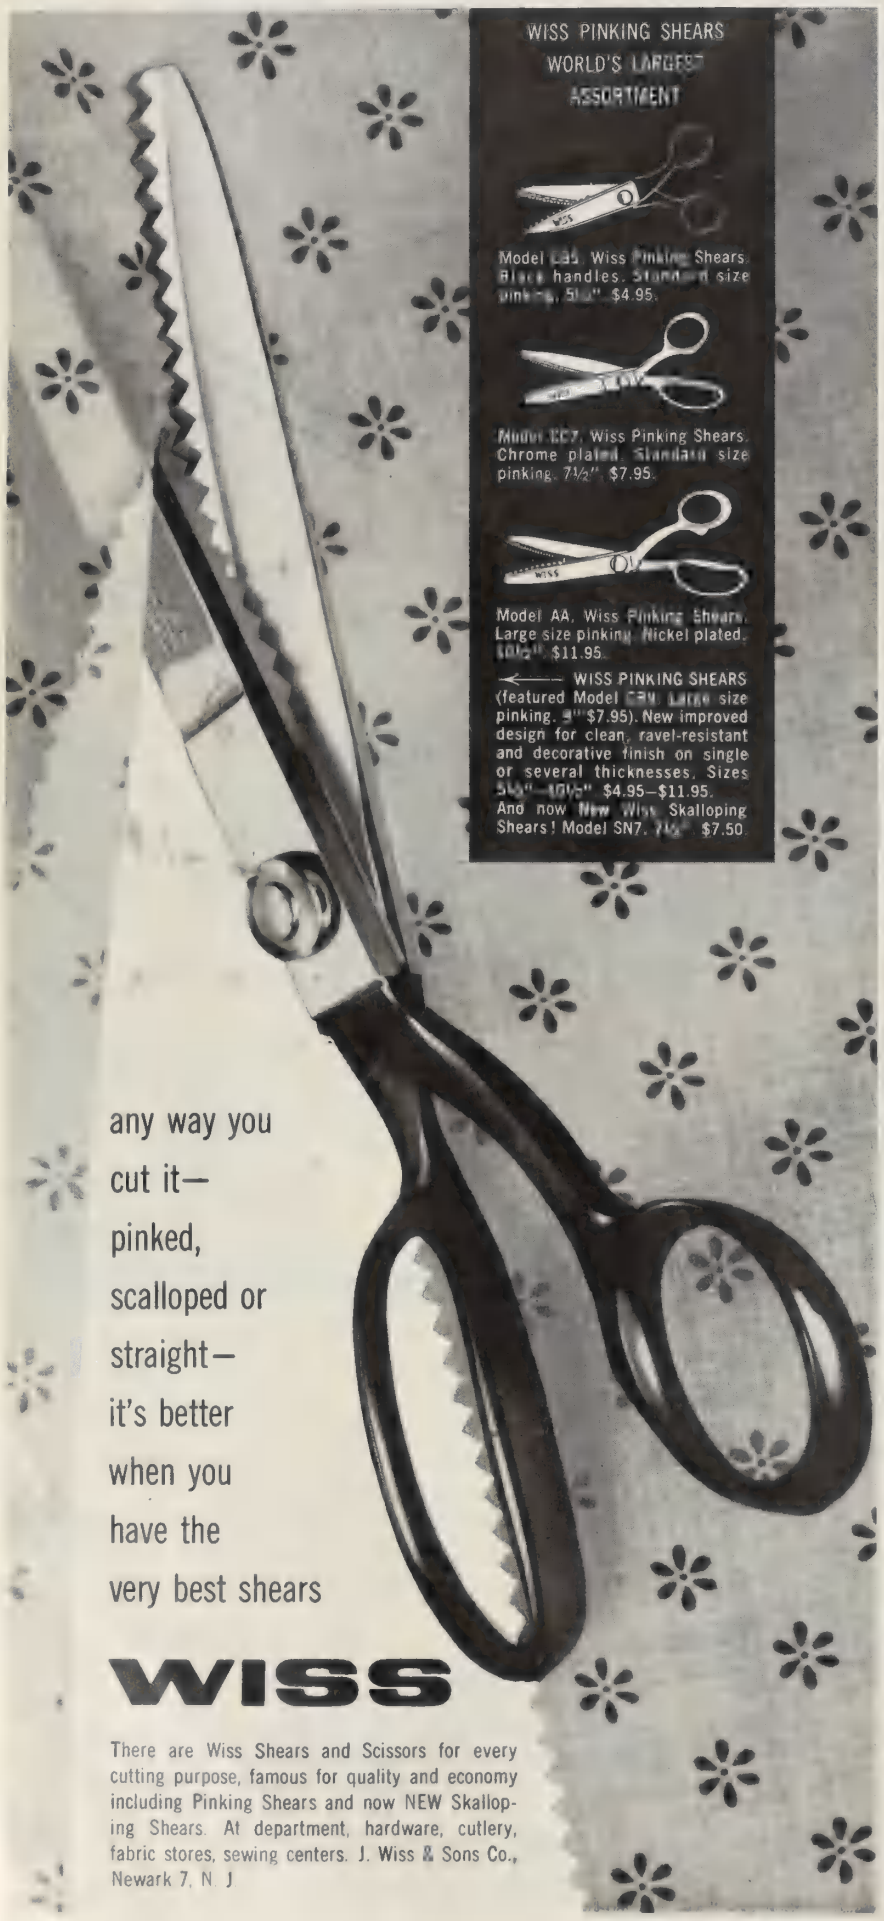
"And what steps do you propose to take?"

"I'm going to tell her I've been a fool."

"Doesn't she know?"

"And I'm going to marry her, if she'll still have me."

"Oh, she'll have you, all right. I could tell that by the way, every time I mentioned your name, she buried her face in her hands and murmured 'Toots! Toots!'"



"She did?" said Sir Raymond, much moved.

"Brokenly," Lord Ickenham assured him.

"You know what the trouble was," said Sir Raymond, removing a cobweb from his left eyebrow. "She didn't want Phoebe living with us."

"Very naturally."

"Yes, I see that now. I'm going to give her two thousand pounds a year and tell her to go off and take a flat somewhere, or do you think she might settle for fifteen hundred?"

Lord Ickenham considered the question. f I were you, Beefy, I would cross that idge when you come to it. For all you know, hoebe may be getting married herself."

Sir Raymond stared. "Phoebe?"

"Stranger things have happened," Lord Ickham told him.

For an instant it seemed that Sir Raymond is about to say "Name three," but he merely ve a grunt and brushed away another cob-eb. Lord Ickenham studied him with a oughtful eye. He was debating whether or t this was a suitable moment to reveal to the rrister-novelist that he was about to become ied by marriage to the East Dulwich Pease-arches. He decided that it was not. He turned another matter, one to which ever since his omentous talk with Johnny Pearce he had en devoting his powerful mind.

"Well, I'm delighted, my dear fellow, that is well again between you and Barbara. If ere is one thing that braces me up, it is to see o sundered hearts come together. But ere's one thing you must budget for, Beefy, hen you marry Barbara, and this may come something of a shock to you. You will have be prepared to start work on another ook."

"What!"

"Well, of course."

"But I can't."

"You'll have to," Lord Ickenham said. "If ou think you can write a novel and sell it r a hundred and fifty thousand dollars and arry a literary agent and not have her make ou sit down on your trouser seat and write nother, you sadly underestimate the deter-ination and will to win of literary agents. ou won't have a moment's peace till you ke pen in hand."

Sir Raymond's jaw had fallen to its fullest tent. "But I can't, I tell you! You haven't y conception what it means to sweat your ay through one of these books. I dare say 's all right for fellows who are used to it, but r somebody like myself —— I'd much ther be torn to pieces with red-hot pincers."

Lord Ickenham nodded. "I thought that ight possibly be your attitude," he said. But I see a way out of the difficulty. Ever hear Dumas?"

"Who?"

"Alexandre Dumas. The Three Musketeers. ount of Monte Cristo."

"Oh, Dumas? Yes, of course. Everybody's ad Dumas."

"You're wrong. They just think they have. hat they were really getting was the output f his corps of industrious assistants. He was rather the same position as you. He wanted e money, as much of it as he could gouge ut of the reading public, but he strongly ob-cted to having to turn out the stuff. So he as-gned the rough spadework—the writing of is books—to others."

Hope leaped into Sir Raymond's haggard yes. "You mean I could get someone else to rite the infernal thing?"

"Exactly. And who more suitable than my odson, Johnny Pearce?"

"Why, of course! He's an author, isn't he? Would he do it?"

"Nothing would please him more. Like Dumas, he needs the money. Fifty-fifty would e a fair arrangement, I think?"

"Yes, that seems reasonable."

"And of course he would have to have some-hing down in advance. A sweetener you call at the bar, don't you? Five hundred pounds uggests itself as a suitable figure. Just step to our desk, Beefy, and write him a check for hat amount."

Sir Raymond stared. "You want me to give im five hundred pounds?"

"In advance of royalties."

"I'm not going to give him any five hundred ounds."

"Then I, on my side, am not going to give ou that letter of young Cosmo's. I quite for-ot to mention, Beefy, that shortly after our Mr. Carlisle placed it in the cabinet, I found nd removed it. I have it in my pocket now," aid Lord Ickenham, producing it. "Five hun-lred pounds, Beefy, payable to Jonathan Twistleton Pearce."

There was a silence during which a man night have uttered the words "Jonathan Twistleton Pearce" ten or perhaps twelve times, speaking slowly. Then Sir Raymond heaved himself up. His manner was not blithe, but it was plain to see that he had made his decision.

"How do you spell Pearce?" he said. "P-e-a-r-c-e or P-i-e-r-c-e?"

The shadows were lengthening across the grass as Ickenham started to saunter back through the park to Hammer Hall, in his pocket the check which would bring wedding bells to Belinda Farringdon, his godson Johnny, Nannie Bruce and Officer Cyril McMurdo. It was one of those perfect days which come from three to five times in an English summer. Everywhere was peace and gentle stillness, and it made Lord Ickenham think how jolly it would be to be in London.

He had become a little tired of country life. Well enough in its way, of course, but dull—humdrum—nothing ever happening. What he needed to tone up his system was a night out in the pleasure-seeking section of the metropolis in the society of some congenial companion.

Not his nephew Pongo. Marriage had turned him into a sober citizen out of tune with the hopes and dreams of a man who liked his evenings lively.

This depressed Lord Ickenham for a moment. Then he was his bright self again. He had remembered that in his little red book in his bedroom at the hall he had the East Dulwich address of Albert Peasemarch.

What pleasanter than to go to Chatsworth, Mafeking Road, East Dulwich, imitate the cry of the white owl, tell Albert Peasemarch to put on his bowler hat, and, having checked that bowler hat in the cloakroom of some gay restaurant, to plunge with him into London's glittering night life?

Which, he was convinced, would have much to offer to two young fellows up from the country.

END

Now... sprinkles as you iron!

New General Electric Spray, Steam and Dry Iron

And look for the standard (G-E) Steam and Dry Iron!

With Even-Flow system that gives you just the right amount of steam. Lets you press like a tailor without a damp cloth.

This amazing new iron actually shortens your ironing day!

You just press a button on the handle and your sprinkling is done for you—as you iron! Saves pre-dampening heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics that no ordinary iron can ever properly moisten. You pre-dampen only your very largest pieces.

Exclusive Even-Flow system gives a steadier flow of steam, lets you iron longer on one filling! Changes instantly to a dry iron.

Visualizer Fabric-dial selects right temperature for every fabric, even synthetics. It's perfect, too, for the touch-up ironing you want to do on "wash and wear" clothing.

It's so easy to use, and it comes complete with a mineral filter for convenient operation in hard or soft water areas. See it now at your General Electric dealer's. General Electric Co., Portable Appliance Dept., Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

The cleanest clean under the sun –

New Tide Clean!

NEW TIDE

with RESERVE CLEANING POWER

...wonderful extra cleaning power to get your whole wash clean and fresh as the west wind. What a beautiful sight when your wash is done! Everything, even problem wash comes out more than bright, more than white ... really clean! So clean smelling, too ... with a fresh air and sunshine cleanness you'll love. Yes, the cleanest clean possible is new Tide clean!

NO PLACE LIKE HOME for Troubled Kids

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Six years ago Jack Shaw, of Beaumont, California, brought home a boy with an 80-page police record . . .

By JOSEPH LAITIN
Photographs By JOSEPH DI PIETRO

The judge removed his glasses and pointed them at the policeman. "You put me in an awkward position, officer," he said. "You know this boy's record. Burglary. Grand theft. One scrape after another. I've pretty much decided to send him to prison instead of reform school, and you're asking me to let him go home with you and live with your family."

The policeman said nothing. Neither did the boy. Aged fifteen, the prisoner had considerably more experience with crime than his captor, Jack Shaw, a forty-three-year-old former businessman who had been a cop less than six months. This was Officer Shaw's first juvenile arrest.

Jack Shaw knew his request could jeopardize his job, and he desperately needed to keep it. But all he could say was:

"Your Honor, this boy needs love and understanding and companionship. My wife and I can give it to him. I'd like to take him home with me."

Perhaps it was the naïveté, perhaps the utter sincerity of the unusual request that moved the judge to grant it. Policeman Jack Shaw was made Richard's guardian.

It wasn't until he was driving the boy home that afternoon that Jack realized he hadn't really consulted his wife about the new house guest. Ava had noticed how moody he'd been around the house and one night anxiously inquired what was bothering him. He'd unburdened himself about Richard and said he had to find some way of keeping the boy from prison. Ava had been reassuring: "Jack, I'm sure you'll find a way."

As he brought the car up to their house, Ava came out smiling, delighted at Jack's early home-coming. She noticed that the back of the car was piled high with cartons of books and magazines, bundles of clothing and homemade fishing poles, but didn't give this a second thought.

Sarah was 7, the twins only 4, when they began to share their home, their mother and father with delinquents, runaways, other boys and girls from poor families.

Beaumont had a bad juvenile problem. Now teen-agers co-operate with Jack. Complaint being investigated: Some kid's been shooting off a pellet gun. Anybody know who did it?

Ava didn't want Jack to become a policeman. "He's too gentle," she said.

Jack believes in "the strap" for punishment, but he's used it only three times on his children. Once on Sarah. Twice on Harry, who looks so much like his twin he got one of Larry's spankings by mistake!

She did feel uneasy, though, when the boy got out of the car. He was wearing a dirty sports shirt, a torn, filthy pair of jeans, and mud-caked shoes. She'd just finished doing the house and everything was spick-and-span. Ava did hope Jack wasn't going to ask the boy in.

Jack was the first to speak. "We've got a new son, honey," he said. Ava stood speechless. Their seven-year-old daughter, Sarah, who had come from the back of the house when she heard her daddy's car, raced away to the barn where her two younger brothers were playing. "Come quick. We've got a new brother," she gasped. The three of them removed Richard's treasures from the car. When the last item was in the house, the children produced a ball and asked Richard to play. "No," he said gruffly. He sat down and buried his head behind one of the magazines he'd picked out of a carton. Ava looked searchingly at Jack, but all he said was, "Will dinner be ready pretty soon, dear?" Ava withdrew to the kitchen.

What, Jack wondered, would Ava say when they were alone?

Ava said plenty.

That night, as Richard lay asleep on the living-room couch, Ava spoke her mind. Had he thought about Sarah, going on eight, and the twins, Harry and Larry, aged four? The house was hardly big enough for the five of them. There were only one bathroom, three small bedrooms; where would the boy sleep? How would they feed and clothe him on Jack's $278-a-month salary? Her $20-a-week food budget couldn't be stretched to feed a teen-age boy.

Jack listened sympathetically, for the family had just emerged from a five-year siege of sickness and surgery which had left them nearly broke. "We'll manage, honey," was all that Jack could bring himself to say that night. He had worked as a cowpuncher in his youth, and years of isolation on the range had made him a miser with words.

Richard stayed.

He and Ava eyed each other warily those first few days. "I was scared to death of him," Ava admits. The Shaw children were puzzled at his continued refusal to play with them. When they complained to Ava, she urged them to "give him a few days to get used to you." But inwardly she was less optimistic. Richard kept to himself and wouldn't even eat with the family. Ava left his food on the table, and Richard ate it cold and in solitude. After five days, Ava became irritated with this double-shift arrangement. When dinner was served, she stalked into the living room, snatched the magazine out of Richard's hand, and ordered him to sit down with "the rest of the family." As it turned out, Richard was equally scared of Ava. He meekly complied. After dessert, Harry asked him to "rassle," and to everybody's surprise Richard enthusiastically agreed. The pair left the table and an instant later not only Harry but his brother and sister had piled onto Richard in a free-for-all. The ice was broken.

va usually takes a job when there's an extra youngster at home, pays baby-sitting fees out of her income.

he's now proud of his record.

The children accepted Richard wholeheartlly as a new member of the family. Ava, unerstandably, was something less than overyed, although she did her best to hide this om Richard. If it made Jack happy to have the oy in the house for a while, she thought, it was er duty to go along. Richard slept on a folding ot in the twins' bedroom. After the first week, e began making his own bed and helping arry and Larry with theirs. Then he asked va if he could help with the dishes. One night, ter he had been there two weeks, Ava asked ichard to baby-sit for a few hours while she sited a friend. When Ava returned, she pened her purse and started to pay him. "You on't owe me anything," the boy said. "I nought I was part of the family." Then, rather nyly, he asked if he could call her "mom." Ava as only thirty at the time and she had mixed eelings about a boy of fifteen calling her mom," but she soon became accustomed to it.

Richard's presence did result in a loss of rivacy.

"At night, I like to take a shower, put on a ightie, and sit in the living room until Jack omes home from work, and then chat awhile ver coffee," says Ava. "An older child, like Richard, would stay up late and so we couldn't alk. Sometimes Jack didn't have to go to work ntil noon, and that gave us an hour or two lone after the children were shipped off to chool. But a chat at noon is never quite the ame as talking things over at midnight." As Jack and Ava look back, this was the only sacrifice they feel they made.

Gradually, as Richard started to confide in Ava, she began to understand why Jack had brought him home. Richard's mother had died when he was three, and his father remarried. Then his father passed away, and his stepmother remarried. He became a ward of the state and was boarded out. Richard must have been a holy terror. He was on parole at the age of six. Before he reached his teens, he was involved in an armed robbery with some older boys, but he was not toting the gun, so the court was lenient. At fifteen, Richard had an eighty-page police record.

Then Jack, investigating a series of burglaries, was struck by the fact that many of the purloined items were parakeets, canaries, pheasants and other brilliantly colored birds. When the clues pointed to Richard, Jack arrested him and, having gained the boy's confidence, asked to see his bird collection. Richard, still denying guilt, unhesitatingly took Jack to his hideaway, a deserted barn. It was a miniature aviary, with almost fifty brightly feathered birds chattering away. This was the boy's sanctuary. As they sat in the dim light of the barn, the policeman and the boy talked a lot about birds and horses. When Jack finally took professional stock of the loot, the boy broke up. "I wanted to have beautiful things around me," he said tearfully. "They're wonderful company and I take good care of them."

"I haven't set a table in years," says Ava. The kids do this. Guests are "part of the family, too," and expected to pitch in. Latest is a teen-ager needing help to continue her schooling.

Only man on the night beat, Jack does most juvenile work in off-duty hours.

Jack works round the clock.
Ava once felt neglected, changed when Jack brought kids home.

Jack returns at 11 P.M., on schedule, or at 2 or 3 A.M. if a case detains him. Ava always waits up to give him a rubdown, milk and cereal, to share a late-hour chat.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

"Parents can prevent 99 per cent of juvenile delinquency," says Jack. "True love will do it—by that I mean companionship. Youngsters need a parent's companionship more than money, cars or parties."

Jack and Ava are proud of Richard today. After he had been with them a few weeks, his school grades began to skyrocket. Richard wanted to work after school and Jack persuaded a storekeeper to take him on. Six months later the storekeeper and his wife asked Richard to live with them, and, with Jack and Ava's permission, he went. Explaining this to the children was a painful experience. When they were told Richard had found a home, Larry demanded, "Why can't this be his home?" Jack and Ava mentioned the lack of space. "There's plenty of space in our room," protested Harry. The bewildered parents then said daddy didn't have enough money. Sarah scampered into her room and marched back with her savings-account book. "I've got $28.50," she said eagerly. "You can have all of it." The twins offered the $5 they had saved. Jack and Ava finally broke down and promised there would be a new sister or brother in a few weeks.

It was always to be so, in the next six years. Richard was only the first of several kids in trouble who shared their home.

Happily, Richard often came to dinner. He was graduated from high school with top honors, a straight-A student. Beaumont, California, was so proud of him that several merchants chipped in and bought him a complete wardrobe for the graduation exercises. A year later, he met a nice girl to whom he is now married. Today, in a larger city and in a responsible job, his superiors are aware of his background but wholly untroubled about it.

Long before Richard left the Shaws, Ava's attitude had changed. She accompanied Jack to lectures on adolescent youth, and joined him in his reading on juvenile delinquency.

Petty crime and vandalism were rampant in Beaumont. High-school teachers were openly threatened. When one man—now the principal—came to teach there, a student boldly told him to "take it easy—I'll give you only two or three months here." His home was constantly subjected to night raids. He devised an alarm system that rang a bell and lit a rooftop floodlight if a prowler set foot on his property. It was like living in an armed camp.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 164

New Simoniz Floor Wax - childproof because there's vinyl in it!

Vinyl—tough, brilliant vinyl—makes new Simoniz® Floor Wax the toughest, glossiest floor wax ever.

Now, kids can spill on your floors. Romp on them. Track on them. Vinyl, the miracle ingredient, means childproof protection.

Floors never shone so mirror-bright. Never stayed so bright, so long . . . even with frequent damp mopping. Yet, when it comes to re-waxing, new Simoniz Floor Wax removes evenly—no blotching.

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. You don't need to buff. You don't need to rub. Try it.

For all floors—linoleum, rubber, asphalt, vinyl tile and finished wood

SIMONIZ MAKES IT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 162

That was the way things stood in 1952, the year Jack Shaw was offered a job on the police force. The family had moved to Beaumont from Long Beach, California, because Sarah was highly susceptible to pneumonia, and doctors said the only hope was a high, dry climate. For five years the family had been plagued by a series of illnesses which required blood transfusions, X rays, hospitals, surgeons and other specialists. When Sarah was born, the opening between her stomach and intestines was too small, and she developed circulatory problems. Then, the following year, Ava's first set of twins was stillborn; not too long afterward she suffered a miscarriage; Larry was born with a bone infection. Jack owned a chain of service stations and garages worth an estimated $100,000, and, having no medical plan, he sold these properties one by one to meet the bills, until almost nothing was left. They moved to Beaumont with about $5000.

Mrs. Hugh Olsen, mother of four, and a new M.D.

Hugh Olsen changed jobs, sold the family house, moved all their possessions and four children to Philadelphia so his wife Frances could go to medical school. That was six tough years ago.

Mother is a Doctor now!

HOW AMERICA LIVES

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART

IN THE MAY JOURNAL

Jack and Ava first met on Christmas night, 1942, in her home town, Laurel, Mississippi, at a USO dance. Her sister had insisted she attend it. "There's a sergeant from the air-force base," she said. "He's handsome, dark and tall, and a wonderful dancer." She emphasized the sergeant's height because Ava is 5'8", and defiantly wore high heels. Her difficulty was finding dance partners taller than she.

The courtship began that night and continued after Ava joined the Spars, and two years later, when Ava was visiting Jack at his base near Winfield, Kansas, Jack suggested they marry immediately. Ava agreed. It was the last day of her leave; at six the next morning she would have to catch a bus to report back for duty at Mobile, Alabama.

It was a dreary night, cold and raining, as they set out to find a minister. Jack is a Mormon, Ava a Baptist, but the only clergyman they could find was a Methodist. When they rang his doorbell, he was about to retire, but he gamely agreed that if the couple wanted a church wedding, they would have one. The airman, the Spar and the clergyman trekked through the stormy night to the church. It was unheated, but beautifully decorated for Christmas. The minister lighted two candles, put a record of organ music on the phonograph. With the candles flickering, the phonograph scratchy but the tune reverent, the wind and the rain whipping across the windows, the bride and groom dressed in drab military garb walked arm in arm down the aisle.

They didn't meet again for four months, when Ava received her discharge from the Spars, and moved into the small furnished apartment Jack had taken near his air base. Almost immediately she was confronted with one of the practical demands of marriage: Jack suggested coffee.

"It was a moment of crisis," Ava recalls. "I looked for instructions on the coffee can. Then I searched a cookbook for a recipe. The water was boiling away madly. Finally Jack called out, 'Coffee 'bout ready, honey?' 'I can't find the recipe,' I said. Jack never spoke a word. He picked up the can, dumped some coffee into the boiling water, and went back to his magazine in the living room."

At marriage, Jack had no inkling that Ava had led such an unbelievably sheltered life and Ava never knew that her sergeant husband was a well-to-do businessman. He had bought his garages and service stations before he went into the Army Air Force.

Whenever she told Jack she needed something, he went out and got it for her—up to the time they moved to Beaumont. Now it was different. Jack put the remaining $5000 into a joint checking account. "It was the first time in my life that I wrote a check," Ava recalls.

The Shaws' house in Beaumont was a depressing place, but with it came five acres of grassland. Jack attended livestock auctions, selected the choicest heads of cattle, fattened them up in the back yard. Then he sold off enough to pay for the original purchase and used the rest for the family table. Ava learned to can, and put up enough fruits and vegetables to last a year.

They were eating well, but had almost nothing in the bank. Occasionally he made a few dollars on a cattle deal, but his only regular income was a $33-a-month pension check from the Government for a stomach-ulcer operation he underwent during the war. Even so, Ava begged him not to accept a job on the police force.

"I just couldn't see Jack as a policeman," she says. "I've never heard him swear or raise his voice in anger. I couldn't imagine him even writing out a traffic ticket."

But Jack saw no other opportunities in Beaumont, so he took the job. Police Chief Bob Bruce observed how well the new man got along with youngsters and appointed him juvenile officer.

Some of Jack's interest in youth may be explained by his own boyhood. He was reared in the toddling stage by his grandmother. At the age of four he was informally adopted by an elderly rancher named Svenson, and his family ("They had their own troubles," says Jack) apparently raised no objections when Svenson moved from Texas to a large ranch in Utah and took Jack with him. Svenson gave him his religion, taught him to ride, shoot, brand cattle and handle a lasso on horseback.

Svenson died when Jack was ten. "That," recalls Jack, "is when I really started choppin' on my own." By the time he reached thirteen he was able to get full adult pay as a cowpuncher. He drifted around the West, working one ranch, then another. Nobody seemed unduly concerned about the welfare of a boy armed like a junior commando and traveling about on his own, with only a horse for steady companionship.

"It wasn't the same in those days," Jack explains. "Today, a boy of fifteen or sixteen gets a notion to go out on his own, and the parents are wanting to put out a missing-persons report. In those days in the West, people just didn't seem to think anything about a boy chopping his own wood."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 166

HAMILTON HOME SERVICE DIRECTOR Mrs. about the 1958

A word about Helen Tangen—There's no make-believe about Helen. She's not a trademark, but a remarkable and thoroughly likable woman—homemaker, mother and skilled laundering professional. In her role as Hamilton Home Service Director, Helen is an important member of the planning group which develops all new Hamilton laundry equipment. Helen speaks for the woman's touch, and Helen gets listened to.

Helen Tangen talks woman-to-woman Hamilton automatic washers and dryers

(they have the woman's touch because Helen helped design them)

I have so much to tell you about our new Hamilton home laundries, and I promise not to say "sensational" or "revolutionary" even once. After all, our company was one of the very first to make automatic laundry equipment —we get awfully tired of that kind of foolish talk, and I imagine you do too. There's a lot to tell—so let's start!

Let's talk automatic washers first

No matter what else it does, a Hamilton washer must wash and rinse clean, clear through. That's why our automatic is the dependable agitator type you know does a good job. That's why we build in extra rinsing power. We start with these things first.

It's a crying shame to pay good money for an automatic, then find you have to fiddle and fuss forever to get the job done right! You're entitled to fully automatic operation, and we give you more than you'll use most days.

Here's how you use the controls shown below.

With the left-hand control you pick the cycle—the full 35 minutes we've found right for regular loads, or a trimmed-down 19 minute cycle for smaller loads or extra-delicate jobs.

The neat rows of pushbuttons let you choose five wash temperatures (from very-hot to cold) and three rinse temperatures (plus your automatic suds-saver). More choices than you'll need most days—but wonderful for wash-and-wear items or other special jobs (automatically!).

Flick the next two switches and you slow both agitation and spinning—now so gentle you can trust it with your most precious cashmeres, and get hand-washed results.

A world more to tell you, but I get just so much space. There's a Hamilton Dealer near you, where you can see and try these new automatics. Before you buy any washer, visit him, won't you?

And now—our clothes dryer

No one knows clothes dryers like Hamilton, and you see a big part of the reason at right. The gentleman visiting me is Hamilton's own Ross Moore—the inventor of the automatic clothes dryer. Ross worked a lifetime to give the Hamilton dryer a headstart it has never lost.

For example . . . only the Hamilton offers quick, gentle Carrier-Current drying—so different it's actually protected by U.S. patents. And where did wrinkle-free drying start? Right here!

Does so much, so easily. The right-hand control offers two drying cycles. One setting provides up to 80 minutes—enough for even the hardest-to-dry items. The other is tailored for the wonderful new wash-and-wear items—a short cycle, with an extra long cool-off period to confound wrinkles.

And the temperature selection buttons? Simplicity itself, for they're marked in actual fabric types. Perfect drying temperatures for every item, and no "high-medium-low" guesswork.

Chances are, someone in your block owns a Hamilton. Yes, and chances are she loves it! We feel pretty certain about this, because Hamilton alone has been making dryers for nearly 20 years now. So ask your neighbor . . . ask your Hamilton Dealer . . . or ask your common-sense self. Isn't the clothes dryer you want a Hamilton?

I'd like you to have one of these handy Weather-Toppers—free!

Honestly, it's wonderful! A sturdy plastic rainhat that folds into its own carrying case, and tucks away in your purse. Smart looking, too.

Would you like to have one? You can—just stop in at your nearest Hamilton Dealer's. See the new Hamilton automatic washers and clothes dryers, and get your Weather-Topper absolutely free. (We hope you do!)

Hamilton

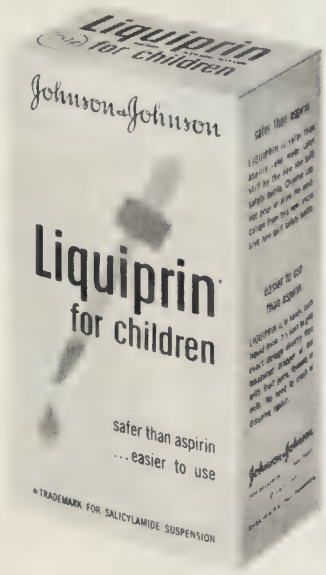
laundry equipment with the woman's touch!

© 1958 HAMILTON MANUFACTURING COMPANY · Two Rivers, Wisconsin

New! Liquiprin* for children safer than aspirin, easier to use

Medical tests prove this new, easy-to-use liquid is gentler, less irritating than aspirin ...safe even for children who are upset by aspirin! Gets to work faster, too!

Mothers! Give your child these added benefits of LIQUIPRIN*—the new way to help calm the feverish, fretful child and ease discomfort of colds, minor aches and pains.



LIQUIPRIN IS DESIGNED ESPECIALLY FOR CHILDREN! LIQUIPRIN pediatric analgesic-antipyretic was developed to meet the special needs of children for something safer, gentler and less irritating than aspirin.

LIQUIPRIN IS BETTER THAN ASPIRIN FOR YOUR CHILD! LIQUIPRIN contains salicylamide, a pain-relieving and fever-reducing agent of the same type as aspirin ... BUT ... it is chemically different. This difference makes LIQUIPRIN basically safer and ideal for children's use.

safer than aspirin—medical tests and actual hospital use prove LIQUIPRIN does not upset or irritate the stomach ... safe even for children who are upset by aspirin.

gets to work faster—liquids work faster than tablets. LIQUIPRIN also leaves the stomach more rapidly, is more rapidly absorbed, gets to work sooner to relieve your child.

easier to take—children take tasty LIQUIPRIN directly from measured dropper or mixed with fruit juice, milk or formula. No more tablets to crush or dissolve. And what's more, you're sure of giving exact dosage.

non-spill safety bottle

LIQUIPRIN is safer than aspirin and made safer still by a special medicine-monitor in every bottle. Children cannot pour or drink from this exclusive safety bottle.

YOUR DOCTOR KNOWS ABOUT LIQUIPRIN Get a bottle today—at all drug stores— 79¢

*TRADEMARK FOR SALICYLAMIDE SUSPENSION

Johnson & Johnson

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 164

It was against this backdrop that Jack, as an officer of the law, first encountered Richard. Perhaps he saw something of himself in the boy; Jack won't say. When Richard left, they took in a fourteen-year-old girl whose parents were separating. There followed a succession of troubled boys and girls who stayed for varying lengths of time. Occasionally Jack and Ava overreached themselves. One of their charges turned out to need psychiatric care. Another time they found themselves with a girl who required twenty-four-hour supervision. Unguarded, she ran away, and even though other teen-agers rounded her up for the Shaws, it got to be too much for Ava.

Not all the recipients of Shaw hospitality came through law-enforcement channels. One of these was Jean. It was Jack's turn to be surprised when he came home from work one day. All the other guests had been brought home by him; this was strictly Ava's show.

Jean stayed with the Shaws for a year, and the three Shaw children cried for days after she left. Jean was the only one who had come reluctantly. A teen-age baby sitter confided to Ava one night, as she was leaving, that her best friend was about to leave home.

"Will you help her the way you've helped others?" she asked pleadingly.

Ava wanted to know more, and the girl told Ava the story. A poor family with many children, the mother was ill, the father jobless. "She's too proud to accept help," the girl added. "You'll have to find some way to convince Jean that you need her."

Ava called on Jean, and asked if she would be a steady baby sitter so Ava could work. "Where are you working?" Jean asked cautiously. Ava said she couldn't look for a job until she had a sitter she could rely on. Jean agreed to come on condition that Ava would bring her home every night.

"So there I was," recalls Ava with a smile, "not wanting a job but having to look for one anyway."

She went to work as a waitress at a truck-stop café on the highway and for three nights dutifully drove Jean home before midnight. The fourth night, as Jean dozed in the car, Ava said Jean couldn't go on staying up so late on school nights. Jean said she would quit school. This gave Ava the opening she sought.

"No, you won't quit school. You'll come live with us so you can get to bed early," said Ava. Next day, Jean came with her belongings.

It took a long time for Jean to accept the Shaws. She wasn't accustomed to seeing children get along so well or parents so harmoniously, and she felt uncomfortable in her new environment. She was punctiliously polite. Unlike Richard, she was quite businesslike about the baby-sitting fees. Jack likes to tease, but she remained unresponsive to his joshing. One day, after she'd been there a month, Jack got a rise out of her. "Old baldy," she said. "You just leave me alone." But she smiled when she said it. What caused this suc break-through?

"You talk to a youngster for hours," Jack, "without seeming to make any h way. Then maybe you say one word an breaks them wide open. What that wor you never know."

Jean began to blossom. With her b sitting income, which amounted to about a week (this came out of Ava's earnings of a week as a waitress) she bought toys for children, a new dress for her sick mother, silverware and dishes for her hope chest. shyness gone, she showed open affectio Ava. But so anxious was Jean to please J she'd burst into tears if he expressed dis proval of anything she did. Ava was p tective; after all, this was her girl. One Jean bought them gifts as a surprise. To J she gave a pair of fire-engine-red pajamas, to Ava a filmy black nightgown. Jean casu said she'd also bought something for her to sleep in, but didn't open the package.

Ava secretly wondered whether Jean picked for herself a nightie exactly like h Next day Ava peeked, saw that Jean's gift herself was not a nightie at all, but pajama fire-engine red!

Jean blended in so well with the fam Jack and Ava began to dread the day w they would feel she was ready to leave. At end of a year, Jean herself made the decisi She learned that her mother, dying of can hadn't long to live, and with no prompt from Jack or Ava, Jean announced she wan to return home to help her own family.

Some time afterward, while Jean was nursing her bedridden mother, Ava went b to waiting on tables. Across the street fr the café was a filling station, and Ava beca friends with the owner's son. She deci Jean ought to meet him and one day asked boy to take a note to Jean. Several mon later the pair called on the Shaws. Jean sho her young man into another room and th radiant, asked Jack and Ava's permission marry him. Jack lectured her on the imp tance of finishing school. She promised continue. Then Jack said, "But, Jean, we ha nothing to say about whom you marry." Je replied, "Maybe not, but if you say no, i no." She broke into a warm smile. "E please, please say yes."

She wanted Jack to give her away and s wanted to be married in the Shaw home. Ja and Ava, though deeply moved, tactfully p suaded Jean to give her family that pleasu She finally agreed, then gave Jack a big h and fell into Ava's arms and cried.

Jack and Ava's interest in youth is by means limited to those who stayed with the Chief Bruce, who says that appointing Jack juvenile officer of his six-man force is "t smartest thing I've ever done in thirty years police work," doesn't have the money to p overtime, but Jack nevertheless is at it twent four hours a day. One of his proudest achiev ments is a teen-age car club, the Camshafte

HOW THE SHAWS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Regular monthly income is $432, including Jack's $386 as a policeman, his $10-a-month uniform allowance, and $36 service disability pension.

Groceries, cleaning supplies	$87.00	Allowances for guests, their clothes, etc.	28.00
Meat (Jack's cattle deals keep costs down)	12.00	School lunches	8.80
Clothing	20.00	Club dues	1.66
House payments, property tax	86.66	Magazines, newspapers	2.55
Fuel, light, water	15.00	Cigarettes	5.70
Telephone	3.76	Vacation fund (they go camping)	4.10
Insurance	9.34	Savings fund (sometimes used for capital expenditures)	50.00
Medical and dental	10.00	Income taxes (often subject to some refund)	36.00
Recreation (many outdoor activities are free)	5.00	Allowances for 3 children, Christmas and birthday gifts	8.50
Church, charity	5.00	Miscellaneous	5.43
Furniture, appliances	10.00	Total	$432.00
Car-operating costs	12.00
Shoe repair, dry cleaning (including Jack's uniforms)	5.50

Some people think kids in cars mean only g racing, loud pipes and trouble," Jack s. "They don't know how wrong they can "

Monday nights, the Shaw front yard nded like the warm-up period before the ianapolis Speedway races, with twenty hot- ders testing their brakes and racing their ines. Ava provided a spread for them in barn. Jack laid down only one rule for the b: to remain a member in good standing, a mshafter had to maintain a perfect traffic ord.

When another group of boys approached k to sponsor them in a similar club, he nd an unoccupied store in town, and per- ided the landlord to let the new club—the eepers—use it as a meeting place. Both bs flourished, and two years ago were in- porated in the T-Timers, Elks' youth or- nization in the West and Southwest.

Though Ava doesn't pursue juvenile work h Jack's driving dedication, she also doesn't ve Jack's detachment about it. Ava gets otional about "my boys and girls." Jack ds to think of the periods between house ests as "peace"; Ava describes them as "a id." In this, the children's attitude is akin Ava's. Both Jack and Ava feel that the esence of outside children in the house has ght their children to share. It is impossible, course, to say what Sarah would be like if e hadn't been exposed to the various house ests since she was seven years old. How- er, she would be any mother's pride and y. Her school report card is a dazzling array A's. She wants very much to go to college d is saving out of her 50-cent-a-week al- wance toward this. She helps with the house- ork, and for the past two years she has been king much of the family's bread and pastry. Actually, Ava feels Sarah is entirely too abitious about housekeeping. Recently, va wasn't feeling well and Sarah wanted to ke over entirely, but her mother told her to t out and play. That night Ava found on her llow a dozen squares of note paper, stapled gether, looking much like a raffle-coupon book. In block letters on each sheet of paper was a different set of instructions. One sheet said: "Clean stove." Another: "Prepare dinner tonight." . . . "Iron daddy's shirts," and so on. Attached to it was a scrawled note from Sarah: "Dear Mommy: If you are tired or feeling blue, hand me a ticket and this is what I will do."

Button-nosed and freckle-faced, Sarah is shy but very popular at school. Mothers also consider her a "good influence" and she is a favorite weekend guest. Sarah accepts the weekend invitations only when she's sure her mother won't need her, and she is partial to friends who own ponies, because she shares her father's love of horses.

Harry and Larry, identical twins, both blond and blue-eyed, insistent on dressing alike, are almost impossible to tell apart. One of their teachers once confessed to Ava that she gave them the same marks because she couldn't tell one from the other. This disturbed Ava. She had a sneaking suspicion Larry was carrying more than his share of the load, and one semester she arranged for them to be in separate classes. Sure enough, Larry's marks were consistently higher than Harry's, although both of them were still considered above average. It was Larry, not Harry, who became uneasy about this, and spent his time urging his brother to do his homework, often helping him with it.

Larry is the "good" boy; Harry has "the devil in him." They each get an allowance of 25 cents every two weeks (they also get 25-cent bonuses for special occasions, as when they get A's on their report cards) and Larry puts every cent into his savings account. Harry likes to spend his money and unsuccessfully tries to get his brother to go halves with him on his purchases.

When any mischief is about, there's a tendency to suspect Harry. "If anything's missing," says Ava, "I'll find myself saying 'Harry, where is it?' I try to make up for it by giving Harry a little more attention than Larry. The job of raising twins is rough."

When children come to stay with them, Jack adds $5 a week to Ava's regular allotment of $20. From this the child gets an allowance, the amount depending on the child's age. A sixteen-year-old, for instance, will get $2.50 a week, out of which he buys his lunch. In addition, Ava pays them 25 cents an hour for baby sitting—half the going rate in Beaumont—when she's out working. They're treated as members of the family. "If we go to a movie, they go," says Ava. "And they're expected to do family chores too.

"When they arrive, we sit them down and they are told what they will do and what they won't do," Ava explains. "We've never had to go beyond that. Once you've got the rules out of the way, if you teach a young person to like and respect you, he is not going to get into trouble if he can help it, because he won't want to put you out on a limb."

"In general," Jack philosophizes, "I say let nature take its course. If I had to make one rule, I'd say 'Never break a promise to a child.'"

Jack sometimes has Sunday off, but this doesn't always mean a day with the family. On one quiet Sunday he was off duty but had scheduled a special hearing for children who had broken some school windows. The high point of this Sunday dinner was a baking contest between mother and daughter. Each had baked a cake—Sarah a chocolate cake, Ava a yellow one—and the male members of the family were to decide which was the better. Harry and Larry mischievously divided their votes between Ava and Sarah. Jack was on the spot. He squirmed uncomfortably as the family waited. Ava suddenly rushed into the kitchen as the coffee started boiling over. Sarah quickly leaned over and whispered in Jack's ear, "For goodness' sakes, daddy, hurry up and vote for mother's." Jack gratefully accepted her instructions.

At ten to four, Jack changed into uniform and left for the city-hall courtroom.

Hearings like this dispose of many juvenile cases without a court record. No judge presides. Each child is called up separately with his parents. Usually they are held on Tuesday afternoon, but Jack had scheduled this particular hearing at a time convenient for all the parents.

Among the "defendants" was the pitcher on the Little League ball team. The coach sat near Jack. Privately, he had besought Jack not to "bench" the boy, who was sorely needed by his team. The twelve-year-old lad readily admitted his guilt.

"How would you feel," Jack asked, "if you had to sit on the bench because of what you did and watch your team lose because they didn't have their best pitcher?"

"Just terrible," said the boy earnestly. You could tell he meant it.

"I'm not going to bench you, because your coach assures me you'll never let him down again," Jack said. "Your part of the window damage is $1.75." The parents smiled gratefully at Jack, the coach looked relieved and the boy determined.

The next boy and his parents were defiant. Their boy hadn't broken any windows.

Jack talked to the boy for a few minutes and elicited an admission that he'd joined in the rock throwing—but his aim hadn't been so good.

The father interjected, "Why should we pay part of the cost? He didn't break anything."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 169

DINING OUT

By JANET HENRY

How nice to be able
To sit down to eat
Where all at the table
Can cut their own meat!

Everybody's pickin' pretty Posy Panties®

The prettiest, perkiest panties for junior glamor girls from two through sweet sixteen . . . so fresh and breezy in petal-soft, spring-y cotton Peek-a-Boo mesh . . . so free and easy on the move. (Easy on moms, too—no ironing!) And Posy Panties are so nicely made, with trim elastic waist, sturdy double crotch and daintily ruffled leg band. Only 69c a pair ! Scoop up a supply at your favorite store.

In 5 posy colors: Buttercup Yellow, Fern Green, Cornflower Blue, Pink and Snowdrop White. Also in Snowflake prints (79c).

Nationally Advertised
Gibbs®
Nationally Known

Gibbs Underwear Company, Philadelphia 34, Pa.

Surf adds brightness

(to colors, to whites . . . yes, even to perfect whiteness)

Bedtime's the best time. Babies bathed. Prayers said. Daddy's kissed them. And don't you love to see them looking bright as gumdrops playing on your snowy sheets? Remember when bright colors used to fade and get old-looking . . . when sheets turned yellow? That was before Surf, the quality detergent that actually makes bright brighter and white whiter than new. If you haven't yet discovered Surf, try it now and, remember, money back if you don't love it. That's Lever Brothers' unconditional guarantee. P. S. Watch for savings on Surf at your favorite store.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 167

Jack patiently explained that he nevertheless shared the guilt with the other boys in the rock-throwing spree. "Do you consider it fair to penalize the other boys just because their son is better?" asked Jack. "That will be $75."

The father grudgingly dug into his pocket. "No," Jack said. "I want him to pay for it out of his allowance."

To watch Jack one would never suspect that he was anxious to get back to his own family. Each boy was given an unhurried hearing. At 8:20 P.M., the session was over. Jack drove home, got into slacks and a sports shirt. After supper, a prowl car pulled up in front of the house and a deputy sheriff rang the doorbell. He had a complaint about property damage done by some teen-agers just beyond the town's boundary—technically, outside the jurisdiction of Beaumont police. He wasn't too familiar with the local juvenile situation—would Jack lend him a hand? Jack got back into uniform, kissed Ava good night and urged her not to wait up for him. But he knew she would.

Jack doesn't have time to be of much use around the house any more. He does take time to perform one service that some wives might resent but Ava relishes: Jack buys all her clothes.

"He knows what I like better than I do," says Ava. Recently, he brought home three new dresses, one size twelve; another, four-teen; the third, size sixteen.

"And they all fit perfectly," says Ava proudly. "They were in three different price ranges and Jack has become so expert he knew the cheaper the dress, the bigger the size."

Shopping in general is not one of Ava's favorite pursuits. "I do most of my day-to-day shopping in the cellar," says Ava. The Shaw basement is stacked high with cartons of canned milk, pork and beans, salt, soap, cleansing powder, toilet tissue, and so on. They buy these by the case, and the local supermarket sells them at a flat 5 per cent markup. Ava gets eggs at a nearby farm for 25 cents a dozen because they are either cracked or not perfectly shaped. With Sarah's help she bakes a three-week supply of bread at one time. Cost: $1.50. Sarah also bakes pies, cakes, cookies and puddings. Ice cream is the only dessert not made in the Shaw kitchen. Most of the time dinner, which consists of meat, vegetables, salad and dessert, comes from the freezer locker and the cellar.

The Shaws have no savings plan, nor do they have any insurance or hospitalization. "But we have our guardian angels," they say. Last year Ava needed major surgery. She kept putting it off. Two Beverly Hills surgeons who had heard about the Shaws' work with children also heard of Ava's plight. They offered their services and even insisted on performing the operation in Beaumont so that Ava would be near her family. When complications developed after the operation, one of the doctors made the 188-mile round trip daily for four days, canceling most of his regular appointments to do so.

Meanwhile, Ava's household was running smoothly, thanks to Jean, the girl who had been too proud to accept help. She had moved in with her eight-month-old baby and had taken complete charge. She cooked and kept house for both families.

A month later, when Jean had departed, Ava found a picture inscribed to her and Jack: "To the bestest second parents a girl could ever wish for. I really appreciate every little and big thing you've done for me. I'll never forget them. Love, Jean." Ava wept.

On the surface, nothing spectacular has occurred in the lives of Jack and Ava Shaw since they arrived in Beaumont. Their finances are in somewhat better shape today. Jack's salary has been raised to $386 a month, plus a small allowance for his uniforms. His Government pension, now $36 a month, covers their current medical expenses; and whenever they're pinched, Ava works a few days at the café, and sometimes Jack hears of a good cattle deal and makes a few dollars. They've just moved into a new three-bedroom, two-bathroom house which they were able to finance under the California Veterans Bill, and the $75-a-month payments do not overtax them. Also, they were able to lease their old house and the five acres of ground to another family for $100 a month, and this just covers their monthly payments and taxes on the old place, so in several years they'll own it free and clear. In leasing the acreage, Jack, ever mindful of his family meat supply, stipulated that he would still be permitted to graze two head of cattle there. Now that they have the room, they have brought in a girl from a poorer family, as company (and baby sitter) for the children.

OLD SONG

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

Round and round
The family hearth
The virus-caught disease'll
Chase until
You think you've won:
Pop! goes the measle.

Not too long ago, an unusual incident occurred at Twin Pines Ranch, the county's camp for boys who have been in trouble. There are no fences at this mountain retreat. But Billy, a boy who needed just a few weeks more to adjust to the camp's discipline, had run away.

Superintendent Johnson picked up the phone with a heavy heart. If he called the sheriff, an all-points bulletin would be issued. This would mean the boy could never come back to camp; he'd be sent to a reformatory.

Johnson suddenly remembered that Billy came from Beaumont, and played a hunch. He called Jack instead of the sheriff.

"Sergeant Shaw," he said, "if Billy shows up at your home, will you please give me a call?"

There was a slight pause.

"He's just coming in the front door," Jack said. "We'll start back right after dinner."

WHY I LOVE MY HUSBAND

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 72

In the two years that followed my dates were just for fun.

I met Paul after he returned from the service. We had known each other in high school, but had lost touch. I knew we were falling in love, and I also knew it wasn't fair to Paul if he wanted the children a marriage to me couldn't bring. My conscience kept saying "Tell him"; my heart kept wondering "Will it make a difference?" Today, as I watch him romping with our adopted children, I think often of the misgivings I had that night I broke the news. Then, I can hear Paul say, "I love you for yourself, not for what you can or cannot give me."

How often he repeated those words after we were married and our friends started having their families. How often when this adoption agency, and then the next, held out no encouragement on the availability of the baby we wanted. How quick I was to forget that he was just as anxious, waiting just as eagerly.

Our two-year-old son has been with us since he was five weeks old. When Stephen was fifteen months old, he helped us choose a tiny baby sister, now a busy toddler about to have her first birthday. In both their baby books you'll find these anonymous lines from one of Stephen's baby cards:

Not flesh of my flesh,
Not bone of my bone,
But still miraculously my own.

Never forget for a single minute
You didn't grow under my heart,
But in it!

It's been over ten years since I sat in the doctor's office and heard him tell me I'd never have a child. But, as Paul says, he didn't tell me I'd never raise a child . . . and that's what I'm doing, not once but twice over, with the wonderful help of the man I love. How could I help but love him?

And how could I help but wish he'd be a little better about picking up his clothes, keeping his home-office in order, organizing his files. Paul's a saver! Every scrap of paper has to be accounted for! He's apt to forget the budget in a sudden spurt of generosity for me, the children or his precious garden; but these, and other things I might change, are insignificant when his step sounds at the door and the whole house comes alive at 5:30 P.M.

A. C.

THE MOST EXASPERATING

Dear Editors: After seventeen years of marriage, I feel I know my husband through and through. He is the most exasperating, maddening, lovable man there ever was! And I hope to spend the rest of my life married to this same exasperating, maddening, lovable man.

My husband's sense of humor is the glue that has cemented into one whole our love, the hardships we've had, and the flashes of pure joy that have come our way. His humor is the fun-poking Will Rogers kind. There's no chance of going pretentious around this house! Our life is very uncomplicated! With six children we could be Geselling and Spocking endlessly, but my husband says, "Give 'em lots of love and enough discipline to understand that crime doesn't pay, and let 'em grow."

Growth in people, plants and projects is very important to him. And he believes in sharing the pleasurable things as we grow. Take our hobbies. His is fishing.

Fishing is easy to share, but it presents its problems. I recall one deceitful spring day when we looked at each other like fools and my husband exclaimed, "Let's go oystering!" (Oystering to us is a delightful business of walking along through the shallow shore waters of Mobile Bay and picking up oysters embedded in the sandy bottom.) My husband's hunter instincts were hitting on eight cylinders; he had to get those oysters! Fortunately there were warm currents scattered through that liquid ice. I did my oystering strictly up and down one of those tepid streaks. See what I mean? Hobbies can be shared!

But sometimes life cannot be met humorously, nor would I want to. There are times when I want special tenderness and love and understanding. A few years ago when a congenital heart disease claimed our infant son, I learned in what full measure my husband possessed those great qualities. That heartbreaking afternoon I took the little bottles from the refrigerator for the last time, and emptied and washed them and put them away. I was still so stunned I hadn't considered how this tragedy was affecting our other children. But my husband had. When I walked into the living room he had our youngest child on his lap, with the other children gathered near, and he was explaining in simple words how their baby brother was now with the little Lord Jesus.

I don't know how he got the words out, he was grieving so. I can never say that a father's love is less than a mother's.

In the months following my husband showed his love and tenderness for me in countless little ways; too many and too personally dear to recount here.

So those are the reasons why I love my husband.

Would I change him in any way? I certainly would! But I would not have him an Adonis, an Eisenhower nor a Charles Boyer; in fact, I would not even change his natural tonsure hairline. I would wish for one thing: that my husband could be a mind reader!

EMMA L. TURNBULL
Daphne, Alabama

FORSAKING ALL OTHERS

Gentlemen: So the editors of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL want to know why I love my husband? Easy, I thought, rummaging frantically for pad and pencil.

But two hours and five fizzles later, I have discovered that it is next to impossible to explain adequately why.

Take my husband, for instance: he's quite good-looking, medium height, dark curly hair. But that also describes the man who's been trying to sell me a typewriter!

Well, he has a terrific sense of humor—not doting on funny stories, but seeing the ridiculous in the commonplace and expressing it by an unexpectedly humorous turn of phrase. But this is exactly our family doctor's type of humor!

H'm-m-m! Let's try again. He's very intelligent and well educated, and we can talk for hours on such diverse subjects as the Dead Sea Scrolls, the pitfalls of modern progressive education, or the psychology of personal counseling. Also, we share a love of outdoor pastimes such as fishing, camping, canoe tripping. But these selfsame things are also true of my husband's brother!

You see what I mean? No matter how much I love my husband, I must admit that those attributes which are presumably the cause of my love are by no means exclusively his. Yet it is undeniably he whom I love; not his brother, nor the typewriter salesman, nor the family doctor!

Why, then, do I love him?

Who can define what really makes this man and this woman stand hand in hand and solemnly swear "till death do us part"? The reason lies partly in those words which the Lord spoke: "—— and forsaking all others, shall cleave only unto her, and the two shall become one flesh." And those other words of the marriage ceremony (so pitifully unheeded in our day): "whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

I love my husband because somehow our personalities have become mysteriously joined together. We are in literal fact "becoming one." How do I know? I think I know it most clearly when that "oneness" is temporarily disturbed. For instance, when we're in the throes of what is politely called "marital discord"—and we've had some lulus in our time!—my resulting personality disorientation is drastic. I can be in a huff with a friend or in a livid rage at our children, yet still function in an organized way. But let a rift occur between me and my husband, and I become literally sick at heart. When we have made up, a flooding sense of well-being engulfs me, as if a terrible split in my own personality had been healed.

This is the essence of marriage, of love. Poor, poor misguided "moderns" who seek with first one person and then another that oneness of life and spirit.

What would I change in my husband? Probably the fault I would most like changed in him is impatience. He always sees how a thing ought to be; and he thinks that by tomorrow—or possibly even tonight—it ought to be changed, improved or completely overhauled. Admittedly, this trait has enabled him already in his work as a pastor to put one defunct church on its feet. But his own violent impatience with shoddy work, or people who hang back because of laziness, low motives or indifference, immensely distresses him and, therefore, me. Our life together would probably be smoother and more peaceful if this trait were abolished or diminished; but—who knows?—it might also be infinitely duller and less satisfying.

JEAN WASSON
North Dakota

Enjoy beautiful new ease in Easter cooking with PYREX® ware

Food cooks so beautifully—browns so evenly, so quickly, in PYREX ware. Tastes so good, too, for food cooked in PYREX ware is completely free of "pan taste." Best of all—you serve food, just as beautifully as you cook it, in the same PYREX dish.

The ham is shown in a PYREX Oval Utility Dish. Easy-grip handles. Doesn't stain. Cleans like a dream. It's baking dish and serving platter, too. 9 3/4 x 16 3/16 x 1 1/2 inches, $1.95.

The candied sweets are baked—and served—in the 2 1/2-qt. PYREX Decorator Casserole. Transparent cover is a table-protecting tile or an extra baking or serving dish. 1 1/2-qt. size, with cover, $2.95; 2 1/2-qt., $3.95.

See PYREX Oval Roasters, Loaf Pans, Oven Roasters and Utility Dishes at your favorite store now.

There's only one PYREX® ware, a product of Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.
Visit the Corning Glass Center, Corning, N.Y. · Corning Means Research in Glass

Mrs. Wizard — that's You!

"Time spent=dollars saved."

Formula for bounty on a budget.

By JEAN ANDERSON

Budget-feeding a family's not easy. But Ava Shaw, of Beaumont, California, does it well. She buys cracked eggs for cooking—25 cents a dozen; milk by the gallon—81 cents; cull apples at an orchard—"They're queer-shaped, but sell 65 pounds for $1"; she makes her own maple syrup at 6 cents a pint; gets tuna and salmon by the case; uses evaporated milk, diluted, for cooking; bakes each week—mostly fruit breads "because the kids love them"; and carefully plans leftovers.

Serving a family of five these nutritious meals each week would normally cost about $31.37.* Ava manages to do it for less than $25. She gardens, last year "put up" 1126 jars of fruits and vegetables for $17, fattened a steer and froze beef at 21 cents a pound. "It's work," she said, "but saves over $300 a year."

Menus based on supermarket prices in Beaumont, early spring, 1958.*

Menus and Costs for One Week

Sunday $7.13

Breakfast	Dinner	Evening Snack
Pineapple Juice	Roast Rump of Beef	Toasted Peanut-Butter-Cheese Sandwiches
Peach-Orange Coffeecake*	Frozen Lima Beans	Tossed Salad
Soft-Cooked Eggs	Mashed Potatoes	Milk
Milk	Vanilla Pudding with Canned Blackberries
Coffee	Milk
	Coffee or Tea

Sunday morning special—Peach-Orange Coffeecake.

68¢

Peach-Orange Coffeecake. Drain well on paper towels 1 No. 2 can cling-peach halves. Slice peaches thinly and drain again. Mix together ⅓ cup dark brown sugar, 1 teaspoon cinnamon and ¼ teaspoon nutmeg. With a pastry blender, cut 3 tablespoons margarine into the spiced sugar until crumbly looking. Make 1 package (2 envelopes) orange muffin mix according to directions. Pour batter into a greased 8″x8″x2″ pan. Carefully lay sliced peaches over the top and sprinkle with brown-sugar mixture. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for about 30 minutes or until done to the touch. Serve hot. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Monday $4.05

Breakfast	School Lunch	Lunch at Home (for two)	Dinner
Stewed Apricots	Beef Sandwiches	Hot Roast-Beef Sandwiches	Ham with Pineapple Sauce
Hot Cereal	Carrot and Celery Sticks	Carrots and Peas	Canned Green Beans
Milk	Applesauce Cookies*	Applesauce Cookies	Sliced Tomatoes
Coffee	Milk	Coffee or Tea	Corn Muffins
			Canned Plums
			Milk

Popular in a packed lunch—Applesauce Cookies.

66¢

Applesauce Cookies: Cream 1 cup dark brown sugar, ¼ cup sugar and ¾ cup margarine until smooth. Beat in 1 egg, then ⅔ cup applesauce. Sift together 3 cups flour, 2 teaspoons each cinnamon and ginger, 1 teaspoon allspice and ½ teaspoon each salt, soda and cloves. Lightly coat 1 cup each seedless raisins and chopped pecans with some of the spiced flour. Mix flour into the batter, flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla, and last of all fold in floured raisins and nuts. Drop batter by teaspoonfuls several inches apart onto a greased baking sheet and bake 12 to 15 minutes in a moderately hot oven, 375° F. Makes 4 to 5 dozen cookies.

STUART

Always popular at the Shaws':
mellow Taglarini, crisp slaw, hot biscuits.

Tuesday $4.77

Breakfast	School Lunch	Lunch at Home (for two)	Dinner
Cereal with Frozen Strawberries	Tuna Sandwiches	Vegetable Soup (leftovers)	Taglarini*
Scrambled Eggs	Oranges	Toast	Cabbage-and-Pimiento Slaw
Milk	Cookies	Canned Peaches	Hot Biscuits
Coffee	Milk	Cookies	Spiced Apples
		Milk	Milk

Quick-and-easy Taglarini is tops with the Shaws.

$2.34

Taglarini: Put 2 tablespoons salad oil in a large skillet and sauté 1 cup chopped onion, ¾ cup minced green pepper and 2 cloves garlic, crushed, until tender. Add 2 pounds ground beef and brown. Drain well 2 cups each canned tomatoes and whole-kernel yellow corn and add to the meat along with ¼ cup tomato paste. Season with 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon orégano, ½ teaspoon pepper and ¼ teaspoon allspice. Simmer the mixture slowly for 20 minutes. Stir in 1¼ cups grated Cheddar cheese and 1 cup sliced, pitted ripe olives. Cook 1 package fine noodles or spaghetti according to package directions. Spoon the noodles onto a large platter and surround them with a border of meat sauce. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Wednesday $4.73

Breakfast	School Lunch	Lunch at Home (for two)	Dinner
Orange Juice	Cheese Sandwiches	Cheese Sandwiches	Lamb Stew with Carrots and Potatoes
French Toast	Bananas	Stewed Tomatoes	Tossed Salad
Coffee	Cookies	Canned Purple Figs	Cherry Cobbler*
Milk	Milk	Milk	Milk
			Coffee or Tea

A new kind of cobbler, as delicious as it is different.

65c

Cherry Cobbler: Drain enough pitted canned red sour cherries to make 1 quart, saving 1 cup syrup. Mix together 1 cup sugar, ¼ cup cornstarch and ½ teaspoon salt. In a saucepan combine sugar mixture with 1 cup cherry syrup and a few drops red coloring. Heat, stirring, until thick and clear. Add 1 tablespoon margarine, 1 teaspoon vanilla, ½ teaspoon almond extract and the cherries. Cook slowly, stirring occasionally, for 15 minutes. Pour cherries into a 1½-quart casserole. Cover with topping. Makes 6 to 8 servings. Topping: Mix together 1 cup cake flour, 2 table-

CONTINUED ON PAGE 172

NOW!

Just add boiling water—a home-cooked frosting is born right in your mixing bowl!

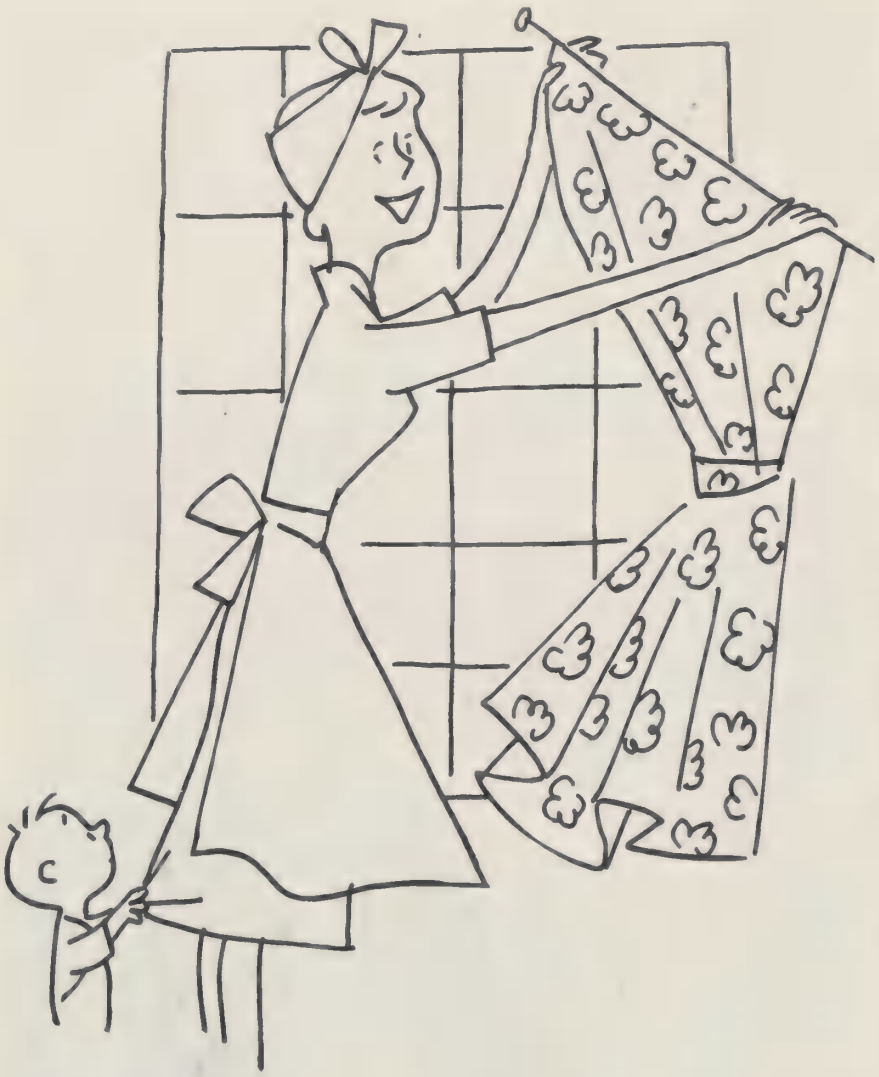
Like your fudge frosting rich and chocolatey? Try our new Chocolate Fudge Frosting Mix! You just add boiling water and presto! You've real home-cooked fudge frosting . . . ready in seconds . . . without cooking. Easy! Thrifty, too. There's plenty of creamy shortening right in the mix. And our fudge frosting will never, never fail you.



"I guarantee a perfect* frosting every time!" Betty Crocker General Mills

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

TRY ALL FOUR BETTY CROCKER FROSTING MIXES:

FLUFFY WHITE | CHOCOLATE MALT | PEANUT CREME | CHOCOLATE FUDGE

"We paid rent on our house before we built it"

The Walkers have just moved into a brand-new, wonderful home of their own. From their savings, they used $2500 for the down payment and $1000 more for new things for the house. A while ago, they hit on a smart idea. Every time they paid rent, they put an amount equal to a quarter of the rent into their savings account and "earmarked" it for their new home. Earnings on their savings helped their account grow. Then came the happy day when they could buy the home they wanted.

The place they chose to save was their Insured Savings and Loan Association. Here, fine returns and friendly cooperation make any savings plan work more quickly, more easily. Savings are insured up to $10,000 by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, an agency of the U. S. Government. Why not stop by and start saving today for any of the things you want?

WHERE YOU SAVE DOES MAKE A DIFFERENCE

Look for this symbol of safety where you save

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION · SAFETY OF YOUR SAVINGS INSURED UP TO $10000

Sponsored by The Savings & Loan Foundation, Inc., 1111 E Street, N. W., Washington 4, D. C.

Mrs. Wizard that's You!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 171

Baking means bowls to lick, so the "lickers" look on.

DI PIETRO

spoons confectioners' sugar, 1 tablespoon sugar, 1 tablespoon lemon rind, 1 teaspoon baking powder and ¼ teaspoon salt. Cut 6 tablespoons margarine into dry ingredients until the mixture is like coarse meal. With a fork, blend in ¼ cup evaporated milk. Turn onto a floured board and roll ¼" thick. Cut circles with a biscuit cutter. Arrange on cherries. Bake in a hot oven, 450° F., for 15 minutes or until golden brown.

Thursday $2.65

Breakfast	School Lunch	Lunch at Home (for two)	Dinner
Applesauce	Ham Sandwiches	Taglarini (leftover)	Frankfurters with Baked Beans
Poached Eggs	Carrot and Celery Sticks	Carrot and Celery Sticks	Canned Asparagus
Cereal	Pears	Cranberry-Nut Bread	Mixed Fruits
Milk	Cranberry-Nut Bread* (as a sweet)	Coffee or Tea	Milk
Coffee	Milk

Cranberry-Nut Bread doubles nicely as "a sweet."

59¢

Cranberry-Nut Bread: Simmer 1 cup cranberries in 2 cups water until skins pop. Drain and purée. Now add ¼ cup sugar and the grated rind of 1 orange and 1 lemon. Sift together 3 cups flour, ¾ cup sugar, 2 teaspoons cinnamon, 1 teaspoon salt, and ½ teaspoon each cloves and nutmeg. Mix together 1 well-beaten egg, 2 tablespoons melted margarine and 1 cup milk. Stir into the cranberry mixture. Mix 1 cup chopped pecans with spiced flour and add to cranberry mixture. Bake in a greased 9"x5"x3" loaf pan for about 1 hour in a moderate oven, 350° F. Cool loaf on a rack, wrap in aluminum foil and let stand overnight.

Friday $3.46

Breakfast	School Lunch	Lunch at Home (for two)	Dinner
Orange Juice	Peanut-Butter Sandwiches	Tuna-Salad Sandwiches	Salmon Loaf*
Hot Cereal	Hard-Cooked Eggs	Coleslaw	Harvard Beets
Milk	Bananas	Cookies	Hot Biscuits
Coffee	Cookies	Milk	Fruit-Gelatin Dessert
	Milk		Milk

Salmon Loaf—a Friday-night family favorite.

$1.15

Salmon Loaf: Mix together a 16-ounce can salmon, 24 saltines, 1½ cups drained canned tomatoes, 1 cup drained, canned green peas, ½ cup chopped onion and 2 slightly beaten eggs. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon each Worcestershire sauce, dry mustard and orégano, ¼ teaspoon each pepper and basil, and ⅛ teaspoon nutmeg. Bake in a greased 9"x5"x3" loaf pan for 1 hour in a moderate oven, 350° F., or until firm. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Saturday $4.34

Breakfast	Lunch	Children's Snack	Dinner
Tomato Juice	Macaroni and Cheese	Cranberry-Nut Bread	Boiled Beef with Dumplings*
Waffles with Syrup	Canned Green Beans	Milk	Canned Peas
Milk	Applesauce		Lettuce Salad with Mayonnaise
Coffee	Milk		Chocolate Pudding
			Milk

Savory and cents-saving—Boiled Beef with Dumplings.

$1.48

Boiled Beef with Dumplings: Melt 1 tablespoon margarine in a large skillet, then brown 2 pounds beef chuck, cut into 1½" cubes. Season with 2 teaspoons each salt and grated orange rind, 1 bay leaf, crumbled, ½ teaspoon pepper and ¼ teaspoon each ginger and allspice. Slice 2 onions into the pan and sauté until tender. Dilute 2 cans beef consommé with 1 can water and heat in a Dutch oven. Add browned beef and onions and simmer, covered, for about 1½ hours or until tender. Drop in dumplings. Makes 6 to 8 servings. Dumplings: Sift 1½ cups flour with ¾ teaspoon salt and 2¼ teaspoons baking powder. With a pastry blender, work in 2 teaspoons shortening until mixture is crumbly. Add ¾ cup milk all at once and mix in with a fork. Drop by teaspoonfuls onto boiling gravy. Cook, covered, over moderate heat for 16 minutes. Don't peek!

WHY I LOVE MY WIFE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 73

aid, I can't think of another woman I'd two cents for as a wife, but I wouldn't a million dollars in cash for the one I've

Sincerely yours,
D. R. RICKBORN
Columbia, South Carolina

AT WICKED GLEAM

ur Editors: There is a heavily underlined tation in one of my wife's favorite old ks. It reads, "Lack of something to feel portant about is almost the greatest tragedy an may have." She says I am a good hus- d. If I am, it is because her understanding his has made me feel needed, appreciated— important.

have never brought home a check without ord of approbation. One of her favorite is impish, "You is a awful good provider." netimes she will punch a button on my st and say, "Ping! You poor men. Just like registers. We punch a button and out es money." That makes me strut.

Ve maintain a joint checking account. She tes checks for routine bills. But she caters ny masculine dignity by saving the major cks for me to write: charge accounts, taxes, tributions, and the like.

he "builds me up" before other people in tle ways. A new possession is something gave me!" We don't "go out" for din- —"he takes me." She often says, "Frank eves ——" Things like that. Little things t count.

he insists that I have the regular medical l dental care that is routine with women that most men neglect.

My wardrobe—even when it was limited— watched over carefully. "You must look r best. It's good business." When my meals irregular I never sit down alone. She sits h me for coffee and to exchange the hap- ings of the day.

never eat breakfast alone, nor is the ta- ever littered with gaping cereal boxes or f-empty cartons of milk. Nor do I look at alf-dressed woman. For years her stand- good-by has been, "See you tonight. Give hell!"

Women are strange and wonderful crea- es. About all mine asks in return for her lerstanding are little niceties and courte- . I am careful to give them: just holding chair at the table even when alone, or nding aside at the door, or good manners ntering or leaving the car. I have seen a ner wicked gleam in her eye when she knew er wives observed. And she always says, hank you."

am now sixty and semiretired. We are el- w to elbow under the same roof twenty-four rs a day many days. We eat most meals ether. This is a situation that would drive st women frantic: "a man underfoot." In- d, we are harvesting a bumper crop of npanionship from her sowing and cultivat- . We are inseparable friends—liking the ne work, books, music, pictures, conversa- tion and recreations—to the amazement of less fortunate couples.

We treasure the comment of a young mar- ried woman who said to us recently, "You two don't seem married at all. You seem to like each other."

Her faults? I'd be an ungrateful stinker to mention the funny little inconsistencies that are a necessary part of thoroughly feminine womanhood. I live with 'em, laugh at them and love them.

FRANK A. COOPER

SWORD DANCE

Dear Editors: You ask Why I Love My Wife. In reply I ask: What would I be without her? She and I have been married only four years. "Wait till you reach the dangerous stage," our friends say. I am not afraid. Before our marriage, and again before our first child, we were warned of difficult adjustments and readjustments. They were not difficult; they were indiscernible.

I am not afraid, because I am married to Carol.

Carol's husband is a college teacher. His job is not an ivory-tower occupation. It demands and gets his attention all day seven days a week, and most evenings. True, there are long vacations—in which he reads and writes long books. He is typically myopic, earnest, humorless, dogged and preoccupied. His wife, therefore, must be farsighted, earnest, full of fun, serious, quick-witted and doubly alert. She does not talk at breakfast if he is chewing over his nine-o'clock lecture; but if he decides to test the lecture out loud between the grapefruit and the eggs, she not only listens. She appraises. Nor does she let the baby distract her attention.

When the baby has a rash and her husband a departmental worry, she, being serious and earnest, gives the worry its due priority. ("The

SPLIT ROOT

By JOSEPH LANGLAND

From cuts and bruises
The aspen roots
Throw up new branches
In greener shoots.

I find it hard,
Yet harshly true,
To admit to a law
In such a view;

Still, I have admired
The Judas tree,
The crown-of-thorns,
And the yew's berry.

60-SECOND AMBROSIA

FAST—AND FANCY! JUST TEAM UP CANNED FRUIT COCKTAIL AND BAKER'S ANGEL FLAKE COCONUT!

Imagine an ambrosia you make with five fruits instead of one! An ambrosia you turn out in 60 seconds flat!

Here it is—60-second Ambrosia! Bursting with luscious peaches and pears...with plump grapes and cherries...with golden bits of pineapple. All neatly cut, all ready to use—in canned fruit cocktail!

And here's the way you make this new ambrosia—in next to no time at all...!

60-SECOND AMBROSIA

1. Drain one #2½ can chilled fruit cocktail.
2. Stir in one 3½ oz. can Baker's Angel Flake Coconut, ¼ cup frozen concentrated orange juice. 6 grand servings!

IDEA: Great way to start the day. Dinner, too!

FRUIT COCKTAIL

CANNED FRUIT COCKTAIL FROM CALIFORNIA

Cling Peach Advisory Board · California Canning Pear Growers
Baker's and Angel Flake are registered trademarks of General Foods Corp.

rash will go away by itself," she says.) But if he returns at night to learn that the rash is measles and imaginatively remarks, "I told you to call the doctor," her sense of humor comes to the fore. It also saves the day when he says that they cannot afford to go to the inn for dinner and then suggests inviting his dozen seniors to supper.

She has learned—No! She was married already knowing—how to do a sword dance among her husband's moods, how to be at will (his will) an intellectual sounding board, a gay companion, an abandoned lover, an ascetic bluestocking and an expert household manager. To be daughter to his parents, mother-sister-wife-and-lover to her husband, adored mummy to her children.

What would I be without her? Of the lonely bachelor, the dull professor, the heavy-witted pedant, the childless dead end, only she can make a happy husband, an understanding teacher, a nimble-witted scholar, a proud father

How could I not love her?

What Would I Change in my Wife? If I were never again to feel superior because I'm compulsively neat and she is just normally messy; if I were never again to correct her "lay" with my "lie"; if I were nevermore privileged to remark, "Dear, I don't want to hurry you, but it is five minutes of ——" No, I wouldn't change these things. Before marriage, I did not secretly plan how I would change her after marriage. And I haven't changed her, and I can't change her, and I wouldn't if I could. I love her much the best the way she is.

G. L.
Massachusetts

UNANIMOUS VOTE

Gentlemen: I have been studying my wife carefully for eighteen years. I believe the following to be correct, allowing for minor variations due to semantic inaccuracies or revisions of opinion due to additional data.

She is five feet and a little in height, small-boned—a nice size for dancing with, or carrying about. Once pretty, she is now beauti redheaded, with various-colored eyes—u ally hazel.

She lies about her age.

She is impetuous, childish, tyrannical, te peramental, imperious, impatient, stubbo argumentative, rattlebrained, exasperat bright, frugal, amusing, guileless, gentle, af tionate, submissive, kind, steady, loyal, cent, intelligent, mature, wise, courageous utterly unselfish. She has a very dirty temp

She fills my house with joy.

I wouldn't change a thing.

G. A. R.
New York

P.S. Have discussed this subject with b sons. They agree.

REALEMON . . . and the livin' is easy!

Salads: REALEMON Lemon Juice makes lower calorie salads and salad dressings that sing with new zest and tang! "RECONSTITUTED" is your guarantee of uniform strength and flavor in every drop!

Seafoods: Spark up lobster, shrimps, fish with REALEMON. Does wonders for prepared cocktail sauces or your own favorite recipe. Lemons may vary, but REALEMON is always uniform—always ready!

Desserts: So easy now to make lemon pies, cakes, custards, with REALEMON. You just pour your lemon juice from the bottle. No squeezing . . . no waste or spoilage!

Tea: Lemonade: Almost everybody loves refreshing REALEMON-ade, but have you tried hot lemonade or REALEMON in hot tea during the "sniffle season"? Thousands use REALEMON with Honey, Baking Soda, or Aspirin, too!

Party Beverages: Party punches, mixed drinks — even soft drinks taste better because REALEMON Lemon Juice zips up the flavor, everytime, in quick time!

New "Plastic" Lemons! Now you can use REALEMON at the table like salt 'n' pepper! New, realistic 'lemons' and 'limes' contain natural strength juice. You just squeeze 'em, they sit flat.

we squeeze . . . you pour!

A Product and Reg. T.M. of REALEMON-PURITAN CO., Chicago 9, Illinois, San Fernando, California

A KITCHEN FOR THE REST OF OUR LIVES

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 115

225 pounds of frozen food, store-bought or home-frozen, can be stowed away here to give a carefree independence when it comes to food shopping. In addition to the usuals, I know Louise will have a goodly supply of individual pizza pies. She has a way of adding grated cheese, anchovies and button mushrooms and toasting under the broiler to make a delectable hearty first course—fitting for bracing New England weather.

It really is a pleasure to string beans or wash salad greens and strip away withered leaves, for there is a glorious view of mountains to enjoy—framed by the window above the sink.

HOBBY:

BIRDS

Last winter the bird-watching Baggs spotted in their area white-breasted nuthatches, hairy and downy woodpeckers, juncos, scarlet tanagers wearing coats of olive green with only a few scarlet feathers. Bob put up bird feeders, Louise supplied them all from the big kitchen as snow fell and even the brown rabbits turned white-coated. Also on hand through the year are pheasant, quail, partridge, sandpipers, and water birds like killdeer that fly straight up with a whir of wings.

Then the debris is easily put out of sight down the garbage disposer in the sink. This small device ably handles one of the most disagreeable kitchen tasks, and since it grinds up food waste from preparation and from the table there is no garbage problem. Of course cans, bottles and other such are still collected outside.

Creative cook Bob made friends with the dishwasher immediately. After any meal the cleanup is so simple when plates and glassware and kitchen utensils too—except those with cooked-on foods—are automatically washed and dried. For two-person families like the Baggs, the timesaving way to wash is to rinse and stack dishes after each meal but wash them only once a day.

Since there are two cooks in this family, separating the oven and cooking top avoids traffic jams—particularly when each section has its quota of counter near it. The oven is installed at elbow height, so it is convenient to add or remove foods. Built into the oven is a rotisserie arrangement, and even before they moved in the Baggs started a collection of barbecue recipes. We'd guess that succulent, juicy and brown rotisseried Cornish hens from a nearby poultry farm will be a specialty of the house.

The oven serves equally well for the usual kind of baking or roasting, such as the household's favorite baked beans. (Every "white birch" family always had baked beans on Saturday, according to Louise.) The cooking top has one unit with a temperature minder that regulates the flow of heat at any level Louise may set—just right for measuring the heat during the long, slow cooking of a g Yankee pot roast, the family decided.

These timesavers are important, but w really sets the kitchen apart is the clever rangement of them. In a floor plan like t a routine U-shaped kitchen might have fitt Instead, the oven is installed diagonally acr one corner—easy to see and reach from part of the kitchen. With this arrangem there is reachable counter or place to unl the oven on either side.

The angled cooking top pleased Louise m of all. Standing here, she faces the keep room and her company, and can talk e while she turns the fish and serves the v tables. The arrangement even allowed f snack counter; and best of all, it meant her light from the kitchen window was blocked at all.

For this kitchen, Bob and Louise deci that metal cabinets were their preference. T chose a lovely blue color of a morning horiz and the cabinets have such refinements rubber door bumpers, nylon drawer roll and sound-deadened construction. "A jo says Louise. The kitchen was tailored to Baggs' own needs, too, with such features storage between counter and wall cabinet the spices and herbs and little items invaria lost in full-size cabinets. Above the oven cabinet with sliding glass doors holds bea ful ironstone and china serving pieces. A the corner wall cupboard where glassw and dishes are kept has turn-around shel so each small item can be reached. The cabi below has shelves that pivot out so the b reaches are serviceable too.

All wall cabinets have adjustable shelves accommodate the milk glass and pink tow design dishes and food supplies in this hor We are all very partial to the sliding shel and trays in base cabinets, which mean supplies and utensils can be surveyed eas The main counters in the kitchen are a wh

HOBBY:

COOKING

Bob and Louise's baked beans with salt pork are "white birch" (old settler) specials. Louise takes 2 pounds navy or pea beans, washes and picks them over carefully, then soaks overnight. In the morning she parboils them with 1 pound salt pork (cut into 1″x3″ strips with rind removed). When beans are tender she combines them with 2 teaspoons salt, 4 tablespoons molasses, 8 tablespoons sugar, 1 large onion, ½ cup chili sauce or catchup or tomato juice, and 6 cups water, and turns it all into a bean pot. Cover and bake in a slow oven, 275° F., 7 to 8 hours, adding water as necessary, and during last hour remove cover for browning. And, says Louise, the recipe cooks just as deliciously in an electric Dutch oven turned to low heat, but it takes longer.

hard plastic with a faint green cracklelike design. And there is a kind-to-knives wood section near the sink for slicing work, and a stainless-steel insert around the cooking top to protect against excess heat.

The small rounded dining counter, open underneath, is just big enough to take two stools and serve coffee breaks or breakfast. Louise uses it even more as a serving counter where salads or desserts can be arranged before mealtime.

The floor is a real inspiration. It is a crushed-stone effect in plastic with the warm tones of the wood plus flecks of turquoise and white—handsome! The plastic sheet is backed with a spongy surface, so it's a foot saver too. With two cockers, Sandy and Carbie, to think about, Louise was wary of the dirt eight paws would bring in. This floor was her answer—it resists soiling and takes very little care.

When son Bob and his new bride join them for tasty succotash (up their way it's made with salt pork) they sit at the round cherry table near the windows where they can watch the changing blue lights on Mount Pomeroy and scan the sky for birds heading north for the summer. The dining chairs are faithful reproductions of colonial ones, with authentic stencil designs, made in a recently reopened factory near the Baggs. When winter winds blow, the draperies will be drawn and a cheerful fire lighted in the fireplace.

For nighttime enjoyment of the keeping room, there are lamps that brighten even the distant corners. Built-in lights over the sink, in wall cabinet and in the ventilating hood light the work areas. An attractive round fluorescent light in the ceiling gives good general light. A large pull-down lamp is suspended over the eating table, and there is a smaller version over the breakfast serving counter.

The living room of the house—"a typical Victorian parlor," Louise says—is just behind the fireplace wall of the family room, and filled with furniture handed down through the family "because we like to live with familiar things." In it stands the old upright piano which Bob Sr. and Jr. both play.

As Louise picks up mending in front of the fire these nights, she often hears Bob playing the old favorites, "the 'home' songs." Like him, she feels happily settled, for the rest of their lives.

HOBBY:

FLOWERS

When spring came this year, Bob and Louise transplanted favorite blooms from the old house, including white violets that years ago came from Shakespeare's home. Later they hope to add "flowers with memories" from other, closer landmarks. It's a big help, Louise thinks, to have garden-minded friends who'll bring back seeds or sprouts from historic areas. She plans outdoor flower boxes later for the big sitting-room window.

SPRING SHAD FEAST

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

use the fresh roe, wash them carefully, being certain not to break the thin membrane. Drain roe well and dust with the thinnest film of flour. Season each with salt and pepper. Sauté them gently in butter until golden brown. Remember to keep the heat low—if it's too high, the membrane will break, scattering the roe. Now turn the roe, again taking care not to break them open, and sauté until golden brown on the other side. Remove to a heated platter and garnish with ½ pound crisp cooked bacon. If you like the flavor, sauté the roe in bacon drippings instead of butter. Garnish the platter with lemon wedges and radish roses. Makes 8 servings.

Perfect flavor and color companions for the shad as it rests on the platter: potato balls and garden-sweet fresh green peas with mint and orange rind.

POTATO BALLS

With a ball scoop make a quart of potato balls. You will need about 4 pounds potatoes. (The rest of the potatoes can be mashed for tomorrow's dinner.) Cook the potato balls in boiling salted water until just tender, 15 to 20 minutes. Drain. Pour a generous amount of melted butter over all and season with salt and pepper. Add to the heated platter with the roe and garnish with a sprinkling of paprika. Makes 8 servings.

PEAS WITH MINT AND ORANGE RIND

Wash, then hull 4 pounds fresh peas. Put about 1" water in the bottom of a large saucepan. Bring to boiling, add the peas, cover and simmer until tender. Meanwhile, peel off the rind from half an orange in ½" strips. Be sure there is no white left on the rind. Cut the strips crosswise into very fine slivers, about the thickness of strong thread or string—enough to make 3 tablespoons. Heat with ½ cup butter—let the rind slivers stand in the butter for a few minutes to steep the flavor. When the peas are tender, drain off remaining water and add butter and orange rind along with ¼ cup finely chopped mint (use fresh mint for this). Season to taste with salt and pepper and arrange on the shad-roe platter.

All pink and white, beautiful as the first spring blossoms, is Royal Meringue Dessert. Velvety moist, a faintly sweet bit of fluff, meringue emerges with strawberry whipped cream, succulent red berries and wisps of almond-flavored coconut as an ambrosial dessert, delicate in texture and flavor, just right after the shad-roe bounty. But don't let this fragile-as-Dresden dessert deceive you. Actually, it isn't difficult to prepare.

ROYAL MERINGUE DESSERT

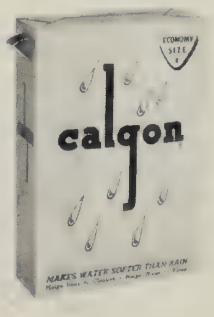
Whip 8 egg whites and ½ teaspoon cream of tartar until foamy. Add 1 cup sugar, 2 tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition. When the meringue will stand in stiff glossy peaks, spoon it into a 10-cup ring mold. This is one mold that does not have to be greased. Do this carefully to eliminate any large air bubbles along the sides or in the center of the meringue. Set the ring mold in another pan which has about 1" hot water in it. Then bake in a very slow oven, 250° F., for 45 minutes or until the meringue is set. Remove the ring mold from the water and allow to cool until the meringue settles. Just before serving, loosen the meringue from the pan with a knife that has been dipped in water to prevent its tearing the meringue. Invert on a serving dish. The meringue may be made in the morning for dinner service.

Strawberry Whipped Cream: Defrost a 10½-ounce package frozen sliced strawberries according to directions on the box. Then buzz in a blender or rub through a sieve. Beat 1 cup heavy cream until very thick but still shiny. Fold in the strawberry purée and chill until ready to serve. Toss 1½ cups flaked toasted coconut with 2 teaspoons almond flavoring.

To serve: Put strawberry cream in a small bowl that will fit in the center of the meringue ring. Garnish with sugared fresh berries. Sprinkle plain or toasted almond-flavored flaked or shredded coconut over the cream and berries and garnish with a few sprigs of mint. Makes 8 servings.

Once your guests are served, relax and cherish the moments of guests enjoying themselves—and your shad feast. A tribute to spring, a tribute to you. END

REVOLUTION IN THE LAUNDRY—



Modern washers put Calgon® into rinse to end hangover dirt left by soaps and detergents

NOW . . . GET YOUR CLOTHES UP TO 39% CLEANER! The big reason for dull, gray, stiff or scratchy clothes is the soap and soil left in them after ordinary rinsing. And these deposits build up in clothes, wash after wash. At last, washer makers have solved this problem—they've developed ways to add Calgon automatically to the rinse. Only a Calgon rinse completely removes soap and soil to give you really clean clothes. For years, women have manually added Calgon to the wash and rinse. Now it's so easy to get your clothes super-clean, feather-soft and bright with the new automatic Calgon rinse. See the wonderful difference—add Calgon to the rinse in your present washer.

New! Hamilton washers add Calgon automatically to rinse!

The new Hamilton Fabric Conditioner automatically adds Calgon to the rinse water for cleaner, brighter clothes.

CALGON ENDS PROBLEMS CAUSED BY WATER

THE UNSUSPECTING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 70

of near poverty and in wistful ignorance toyed with a fortune at the end of a gold chain.

Elizabeth seldom spoke of the pendant and never displayed it: it was a private thing of joy or sorrow, and she wore it tucked inside her dress. But when she sat among us, as she did that Sunday afternoon, she would pull it out by the chain and idly turn it in her fingers. Now and then we caught sight of its startling brilliance, but we had never liked Edward and so we never mentioned it. To us it was a worthless bauble from a worthless wretch. If she held it in her palm smiling her faintly melancholy smile, we looked away and often as not spoke of John Clendaniel. Then her eyes would light with a twinkle of droll mischief.

Mr. Malachi was a silent, obsequious little man with tight-lidded black eyes. He had apparently been standing in the doorway some time before any of us saw him. The front door was closed that day, so he must have heard our voices coming through the garden door which stood open to let in the afternoon sunlight.

When Elizabeth, startled at seeing him, rose hastily to meet him, she let the pendant drop from her fingers and fall upon her bosom. When she approached him, smiling inquiringly, he did not move, except to tremble; the color left his face and his small eyes gleamed like buttons of jet.

Elizabeth received him graciously and he sat among us, a curious little foreigner, trying anxiously to keep abreast of the conversation. We are small-town and foreigners unnerve us and so we chattered all the more self-centeredly to cover our discomfiture.

With heavy decorum Mr. Malachi made one or two references to Edward. Elizabeth replied with quiet grace, but the rest of us met his words in silence. We didn't feel in the least sentimental about Edward.

During a pause in the conversation Mr. Malachi, glancing at Mary and Hannah and me, turned to Elizabeth with an apologetic air:

"Dear Mrs. Starr, I am afraid my calling at this hour is an intrusion. But I hesitated to pay an evening call for fear you are in the habit of retiring early." His voice, it seemed to me, held an inflection of inquiry.

"Indeed you are not intruding, Mr. Malachi," Elizabeth began and Hannah interrupted her with a deep chuckle.

"If you called this evening you would certainly be intruding. Mrs. Starr receives Mr. Clendaniel in the evening. Although sometimes," she added and winked at Mary and me, "it's nearer morning."

We laughed and Mr. Malachi leaned forward with a polite if bewildered smile and lifted his eyebrows inquiringly. We replied with a chorus of cryptic explanations.

"Mr. John Clendaniel," I said, "is Mrs. Starr's most devoted admirer, Mr. Malachi."

"And a perfectly terrible rascal," said Hannah.

"He avoids going out in the daytime and only calls at night," Mary Pike said, and added, "You can't keep him out, either. Locked doors mean nothing to John Clendaniel!"

"Actually"—Hannah lowered her voice confidentially—"he is wanted by the law."

"Imagine keeping company with a man like that," I said.

Mr. Malachi, appearing to be still more puzzled, looked appealingly at Elizabeth.

"But surely, Mrs. Starr, your friends are joking."

Elizabeth smiled at him and murmured with that curious catch of laughter that ran through her voice when she spoke of John Clendaniel, "I'm afraid they are very close to the truth, Mr. Malachi. But even so," she added, "he's a dear."

With a fleeting expression of some private satisfaction, he executed an ingratiating little bow of deference. As he did, his hard, tight-lidded eyes rested for a moment on the frail hand that closed around the gold chain.

Sometimes in an idle corner of my mind I imagine time as a clock whose hands may be turned backward or forward in order to confound the forces of evil. If only at that moment when, having risen to take his leave, he stood once more in the doorway with his shadow before him, I could have turned the hand of time ahead just one day! For less than twenty-four hours later I knew that he had come for the Jens Diamond; I knew that seeking Edward Starr's impoverished widow, left forgotten in some obscure American town, had been a nagging hunch, played in desperation, for Mr. Malachi mistrusted hunches; he was more at home with simple down-to-earth logic. And he had a flair for selecting either an innocent scapegoat or an accomplice to take the main risk. Any scapegoat would do. But an accomplice must be bold and effective and, necessarily, desperate. Consequently, when he planned the most daring jewel theft of his career, he had selected Edward Starr, whom he knew by reputation as a colorful, if unlucky, gambler. Starr was bold enough to take the main risk, and desperate enough, having run through his wife's money by then. And effective! The thing had gone off as smoothly as lifting an orange from a fruit peddler's cart. But the conservative Mr. Malachi had underestimated Edward Starr's boldness, for Starr had fled with the diamond. Mr. Malachi had doggedly followed him over three continents, losing his trail again and again. When at last he had found him in a lodginghouse in Prague, he was dying. Dying and without the Jens Diamond. To Mr. Malachi's insane pleading, he only smiled bitterly, murmured that it was well hidden and went on with his dying. So Mr. Malachi's search continued: years of painstaking work in which he tracked down endless false leads which only brought him to the end of his inhuman patience. And then, unwillingly but doggedly, he played his nagging hunch.

Elizabeth's poor little body was found late in the morning in her drawing room. The lights were burning and the draperies were drawn. She was crumpled on the floor, looking very small, with her neck broken.

The room gave the appearance of a clumsy, run-of-the-mill burglary: table drawers had been pulled out, a curio cabinet had been broken into, but the only things that had been stolen were money and a few bright trinkets; a little band of opals was missing from her finger, her purse had been looted of its meager contents, a gold pillbox had been taken from the mantel, and Edward's pendant was gone.

Jim Carney was as shocked and as grieved as I was. And as puzzled. We had had petty burglaries from time to time: the candy shop, the Jewel Theater; but nothing like this. Jim asked me what I thought about it and I shook my head.

"A prowler, I suppose. Some mischievous lout. But why? Why Elizabeth? What did Elizabeth have?"

What, indeed, I thought, did Elizabeth have but a few trinkets and a dream? She was a gentle girl who had grown old; who had loved deeply and lost greatly and who had dreamed a laughing dream to make up for all that was gone; who had nothing to share with the friends she loved but a little enchantment.

We grieved so. All but John Clendaniel. And how he must have rejoiced! How wildly happy he must have been, if we could believe Elizabeth; and, for all our laughing, I suppose, in our hearts, we did. For we had been brought up to believe in John Clendaniel: Elizabeth and Hannah and Mary and me; and Jim Carney too. We had all heard the tale as little children and we had shivered to hear it and sighed.

He was a black sheep, John was, a dashing ne'er-do-well who, a hundred years ago, had fallen so much in love with a girl that he had given up his reckless ways and changed into a respectable, peace-loving man, until he discovered that her love was false. Then, in his raging sorrow, he had killed her lover, and when they pursued him over the hills to bring him back for hanging, his horse had fallen into a quarry and John Clendaniel had died. And for a hundred years his ghost had wandered over the hills looking for a true love. What a splendid, tragic figure he was to us! Oh, how we believed in John Clendaniel!

Sickness is introduced into our bodies by ourselves, by our ignorance, our weakness or our sins. The idea that sickness is sin is not as irrational as it sounds.

DR. MARTIN GUMPERT
You Are Younger Than You Think
Duell, Sloan and Pearce

But it was Elizabeth who captured him. I was after Edward died and living in loneliness had become her habit that she said to us one day with a twinkle in her eye and that little catch of laughter in her voice:

"I was walking in the hills today and I met John Clendaniel there. He asked me to be his true love. And do you know what I did? I promised him that I would."

For years we laughed and teased her while she enchanted us with hilariously improbable tales of their outlandish courtship.

"I suppose," Jim sighed heavily, as he eased himself down on the corner of my desk, "that you're about right. A prowler. Something like that. Except for one thing," he added thoughtfully. "The garden door wasn't locked and no other door or window had been forced. Elizabeth wouldn't leave the door unlocked at night. It looks like she let somebody in."

"Oh, horse feathers, Jim!" I said. "Open the door to a prowler?"

"That's not what I'm saying. I mean that she'd open the door only to someone she knew."

"Who, for instance? Me?"

"Who's that Mala . . . what's-his-name fellow?"

"Mr. Malachi? He's one of those art dealers here about the Primrose collection. He knew Edward once."

"That's no recommendation," Jim snorted. "Foreigner, isn't he?"

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Jim, don't be so small-town! Foreigner or not, he isn't the type of man to commit a petty burglary."

"Is he the type of man to commit murder?" In spite of my skepticism, a cold chill ran up my spine. "It wouldn't hurt to question him," Jim continued. "I'll just say someone thought they saw him . . . could have been mistaken . . . you know."

"All right, you're the sheriff."

"Glad you told me," he said dryly, looking at me all spread out behind the desk. "Sometimes I wonder."

I lifted the phone, waited for our combination postmistress-town crier to get off the line and rang the inn.

Mr. Malachi arrived carrying his suitcase and wearing an aspect of solemn bereavement. Speaking softly in a whisper, he declared his intention to render whatever assistance he might, even if it meant missing his train, which left at noon. It was nine minutes to twelve.

Jim assured him that that would not be necessary and, red in the face and steadfastly avoiding my eye, he observed to Mr. Malachi that "someone" was almost certain of having seen him last night in the vicinity of Mrs. Starr's residence.

Mr. Malachi failed to suppress a little start, but he calmly replied, "Oh, yes. I called on Mrs. Starr last evening. I thought I might not have an opportunity to see her this morning, so I went to say good-by." As he paused, Jim tossed a smug glance at me. Mr. Malachi, intercepting it, dropped his eyes and after a moment said quietly, "But really, I cannot imagine who could have done this shocking thing." He paused again, but with an air of delicacy, as though there was something he preferred not to have to say.

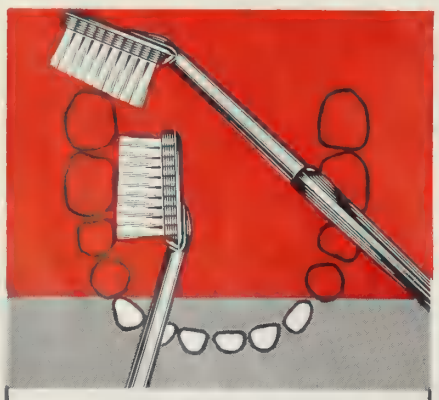
Jim leaned forward. "Yes, sir?" he prompted the delicate Mr. Malachi.

"I hesitate to mention something which can surely have no bearing on this clumsy, tragic affair," he said softly and regretfully, "but as I was leaving Mrs. Starr's house last evening, a gentleman called. Mrs. Starr introduced us."

With a wail the noon train announced its approach to the little station down the street. Mr. Malachi rose from his chair and began carefully smoothing his gloves.

"Do you remember this man's name, sir?" Jim asked tensely.

In replying, Mr. Malachi had never been more logical. Or less down-to-earth.



"Why, yes," he said, moving toward the door, "it was a Mr. John Clendaniel."

When Jim Carney's expression finally changed from openmouthed astonishment to deadly amusement, Mr. Malachi's small, black, wicked eyes went flat, like a snake's.

I pulled out three rows of stitches trying to get the keys to the jail untangled from my knitting.

END

aper toe shoes you'll love to live in today's

Enna Jetticks

The Shoes You Love To Live In

Fan

confident of their fashion delighted with their fit relaxing in their comfort

Milano

Futura

Honey

These taper-toe fashions offer you every feature of a fine shoe. Beautiful leathers set off by distinctive trims . . . slim lines that flatter your feet because of the smoothest fit . . . light, flexible walking ease—roomy comfort accentuated by soft cushioned insoles. Stop in at your favorite ENNA JETTICK dealer and step into these luxurious fashions.

ENNA JETTICK SHOES, Inc., Auburn, N. Y.

$9.95 to $11.95

Far West slightly higher

®

©1958, Nitey Nite Company, St. L

Just what they ordered

These fun-printed, cool sleepers serve a huge portion of comfort and quality — absorb perspiration, never chafe or bind, are Perry-ized so they won't shrink out of fit. And, they don't need a bit of ironing! Left to right, girls' "Heart Bouquet" baby doll style in Tropic-Mesh, sizes 4 to 10, $2.25; boys' "Batter Up" in Tropic-Mesh, short pants, sizes 4 to 12, $2.25; girls' "Petite Blossom" in our Angelspun® fabric with short panties, sizes 4 to 14, $2.98. Choice of colors. Nitey Nite "drink 'n' wet" doll, $3.98.

NEVER NEED IRONING!

For the finest quality sleepers . . . ask for

Nitey Nite®

IS $1 BILLION FOR EDUCATION ENOUGH

. . . or do we nee a miracle too?

SECRETARY FOLSOM

By NEAL GILKYSON STUART

Congress is considering an administration program for spending one billion dollars on education over the next four years. Some argue this is too much Federal money, others argue it isn't half enough. Everybody agrees that our education system, from first grade through graduate school, needs stimulating. The man behind the program, who had the delicate job of recommending how big it should be, is Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Marion B. Folsom. What kind of man is he? What does he himself believe are the urgent education needs of America?

The benevolent-looking gentleman in the blue serge suit has dark silver hair with a bit of white at the temples, and he closes his eyes when he smiles. His office, at the end of a quarter mile of rose-carpeted corridors, could hold a square dance, but he has moved his great desk down to the near end, making a working corner a comfortable distance from the door. The desk looks neat as a pin, and so does he.

"When I was a boy," he says, thinking back some fifty years to a tiny Georgia town, "the teacher was top dog in the community. The years a young man gave to his education were precious.

"Today"—his voice is mild, but he slips a rubber band over his fingers and pulls on it hard—"people still believe in education, but blindly. The high-school band gets as much attention as the science class. I'm all for bands—but we ought not to forget the fundamentals. I think electives have gone too far. Youngsters pour into college, but some of the brightest ones don't get there. More than fifty thousand students in the top quarter of their class drop out of high school every year, and more than a third of the top ones who do graduate don't go to college. The low salaries we pay teachers are a national disgrace."

He pauses and smiles one of his warm, personal smiles. "I was offered a teaching job after I'd finished Harvard Business School—but I didn't take it."

The Secretary visibly relaxes now. He leans back in his chair from bolt upright and enjoys talking about his own education, from which he evidently extracted every ounce of value. "We had only one school in our town, a church school, but it had very high standards. I wasn't quite sixteen when I entered the University of Georgia." When it is pointed out that he was graduated remarkably young, he ducks his head modestly and says, "Well, I had a thorough background. I was able to skip a class." Secretary Folsom was graduated a member of Phi Beta Kappa at the age of eighteen. An assistant, rummaging recently through an office closet, found some old college records and reports with delight, "He slipped once in one course down to a ninety-six."

The Secretary's pleasant Georgia voice continues (it has been reported that Secretary Folsom "never swears, gets angry or raises his voice"). "Just to show you the value of a scholarship—I probably would never have gone on to Harvard if I hadn't been awarded a scholarship there. I tutored undergraduates on the side to raise enough money to take myself abroad in the summer." Back comes the smile, and now one leg is jauntily over the arm of his chair. "Once I had the captain of the football team, the baseball team and the crew all at the same time. They were bright boys—they'd ju been too busy."

Two imposing standards are behind t Secretary's desk—the American flag and a bl flag emblazoned with the seal of the depar ment. On the wall to his left, the Norma Rockwell portrait of President Eisenhow smiles genially. On a polished table is a phot graph of Ike, signed "With best wishes a warm regard from your friend." These are r minders that Secretary Folsom must think terms of millions of people—a whole natio The Georgia boy who had such a gift mathematics that he was keeping his fathe books by the age of fourteen grew to a man such breadth that he made his company, Ea man Kodak, a pioneer in developing a wi range of benefit plans for its employees, a helped frame our whole Social Secur legislation.

"Don't tab me as a math man; I'm a ma and history man. I've always been a believer the humanities. I've resisted the whole concep of a 'crash program' in science. The part our program that excites me is the counselin and scholarships it sets up to ensure that ou ablest youngsters are educated. Some peop seem to think that our concern is to get va numbers into college. That's not it at all—it the cream of the crop we want to save. Th scholarships will favor boys and girls who hav taken some science courses in school, but w don't think that will hurt them a bit. An edu cated man today needs a background in th sciences. But then we'll give them the schola ships across the board; they can study whe and what they please with them—science, th humanities, the ministry, the law. We need a our diverse abilities if we are to meet the cha lenge to freedom today."

He sits forward at his desk again, now, an drops the rubber band from his fingers. "It my opinion that what we're doing now in ou classrooms may determine our survival. don't think Americans have really grasp this. Soviet Russia goes ahead and manipulat its whole school system for the benefit of th state. We can't afford to shamble along, on th basis that we've done pretty well in the pas The amount of money that our program pr poses is a very small amount—to stimula state and local bodies to do what they prob ably already should be doing. The real driv the big drive, will have to come from th American people."

Here the bushy eyebrows come down. "Le me give you some figures—and they aren't v sionary figures, either. Our schools and col leges are now costing us over eighteen billio dollars a year. Within ten years they'll nee about twenty-five billion annually just to hol their own with enrollment increases. Add t that the cost of improving the teacher shortage the classroom shortage, the quality of the cur riculum, and we'll need still more billions.

"Someone in Washington can't push a but ton for this money. I have my ideas about hov big a program we ought to be launching, bu the decision isn't mine to make. It's up to th public.

"My job, in a free country, is to point to th problem and make the appeal. I can ask fo one billion, which will barely prime th pumps. I can holler 'Fire!' That's what I'm trying to do now. But I won't accomplish any hing unless a lot of state and community eaders and quite a few millions of voters and axpayers hear me. They are the ones who are oing to have to support bond issues and vote hemselves taxes. They are the ones who will ave to pay the big end of the cost.

"The main thing I ask for, as a Government dministrator, is that state and local officials nd the people themselves look at the problem learly and responsibly. Nothing is going to hange our education values faster—no mount of leadership from Washington or rom professional educators—than attention rom a lot of parents. It's my hope that the urrent fuss and publicity are making millions f them look at their local schools and make p their minds about the weak points.

"The parents are the ones who will have to lemand the spirit of learning in the schools as well as the spirit of the football field. They are the ones who are going to have to tell their children, 'Go to school and learn; that is what your school is for.' They are the ones who must be convinced that a trained and enlightened mind is a man's best chance for happiness and a nation's best resource. When enough people refuse to settle for less, they will face up to opening their own purses to pay for it. Just as important, they will give dedicated teachers and administrators the backing to do the job.

"Sometimes I don't feel the people are doing this."

He leans back, and suddenly the smile reappears, lighting the face of a good man.

"Other times, I do. After all, our education system has performed near-miracles in the past. We can do it again." END

I WAS CHURCHILL'S SECRETARY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 69

ccommodation. Beneath a vast concrete block set in at ground level there was first of all General Headquarters, known as the Cabinet War Room, or C.W.R., where the Prime Minister, all Cabinet ministers and the Chiefs of Staff had rooms, as well as the Service Planning Staffs. Here some of the most brilliant British officers spent their days breathing conditioned air and working by daylight lamps, to emerge white-faced and blinking for a few hours in the evening. Below it, on a still lower level, had been constructed a whole floor of tiny bedrooms, and it was here those on late duty would retire at bedtime.

No. 10 was for the most part closed, except for the ground floor. Below the Cabinet Room level some small rooms had been fitted out for the Prime Minister's entertaining, and one of our urgent duties each morning was to find out where meals and appointments for the day were to be held. Much time was spent trotting between the two offices, and confusion was frequently caused when visitors failed to make sure of the rendezvous. The kitchen staff would wail in despair when dinner turned out to be "at the other side," and a hurried exit with dishes and baskets of food would take place.

All this was explained to me by Mrs. Hill and her assistant, who went on to tell me about working conditions. The hours worked by the Prime Minister were, they said, rather unusual. He was, they said, an unusual man. Mr. Churchill would usually waken about 8 o'clock, and would have breakfast in bed off a tray. During this meal he would read through all the morning papers. Thereafter, having lighted up his first cigar, he would recline in bed propped up with pillows, dressed in his favorite dressing gown, which was green and gold with red dragons on it, and work on his Box. This was a rectangular black box which locked automatically on closing, and "Gimme my Box" was a phrase we all knew well. Inside were various folders, always in their prescribed order. The top one contained particularly urgent papers, such as telegrams from President Roosevelt or Marshal Stalin, or from the generals in the field; the second, Foreign Office telegrams; then service telegrams, Cabinet papers, and so on. This box was always prepared by the private secretaries and placed on a stool next to the P.M.'s bed, key on the bed table, so that as soon as he awoke he could open it.

Mr. Churchill found it more restful to work in bed, and because of the great calls upon his strength he was urged by his medical advisers to do so as often as possible. He would remain there until half an hour before his first appointment, sometimes receiving visitors, but often working the entire morning at his Box. Luncheon was invariably at 1:30, and every day at some time before dinner, which was at 8:30, he would sleep at least an hour, waking refreshed and ready for another normal day's work before bedtime. This was very seldom before 2 A.M. and might be any time up to 4:30. "It's amazing," they told me, "how quickly you get used to going to bed at two-thirty."

It was also explained that working for the Prime Minister was not easy, particularly at first. He did not like new staff and would be looking for a reason to lodge an objection. In those days he was in the habit of dictating straight onto the typewriter in order to save time. As he finished dictating one was to hand over the minute, letter or directive ready for signing, correct, unsmudged, complete. He would then sign or initial it, buzz for the private secretary, and it would be dispatched, frequently topped with a bright red sign stating "Action This Day."

"But," they told me, "it's not easy to hear what he says. He has a very slight impediment in his speech connected with the letter s, and that combined with the ticking of the typewriter makes for difficulty. Until you get used to his voice it's almost impossible to catch everything. There's always that cigar, and usually he paces up and down the room as he dictates, so that sometimes he's behind your chair and sometimes far across the room. You must be prepared to go fast in short bursts, to finish one sentence before he starts another—and for heaven's sake don't make any typing errors. When you don't hear you may ask him what he said, if you're brave and prepared for a squash; or you may put what you thought he said, if you don't mind having your head snicked off; or you may leave a space and hope that from the sense you'll later realize what it was you missed, in which case you can creep back quietly on the typewriter and put it in—and hope he doesn't roar at you for fidgeting. There's a rubber eraser attached to every typewriter, but don't be so rash as to fidget by using it. You must take two carbon copies of everything you type, but don't rustle the paper. In any case, you're bound to have it a bit rough at first, and if you'd rather leave now you can still do so."

I thought I'd have a try.

For the next few weeks I worked in the office under the two personal secretaries. I learned how Mr. Churchill liked his minutes typed, always in double spacing with a space left at the bottom for his initials and the date. I learned how to do speech form, the way he liked his speeches and broadcasts typed out—a special method he had evolved through the years with various recognized abbreviations and the lines arranged in phrases. I was told that if there was a choice of z or s in spelling, he liked the old-fashioned z. I was told that if the Prime Minister said "Gimme Pug" I must fetch General Ismay, his constant adviser on military affairs and secretary to the Chiefs of Staff Committee; that if he said "Gimme Prof" I must go and ask for Lord Cherwell, his scientific adviser; and that if he merely stretched out his hand and said "Gimme" I must be so well in sympathy with the train of his thought as to be able to place in his hand whatever he needed from a selection of black pen, red pen, tag (for joining sheets of paper), paper punch (which he called a Klop), blotting paper, "Action This Day" label, and so on.

There was of course other work to be done besides taking dictation: writing short letters on the Prime Minister's behalf in respect of personal matters, drafting personal letters for his signature, doing the household accounts, keeping the files, helping Miss Hamblin with Mrs. Churchill's correspondence. And there were interesting tasks which fell to my lot, being the junior: taking the Prime Minister's glasses to be repaired, or going to the bank for the weekly household wages, or getting a book from the library for his reference, or fetching something for Mrs. Churchill from Bond Street.

This was the background to which I became accustomed during those first weeks. Of course one could not help knowing when He was in and when He was out. When bells and buzzers had an urgent note, when the air tingled and messengers ran on tiptoe, when private secretaries looked harassed and spoke in hushed tones, when a whiff of cigar smoke reached one and an occasional rumble of anger was heard through closed doors, then the Prime Minister was at home. Once or twice I caught a glimpse of him; I began to long to take the plunge and get started.

One night I was left on duty. Usually when there was no meeting the Prime Minister would start working on his box at about 10:30, frequently with one or two close friends keeping him company or giving him information from their particular sphere. When he wished to dictate he would buzz for the private secretary and request a young woman, who would sit behind the noiseless typewriter (there was one kept in every room in which he ever worked) typing as required, until bedtime. He seldom asked for any of us by name.

On this occasion I was summoned, and entered his study feeling rather like someone who is about to be decapitated. And there he was, at last, the man in whose hands our future rested. He was pacing the room, cigar in mouth. He was not as big as I had thought, but fairly plump, compact, controlled, forceful. I noticed his well-shaped head and high forehead; his pinkish skin had a healthful look. He was wearing his siren suit, an Air Force blue garment with a zip up the front, originally designed for the raids, which had become very popular with him (called in the office, I am sorry to say, his rompers).

He gave me a sharp look, but made no remark. I sat at the typewriter and presently he began dictating, still pacing the room. All machines were always left in readiness at double spacing, but as I hurried on to the second line I found this one had been switched over to single spacing. It was too late to change now, so I continued in single spacing.

It was not long before, passing behind the typewriter, he noticed the single spacing; at once he went off like a rocket. I was a fool, a mug, an idiot; I was to leave his presence and one of the others was to appear. Naturally this was rather upsetting.

For some weeks I seemed unable to do anything right. Each time I was on duty I would sit in great anxiety, frantically remembering all the things they had told me to help me. When I had finished typing a minute I would pass it over for signature, expecting the worst. My apprehensions were seldom ill-founded. More often than not it would come skimming back to me with red alterations on it, for retyping, sometimes to the accompaniment of remarks disparaging to my education and sense of hearing.

Let me say at once that neither I nor anyone else considered this treatment unfair. The Prime Minister carried a terrific load, and he had a right to expect perfect service. I used to wonder how long his patience would last, if he would not one day say, "Go, and never let me see you again." It was just a trying period for someone to go through, and I was lucky enough to be that someone.

The others stood by and comforted when they could. Mrs. Hill told me how when she had first worked for him at Chartwell he had told her "Gimme Klop," whereat much to his astonishment she had brought in fifteen volumes of an encyclopedia by a gentleman named Kloppe which she had noticed in his library, when he merely wanted the paper punch. General Ismay, who was always kind and friendly toward us, told me a wonderful story. One night the P.M. had been dictating about future operations, and operational code names were mentioned. The Prime Minister, in speaking of the Greek islands, made a remark about Lemnos, but when the sheets were handed over he was surprised to read that "LEMONS could be picked up cheap today."

Then good fortune came to my aid: the second of the personal secretaries caught the measles, and the Prime Minister had no alternative but to put up with my services every day, since anyone else would have been even less familiar. I felt encouraged, and even more determined. Mrs. Hill took me each weekend to Chequers, the country home near Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire, where the Churchills went regularly each Friday afternoon until Monday morning. This weekly expedition provided a change which the Prime Minister enjoyed, and gave him more peace than he would have had in town. It was also an opportunity for him to entertain and consult with those on whom he relied for information, advice and help in the prosecution of the war, his own chosen ministers and service chiefs as well as visitors from overseas. Here the atmosphere was more informal, and I gained a little confidence from seeing Mr. Churchill at ease.

I found that the Prime Minister's dictation seemed to fall into three types. First, speeches and broadcasts. When he was first drafting these he would frequently make alterations; the thing had to be retyped several times anyway, plenty of crossings out would appear and sentences written above the line. Therefore one did not need to be as particular as usual, though one always kept a rough tally of how many words had been dictated, to have an answer ready for the sudden demand, "How much so far?" The second kind, a long directive or perhaps a telegram to the President, had to be typed with care since he would wish to sign or initial it on completion, but was not too difficult, as one knew what was the subject on hand and could follow the trend of his thought. The third type was dictation on the matters in his box. One would have not the slightest idea what he was reading, and suddenly out of the blue a minute would be shot out on any subject under the sun. Sometimes that cigar would get in the way of some of the words; one might perhaps feel what one handed over was correct, but back it would come with the information, impatiently given, that the time was "ripe" rather than "right," or that he had dictated "fretful" and why had I put "dreadful"?

I made plenty of inexcusable mistakes, also, chiefly from anxiety. I remember once putting "since time immemorable" instead of "immemorial," which was rather poorly received, and never having heard of General Auchinleck I made a hash of spelling his name the first time, which gave considerable pain. When on another occasion the Prime Minister said something about "the importance of chrom in this connection," my mind went blank an I put Crome as if it had been a man . . . "What, NEVER HEARD OF CHROME!" I wrote "perverted" instead of "perfervid," an many other such slips.

I had been working regularly for M Churchill for about six weeks, toiling an iously onward, looking a little long-faced an depressed, when suddenly my corner wa turned. One weekend he was to prepare a enormous address to the House of Com mons—in the end it was 10,000 words. W were at Chequers and on Saturday evenin he sent me for a walk in the garden, sayin I'd need some air. About one o'clock h called me into the Hawtrey Room, a lovel place which he often used for work, and dic tated, this time for me to take in shorthand without stopping until 4:30.

He would walk up and down the room, hi forehead crinkled in thought, the cords of hi dressing gown trailing behind him. Sometime he would fling himself for a moment into chair; sometimes he would pause to light hi cigar. For minutes he might walk up and dow trying out sentences to himself. Sometimes hi voice would become thick with emotion, an occasionally a tear would run down his cheek As inspiration came to him he would gestur with his hands, just as one knew he would b doing when he delivered his speech, and th sentences would roll out with so much feelin that one died with the soldiers, toiled with th workers, hated the enemy, strained for victory

He stopped once to ask if I were tired, an when I told him I was not he said, "We mus go on and on like the gun horses, till we drop."

After that weekend I think Mr. Churchil felt confidence in me, and I certainly foun confidence in myself, for though he was t roar at me again on many occasions it neve went very deep, and I knew now that I wa accepted as one of his staff.

Not long after this episode the second o the personal secretaries left, and I found to my surprise I was now the assistant personal secretary to the Prime Minister. During the next year or so various young women came Shorty gown and panty set, about 1.29.

Sandman time is Spencer time for undreamed-of comfort all night long. Each garment is impeccably tailored, generously sized, shrink-resistant . . . and so modestly priced you can buy a dozen at a time. Made by folks who make only baby wear, Spencer's is the name you can trust.

For folder on suggested layette, send 10c to Spencer's, Mount Airy, N.C., Dept. LH-4.

Tie-side shirt, about 49c.

Double-thick panty with triple-thick crotch, about 29c.

SOFT SPUN Spencer's BABY WEAR
COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AT LEADING VARIETY DEP'T. and BABY STORES
Mount Airy Knitting Co., Mount Airy, N.C.

By MUNRO LEAF

Most people don't mind if somebody tries to toss trash into a wastebasket from far away. Sometimes it's fun and almost a game; but if the shot misses and the trash is just left there on the floor, then we have a Messy Misser and everybody minds having one of those around. You would be surprised how easy it is to find a lazy mind in a lazy body—just watch a Messy Misser.

d went as the third on our staff. It needed a r determination to keep going, and many nes did I bless my healthy Canadian up-nging.

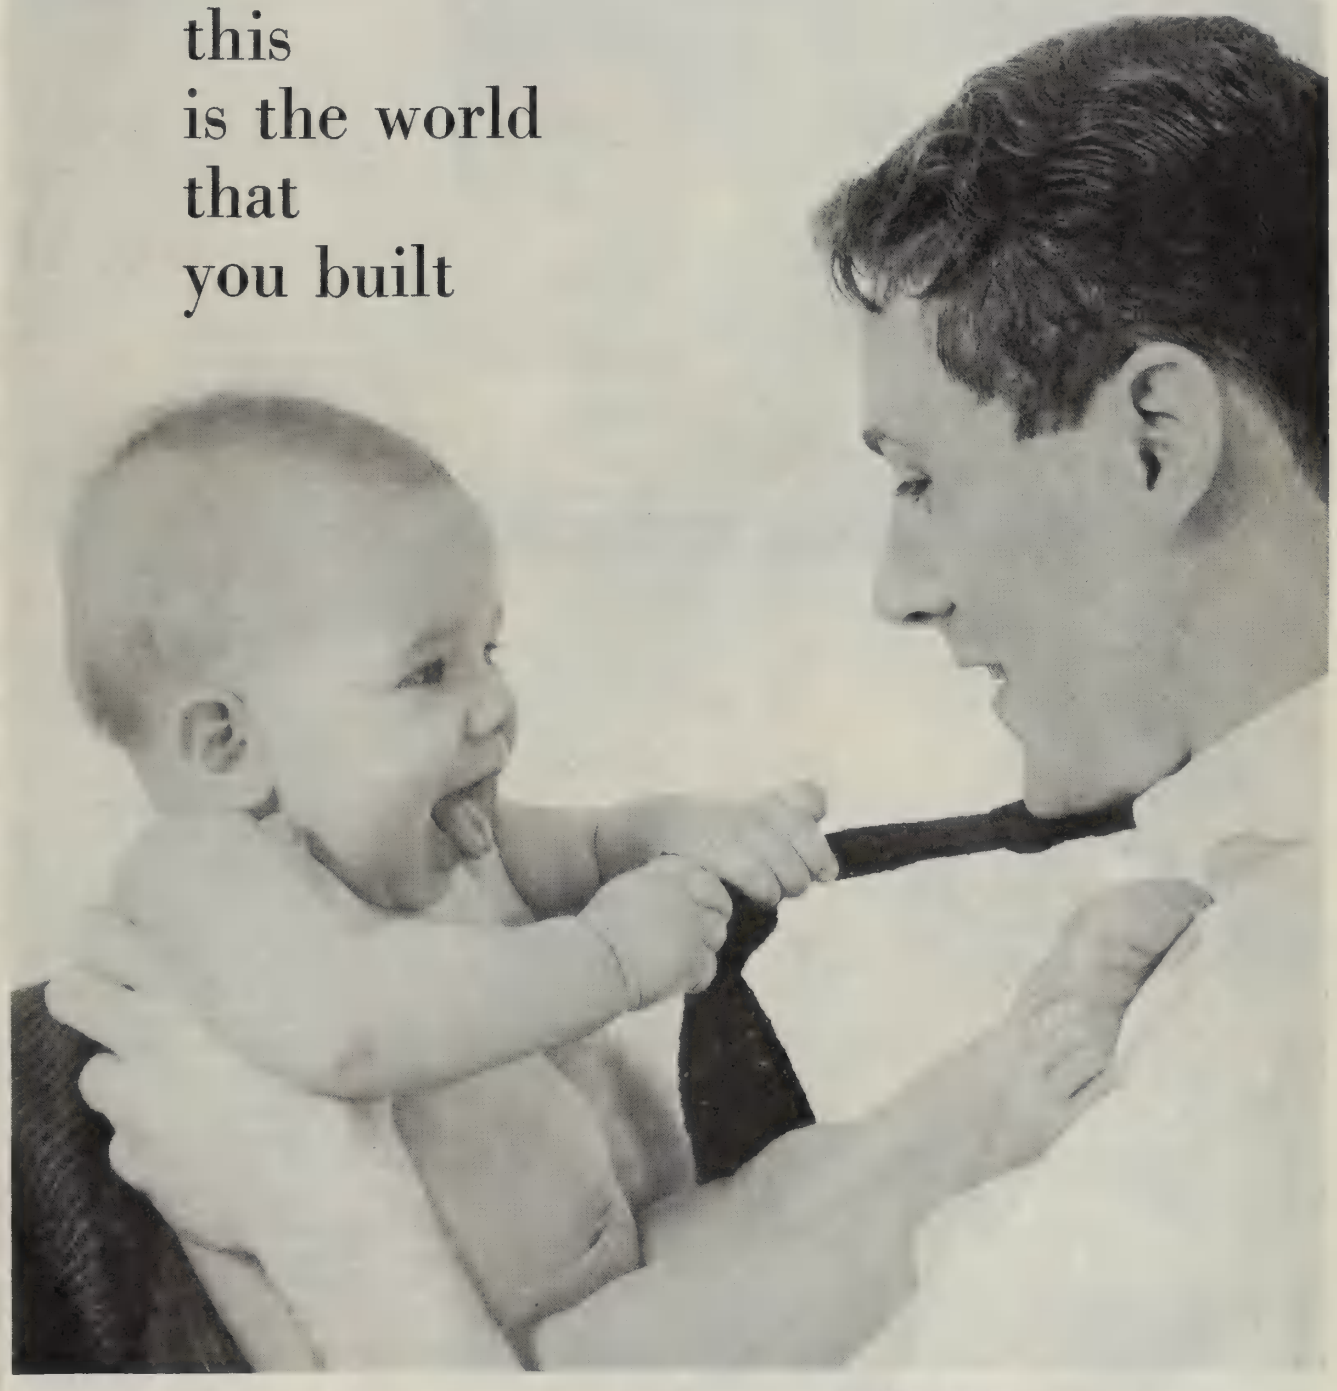
At this time I was doing mainly night duties the Prime Minister. Mrs. Hill arranged t the other young woman and I should go ernate weekends with her to Chequers. On ekdays she would be on duty during the rnings, and for three days I would work unusual hours of 2:30 in the afternoon un-the Prime Minister went to bed; the other l, who had other work in the office, did the rth night spent in London. At Chequers rs. Hill would be with him in the mornings d whoever of us was with her would do the ght duty, having worked in the office during day. These arrangements were, of course, ly approximate—frequently two of us would required at the same time, and whenever a eech was in the offing it was a case of "all nds to the pumps."

I still had my flat in Kensington, and when London and not sleeping in the shelter after e duty, I would go home to sleep, and some-nes pop home for an hour or two during the y. But I saw little of anyone outside the of-e except on my alternate weekend free—and at was of course a time for energetic washing d ironing of clothes. I grew used to spending ree nights in a row on duty until 2 or 2:30, d sometimes later; a night when we closed promptly at 2 o'clock seemed quite ade-uate for rest. One would then retire to the cond bathroom in the flat to put on one's ght attire, and hurry down the two flights of virly stairs, past the C.W.R., to the bedroom vel below. By this time one was safe from eeting anyone; but when, having slept heav-y for six hours in a narrow cot covered with my blankets, one would be aroused by the arm clock and emerge from one's room, ere were all sorts of people about. We all ad housecoats that displayed no signs of ight attire, but somehow as one hurried up e drafty stairs in the morning one always et the most glamorous officers coming into e C.W.R. looking spruce and a bit haughty.

But we remembered, too, that it was war-me. I think our sense of proportion was bet-r in those days—we knew it did not matter. Mr. Churchill would not have minded.

I became fond of my night duties. When we ere at No. 10 in the evenings I would sit at y desk, finishing off letters to constituents, r thanking people for simple little presents hey sent Mr. Churchill, or sticking his photo-raphs in the big album—or sometimes writ-ng to my mother. There would be a Cabinet neeting, or an appointment with someone to whom the Prime Minister wished to talk—General Smuts, or Mr. Mackenzie King, or Mr. Harry Hopkins, or General Sikorski, the Pole, or one of our own generals. The hours would tick slowly past. There would be a hush over the old building, broken only by perhaps the cough of the private secretary on duty next door or the sound of the buzzer or telephone. Then suddenly a stir—the door from the private secretaries' room would open and one would be sent in for dictation.

One would take book and pencils, lift the typewriter from the table, deposit it opposite Mr. Churchill's place, and sit down as unobtrusively as possible. Sometimes one would be given a "Good evening," sometimes ignored. Sometimes there would be others in the room—one was never invited to enter while the Cabinet was still in session, though once or twice I was sent in just as they broke up and took down a long telegram with most of them making comments or changes when invited.



At times one would sit opposite Mr. Churchill in the Cabinet Room for hours at a stretch, typing minutes or directives or telegrams as required and frequently merely sitting for long periods. At first I found it tiring merely waiting—trying to remain in readiness and mentally on tiptoe—but as I became more used to the work it was possible to relax between spurts of dictation and think of other things. When it was a short note or minute, Mr. Churchill would usually sit and rattle it off, holding out his hand for it almost before he had finished dictating, after which it would be "Klopped" for attaching by a tag to the paper which had inspired it, and initialed. He had two regular pens: a beautiful gold one filled with blue-black ink with which he signed letters, and a "stylo" type one filled with red ink with which he initialed minutes, directives and other documents. When it was something longer than a minute, he would usually rise and walk up and down, working his cigar in his mouth and trying out a few sentences to himself. Then off he would go, the words would roll out, the gestures would start, sometimes an emotional note would creep in. When he had finished that particular piece of business his mind would switch over completely to the next matter to be considered; he would sit down and return to his box.

The Prime Minister always seemed at his most approachable and considerate and easiest to work for when there was a crisis on, and one would have a feeling of sharing a tremendous experience with him. In calmer times when there was less to worry about he would sometimes be irritable and easily upset.

If the weather was bad or there was air-raiding, Mr. Churchill would not go to No. 10 in the evening but would remain at the Annexe. Any meeting would be held in the C.W.R., and the rest of the evening would be spent in the study in the flat. This was not so thrilling as No. 10, but it was cozier. Mr. Churchill seldom liked to be alone, but would have close friends or advisers in attendance. Mr. Eden (then Foreign Secretary) was of course our most constant visitor. On such informal occasions he would often be wearing a dark green velvet smoking jacket and black velvet slippers with his initials embroidered on the toes (Mr. Churchill had a like pair of which he was very fond). Mr. Eden was always charming and considerate to us of the staff, far more approachable than Mr. Churchill; however, his dictation seemed politely dull after what we were used to.

Working at night at the Annexe was less lonely than being at No. 10, for while one was waiting in the office there was always the

this is the world that you built

It's a wonderful world, your heart's own world. And that special baby in it counts on you to make it a happy, comfortable world. Of course, you make a point of choosing the best in baby products. That's why extra care, extra quality go into every Chix product . . . disposable diapers, gauze diapers, crib sheets, diaper liners . . . to make them the very best.

Next to you, Chix cares the most

Chux Disposable Diapers are proof positive of the extra care that goes into every Chix product. They're the most absorbent disposable diapers made. They're medicated . . . actually prevent diaper rash. They're soft and gentle. And they're strong. Even the most active baby can't kick them loose. Try Chux soon for traveling . . . for everyday use.

MADE BY A Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

NOTHING BOTHERS
THE MAN IN THE BERK-LOCK

Neither sweepers nor weepers will bother the man in the Berk-Lock . . . he's relaxing in America's favorite comfort chair! This 3-in-1 rocker-recliner-lounge (available with swivel, too) provides sublime comfort, fades away tensions, soothes tired bodies. The whole family will love it! Many styles available — at low, low prices.

THE BERKLINE CORPORATION, MORRISTOWN, TENNESSEE

WORLD'S LARGEST MANUFACTURER OF PLATFORM ROCKERS

SITTING IS BELIEVING

Your guide to a Great Vacation
in WASHINGTON STATE

Mother Nature was good to our state, and we've made it easy for you to share her bounty with us. We've "gridded-up" our state on a map with grid lines every 50 miles in each direction; about an average hour's driving. This map shows you how to make the most of your visit. It's in a folder "Only Hours Apart," and yours for the asking. Do it today! Use the coupon below.

Majestic Mt. Rainier near Seattle-Tacoma

Spectacular Coulee Dam

Free folder - Send today!

Washington State Department of Commerce & Economic Development
Gen'l Administration Bldg.,
Olympia, Washington.

Please send your free vacation folders to:

Name_____

Address_____

City _____ State_____

(PLEASE PRINT CLEARLY) 14

friendly
WASHINGTON
A State OF HAPPINESS

household staff to entertain one. We had a faithful staff consisting of valet, cook, parlormaid and housemaid; they were a cheerful crew, and often made us laugh. Nellie, the parlormaid, though essentially capable was a nervous type. One evening the Kents were coming to dinner in the flat, with a few other guests, and Nellie's bones told her that something was sure to go wrong. It did. As she was passing the stewed raspberries, the Duke of Kent gestured with his hand in exactly the right direction and all the raspberries went down the back of the lady sitting next to him. I fear the dinner party was somewhat spoiled—but for poor Nellie the whole sky was black for a week.

Mr. Churchill's valet-butler, Frank Sawyers, was the custodian of the famous cigars. Contrary to popular belief, which put the number at anything between 30 and 50, Mr. Churchill did not smoke more than 8 or 10 cigars a day, but these lasted him all day. The cigars frequently went out, and vast quantities of large-size matches were used and a certain amount of time consumed in relighting them. They would burn along nicely at first, but then as their smoker's thoughts became fully engaged their fire would die and they would be used merely as a sort of dummy—until their deficiency was noted and relighting performed. It was no good trying to palm off Mr. Churchill with anything but the best cigars, and Sawyers was always scurrying about to keep a sufficiency in store. If some dealers were in the habit of keeping back their best cigars for the P.M., who can blame them? He deserved it. Newcomers to his service might be surprised and a little alarmed when, a cigar proving not up to standard, the corpse would be hurled into the fire; old hands knew better than to sit between the Prime Minister and the fireplace.

We of the personal staff were thrown together a great deal with Sawyers, Nellie and Mrs. Landemare, the cook. We were all busy, all doing our best, all bothered when we slipped up. The feeling of comradeship with the household staff helped me to feel at home in the little circle. Mrs. Landemare gave me breakfast in the office each morning after late duty. Sawyers sometimes brought me a small glass of champagne when there was a dinner party, or Nellie would produce an apple.

Naturally one saw a great deal of Mrs. Churchill and the "children." I used often to give a hand to her secretary, Miss Hamblin—Ham, as we all called her. Mrs. Churchill was a beautiful and charming woman; her vivacity and spirit made her a gay companion for the Prime Minister and she contrived to bring a little of the normal into his busy life. She had a most alert mind and kept up-to-date with everything that went on, and sometimes Mr. Churchill would turn to her for advice of a practical nature. She was completely disinterested in publicity for herself, keeping in the background whenever possible, and immensely proud of her husband. A talented hostess who could put anyone at ease, she was also fluent in French. But I always felt Mrs. Churchill's main contribution to the greatness of her husband had been in standing up to him, in not being overwhelmed. Others might have spoiled him with adoration; she would not let him be selfish.

We saw a good deal of the daughters too. Sarah, then about twenty-five, was an officer in the Women's Auxiliary Air Force, and came when she could to see her parents. Mary, the youngest, was a subaltern in the Auxiliary Territorial Service (the Women's Army), and had been posted to an antiaircraft battery in Hyde Park. When she had leave she would stay at the flat, and we took a great interest in her dresses and her "dates." She was a pretty girl with a gay and friendly smile. We saw less of Mrs. Duncan Sandys, the eldest daughter, and Randolph, who was on active service. All the "children" were devoted to their mother and to "papa," as they called him.

For some weeks after her colleague left, Mrs. Hill remained on duty every morning and hardly left the premises, in case she was called for. Morning duties were the trickiest from our point of view. For some reason it was always more difficult to hear Mr. Churchill when he was sitting in bed—the double doors and heavily shuttered windows seemed to deaden his voice, or perhaps at that time of the morning he did not feel so much inclined to articulate clearly. The time came when I was judged safe for her to take a day off, and one morning I duly presented myself at the Prime Minister's bedside at 8:30.

The routine was that one would not wait to be summoned, but would quietly enter the room when one judged he had finished breakfast and reading the newspapers, sit at the typewriter and make oneself as much a part of the furniture as possible. There would be small jobs to attend to—filling the pens, opening the box, fetching Sawyers. Sometimes Mr. Churchill would light his first cigar with a candle, and then woe betide the one who forgot and blew the candle out instead of carrying it from the room—the waxy smell was not popular. Frequently he was not in the best of moods at this time of day—perhaps from too little sleep—and added to this there was the hammering. Oh, that hammering!

The Annexe was still being converted, and during the day was full of workmen. Though every effort was made to arrange for them to work in a part of the building far from the P.M.'s flat, there was always some clod who forgot the instructions. There would be a loud bang from somewhere, and one would stiffen as one saw Mr. Churchill look up. Peace. Then another bang or so, and knowing it was time for action one would leave the room hastily to have the hammerer stopped before the storm broke. This was never a good start to the day.

On this occasion, to my great relief, nothing untoward happened. The room seemed heavy with cigar smoke as I entered, and the Prime Minister, sitting propped up with pillows, looked gravely at me over his glasses—he wore them for reading only—but made no comment. For some months I found these morning sessions with the box a considerable strain, particularly as often his first appointment was luncheon and one was closeted with him from 8:30 until 1 o'clock. Later I found there was a certain comradely feeling, as Mr. Churchill was less impersonal than when in the office, occasionally making a remark apart from his instructions—though of course he did not in any circumstances wish to hear a reply!

Every few weeks he would deliver a review of the war to the House of Commons, sometimes enormously long. These speeches would take a great deal of preparation, and for a week beforehand we would all be aware that great things were astir. As opportunity offered, a start would be made, perhaps part of the weekend would be devoted to breaking the back of the statement. Sometimes dictation would take place in the garden, and one would follow Mr. Churchill around as he paced the lawn, scribbling hastily and awkwardly as one hurried after him. Usually the evening before the statement was due would be kept free for checking the final draft, two of the personal staff in attendance and ready for an all-night session. At 10:30 or 11 Mr. Churchill would settle down to a final revision, and as the various sections were completed they would come out to us for putting into speech form. We used a special octavo sheet, and made four or five carbon copies. Speech form would look like this:

We cannot yet see how deliverance will come or when it will come,

but nothing is more certain than tt every trace of Hitler's footsteps, every stain of his infected and corroding fingers, will be sponged and purged and, if need be, blasted fr the surface of the earth.

At 2 or so the Prime Minister would go to bed, leaving the balance of the script ready for us. I used to try to send Mrs. Hill off to bed, too, knowing she would have to be up for morning duty. Then I would plod steadily on. About 2:30 I became intolerably sleepy and felt low in energy, but about 4:30 my spirits seemed to revive, and I would feel full of strength again. Usually I finished at about 5, then sorted out the copies to make the five or complete sets, "Klopped" the top copy in lower left-hand corner and placed a long through the holes, put this copy on a chair side the Prime Minister's bedroom so that ould be taken in to him immediately he ke, undressed and tottered down the stairs two to three hours' sleep, it being by this e almost 6 o'clock.

ty 10 I would be dressed again (feeling per-s just a trifle snappish), and ready for last-nute alterations. Often during the night he uld have had a new idea and Mrs. Hill uld have typed several pages. The private retaries would be hastily checking this with departments concerned, and then one uld receive it for last-minute putting into ech form. Then some of the finished copy uld be altered—the alterations put hastily vith Mr. Churchill's red pen, usually quite eadable. As one was poring over the red iggles, not wishing to have to go in and ask, news would come through, via Sawyers, e's gone for his bath," and the last-stretch lop would begin. No time to feel tired—t get it done. And of course, one way or other, it always was done.

And then, at the moment when he was sup-sed to leave, when the car and driver stood tside and the private secretary on duty stood iting, holding the final script, he would erge from his bedroom looking fresh and autifully groomed in his black coat and iped trousers, often with a rosebud in his ttonhole, often accompanied by Mrs. urchill. We would stand at the office door-y to see him off, and usually he would have beaming smile and a word of thanks for us, hich inspired the most fu-us feelings of devotion d loyalty.

Sometimes, however, ings did not run so noothly. Perhaps a shorter tement would be con-mplated and there would t be the urgent necessity r advance preparation. he Prime Minister always acted well to an emer-ncy and a last-minute sh; one almost felt he did it on purpose. Per-ps in the days beforehand he would not be the mood for dictating the particular sub-ct on which he was to speak, or perhaps he ould try for some hours and the words would ow like treacle on a cold day—and as the time r the speech drew near it would be hardly be-n. Sometimes an unexpected event would call r an immediate statement, with only an hour so to prepare it. In these cases there would be terrible crisis on the morning in question; we ould all look a bit tense, and later on Mrs. ill and I would go with the Prime Minister to is room in the House of Commons, there to mplete the speech form before he went to e chamber. The anxiety and haste can well e imagined. The private secretaries on duty ould stand sympathetically around, at times oing the checking and "Klopping" and "tag-ing" themselves, as Big Ben chimed the pass-g quarters. In extreme cases one took down om the Prime Minister straight into speech rm on the typewriter, which seemed rather a esponsibility.

When these crises were over, I would feel ompletely fagged out. Luckily the third on ur staff would do late duty that night, and I ould stagger off home with my little suitcase, nd sleep until 8:30 the following morning.

I often wondered, in the period before be-inning to work for Mr. Churchill personally, What is a Great Man like? Will he seem dif-erent from other people? In Mr. Churchill's ase the answer was definitely "Yes." I was at nce aware of the great force at his command, f the strength and determination within him, f the vast stores of knowledge his head con-ained. No one could doubt his utter single-nindedness and nobility of purpose.

He was of course in possession of bound-ess self-confidence—without it he could never ave been the man he was—and his back-ground (combined with the British caste sys-tem) made him a person who expected to be approached with great respect by those who worked for him. I cannot imagine that he was ever troubled with cheeky servants or secre-taries; but at the same time, he always remembered to respect the position of each one of us. He might order his valet about; to us he said "please" or "would you."

He always concentrated upon that which was important, and was able to discount that which was merely tiresome. I am sure this was true of his prosecution of the war; in our sphere we noticed it in a less general sense. For instance, the Annexe flat was, as I have said, not ideally situated for the Churchills' use, in that it was also a passage through to the office of the No. 10 official staff, and visitors arriving early for an appointment with the Prime Minister and being marched through to wait in the private secretaries' office would occasionally be astonished to be confronted by a figure enveloped in a bath towel crossing back to the bedroom from the bathroom. No one really likes being caught in a bath towel. But Mr. Churchill was always equal to these moments, and the visitor would be put at his ease by a stately greeting from the towel-clad figure.

In October of that first year of my time with him, Mr. Churchill visited Harrow, his old school, and talked to the boys. One thing he told them was "Never, never, never, never give in"—which was like him. When they sang their school song, there was a verse added in honor of their Old Boy. It began like this:

Not less we praise in darker days
The leader of our nation,
And Churchill's name shall win acclaim
From each new generation.

But he asked that the word "darker" should be altered to "sterner"; he said they were not dark days, they were great days. That was also like him.

Sitting still and wishing Made no person great.
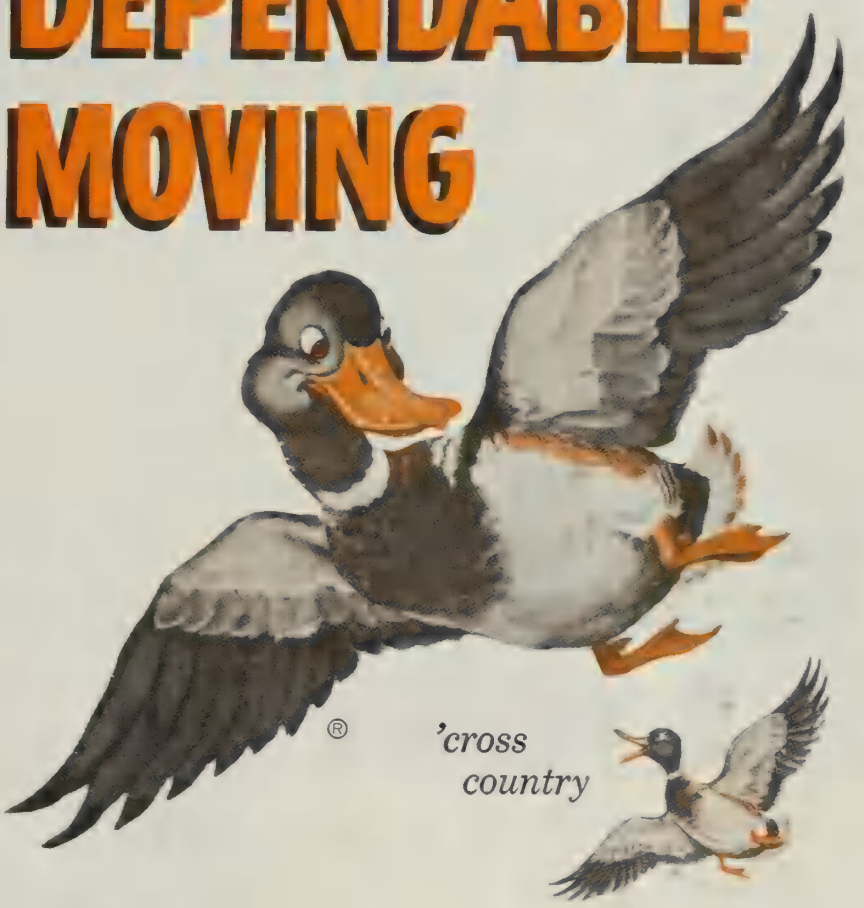
The good Lord sends the fishing,
But you must dig the bait.
OLD ENGLISH TRADITIONAL

Perhaps the quality in Mr. Churchill's make-up that endeared him particularly to his staff was a complete unself-consciousness, almost naïveté; an ability to be accidentally funny. The atmosphere of tension and anxiety in the office, a natural result of the war, was frequently broken by silly events arising from this quality—which always made us giggle and kept us from becoming too serious about life.

One night the Prime Minister decided to go to the roof of the Annexe to watch an air raid, despite all persuasion to the contrary. The night was cold, but wrapped in his coat he found a comfortable seat on the roof and professed himself warm. His companions became anxious for his welfare, but there he remained. Suddenly the party was dispersed by the arrival of a somewhat bothered officer from the lower regions, who reported that downstairs the place was full of smoke, they could none of them work—and would the P.M. please mind not sitting any longer on the chimney? No wonder he felt nice and warm!

Another evening he was sitting in his study with one or two advisers, working on his box. I had incurred his wrath for a silly typing mistake, but was not upset about it. However, having a slight cold, I ventured some minutes later to blow my nose quietly, and he noticed and thought I was crying. "Good heavens," he said, "you mustn't mind me. We're all toads beneath the harrow, you know." In a few minutes he dictated a very short note indeed:

FIRST SEA LORD.
I am in general agreement with this proposal.



When I handed it to him for initialing he said, "Oh, very good indeed, very well typed, how quick you were."

Chequers was given to the nation by Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham in 1921 as a place of rest and recreation for the current Prime Minister. It is full of beautiful things—paintings, antique furniture, books, ornaments—and can boast a secret staircase to a room on the second floor where long ago Lady Mary Grey, sister of Lady Jane, was kept prisoner for two years by Queen Elizabeth I.

Leaving for Chequers on a Friday afternoon was always quite a performance. The Prime Minister perhaps would say, "We'll leave at three-thirty and I'll have my rest when we get there." At 3:15, therefore, three big black cars would be at the garden gate of No. 10 with their drivers in readiness, the third car loaded up with two telephone operators and Sawyers. Inside the office would be waiting the private secretary on duty at Chequers that weekend (another remained on duty at the Annexe), the naval aide, Commander Thompson, two of the personal secretaries and two detectives (they were allocated to the Prime Minister by Scotland Yard and went wherever he did). Time would pass, the buzzer would sound, telephone calls would be put through from the Cabinet Room, or perhaps Mr. Churchill would decide to see one of his advisers before leaving. Or an urgent telegram would come in and have to be dealt with.

Perhaps at 5:30 he would decide to have his rest in town and leave for Chequers at 7, after all. Then all would relax and resume other work. Later the vigil would be renewed, and probably about 7:35, when one had almost given up hope of ever getting away, he would step quickly from the Cabinet Room with a twinkle in his eye and a look of "Hurray, we're off"; would be helped into his coat by one messenger, take his hat, stick and gloves from another, and be down the back stairs and out

DEPENDABLE MOVING

"Allied's sure our good friend"

It's so much easier for you . . . and safer for your things when you move with Allied—the No. 1 specialist in long distance moving (packing and storage, too). He'll handle all the details, from packing bric-a-brac to arranging furniture. Your goods are moved with expert care, and right on time!

FREE BOOKLET—Ask your Allied Mover for your copy of "Before You Move," a helpful booklet on trouble-free moving. Look for his name in the Yellow Pages under "Movers."

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

ALLIED VAN LINES, INC. • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

through the garden in a few seconds, while a panting train of staff hastily grabbed boxes, books and pencils and hurried to reach each his allotted place before the general circus left.

The Prime Minister's time was too valuable for him to waste the hour of the journey, and unless there was a visitor of importance with whom he wished to speak, one of the personal staff would sit beside him and he would work in the normal manner. Large jobs, such as speeches or broadcasts, or reports to the President, would be kept for the journey to Chequers. Mr. Churchill did not care for slow travel, and would congratulate the driver when he managed to do the hour's trip in fifty minutes. It was not easy to get down all he said, however, when the car rocked and swayed through the outskirts of London, jumping stop lights and driving to the right of traffic islands, police bell sounding. One would sit with book balanced on one knee, scribbling hard, one's left hand holding spare pencils, his glasses case or an extra cigar, sometimes with one's foot keeping open his precious box, which otherwise would have slammed shut as we swung round a corner. There was a small light to shine on one's book when it became dark. We usually arrived just in time for dinner at 8:30, and then there would be a scramble to get everything typed before he began work again.

Sometimes Mr. Churchill would decide to have his afternoon rest during the journey, and then he would place over his eyes a round black bandage which Sawyers always kept in his overcoat pocket. On these occasions he would invite Commander Thompson to travel in the car with him, and after a short time he would put on his black bandage and sit sleeping in the corner. One Friday afternoon Commander Thompson had a slight cough, and knowing how little Mr. Churchill liked such ailments he purchased a bottle of gargle and a bottle of soothing throat syrup, so that he would not annoy by coughing. But alas, as the Prime Minister sat peacefully sleeping during the drive, Commander Thompson, feeling a tickle coming in his throat, reached into the wrong pocket and swallowed a good dose of the gargle by mistake. He was shaken with a tremendous fit of coughing, which woke Mr. Churchill. The car was stopped and fished out of the following car to change with poor Commander Thompson be Mr. Churchill said, "Tommy seems to h very bad cough."

At Chequers we lived in moderate co waited on by the household staff. B needed that comfort, for we invariably w all weekend. Bed for the late shift woul dom be before 3, and we would be bu day too. The house was always full of bus visitors. All the well-known personaliti the war came there, sometimes only for a but usually for one or two nights. The A icans found the house cold; poor Mr. kins, who was thin, always grumbled a lack of central heating and usually state arrival, "I sure brought my long woole derwear this time." General Smuts obvi enjoyed the country atmosphere, but dis the extraordinary hours, being used to r at 6 and retiring at 9.

In the evenings Mr. Churchill would sit in the office, beside the cheerful fire, talk to General Ismay about the most drea secrets of the war—future operations! M they would use the code names for plac particular plans. One evening during su chat the Prime Minister swung round on saying with a twinkle, "Miss Layton, yo the repository of the nation's secrets." I c only say, "But I won't tell," whereat h swered, "I know you won't—I know y rather die"—which was true.

Chequers was guarded day and night b Coldstream Guards, and there was a spotter always on the lookout for raiding craft; but the Germans, we heard, had v to "get Churchill," and therefore when moon was full and they were apt to come in force we did not go to Chequers for weekend, but to "the other place," a hea guarded secret. It was Dytchley Park, home of Mr. and Mrs. Ronald Tree, friends of the Churchills, and was not far fr Blenheim Palace (where Mr. Churchill born on November 30, 1874). It was a jour of about two hours from London. I went th only once or twice, as soon after my advent danger from raiding decreased. Coming fr Canada, I found this huge Georgian palace a country house quite overwhelming: th seemed to be so many butlers and footm around; the front hall was as big as a cinem and the honored guests all slept in four-pos beds with drapes. I was particularly impress by the lavender bags which were placed in t little baskets of paper in all the bathrooms- refined touch!

My first impressions of Dytchley Park w perhaps a little damped by the remembran of my first morning there, when I had sat t hind the typewriter near the biggest a swankiest four-poster bed. Mr. Churchill h been dictating something about Ceylon, a had mentioned the naval base Trincomal Unfortunately I had never heard of it, and wrote a horrid-looking word beginni "Chink——" When I handed the docume over there was a short pause, then the sto broke. "Where on earth were you educate Haven't you ever heard of TRINCOMALE Why don't you learn some geography? W don't you read some books? . . ." etc. etc.

But that was in the bad old days, at th beginning.

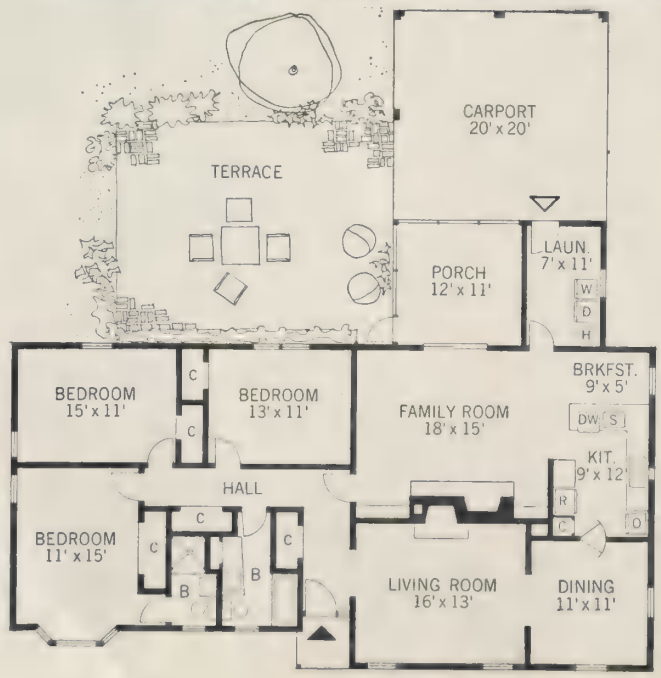
At other times Mr. Churchill would decid that he really must have a sight of his dea deserted house in Kent, Chartwell. The bi house was closed up, but Chartwell Cottag which he built with his own hands in the day when he was out of office, was constantly oc cupied by a relation. If he decided to sta overnight, Mr. and Mrs. Churchill, the pri vate secretary, Sawyers and Mrs. Landemare the cook, would be housed there with squeeze; poor Commander Thompson woul be left in London; Mrs. Hill and the two de tectives would put up in the nearby village o Westerham; and I, being on late duty, woul be left to fend for myself.

I well remember the first of such occasions when I was still new and anxious. Mr. Church ill's study in the big house, an ancient room with a high, arched ceiling, had been opened up for him, and we therefore opened the office

CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

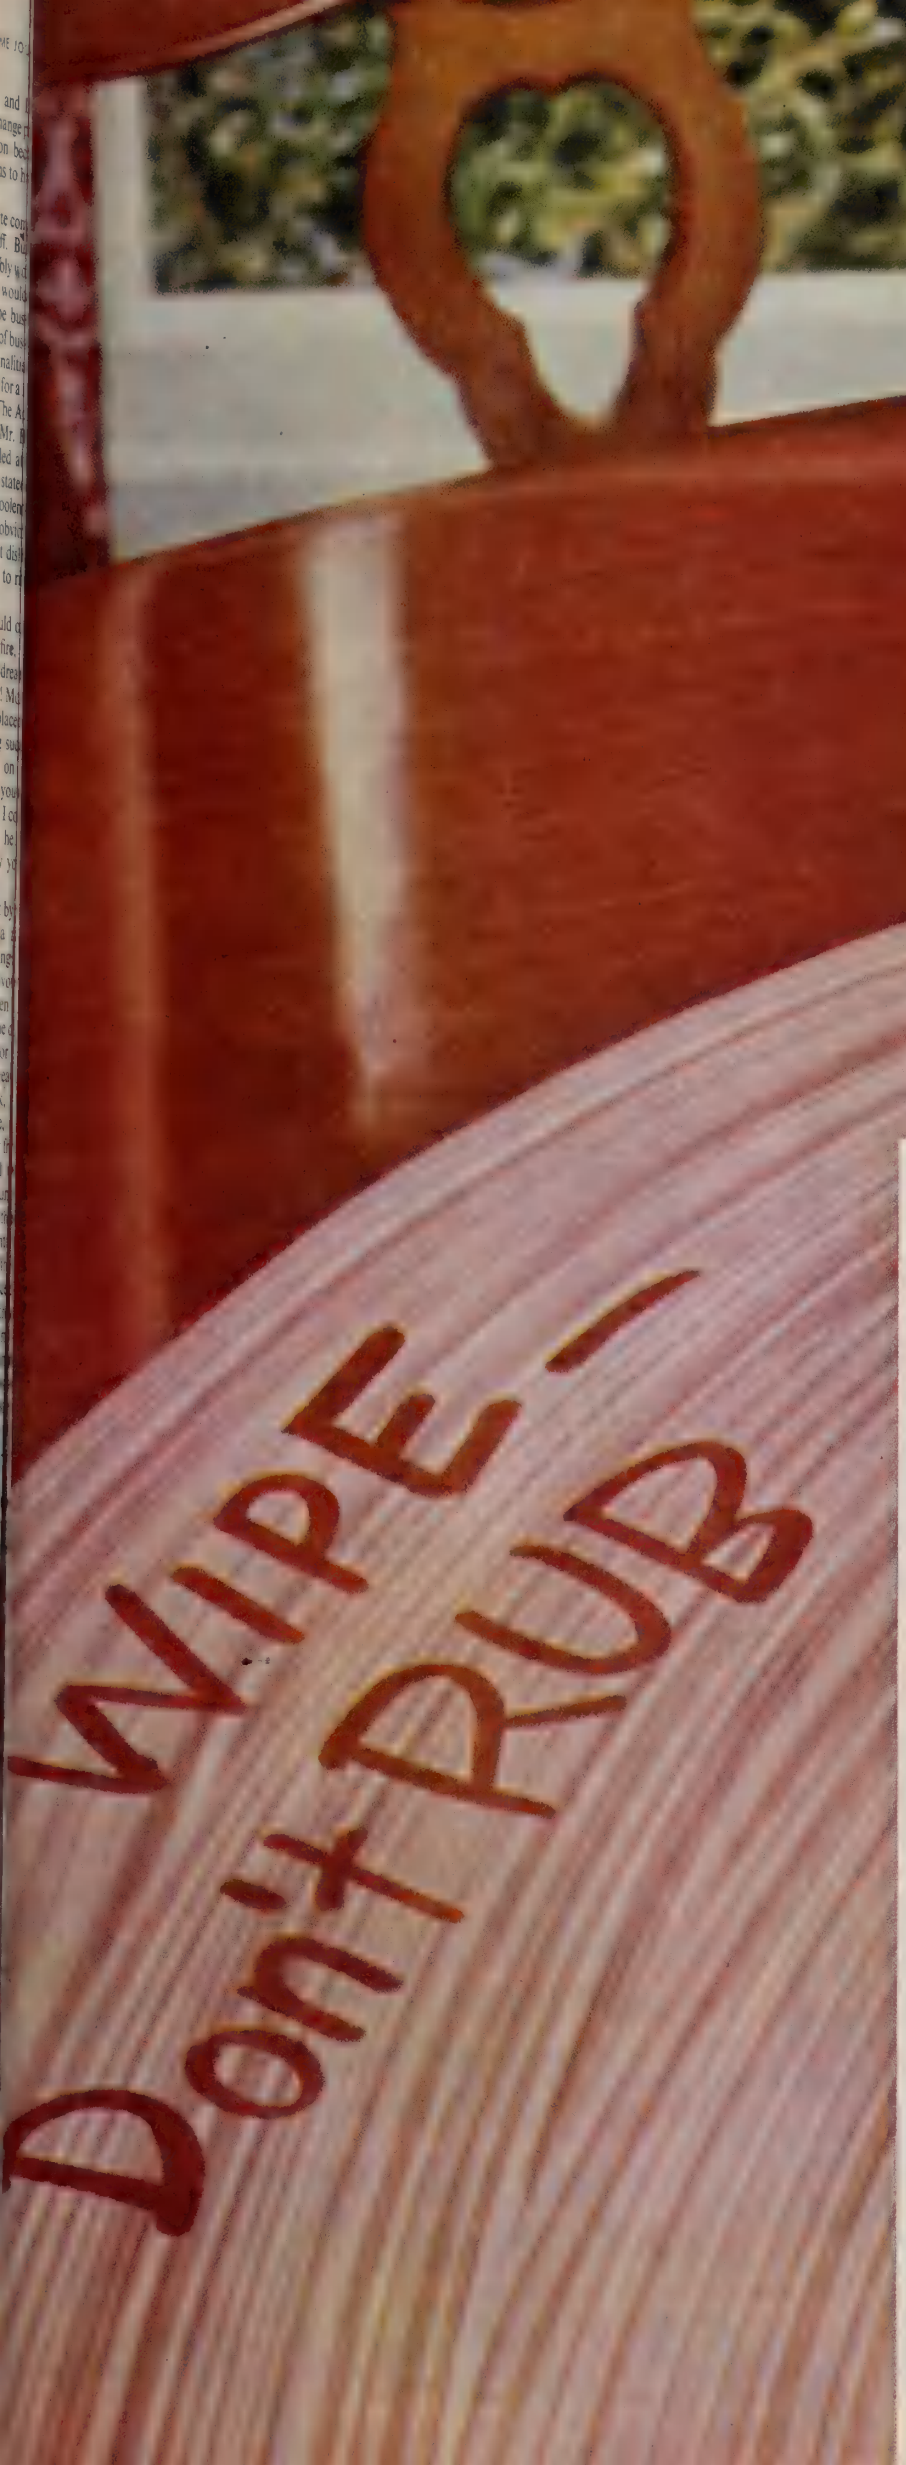
DESIGNER AND BUILDER: GEORGE LATHEM; PHOTOGRAPHER: RODNEY MCCAY MORGAN

House with a Place for Everything



In which it is easy and pleasant to keep everything in its place.

As appealing as this house is to the eye in its grove of slender tall Georgia pines, it is really the plan that keeps distracting your attention from the whole eye-catching appearance front and back. As someone said here when the house came in, it's a plan that offers imaginative possibilities in the use of space. The customary good points can be taken for granted; the observant reader having already noticed things like the orderly circulation, making it possible for family and friends to move about the house in all directions without any disturbance to one another. The living room, right by the front door, is just where it should be, and just the right size for intimate entertaining, adult entertaining, with quiet and seclusion even when rough-house is rampant in the family room well around the corner. The family room, as it should, embraces the informality of family meals and the convenience of cooking close by, while the dining room does double duty: for dining in the true sense of the word, for study, and for expanding the party possibilities of the parlorlike living room. And how do you like where the laundry is? Where it can serve as a beautiful vestibule to the kitchen complex. And what about the built-in, screened-in porch? Even in the bedroom department, everybody gets a very good break, particularly the parents.



Seldom does a house so well arranged within get an exterior so nicely turned out in the bargain. Everything from the fence along the entrance path to the patio in the back goes all out to be good looking. The textured-brick walls complement the clapboarding. And for once a carport compliments the house. Architect designed, built for sale, with fully equipped kitchen and nice large lot with trees, sold for $23,000. Our compliments to all concerned!

R. P.

B—BATHROOM
C—CLOSET
R—REFRIGERATOR
O—OVEN DW—DISHWASHER
S—SINK RANGE
W—WASHER
D—DRYER
H—HEATER

...for the richest, longest lasting wax luster you've ever seen on furniture!

All shades—even light finishes like this one—can be beautifully waxed without rubbing. Just apply Pride, let dry, wipe lightly.

As you whisk away the haze, you'll see a gleaming finish of genuine wax. One that won't trap lint and dust the way oily polishes do. A finish that stays shining bright for weeks without constant attention. All this without rubbing—or the name isn't Johnson's Pride.

Made by the makers of Johnson's Wax. Recommended for both light and dark finishes by 51 makers of fine furniture.

Get either the handy 8-ounce or thrifty 16-ounce size today!

"Pride" and "Johnson's" are registered trademarks of S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc.

Smart Shoppers insist on Strength of Steel
PERM·A·LATOR® wire insulators

NOW!
Longer-Lasting Comfort

▶ IN MATTRESSES . . .
It's smart to insist on getting the extra value of Perm-A-Lator wire insulators in the mattress you buy. These "Strength-of-Steel" wire insulators protect soft surface cushioning for better sleep . . . assure healthful, firm head-to-toe support. And no "coil-feel" ever! Perm-A-Lators keep your mattress smooth and comfortable . . . permanently!

▶ IN FURNITURE . . .
It's wise to pressure test furniture before you buy. You'll find there's never any "coil-feel", lumps or sags when it's built with Perm-A-Lator "Strength-of-Steel" wire insulators. Cushioning stays neater, smooth and comfortable years longer. Wear tests prove Perm-A-Lator wire insulators last 2½ times longer than ordinary insulators.

LOOK FOR THIS TAG . . . YOUR GUARANTEE of NO "COIL-FEEL"

Ask Your Dealer to Demonstrate the Perm-A-Lator Difference!

FLEX-O-LATORS, Inc., CARTHAGE, MO.
New Castle, Pa. Carthage, Mo. High Point, N. C

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 184

also, dust-covered as it was. Few of the lights were in operation, and the dark rooms and passages were filled with sheet-swathed pieces of furniture. When bed was announced and Mr. Churchill and the private secretary left for the cottage, I retired to a bed which had been left by chance in the dining room. It being a warm summer night, I merely climbed under the dust sheet that covered it and slept.

In the morning I was awakened by footsteps and the dragging of a dressing-gown cord. I looked up quickly—the sun was shining, and there stood Mr. Churchill in gown and huge-brimmed hat, going the rounds of his loved home by daylight. He looked astonished, then grinned broadly and said "Hullo" and walked out. Later I overheard him telling Mrs. Churchill, "I went into the dining room and there she was, asleep, fast asleep in bed."

Mr. Churchill was very fond of cats, and a young Persian, gray and fluffy, named Smoky, became much attached to the P.M. Every morning as breakfast was taken in, Smoky would be at the door waiting to be let in, too; he would sit on the bed and receive graciously any small piece of meat, or perhaps a little milk, and then he would sleep on the bed while the Prime Minister worked, sometimes covering him accidentally with a top-secret report. Unfortunately as Smoky grew up he became wild and ill-behaved, till he was a positive menace to anyone entering the room. Legs and stockings were his specialty. One never liked to make a fuss when ladders and even blood appeared, but privately Smoky was called by some uncomplimentary names.

One morning the Prime Minister was talking on the telephone to Sir Alan Brooke. The conversation was long and anxious, his thoughts were far away; his toes wiggled under the blankets. I saw Smoky's tail switch. Suddenly he pounced on the toes and bit hard. It must have hurt, for Mr. Churchill, startled, kicked him right into the corner of the room, shouting, "Get off, you fool," into the telephone. Then he remembered. "Oh," he said, "I didn't mean you"; and then, seeing Smoky looking somewhat dazed in the corner, "Poor little thing." Confusion was complete, Sir Alan hung up hastily and telephoned the private secretary to know what was happening. It took a long time to get it all sorted out.

When there was news of a calamity Mr. Churchill was always the fountain of strength from which emanated comfort and reassurance. But within himself he minded—terribly. When a city had received a bad bombing, he would try whenever possible to pay it a visit, to cheer up the inhabitants, but his grief at the sight of the devastation was moving to see. However, he was always on top of his feelings, and the people, revitalized, would roar with delight at the sight of him. Once or twice I went with him in London to see bomb scars, sometimes only a short time after the bombs had fallen. On one occasion I remember his speaking to the shaken occupants of a recently shattered small home. As he left, some papers blew about, so he turned to say quickly, "Hope that's the income-tax form," which left them smiling.

He was keen, too, to keep his own eye on those concerned with the air-raid-warning system and other forms of civil defense. Any suggestion of lethargy or inefficiency would be swiftly and angrily investigated. On occasions he liked to turn up unexpectedly somewhere, to see for himself how things were running.

An instance of this was our sudden descent on the Northolt aerodrome one Monday morning on our return journey from Chequers to London. The cars turned off the main route and swept past an anxious guard into the airfield's enclosure. The station commandant was requested to sound the emergency signal, and quite soon men were running about in all directions, looking somewhat alarmed. Mr. Churchill was not altogether satisfied with the reaction and, stepping once more into his car, directed the driver to drive around the field. Some distance away he came upon a small canteen, displaying no activity. He hopped out and strode quickly through the front door. A few moments later three or four very bothered-looking men emerged at the trot, one hastily grabbing a rifle from somewhere. I couldn't help laughing to myself to think how one would feel if one were sitting in all innocence drinking a cup of morning coffee, and suddenly the door opened and in marched a furious Prime Minister, particularly if it were Winston Churchill.

Early in December, Japan attacked at Pearl Harbor. We were now all in the same boat, the three great Allies. In the office the wheels were whirring. I had had the weekend off, so hurried earlier than usual to work on the Monday. Quite soon there was a call for someone to go into the Cabinet Room. I went.

The Prime Minister was pacing up and down. He looked keen, enormously alive, on top of his job. He said "Shorthand," and continued walking about, muttering, "Letter to the king—letter to the king." But what was this I was writing down? "Sir: I have formed the conviction that it is my duty to visit Washington without delay ——" asking for royal approval of his sudden plan to cross the Atlantic immediately. This letter was followed by a directive to General Ismay, giving instructions as to who was to be included in the party and what arrangements made. I staggered out to my typewriter, eyes bulging, feeling this heavy secret could probably be read from my countenance. The others, realizing something big was on, were tactful enough not to inquire.

Within a few days the party had left, traveling in the new battleship Duke of York. There was no question of female staff being taken along, but Peter Kinna, a young man from another government department, and a

The only gift is a portion of thyself. Therefore the poet brings his poem; the shepherd, his lamb; the farmer, corn; the miner, a gem; the sailor, coral and shells; the painter, his picture; the girl, a handkerchief of her own sewing. EMERSON young Air Force sergeant, Geoffrey Green, were lent for the occasion.

So ended 1941.

For the first eight months of 1942 nothing seemed to go right. First we had bad news from Cyrenaica—our forces were pushed back and Bengasi retaken by the Germans. Then the German battleships Scharnhorst, Gneisenau and Prinz Eugen broke out of Brest and, speeding up the English Channel, evaded the attacks of our aircraft and shore batteries and regained home waters. In February, Singapore fell to the Japanese. In June we lost Tobruk and were pushed back almost to Cairo. The U-boat warfare was taking a sickening toll, the Atlantic life line was stretching thin. The Russians were engaged in bitter fighting, and now at home uninformed clatter for a "second front now" became irritatingly audible.

Throughout this period of stress and disappointment—to use his own words, "a time to suffer and endure"—Mr. Churchill remained calm, firm, bulldog-jawed. Always at his most brilliant in a crisis, he seemed to draw on reserves of strength and will power. He felt our losses very deeply, and threw himself anew into the task of hitting back. I think it was the lack of complete unanimity at home that troubled him as much as anything.

At the end of January, urged on by signs of restlessness among a small minority in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister made an enormously long statement on the war situation. A debate followed, which he was to wind up. On that occasion he only finished dictating his winding-up speech during the luncheon interval at the House, and thereafter Mrs. Hill and I sat in the private secretaries' room adjoining his office there, typing for dear life without daring to look up from our desks. The private secretaries, who would always rally round in a crisis, stood waiting for the pages, snatching them from the machines as we finished. When the Prime Minister finished speaking, a Vote of Confidence in the Government was taken, which he won by the substantial margin of 464 to 1.

In June, Mr. Churchill went again to Washington; during this visit he received the news of the fall of Tobruk. Deeply concerned, scarcely able to believe it—for he had said that we should hold Tobruk at all costs—he turned to his great friend for consolation. And not in vain. President Roosevelt's sympathy took a very practical form, for he immediately offered that a shipment of Sherman tanks destined for American forces in the Middle East and already en route should be diverted instead to the re-equipment of our armies there. Mr. Churchill was never able to forget this instantaneous act of kindness.

Mr. Churchill flew back to Britain not many days later. The loss of Tobruk brought to a head the feelings of restlessness in the House of Commons, and within a few days he had to face a motion of no confidence in the central direction of the war, put forward by Sir John Wardlaw-Milne, a Conservative Member of Parliament. This was a horrid time for all of us in the office. We felt awkward and unhappy, as I am sure Mr. Churchill did. I think the main feeling of Sir John Wardlaw-Milne and his followers was that Mr. Churchill should not be acting at once as Prime Minister and Minister of Defense, and they wished to see him pass on the latter position to someone else.

There was a debate on the Motion of Censure, which the Prime Minister was to wind up, and two of us sat up all night till 6 putting into speech form a tremendous statement he had prepared, which would take him at least an hour and a half to deliver. I hung around in the morning helping with the alterations, then took Mr. Churchill's gold watch, which had ceased to run, to a little man for mending. At 1:30 I returned to his room at the House in case he wanted to dictate anything further. He was having his lunch late, and as I sat behind the typewriter in readiness I noticed that he was irritated because the peas wouldn't stay on his fork. I knew that despite his lifetime of experience and his enormous strength and self-control in bearing trials, he was still human enough to feel worked up inside. It must have been a great strain on his composure, having to drop all other work to state his own case to his fellow Members, when so much hung on what he did with every minute of his time.

At last he went off to the chamber, and I was left minding the office. I felt tired and discouraged.

At 5 the Division Bell rang, which meant that Members would leave their seats and walk from the chamber by the two doors, the Ayes going through one door and the Noes through the other, this being the method of voting. Time passed, which meant that many were going out by one door—good; twenty minutes passed, and I felt better. Then suddenly back they came to the office with the news that the Motion of Censure had been defeated by 475 to 25. Mr. Churchill, looking calm and matter-of-fact, came over and asked me what had happened to his gold watch. I explained its mainspring was broken, but that the repairer had sent his own watch as a replacement and had asked if the Prime Minister would honor him by using it. He took it, and thanked me for staying up all night. I nearly wept, feeling worn out and at the same time relieved that all was well.

As 1942 progressed, so the news improved. The famous Malta Convoy got through despite heavy losses and a nerve-shaking ordeal, and Malta, our vitally important naval base in the Mediterranean, was refueled and supplied. There were several raids on the French coast by Combined Operations—notably the costly Dieppe affair—which gave us a feeling of activity. And of course there were the Americans.

At about this time Generals Eisenhower and Mark Clark arrived in England, in preparation for our combined plans for the assault on western North Africa. They were in frequent consultation with the Prime Minister, and we saw them almost every weekend at Chequers. I think Mr. Churchill found the American generals charming; they were tactful, modest, direct and most businesslike. We

CONTINUED ON PAGE 188

The most precious gift you can give a son

From that first wonderful day when he drops your guiding hand to walk alone—unsteady, unsure, but on his own—his goal is independence.

And this is yours to give—even as he falters and clings, then manfully struggles on. You want so much to help him. And your heart nearly bursts with pride one day when you know he's now "his own man." How fervently you pray that no one—ever—will take away this hard-won freedom to be himself.

There's one way you may not have thought of to help him continue to enjoy the independence he's achieved.

Be on the watch for ideas that could deprive him of it—the idea, for example, that "government should run such and such—a business, a service, an institution." You have only to remember the people in socialist nations to know that when government controls more and more things, there is less and less freedom and independence for the individual!

You can use your woman-power to discourage this idea that "the government should run it." When you hear people talk that way, point out that the loss of anybody's independence is a threat to everybody's freedom.

Very much aware of this danger are the independent electric light and power companies, because government already runs part of the electric business, and powerful people are pressing it to take over more.

America's Independent Electric Light and Power Companies*

*Company names on request through this magazine

"Freedom is a woman"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 186

of the staff were surprised by their easy friendliness and lack of formality.

The planning of TORCH, the American and British descent on the North African coastline, was an operation which brought something new into our lives. At last we were going over to the offensive. After the ordeal of the bombing and the many losses and setbacks we had suffered, here we were planning something actual with our great friends, the Americans. Mr. Churchill kept President Roosevelt well in the picture with long telegrams. There was also in preparation the great British and Commonwealth attack in the desert, at Alamein. We felt sure these ventures would succeed, and that our star was about to rise.

Dictation now took on a different form. We wrote of nothing but landing craft, seaborne troops, escorting destroyers and anti-aircraft guns. One night on duty I was delighted to pick out a Winston touch. As he wrote something by hand on a document, I heard him saying to himself, "Battalion—two t's and one l." Then he looked up and explained, "When I was small I always used to think of 'Battle lions' to remind me of the spelling."

We now had two great offensive actions on hand. LIGHTFOOT, which was the code name for the attack in Egypt, was to begin on October 23rd, under the command of General Alexander, the new Commander-in-Chief, Middle East, and General Montgomery, in command of the Eighth Army. TORCH was due to start on November 8th, under the general command of General Eisenhower.

It so happened that I was on duty the weekend just after LIGHTFOOT started. Everyone was in a wonderful humor, and in great excitement, waiting for reports to come in on the telephone. Everything that was received over the scrambler had to be typed out like the wind and rushed to the Prime Minister wherever he was—at meals, entertaining guests, walking in the garden. One afternoon the news of the great victory came through, and that evening when I went in for dictation the atmosphere was most jovial. I noted in my diary: "He and a few others were gathered in his study, full of jokes and laughter, he trying to dictate through it all, making me laugh too. Once he began to bark at me, then quickly stopped himself and said, 'No, no; quite all right—quite all right. Tonight you may rejoice. Tonight there is sugar on the cake.'"

During the latter part of November, Mrs. Hill became ill. She had been strained and unwell for some time, and now it was found that she had to have her appendix out. Peter Kinna was brought along to help me out. He remained on the Prime Minister's staff for the rest of the war, in a clerical capacity: he didn't really like shorthand and typing, and in the intervals between trips, he minded official documents and filing, arranged transport, and so forth. This meant that I was on duty almost every morning, almost every weekend, and often at night too. Peter Kinna would do night duty, but he could not do speech form, and that meant that all speeches and broadcasts were my final responsibility. And then, oddly enough, the third on our staff went down with a nervous breakdown and had to leave the office for good. We carried on as we we hoping fervently that Mr. Churchill would n be put out by this depletion of his staff, wa ing for Mrs. Hill to return, and trying to ke up with the work.

From that time, the end of November, ur the Prime Minister left for the Casablan Conference on January 12th, was a hard sp for me. Everything seemed to happen. T gold pen, an indispensable part of our da life, gave in, and I had to find someone to r pair it. Mr. Churchill's glasses ceased to gi satisfaction; the regular oculist was away, a I had to find another, have his eyes tested f new glasses and fetch the latter when th were ready—in those days things were not d livered. On November 30th there was t birthday to attend to, piles and piles of te grams and letters and presents to be acknow edged—in addition to the normal routine. had to take responsibility for all his priva affairs—letters, household accounts, const uents, gifts, engagements, literary affai Chartwell—all of whi I had done former under Mrs. Hill's ey so that it wasn't to difficult. I was even co sulted on occasions l the private secretarie which great honor ma me giggle. I hardly h a day off in all that tim When Christmas can there was the usual l to be prepared of su gested names to who gifts were to be se (usually copies of M Churchill's books), whom telegrams di patched, and then the to be sent off.

I made plenty of mi takes, I was continu ously tired, but I trie my very best—anyon with any heart woul have done so. Throug all that time Mr. Churc ill was kind and consid erate, and I never had hard word from him. was immensely gratefu for this. Though alway an exacting employe from that time on he wa never really cross wit me again. Mrs. Church ill, too, who depende to a certain extent on m help at the weekends could not have bee kinder.

The P.M. made m smile one day. I was s bold as to point out a slight error in a directio he had given me, and he turned to me in sur prise. "Quite right, quite right; take a goo mark. Or rather, cancel the last bad one I gav you." I suppose he thought too many congrat ulations might produce too much self-confi dence.

When he left for the Casablanca Conference I didn't even resent it that Peter Kinna and Geoffrey Green were taken and I was not. All I wanted was peace, perfect peace. When the evening came for him to leave, the private secretaries were congregated around the door of the flat, waiting to bid him bon voyage. I did not quite like to join them, but I picked up Smoky, knowing the Prime Minister would notice his little cat.

Sure enough, when he emerged from his room, pink and beaming, ready to leave, he came and talked to Smoky, hugged him and told me to see he was not lonely. Then he shook hands and smiled, leaving me childishly pleased.

Shortly after his return from this trip, which included a visit to Turkey following the conference, Mr. Churchill became ill. He must have been tired, for he seemed suddenly to be stricken with pneumonia almost before we knew he was unwell. For some days we wondered whether or not he would live. We were all utterly miserable; he was in his room at the

AGED EIGHT AND THREE

By NORMAN NATHAN

This morning, daughters, as we play
At catch-us-dad near Eagle Rock,
Zigzagging through the child-high weeds
We stumble on some broken glass—
Beer bottles that teen-agers tossed
Last night for excitement in the dark.

How casually you laugh and romp
Over jagged edges others leave,
Who wear their carelessness like jewels,
Forgetful of the years when they Ran light-footed through fairy grass
And broadcast pleasure in the sun.

Shelton Stroller
"the carefree fashion"

When true beauty of print meets the wonder of nylon jersey . . . you just know it's a Shelton Stroller. Gay colors match good taste with a cheerful look. Slim, trim lines stay in step when you're on the go. When day is done, Shelton Stroller washes easily, drips dry, sheds wrinkles, needs no ironing. For the carefree fashion in your life, choose Shelton Stroller!
Sizes 10 to 20, 12½ to 22½, 38 to 44.
From $12.95 to $14.95 at leading stores.

for name of nearest store and FREE FASHION FOLIO write to:
Shelton CASUALS Department L-4, 1350 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

dvertisement

The Picture of Health for April

by MAXINE DAVIS

Spring fever got you? Want to sit and think—or just sit? Don't! Go outdoors and do something. Regular exercise is a MUST for good health. It sends he blood zipping through your veins instead f getting sluggish, risking clotting. That's hy doctors make you move around soon after urgery and urge you to stretch and walk on ong trips.

t improves muscle tone. It's good for all your nuscles but especially those in your diahragm. The abdominal muscles help your ungs and heart.

It's the most effective tranquilizer known; it elaxes all your tensions, makes you new as April.

ought to warn you: when first you start your outine exercise you're sure to suffer what my amily vaguely and dolefully calls "muscles." ou will ache! And if you have some mild arthitis or rheumatism your joints and muscles re bound to act up from time to time. But hat won't get you down if you have SURIN. t's no cure for arthritis; there isn't any. But URIN will bring help—blessed temporary reief for those minor pains, as tests in a famous hospital proved. Put moist hot towels on the rea that hurts until the skin is warm and water-saturated. Then apply SURIN gently. It gets down where the pain is and relieves it.

We have new neighbors, a friendly middleaged couple used to city living. Mr. Coe spends very salubrious Saturday on the golf course, but Mrs. Coe didn't seem to have enough energy to put her hair in pin-curls, let alone walk to the market.

invited her to lunch one Saturday. She only ate the rice and applesauce. I guessed her trouble: she has dentures that slide around when she eats the meat and food she should have. As that hurts she doesn't get enough to eat for health or vigor. So I told her about Gramp's ORA-FIX. It holds dentures in place so well he chews apples, peanuts, anything, as well as a boy. Then he uses ORA to clean his dentures afterwards. Mrs. Coe bought ORA-FIX and ORA right away. Now she bounces like a teen-ager!

My husband loves golf, and as Mr. Coe's a stranger to our suburb he makes a point of including him in a foursome as often as he can. I'm glad, because his sense of neighborly obligation gets him out-of-doors more often than usual for him.

Before he leaves the house I always tuck a pair of clean socks and a can of OCTOFEN Powder in with his golf balls. His feet perspire a lot, and the fungi that cause athlete's foot might make trouble. He's had several acute attacks. OCTOFEN Liquid stopped them but—better—OCTOFEN Powder, dusted between each carefully washed and dried toe and sprinkled into fresh socks, prevents the disease from breaking out. OCTOFEN is the only medication approved by the National Foot Health Council.

Even after a shower and change, my spouse unfortunately sweats profusely when he's been active. So—he borrows my YODORA. He may be damp but nobody knows it. For the odor of perspiration comes from bacteria that flourish in it. The new YODORA is a deodorant which paralyzes those unpleasant bugs. Its light cream base is soothing to and helps heal irritated surfaces, and its scent is so light, so evanescent, that he feels fresh and clean with it.

© 1958 McKesson & Robbins

Annexe, and most of the time we hung forlornly about the flat, feeling quite lost. On the rare occasions when he dictated—and it could be only on a matter of major importance—his voice was so weak and his manner so gentle that we longed for the old stamp and bark, the quick word of scorn, the snort of impatience and the final twinkle of forgiveness. The flat was stiff with specialists, and two hospital nurses took up regular abode in the study. Eventually, to the relief of the whole nation, Mr. Churchill was well enough to travel to Chequers to convalesce.

One day while we were there we heard that the king proposed to visit Mr. Churchill. This was quite an unexpected honor. The Coldstream Guards were alerted to produce a Guard of Honor, and thoroughly primed in the intricacies of a royal salute. The young officer who was to be guard commander was in a high state of nerves. When the great moment came and the long, black car, signaled by the police at the outer gate, drove into the courtyard, he fairly shrieked his order and a crashing salute was given. However, the car door opened and Lord Cherwell hurried into the house—it was the wrong car. When a few minutes later His Majesty arrived, all the stuffing seemed to have left the poor guard.

It was during this period at Chequers that Mr. Churchill dictated his "Four Years Plan." One day he decided to drive to Dytchley Park for luncheon, a distance of about forty miles from Chequers. From the moment the car started till we reached our destination he raced along, his ideas tumbling over one another. He spoke of Reconstruction; of National Insurance; of Employment, the Export Trade, and Agriculture; he continued with Health and Education. But the journey home was even worse. He dealt with Rebuilding, Income Tax, National Finance, and our wartime scientific discoveries. We had to make time, and the swinging of the car round corners disturbed my Pitman's best. When we arrived back I hurried to the typewriter, wailing that I was in for a real raspberry and couldn't someone please save me. They all clustered around—Mr. Martin, Commander Thompson, Lord Cherwell and other helpful people. What I had missed or could not read they made up for me; they told me what he had probably said and what they thought he ought to have said, and what they would have said had they been Prime Minister; and Mr. Churchill had later to admit that, though I had not recorded his dictation exactly, at least the words made sense.

With the end of hostilities in North Africa in sight, it became obvious that the Prime Minister and the President would have to meet again. It was decided that Mr. Churchill should go again to Washington, taking with him various Cabinet ministers, the Chiefs of Staff and their own staffs, and the Indian commanders in chief, Admiral Somerville, Field Marshal Wavell and Air Marshal Peirse. These dignitaries were to be transported in the Queen Mary, and their staffs would include a good number of young women. I was the only female in Mr. Churchill's personal party; Peter Kinna and I were to work together.

Mr. Churchill did not dictate a great deal on the journey, as his days were chiefly occupied by conferences with the Chiefs of Staff; but Peter and I were not idle. All messages came in through us, and the Prime Minister had to be kept completely informed. There were few early nights. Going westward meant that each night we had an extra hour of time, the clocks being put back at midnight. Mr. Churchill always made the most of this, playing bezique with Mr. Harriman till far into the night with the excuse that he was sure they had forgotten to alter the clocks yet and "it can't be more than three o'clock, which means only two by the new time"—till poor Mr. Harriman looked quite haggard.

We landed at Staten Island, were off-loaded and put straight onto a train, which rushed us through to Washington. But before we arrived there we ate luncheon, our first American meal, and what a meal it was! When the steaks appeared they seemed not only to cover the whole plate but to touch the tablecloth on either side.

Lose weight fast... forget food craving!

Lose up to 14 pounds in 14 days

Afraid of reducing because you fear hunger pangs—because you hate real starvation diets?

Here is a new, modern, pleasant —easier way to lose weight. On the Kessamin Plan 14, you'll enjoy the same delicious foods as your family and friends. Forget food craving!

The Kessamin Plan and Tablets start working right away to help you reduce. You start losing—losing . . . really losing.

And you feel great because Kessamin Tablets bring you vitamins and iron for up-to-par pep and well-being. You feel younger, livelier when you really lose. Women look younger—men more trim, more athletic! It's easy, pleasant, safe to reduce on Kessamin Plan 14.

Ask your doctor about reducing. Then consult your druggist about the guaranteed Kessamin Plan. Either you lose weight, feel better, or you get your money back. Kessamin is sold only by your druggist. It's one more example of how McKesson "makes it better—so it's better for you."

KESSAMIN

BETTER...by McKESSON

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Dr. Scholl's SHOES

so kind to troubled feet

Sizes, Some Styles
2½ to 13
AAAAA to EEEEEEEE

So engagingly trim, too!

You'll quickly discover what real walking ease is like when you step out in your first pair of supremely comfortable, foot-flattering Dr. Scholl's Shoes. Made over Dr. Scholl's scientifically designed lasts, their glove-like, foot-cradling fit makes them ever so kind to your feet. No "breaking-in" discomfort.

Dr. Scholl's Shoes are made in all sizes for all types of feet. Expertly fitted at Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops in principal cities and selected Shoe and Department Stores. If not obtainable locally, write for catalog to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Dept. J48, Chicago 10, Illinois

Delightful!
Dry Cleaning with that Free Sta*Nu "Finishing Touch"!

"Sir Sta★Nu" says:

Guards the Life of Your Clothes

For the finest in dry cleaning and a "finishing touch" that makes garments look and feel "like new" again, send all your clothes to your Sta★Nu Dry Cleaner! Sta★Nu finishing revitalizes all fabrics—actually restores the original lustre, color and softness to all your clothes—makes them wrinkle-resistant too. All this at no extra cost to you! You'll be delighted!

Find it Fast in the 'Yellow Pages'

Look in the Yellow Pages for the dry cleaner nearest you who offers the exclusive Sta★Nu Finishing Process.

Nationwide Stā-Nu PROCESS

FREE WEDDING CATALOG

Everything for the Wedding & Reception!
Invitations • Gifts for the bridal party
Table decorations • Trousseau items
Unusual, exciting personalized items.

Write

ELAINE CREATIONS
Box 824 Dept. E-133
Chicago 42, Ill.

THE NEW
Emily Post's Etiquette
At all bookstores $5.50
FUNK & WAGNALLS

The three weeks we spent in Washington were some of the busiest days I can remember. We seemed to pick up some of the American ideas of rush and bustle, and we fairly panted along from early morning until far into the night.

The White House staff obviously thought Peter and me quite mad to put up with our hours of work. Sometimes we did not finish till 4:30 A.M. We kept reminding each other that we hadn't been brought along for a good time, and with the hustle in the office during the day we found the night the best time for getting a long job done.

The Prime Minister was to address the Congress of the United States. It was an important speech, a review of the whole war scene, and a night or so beforehand he got through most of the dictation. He had been dining and conferring with the President, but about midnight he came to his own quarters, saying that a busy night was in prospect. I settled myself in Mr. Churchill's room with book and several pencils, in an armchair with high back and ear flaps, and soon he began pacing about the room. Inspiration came, and flowed on and on and on.

Back and forth he walked, his hands gesturing, his voice rising and falling. About 2 o'clock a sleepy note came into his voice, and I knew that he wouldn't last much longer. Presently while behind my chair he took off his dinner jacket, then continued pacing the room. The next time he went out of sight he took off his waistcoat. I wondered in considerable amusement what would happen next. There was a longer pause than usual behind my chair, and a rustling sound as something flew through the air onto the bed. When next he appeared, he was wearing his famous green-and-gold dressing gown with the red dragons, the cords trailing behind as usual.

At 2:30 he finished, and at 4:30 I finished typing it out. As I tottered off to bed, one of the American officers on duty near the front door said, "Gee, are you crazy? All the American girls went home just twelve hours ago."

As our visit drew to an end, activity in the office increased. It was decided that the Prime Minister and his personal party, with the exception of myself, should fly straight to North Africa, there to consult with Generals de Gaulle and Giraud; I was to return with the main party in the Queen Mary.

The night before they left, Mr. Hopkins came walking into the office to inquire if I would like to meet the President. I jumped up in a terrific fluster, gasping that my nose was shiny and my hands grubby—but he just smiled and said, "Oh, come along," so I went. Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt were dining alone in the latter's study, and as I entered with Mr. Hopkins they both looked up and beamed. The President said, "I think it's about time I met you," holding out his hand to shake mine, with that well-known toss of his head and the famous smile. He spoke kindly to me for a few minutes, then I felt it was time to go and backed hastily out, with a grateful look at the Prime Minister, thinking this could not really be me at all.

On June 30th that year Mr. Churchill received the Freedom of the City of London. This took place in the ancient and historic Guildhall, badly battered though it had been in the fire blitz, and there was great competition to obtain invitations to the ceremony. I longed to go, but there seemed not a hope.

On the morning of the day in question we were informed that the Honorable Mrs. Keppel, a relation of Mrs. Churchill's, would not be able to attend. Mrs. Hill asked Mrs. Churchill, then took me aside. "Keep it dark," she said; "you can go."

There was an enormous crowd filling the City and making it difficult to move about, but at length I reached the Guildhall and found my place. Mrs. Keppel's seat was in the front row on the aisle up which the distinguished guests were to walk; my neighbors turned out to be Sir Charles Howard, the sergeant at arms of the House of Commons, and an air vice marshal. When they discovered I was not Mrs. Keppel as my card indicated, they seemed a little shocked—when asked, I told them, "Well, I type."

At last the herald announced "The Right Honorable the Prime Minister and Mrs. Churchill"; they were received by the lord mayor and seated on the platform. The City chamberlain read an account of the Prime Minister's achievements, the freedom ceremony was performed, and then Mr. Churchill rose to give his address.

This was the first time I had actually seen him make one of his deliveries, apart from the usual preview while he was dictating. As he took from his pocket the notes I had so recently typed, I wondered anxiously if the pages were in the right order.

He was, of course, looking most spick-and-span in morning coat and striped trousers, and as he reached the small reading desk from which he was to speak, he took out his glasses and put them on, a familiar act. He spoke very much as he did on the radio—slowly but not too slowly, clearly and emphatically. He made use of every pause, his sense of timing was perfect—he might not have been reading from his notes but speaking his thoughts as they came to him. His hands gestured in the well-known fashion: sometimes he would hold the front of his black coat, fingers tucked in, sometimes his hands would be clasped in front of him, sometimes a forefinger uplifted. He held his audience (me included) spellbound, and I am convinced there was no one present who did not feel a prickling thrill in his veins when Mr. Churchill said, in that growly way one knew so well, "It is very probable there will be heavy fighting in the Mediterranean and elsewhere before the leaves of autumn fall."

Afterward the lord mayor escorted Mrs. Churchill down the aisle, followed by the Prime Minister with the lady mayoress. As he passed me Mr. Churchill looked surprised and said "Oh—hullo," much to the astonishment of my neighbors.

Not long after this I was included in the Prime Minister's staff to attend the First Quebec Conference, which took place early in August. Peter and Geoffrey Green also went, and in addition my friend Ham, since Mrs. Churchill and Mary accompanied the Prime Minister.

The Château Frontenac had been completely commandeered for conference personnel, British, American and Canadian. The Prime Minister and his personal party were housed in the summer residence of the governors-general, called the Citadel, a picturesque building on top of the hill overlooking Quebec. The walls were guarded day and night by Mounties in their scarlet coats.

Within a few days Mr. Roosevelt arrived. We were rather amused to see the President's car smothered in Secret Service men; they hung on the back and on the bonnet and from the running boards. Mr. Churchill traveled with only his two Scotland Yard detectives, usually on duty one at a time.

At the end of the conference the Prime Minister made a world broadcast, speaking from the Citadel, and that same night we left by train for Washington. And here I must include an incident typical of Winston Churchill. As we traveled south next day, I sitting by him waiting for dictation, he began asking about my mother, who had flown from Vancouver to see me during the conference. Then he told me he wished to make her a present of half her fare across the continent, knowing what an effort she had made. I was touched indeed at his kindness. Though pressed upon by matters of international importance, he still never forgot those who worked for him.

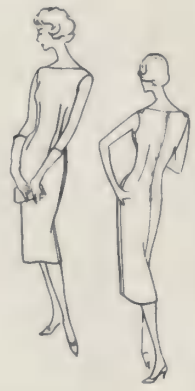
It was pleasant and familiar to enter the White House once more. The office we normally occupied was not big enough to accommodate the two private secretaries, Peter, Geoffrey and me, and so we three were moved into a sitting room, which in a very short time changed its appearance into that of a paper-junk shop. Everywhere were Klops, tags, pins, clips, piles of carbon copies, papers to be sorted into the files, files to be sorted into the secret boxes, bags to be dispatched to London by courier. For the first day or so I was too busy to find myself a proper desk, but set up my typewriter on a grand piano!

After some days the Prime Minister, Mr. Martin, Peter and I left Washington by overnight train for Harvard, where Mr. Churchill was to receive an honorary Doctorate of Laws. Peter and I worked until 4:30, getting his speech ready, in our special train. The next day—or rather the same day—we had the honor and privilege of being present at the ceremony. Perhaps the graduation "bonnet" which had been supplied to Mr. Churchill did not suit him so well as his more standard headgear. Nevertheless, one knew everyone in that hall was conscious of the presence of a very great man.

En route for Halifax, Mr. Churchill had a terrific volume to dictate, mostly reports of his discussions with the President. I sat writing until my eyes were nearly dropping out and I could no longer suppress my yawns. Finally after a particularly obvious one, Mr. Churchill said impatiently, "Well, you'd better go to bed if you're tired, and type it out in the morning." My appearance must indeed have been rock-bottom, to have produced this rare indulgence.

After this interlude life went on as usual for a few weeks. Then Admiral Sir Dudley Pound, First Sea Lord until ill health forced him to resign, died and was given a state funeral. The Prime Minister insisted on marching behind the coffin down Whitehall to the Abbey, rather against medical advice, and we watched him, a dogged figure moving somewhat stiffly to the notes of Chopin's Funeral March, that bulldog look on his face which betokened the emotion he was feeling at the death of his old friend and colleague.

Plans were afoot for the Cairo Conference and the first Big Three meeting at Teheran. Early in November we embarked at Plymouth and proceeded via Gibraltar and Malta to Alexandria. The conference of the staffs, preliminary to Teheran, was to take place at Mena House, outside Cairo, and here the main body of the party were deposited. The Prime Minister and his personal party, which consisted of his daughter Sarah in W.A.A.F. uniform, two private secretaries (Messrs. Martin and Brown), Commander Thompson, Peter, Geoffrey and myself, Sawyers and two detectives, were accommodated in the villa of Mr. Richard Casey, then Minister Resident in the Middle East. It was about a mile from Mena House, and bore the romantic name of Beit el Azrak, which I discovered merely meant Blue House.



The place had been carefully fitted out to suit the Prime Minister. Everywhere were bells, buzzers, telephone extensions, mosquito nets, fly swats and the like. My first job was to make sure that all arrangements were in order—that he could from his bedroom ring for Sawyers, buzz for a secretary or speak by telephone to whom he chose, that his bed was securely netted against mosquitoes and his bedside table laid out with the correct selection of Klop, tags, pencils, "Action This Day"s, and all the necessaries.

Soon we were comfortably settled in. Shortly after our arrival, President Roosevelt also arrived, with his large and efficient staff

CONTINUED ON PAGE 192

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE PATTERN ON PAGE 139

Vogue Design No. 9429. "Very Easy to Make" one-piece dress or jumper dress; 12–18 (32–38). 75c.

For most every kind of pain or ache, BAYER is what millions take—because

BAYER
Brings Fastest Relief

...the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get!

"I use it for
HEADACHE!
Bayer makes it go—in a hurry!"

"I use it for BACKACHE
and get wonderful relief!"

"I use it for SORE THROAT
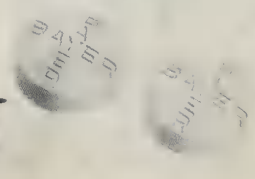
due to a cold!"



"I use it for minor
ARTHRITIC PAINS!
They are temporarily relieved—fast!"

Men who KNOW medicine say: "Take Aspirin!".... Doctors and public health officials are men who know medicine—men who know what's best for pain relief. And for headache, backache, muscular pains and fever from a cold, these men who know medicine say the thing to take is aspirin. And the best aspirin the world has ever known is Bayer Aspirin!

Why BAYER makes you feel better fast!.... Unlike pain-relieving tablets which delay relief because they enter your stomach whole, a Bayer tablet disintegrates into soft, tiny flakes on its way to your stomach. Therefore, it's ready to go to work instantly—without delay—to bring the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get!

FEEL BETTER FAST—with BAYER® ASPIRIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 190

of Secret Service men, and was established in an equally comfortable villa about a mile past Mena on the Cairo road. A third leader made his appearance, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and he and Madame occupied a third villa at no great distance from our own.

One never-to-be-forgotten evening the Chiang Kai-sheks dined with Mr. Churchill and Sarah. The dining room was just across the courtyard from the office, so that we had a good view of them as they sat at dinner. The Generalissimo looked old and very frail. He wore a black robe belted with a cord, and his thin, delicately featured face had a transparent look as if he belonged to another world. His dignity and stately bearing were impressive. Madame was also dressed in black, but with a touch of white and a white flower in her hair. She looked a model of elegance and grooming, small, neat and vivacious, a brilliant conversationalist speaking fluent English with an American accent.

Mr. Churchill loved to sit in the sun next to the little fountain in the courtyard as he worked at his box or dictated directives. Sometimes he would instruct one of the Royal Marine orderlies to stand by its tap. "It's too high," he would say, "turn it down." Then, "Now a little up; no, a bit lower; just a bit higher ——" and so on, until his full attention was claimed by his work.

The time came for the Teheran party to fly off. I remained at Beit el Azrak, and therefore have nothing to tell of the first Big Three meeting. I did not resent this in the least—there were the pyramids to visit, and the Sphinx, sandbagged to her chin.

When they arrived back, all thoughts were turned on Turkish affairs, as the Prime Minister and President Roosevelt were to meet President Inönü at Mena. Much urgent work was at hand. One morning the P.M. delivered himself of a most enormous paper on Turkey. I was doing my best to produce this in type, for nowadays he often liked one to use shorthand, and Peter was standing by to check, Klop and tag, the matter being urgent. Several gentlemen of ambassadorial status came wandering into the small office, all anxious to know "what the P.M. had said." Vainly did we hint that if we were not left alone, no one ever would know. Finally Peter hustled them politely out the door. Afterward we looked at each other grinning, and remarked that we were getting hardened indeed if we could order ambassadors about.

A few days later President Roosevelt and President Inönü dined with the Prime Minister, together with various of their advisers. Among them was Monsieur Menemencioglu, and watching them across the courtyard I could not help thinking of the occasion when, taking dictation on the typewriter in faraway No. 10, I had first heard his name. I had stopped and goggled, and Mr. Churchill had said impatiently, "Come on now, you know that one," and when I had anxiously handed over the minute for initialing he had been surprised into congratulations because by some strange chance I had spelled it right.

The Prime Minister planned that after leaving Cairo he would first visit General Eisenhower at Tunis, and then fly to Italy to see General Alexander and our front there. But the weather was bad, and for this reason an alternative method of transport was prepared. Various of the Prime Minister's staff were placed aboard the light cruiser HMS Penelope at Alexandria, to proceed to Malta and there to await developments, in case a crossing to Naples by sea became necessary. I was one of these, being considered less airworthy than Peter and Geoffrey. The rest of the party flew off to Tunis.

We spent a week aboard Penelope without being called on for work. But then the captain received an urgent signal and soon, with a flurry of water astern, we were gliding out of Grand Harbour and off to Bizerta. It seemed all was not well with the Prime Minister.

We remained anchored off Bizerta; General Hollis, the head of the Prime Minister's staff aboard, went ashore and returned looking very grave. Mr. Churchill was at Carthage, at General Eisenhower's villa, very seriously ill with pneumonia. Italy was off. Everyone was to fly home except him and me, and we were to join the Carthage party.

At the White House, Carthage, there was the greatest anxiety. It seemed that the Prime Minister's life hung in the balance. A famous chest specialist, Brigadier Bedford, had been flown in from Cairo to assist Lord Moran, and three nursing sisters. Mrs. Churchill and Ham were due by air from London that afternoon.

For a day or so I did not see the Prime Minister. He was hardly able to dictate, though he still read many of the telegrams that arrived. Sarah had been keeping her father amused by reading him Pride and Prejudice, for he always enjoyed Jane Austen. Before long it became obvious that Mr. Churchill was on the mend. Work began again as usual. The first time I went in for dictation he said, "Hullo, Miss Layton, how are ——" but then realizing that perhaps in reply I might ask, "Rather how are you, Mr. Churchill?" and the time of day would pass, he quickly checked the question and started on the work. He looked much as usual; I think the arrival of Mrs. Churchill had helped.

Christmas was spent at Carthage. Never shall I forget that beautiful bay, the blue water, the pink sunrises and sunsets. On Christmas morning a small patrol vessel, which had been on guard each day in the ba put up a stream of flags which in naval pa lance meant Happy Christmas. Mr. Churchi was much pleased, and was cross when fo security reasons the little ship was ordered t haul them down.

We had a big conference, too, at Christma time. General Alexander flew from Ital Generals Eisenhower and Bedell Smith we on the spot, General "Jumbo" Maitland Wilson, Admiral John Cunningham and A Marshal Tedder came from Cairo. There wa a party after the conference, and Peter and were invited; I have recorded rather dolefull that we were able to spare only ten minute each from our office work!

Some days later we moved again. M Churchill could not yet return to the mists an damp of an English winter, and Genera Eisenhower therefore put at his disposal villa at Marrakech, in Morocco, taken over b the American Army. Before leaving, M Churchill dictated a press communiqué, ad dressed principally to the people of Britain, which he told them that with the help o M. & B. (Moran and Bedford, according t him) he had made a wonderful recovery fro pneumonia, and was now going to Marrakec to convalesce. He also said that as he had wit him a "highly efficient nucleus staff" he ha been able to remain in full control of the gov ernment. When Peter and I saw that bit w looked at each other, grinning.

The Taylor Villa, where we both spent th days and I half the nights, was built in th Moroccan style, but with every modern co venience and luxury. The furnishings we colorful and Eastern; everything seemed to red and green or red and gold. The floors we colored stone mosaic, which made every foo fall a clatter. A fairly large staff graduall became established here—the three privat secretaries, a detachment from the map roon Mrs. Hill from London, and various folk fro other offices. Lord Beaverbrook arrived, an his rather snarly voice could be heard aroun the courtyard. General Alexander also ar rived. Plans for the Anzio landing, the P.M.' own baby, were being formulated.

Halfway through January came the time t leave. We were flown to Gibraltar, and ther embarked in the battleship HMS King Georg V, which was waiting to take us home.

As always on our return from a trip, th entire Cabinet, the service chiefs and variou others turned up to welcome the Prime Min ister home. Their greetings on this occasio were particularly sincere, after his long ab sence and severe illness. Mr. Churchill, wear ing his reefer jacket and yachting cap (hi favorite outfit), his cigar well lit and a larg beam lighting up his face, moved happil among his colleagues. It was nice to be hom again.

In the early months of 1944 the Germa night raiders returned. Some severe damag was caused, particularly by the incendiar bombs, so that it was called the Fire Blitz This was the cause of the following event.

I was on late duty and we were all at No 10, for the Prime Minister had importan guests to dinner and was entertaining them i the two small rooms below the Cabinet Room Presently the sirens announced that our eve ning visitors had arrived; later came th "Overhead" signal, and Mr. Martin, who wa on duty, ordered his own shorthand writer one Liz Gilliatt, and me to retire to the shelter I felt indignant; never before had I sheltered But at the shelter door we were met by Mr Churchill, who hurried us within and directe us to scramble onto an upper bunk in the firs of the two small rooms. Mrs. Hill, Ham, Mrs Landemare, the cook, and her two littl kitchenmaids were already seated about th walls. Through the doorway a few feet off w had an excellent view of the Prime Ministe and his guests, who had also retired to th shelter; they sat on chairs, stools or bunks i the second small room. They were the mem bers of the War Cabinet and—His Majesty the King.

I had seen the king on a number of occa sions; he quite frequently came to dine wit the Prime Minister; but I had never listene to him talking before. We sat there for ove

GOWN BY DESSÈS

"Or for an unforgettable vacation in all of Europe . . . now is the time to fly for less . . . and have more fun abroad, too!"

SAYS Mary Gordon TWA TRAVEL ADVISOR

TWA offers new Sky Club Economy Fares*—the lowest ever to Europe and good all year! And you can fly aboard the magnificent Jetstream*. . . just in time to visit the Brussels World's Fair. You save $113.40 over regular round-trip Tourist fares . . . enough for extra fun overseas. Pay just 10% down and you're on your way . . . non-stop to London, Paris, Rome—all of Europe. Call your TWA travel agent or nearest TWA office now!

Jetstream is a service mark owned exclusively by TWA. Economy Fares subject to government approval.*

FLY THE FINEST
FLY TWA

☐ Economy Service to Europe
☐ Climates and Clothes
☐ Time-Pay Plan

Mary Gordon, TWA Travel Advisor, Dept. LH-48,
Trans World Airlines, 380 Madison Ave., N. Y. 17
Please send me the following free information:

NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY_____ZONE_____STATE_____

hour, our eyes goggling and our ears oping, our legs dangling over the edge of bunk. It was intensely interesting to see at happened when The Great got together a purely social occasion. Actually, it was t like any friends sitting down to pass a asant evening. The king seemed boyishly ger to join in with the others, and told one two funny stories, which made one feel t in addition to being king he was a very e person indeed. Mr. Oliver Lyttelton, ays a wag, related a few anecdotes with itations; the conversation was not business- e at all! The raid was particularly heavy t night, and the Prime Minister kept dging in and out of the shelter door to see he rest of the place was still standing. At ervals other members of the party, Mr. tlee or Mr. Bevin or Mr. Eden, would oll across to make a joking remark to us the anteroom; I hope they didn't think we re nervous—we had forgotten all about the raid.

When at last it was safe for the guests to ve, we had a charming smile and "Good ght" from His Majesty as he passed us. We d planned to jump down from the upper nk and stand straight as soon as he moved, t unfortunately the little kitchenmaids were t then scrambling out of the lower bunk, we merely sat tight and smiled back.

The months before the invasion were a ain on us all. Hours were later than usual, npers shorter. If the knowledge was a bur- n to us, it must have been an oppression to se who bore the responsibility. We tried ry hard not to give Mr. Churchill any cause impatience. We understood how his whole ing was bound up in the pending landings and the ttles that would follow, d we laid ourselves out to oid any of those petty itations which tiredness lack of 100 per cent con- ntration might have used. The private secre- ries, too, gave of their ry best. One of them, Mr. ck, had an exceptionally fast brain, as per- ps the following incident will serve to illus- ate.

One morning as Mr. Churchill sat in bed, rking at his precious box but pausing metimes to lean back deep in thought, ffing away meanwhile on the usual huge gar, I observed that he was in a somewhat gy mood. Presently he stretched out for the tle white telephone by his bed, which con- cted directly to the private secretary in the fice not far off. Mr. Peck was on duty that orning, and when he answered, Mr. Church- merely said gruffly into the mouthpiece, Gimme the moon," and replaced the receiver. on Mr. Peck entered bearing the chart of e moon's phases for the month of June, vasion month. This was received without mment, and was indeed what was required!

One felt the whole nation knew the time as near. Purpose and resolve seemed tighter. ueues were longer, but there were no grum- es. Travel became even more impossible, t no comments were made and no questions ked about the masses of men and armor oving southward and congregating there. I lt the deepest admiration for the way the ritish people faced up to the prospect of the ruggle to come—"grim and gay" never ited them better.

The weekend before D day was spent in our ecial train at a tiny siding outside Southamp- n. It was not particularly convenient or mfortable, but Mr. Churchill felt he had to e on the spot. The Prime Minister had rought various Cabinet ministers and ad- isers—General Smuts, Mr. Ernest Bevin and thers—to share his vigil, and as the office as separated from the sleeping and dining uarters by the coach in which they all sat, y colleague Marian and I were forced to wer ourselves about seven feet to the track, rot along and scramble up again every time was necessary to make the journey. Mr. Churchill went off one day to inspect the forces their last preparations, and returned with hat dogged look on his face that betokened reat emotion. The thought of the lives which would so soon be snuffed out was awful and serious. It was hard to sleep at night.

Less than a week after the invading forces crossed the coast of France, flying bombs began to arrive in Britain. These nasty things would come over in batches of six or eight, usually three or four times during the night and once or twice in daytime. Sometimes they would come very close, cutting off just before they reached us, and frequently the windows would have blown in without the steel shutters, which a marine orderly always closed when the alarm was given.

Usually Mr. Churchill took no notice of these disturbances, or made a joking remark to help morale. One night when there was a particularly heavy crash, he looked up from the paper he was studying. "Aren't you afraid?" he asked. "Don't you want to go to the shelter?" I felt there was something of a twinkle behind this, and merely said, "No, thank you." Perhaps I was scared inside, but I can't imagine what he would have thought of me if I had chosen to go to the shelter while he remained aboveground.

In general this new form of torture was having a bad effect on the people. Everyone was determinedly cheerful, but no one looked very happy. Many who had withstood the blitz following the Battle of Britain began evacuating to the country. It was a difficult time. The war seemed to have been going on for a lifetime. Try as one would, the constant late hours and nerve strain had their effect. Mr. Churchill was particularly busy with many speeches, including an enormously long review of the war in the House of Commons. It was just one thing after another.

We all knew Mr. Churchill's saying: "A change is as good as a rest"—a maxim which I imagine he has imposed upon himself and his staff for most of his life. I longed to get away—for a change, another trip, anything which would get me out of the trough of feeling I could go no longer.

But then relief came. In October, Mr. Churchill flew again to Moscow. The office staff consisted of Mr. Martin and three young women—Sheila, Marian and me. We were driven through Moscow to the Dacha or country house of M. Molotov, some twenty miles the other side of the city. Here we lived in great luxury for the best part of two weeks. Russian hospitality was quite overwhelming. The food was as one might imagine it to have been in czarist days. Breakfast was served about 9 o'clock. Luncheon and dinner lasted two hours each; each meal would be about ten courses. In case it be thought I am exaggerating, here is one of our menus:

Caviar, with brown bread and butter, tomatoes, cucumbers, radishes, shredded beet root, toast
Smoked salmon and smoked turbot
Bismarck herring
Sliced ham and tongue
Suckling pig with creamed horse-radish sauce
Jellied caviar
Russian salad
Hot mushrooms in butter
Soup
Grilled turbot with boiled potatoes
Roast chicken
Steamed cauliflower with butter sauce
Ice cream "bomb"
Dessert (apples, pears, peaches, grapes)
Coffee

Each course was served separately on clean plates, with some delay between, during which we were pressed to consume much vodka, white wine and red wine, and finally cognac and liqueur vodka. We used to wonder who did the washing up and where all the crockery was kept.

Every day Mr. Churchill would make the journey into Moscow to talk with Marshal Stalin, returning to the Dacha late in the afternoon. One day there was to be a banquet in his honor, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. As he was leaving the Dacha, he suddenly announced that he wanted to dictate in the car, so I accompanied him.

Driving through the pleasant autumn woods, which reminded me somewhat of British Columbia, he dictated a document for Mr. Stalin's immediate consideration. I was to go to the embassy and type it out, and thereafter could have a look around Moscow, as long as I was back at the embassy at 4:30. He was disembarked at the hall in Spiridonievka Street, looking very smart in his khaki uniform, and as he went off he turned to smile good-by. I knew he understood that being driven off by a Russian driver through the streets of Moscow to a place I didn't know might be alarming, and he wanted me to know it was all right. As we drove away I thought, Amazing man, he knows everything.

For a few days toward the end of our stay, Mr. Churchill remained in Moscow, at a house in Ostrovskaya Street set aside for important visitors, as he found the journeying took up too much time. That meant that we three girls had to travel from the Dacha into Moscow early and back late. When we arrived back at the Dacha in the early hours, the Russian officer in charge there, who spoke English perfectly, would be waiting up for us with caviar, vodka and fruit in case we felt

You can't have half a fowl for cooking, leaving the other half for laying eggs.
INDIAN PROVERB

Get the full treatment

Cuticura guarantees lovelier skin within 5 days... or money back

When have you ever seen blackheads and pimples yield so quickly, and skin made ever so much lovelier—softer, smoother, fresher, more radiant—usually within 5 days!

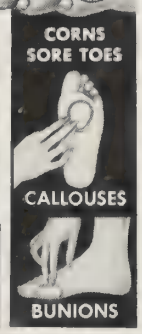
For sensational results get the full treatment: 1. Mild, superemollient, moisture-giving Cuticura Soap for twice daily, beautifying lather-massage. 2. Soothing, softening, gently stimulating Cuticura Ointment that improves your skin as it helps heal. 3. Greaseless, fast-acting Cuticura Medicated Liquid for daytime use to cleanse antiseptically, remove excess oiliness, check blemish-spreading bacteria, speed healing, cool and refresh your skin. Get all three—and see! At leading drug counters.

Available in Canada

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Cuticura

Cuticura has said for years—
Wishing won't help your skin, Cuticura will!



Corn, Callous Bunion Pain Stops!

Dr. Scholl's Fast NERVE-DEEP RELIEF works almost like magic!

No waiting for action when you use soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. You get super-fast nerve-deep relief. Used with the separate Medications included, Zino-pads remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

HOW TO SET

PIN CURLS

—IN SECONDS!

Hair setting a chore? NOT ANY MORE! Lady Ellen Klippies glide onto your curls in an instant—off in a jiffy—with the lightest finger-tip touch! Never pinch, or crimp delicate hair. At your favorite variety, drug, department or food store, and beauty shop. ■ Klippies for 25¢!

Lady Ellen HOLLYWOOD KLIPPIES

Write for 16-page illustrated booklet, "How to Set a Pin Curl." Send just 10¢ to:

LADY ELLEN, Dept. L. 453, Los Angeles 51, Calif.

Better than aspirin even with buffering for

TENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES

Nervous tension headaches need the special relief Anacin® gives. Here's why Anacin is better than aspirin, even with buffering added. Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one but a combination of medically proven ingredients. Anacin acts to (1) relieve pain, (2) calm nerves—leave you relaxed, (3) fight depression . . . and Anacin Tablets do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today!

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients of ANACIN in need of refreshment. There seemed no limit to Soviet hospitality—but we were very careful about the vodka!

One morning as I was on duty beside Mr. Churchill while he worked in his room at the town house, I was reminded of our morning "noise" troubles at the Annexe. First, the Russian guards on duty at the front door, not far from the bedroom, were chatting to each other. I hurried to quiet them by gestures, the poor frightened little men horrified at their offense. Next, the public-address system which is in every street was switched on, and Moscow at large was treated to the efforts of a trembling soprano. "What on earth is that howling?" asked Mr. Churchill. I explained there was nothing to be done about it, and luckily it soon quieted down. Not long afterward Mr. Martin, telephoning in the office opposite, was obliged to shout on account of a bad connection. The Prime Minister looked up—"Who the hell is that jawing away out there?" I flew to shut the office door. But that was not all. Somebody in the house adjoining started hammering—hammering! After one glance at The Countenance, I left the room without a word and implored the housekeeper to do something about the trouble. Eventually there was peace.

Another morning the inoffensive little guard at the front door had a cough. After bearing this rather impatiently for some while, Mr. Churchill suddenly roared at me, "Go and fetch that secretary chap," so I hastily went for the officer in charge of the household, preparing him for the worst. However, I should have known better. The Prime Minister said solicitously, "There is a poor man at the door who has a very bad cough. I feel he ought to be put on duty where there is less draft, otherwise it might turn to pneumonia."

One afternoon the Prime Minister gave us a fright by developing a sudden temperature. He was put to bed, and we all felt miserable. The others, even Mr. Martin, had arranged to see Swan Lake that evening, so I was on my own after dinner, and presently he asked me to read to him. For an hour and a half I sat by his bedside reading a book called A Primer of the Coming World. He sat with a black bandage over his eyes, concentrating, occasionally saying, "A little faster," or "Slacken off a little," to show he was not asleep. Fortunately the fever did not develop.

The time for leaving had come. The Prime Minister told me to travel in his aircraft, as he wished to dictate on the journey, and just before we left Moscow Central Airport I was aboard the York with only Mr. Churchill, Marshal Stalin, Mr. Eden and M. Molotov, while good-bys were said. M. Molotov looked just as his pictures had led one to imagine—inscrutable and slit-eyed behind his glasses. Marshal Stalin was much shorter than I had thought, and the twinkle in his eye looked, somehow, all too knowing. Bundled up in his long army greatcoat, he reminded me of a rather wicked-looking stuffed doll.

Off we flew, and then occurred the most memorable of my own adventures.

We were to fly across the Mediterranean to Cairo, and the aircraft were to be serviced as well as refueled in the Crimea. Accordingly we came down near Simferopol. A small house in Simferopol had been put in order as a resting place for the Prime Minister and the principals of his party, and during the afternoon they congregated there. Besides Mr. Churchill there were Mr. Eden, Sir Alan Brooke, General Ismay, Lord Moran, General Jacob, and various Foreign Office and War Office advisers, as well as the P.M.'s staff of Mr. Martin, Detective Inspector Hughes, Sawyers and myself. That evening they were to be entertained at a banquet, the trappings of which had been flown from Moscow that day; the hosts were to be the mayor of the Soviet of Crimea and one General Yermetchenko, of the Russian Naval Air Force, accompanied by interpreters.

Dinnertime came, and Mr. Churchill said that Inspector Hughes, Sawyers and I must go in to dinner with the main party, there being no separate dining place for us. Fortunately we found a small table and were able to sit together.

It was an amazing scene, like something out of Hans Andersen. The room was lit only by candles, and we were served by fresh-faced Russian girls wearing unaccustomed high heels on which they tottered awkwardly. Course succeeded course, the air became wavy with cigar smoke, the candles guttered, the vodka flowed. Soon toasts and speeches began. There was a toast to the king, then one to Marshal Stalin; one to the Red Air Force, and one in reply to the Royal Air Force. Then I saw Mr. Churchill looking at me with a wicked twinkle. He rose to his feet and proposed the health of "Miss Layton, the only lady present," at which all that grand company got good-naturedly to its feet, laughing, and drank the toast. General Yermetchenko seized the flowers out of a bowl on the table and dumped them, dripping, into my lap, and then the company called for a speech. Feeling idiotic and scarlet-faced, I stood up and said, "Thank you very much, I feel greatly honored," and sat down again hastily.

When the party left the tables, the gallant General Yermetchenko indicated that he wished me to accompany him to an adjoining room. I felt anxious, and called Inspector Hughes, but the general waved him away. He then indicated that we were to drink to Anglo-Soviet relations, and produced two tumblers of red wine, which on his instructions we drank "bottoms up," I rather innocently thinking I should humor him. However, the tumblers were then refilled, and we bottoms-upped a second time. Fortunately I was then rescued by Mr. Martin, who put his head round the door and decided I had better return to the aircraft!

After returning to London Mr. Churchill was in one of his good moods. Several times he teased me about the Russian general. Once he burst out laughing, and when I looked surprised he said, "I can't help laughing every time I think of you and that bunch of flowers." Despite his seventy years and the fact that the war had been going on for five years, he bore his responsibilities extremely well.

Early in December fierce fighting was taking place in Greece between government troops with British military backing and the forces of ELAS, which was the military instrument of the Communist Party there. It looked as though Greece would go Communist if nothing was done. Mr. Churchill was extremely unhappy about the situation.

On the morning of Christmas Eve, the private secretary (it was Mr. Colville) told me the Prime Minister had it in mind to fly that night to Athens to make a personal attempt to solve the crisis. All day the subject was debated; first he would go, then he was persuaded that he certainly could not. There were conversations with the Foreign Secretary, and telegrams and signals flashing to and from the British embassy in Athens. At about 7 P.M. Mr. Churchill decided that the trip was on and that he would take with him Mr. Colville, Mr. Eden, and his private secretary Mr. Dixon, Lord Moran, one detective, Sawyers, and the two young women on duty.

Marian and I flew to pack all that would be required, and shortly before 1 A.M. on Christmas Day the party took off from Northolt

CONTINUED ON PAGE 196

NEXT MONTH

"I LOST 146 POUNDS."
ILLINOIS TEACHER TELLS HOW SHE DID IT

Marjorie Tubbs, of Chenoa, Illinois—literally "half the woman she was"—reduced from 294 pounds to 148. Her photo album and reducing rules tell the story.

THE DAY THE STRANGE AND TERRIBLE AND WONDERFUL THING HAPPENED—

Jonathan Adams was eight years old, alone in the bewildering city of Hong Kong. His father and mother and Bozzy, the bulldog, were never coming back, he knew that now. Nurse Fowler said, "This is Mr. Angus ——" Cecil Maiden's new novel, "Jonathan Found," has a background of contemporary China and New York. Complete, condensed, in this issue.

HOW TO GO TO COLLEGE WITH FOUR CHILDREN AND NO MONEY

Mrs. Hugh Olsen was 35 years old and mother of four children when she entered Women's Medical College in Philadelphia . . . on borrowed money. Now, six years later, she is a hospital resident physician. She and Hugh have found a workable way to combine two careers and a pleasant home life with their children. "Mother is ■ Doctor Now" is next in How America Lives.

SALADS SO GOOD THEY'RE INTERNATIONALLY FAMOUS

Chilled shrimp, goldenly dressed in pungent curry sauce, is a Javanese favorite. Also perfect for summer days: "Hollywood Salad" and salads from Germany, Armenia and Japan. They're all (with recipes, of course) in "Collector's Items."

A SUMMER COTTAGE FOR $2000 OR $4000; TAKE YOUR CHOICE

Richard Pratt shows a vacation home which can be built on lakeshore, seaside or in the mountains, stronger than most everyday houses. The basic design is adaptable to many changes. Cost depends on the owner's requirements.

CANDIED VIOLETS— YES, REAL ONES MADE IN YOUR KITCHEN

Elizabeth Kent Gay tells how to turn out this crowning touch of elegance for ■ birthday dinner party. Roast lamb with savory rice dressing, asparagus with mushrooms, and daffodil cake are more substantial treats. With all the recipes.

Also short stories, Dr. Spock's page for mothers, "Making Marriage Work," eight pages of fashion news and photographs and many other features, all coming

IN THE MAY JOURNAL

(Advertisement)

A fine figure of a girl – Anita Ekberg, co-starring in "Paris Holiday," Technicolor United Artists' release.

After unhappy results that ruined health and wrecked careers, Hollywood stars have turned their backs on dangerous, freakish fad diets and now depend on a "candy that makes you thin."

WHY HOLLYWOOD STOPPED DIETING

By VIRGINIA PALMER

"You've got to reduce!" How many times Hollywood stars have winced at those words . . . from the celluloid darlings of yesteryear to the glamour dolls of today!

Just recently, when Ann Miller was making tests for a new role – a coveted part in MGM's "Opposite Sex"–she saw the camera man signal the director. Ann knew what it meant. That old bogy overweight was padding the picture. She'd have to trim down – or good-by part.

Did she panic? Not Ann, for she knew the answer to her problem – the amazing "candy that makes you thin." "No starvation diets for me," Ann was heard to say to a friend. "I've tried fads before – and they've failed. But, darling, the wonders I've seen these work!" and she held up a little square candy.

What a lucky break for Ann that she had discovered this packaged "miracle." For it did the trick in no time. P. S. She got the part!

If only movie stars of the past could have saved the day this simple way! But the drastic steps many "old-timers" took to lose weight were enough to kill them – and sometimes did!

Ann Miller, with all the exercise she gets as a dancer, still watches her weight.

For Hollywood used to lose its head in frantic efforts to shed unwanted flesh. When the edict was "Eight pounds off in a week" – the torture began. Pummel tables, Epsom salts, starvation regimens – buttermilk and nothing but, at 2-hour intervals, was one extreme. Why, the movie colony just went wacky with freak "wonder" diets that often brought on collapse.

Many a reader will remember that raven-haired beauty of "The Three Musketeers," Barbara La Marr, and that belle of "Big Parade" fame, Renée Adoree. Tragic cases both – for it's been said drastic dieting led to their deaths – and the same was true of Louis Wolheim, the hard-boiled captain of "What Price Glory."

Apparently, in those early days, a diet's effectiveness was judged by how much punishment it inflicted. But Hollywood has learned its lesson. The bizarre, inhuman regimens, the weird digestion-defying food combinations are part of the past. Now, Hollywood has found a better way to lose weight. A way that's easy, that imposes no hardships and is completely safe. Ask Anita Ekberg, Alexis Smith or Mrs. James Mason or scores of other Hollywood favorites.

Today's screen stars now eat candy. Oh, not ordinary candy but a special low-calorie vitamin- and mineral-enriched candy called Ayds. Taken as directed before meals, it curbs the appetite so you automatically eat less and lose weight. And what a figure-saver it's been for actors and actresses!

When George Brent was rehearsing for the TV film series "Wire Service," he found he had added just a few pounds too many for the camera. What to do was the question. His lovely wife, Janet, had the answer.

"We'll reduce together," she remarked. "And we won't starve ourselves either – not when we use Ayds." And how right Janet was. A slimmer, trimmer George verified that at a rehearsal later. "You know, it was fun," he said to the director. "Janet took the chewy vanilla caramel kind and I the new chocolate fudge-type, and both worked equally well. Why, we ate delicious meals all the time and still lost weight."

The Brents had heard of this low-calorie candy through a friend, a doctor who'd read the report on it in a leading Medical Journal. It seems this reducing-plan candy works on an entirely different principle from anything in the past. It's not a "pill" or a drug. It's what is known as an "appetite deterrent."

A look at the Medical Journal report revealed that a clinical investigation had been made at a famous Boston Medical Center to determine the value of "appetite deterrents" in achieving weight loss.

Leading weight-reducing products, plus a strict diet alone, were tested among 240 overweight men and women. And the results were truly astonishing! The doctors discovered that those taking Ayds lost the most weight – almost three times as much as those following the rigid diet alone. What's more, they suffered no hunger pangs, no loss of sleep, nervous jitters or other unpleasant side-effects. It might be said, it's "just what the doctor ordered" for movieland.

As lovely Anita Ekberg remarked: "Out here in Hollywood when we have to lose weight, the first thing we think of is Ayds. It's such a natural, safe way to trim off weight and then control it." And that about puts it in a nutshell as to how the rest of Hollywood feels!

The movie folks are still as conscious as ever of keeping their weight down, but now they're much keener about keeping up their health. That's why, today, Hollywood stars are off fads and on to Ayds.

For any fans who want to follow the stars to slimness, see your doctor before reducing and have him write for The Medical Journal Report. Then it's just a matter of taking a few steps to pick up a box of Ayds (regular vanilla caramel or new chocolate fudge-type) at your nearest drug or department store.

A candid shot of George Brent and his lovely wife, Janet, taken on their ranch, speaks well for the way they keep themselves in trim.

© 1958, Campana Co., Batavia, Ill.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 194

About 8 A.M. we landed at Naples, where we had breakfast, then continued eastward. At the tail of the aircraft was Mr. Churchill's bedroom, and here he could lie and work comfortably with his box, pencils, Klop and tags beside him, very much as he did at home. On such occasions one had to remember to empty his pens, or the change in altitude made the ink squirt out, which produced a crisis.

About 2 o'clock we circled Athens and landed at Kalamaki airfield. The aircraft was at once surrounded by British soldiers, who ushered aboard Field Marshal Alexander and Mr. Macmillan, flown there from Caserta; the British ambassador to Greece, Mr. Leeper; and the British commander on the spot, General Scobie. It was terribly cold; there was plenty of snow about. We sat huddled in our coats while the principals conferred.

About 4 o'clock I was called in. Mr. Churchill, wrapped up in overcoat and scarf, looked flushed and uneasy; he dictated a press communiqué. The table was sloping, the light was bad; wind jerked the aircraft up and down. Once he stopped and said, "That was cannon fire"; with cold hands it was hard to type, and there was no Klop handy. However, it was managed, and when the communiqué had been hacked about and retyped ready for issue, it was decided that the party would be housed aboard HMS Ajax, now standing by in Piraeus harbor. The British embassy had been judged ill-suited for visitors; it had been for some days under siege, without light and with very little food.

The Prime Minister drove off in an armored van; Marian, Sawyers and I then were hustled into a second armored van by some poor soldiers who had been waiting around for two hours or so and looked half frozen. We were cold and hungry, Marian had a rotten cough and Sawyers a cold. We sat in swivel chairs fitted onto the iron floor, piled around with luggage and our secret boxes, Mr. Churchill's coat over our knees, and every time the van swung round a corner or crashed over a bump, boxes and bags fell on to our heads. Suddenly we began to laugh. We laughed till Marian and Sawyers were convulsed with coughing. The van bumped and jarred through the Athens streets for forty-five minutes, till we reached the Naval College, where we were disembarked by some poor frozen naval officers who had also been waiting several hours.

It was a deserted rocky shore; far out some lights were twinkling. The moon was almost full, and great stars hung in the sky. We were asked to keep silent; one never knew who was about. Clutching secret boxes under both arms and helped by the officers, we scrambled down rocks and over barbed wire to steep steps, little more than a ladder. Someone said, "Take care—the top step is broken," and so with great caution we descended to a small jetty, where a motor launch was waiting.

The morning after our arrival the ship was straddled by shells; Ajax was moved farther out into the harbor. The sound of cannon fire was frequent, and one could see Beaufighters strafing—diving and firing rockets. In the afternoon a big conference was held at the embassy—the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary met the leaders of the Greek government, together with the ELAS Communist leaders, in an attempt to bring about a settlement.

The next morning Mr. Churchill again went ashore, and outside the embassy was shot at and missed. A woman was hit, and died there in front of the party. Within the embassy talks proceeded, and arrangements were made for a press conference in the afternoon.

Meanwhile, aboard Ajax, Marian and I had been invited by the admiral to lunch with him and the captain. Just as the meal was ending a naval rating entered, snapped to attention, and handed over an emergency signal, which the captain opened. Miss Layton was to report at the embassy with all possible speed.

I was rushed to the crazy pier in the admiral's barge, where a scout car was waiting. I hopped in beside an army captain, and we tore through the streets of Athens. Three times we drew up, reversed and chose another route, as he spied trouble ahead. We drove quite near the Acropolis.

The press conference, which I was to report, was attended by about thirty correspondents. The Prime Minister sat in his overcoat, backed by Messrs. Eden, Alexander, Macmillan, Leeper and Scobie, and spoke very fast. Frequently he was interrupted by the booming of guns, and once there was such a prolonged roll that I lost what he said, though I sat behind with my ear almost on his shoulder. Questions were then allowed, and he replied. This lasted in all about an hour and I wrote about 4000 words, which then had to be typed at top speed. I retired to the cellar, where the staff were working for the sake of warmth and safety, and read out my outlines to one of the embassy staff, who typed like the wind.

Halfway through, Mr. Colville came in to tell me, "Go to the Prime Minister—he wants to dictate." I went up into the cold, lamplit room. Mr. Churchill was sitting in one corner in an armchair, wearing his coat and with a rug over his knees. Near him sat the mighty figure of Archbishop Damaskinos in his impressive attire, stately and dignified, an interpreter looming behind. There was complete silence as I walked in, book in hand, and the air seemed heavy with something awe-inspiring. Mr. Churchill dictated a letter to the ELAS Communist leaders, the archbishop interpolating a few sentences through the interpreter, and I went hastily off to type it out. Perhaps I cannot quite make the reader understand the deep impression of that scene. We were, after all, in the middle of a shooting war.

When the report of the press conference was done, the P.M. hacked it about and a press statement was issued. About 7 we left the embassy. I got into the second armored van, and found myself seated between Mr. Eden, in beautiful Homburg hat, and Field Marshal Alexander, in maroon beret. They were moderately chatty. Once or twice as we bumped and clattered through the streets I heard the sound of gunfire, and could not help reflecting how surprised my mother would be if she could have a sudden bird's-eye view of where I was sitting.

We reached the jetty, had the usual struggle down the broken steps, and boarded the speedboat with a small cabin to seat about four. Mr. Churchill was already inside, and he told me to come in and share the rug he had over his knees. So I sat beside him, while the field marshal sat opposite and looked with a grin at W. Churchill and E. Layton sharing a fur rug. Small fry such as Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Leeper stood outside, blown by the wind and wet with salty spray!

That night Marian and I both worked until 2:30, too excited to feel tired. Next afternoon we were circling the Piraeus; looking down, we could see Ajax in the blue water.

It seemed only a short time after this adventure when we were once again on the move, this time to Malta and Yalta. There was to be a meeting of Prime Minister and President at Malta preliminary to the Big Three meeting at Yalta, in the Crimea.

Early one morning at the end of January Marian and I, in company with various Foreign Office officials, took off in a Liberator, Mediterranean-bound. We were to arrive some hours earlier than the Prime Minister, private secretaries, Commander Thompson and Peter, who were coming in the Skymaster, and were to prepare the office aboard the cruiser HMS Orion in Grand Harbour, which was to be our temporary hotel.

On arrival we hurried aboard HMS Orion, and were received by the commander, who seemed not even to have heard of us. Strange. We asked where our office was to be, but he knew nothing of the prospect. We asked to see the captain, and asked with much politeness where we might set up office. But he seemed to have heard nothing of the necessity either, and he was considerably alarmed at the possibility that we might have to stay aboard: females impossible! "But really," we said, "we oft stay aboard naval ships. Now please let have someplace where we can set up offic the Prime Minister will be here any tin now." At last we were reluctantly given t admiral's office, as no admiral was in re dence, and as soon as Mr. Churchill car aboard he walked in to see if everything w prepared for him. We hoped the captain re ized the mistake he had nearly made.

There was first a conference of the Briti and American staffs, and after about thr days the President arrived in a U. S. cruise We had heard that the President had been i but were not prepared for the change the was in him. He looked much aged, frail a haggard. The Prime Minister went at on aboard the cruiser, and they spent the rest the day together.

That night we said good-by to Orion, to off from Luqa in a York aircraft, and car down at Saki airfield, near Simferopol, whe I was warmly welcomed by my old pal Ge eral Yermetchenko. From there we we driven for five hours along the coast to Yalt and came at last to the Vorontsov Villa, whe the British delegation was to be housed.

This was the least enjoyable of the confe ences I attended. There seemed to be an air dissatisfaction and disquiet; there was hard enough for us to do. The Prime Minister w restless and little inclined for work. We almo longed for the time to come to an end.

One night toward the end of our stay, t Prime Minister invited the President and Ma shal Stalin and the three Foreign Secretar to dine at the Vorontsov Villa. Shortly af this evening, Mr. Churchill bade farewell his great friend Franklin D. Roosevelt. Th did not meet again.

The war in Europe was drawing to its en In the office we were all tired—Mrs. H looked far from robust; I had begun to feel essential to make a change. I longed as nev before for peace to come, and knew that if had not been in sight I could never have ke up the pace. I determined that soon after th war I would go home to Canada, hard as would be to leave Mr. Churchill's service.

Halfway through March Mrs. Churchill s out on a tour of Russian hospitals. With h went any restraint on the P.M.'s peculiar idea of time. Our working hours became fantasti No one could induce Mr. Churchill to go t bed before 3:30 or 4 A.M.; his afternoon re would sometimes only be started at 8 P.M., din ner would be at 9:30 or later, and when ther had been "business" visitors to dine, the ev ning's work might only start at 1:30.

In those days there were few statements an broadcasts to be given; it seemed that ever thing was waiting for the end of the war. Ther was something on Mr. Churchill's mind—ha been ever since Yalta. He would sit talkin talking through the evening with his clo friends and advisers. Sometimes one woul wait up for him till 3:30, but there would b no dictation. Some evenings one would sit the room while he worked and talked. On did not have to think very hard to know wha it was that was troubling him. It was the de terioration in the relations between ourselve and the Soviet Union.

One evening I remember well. Mr. Churchi sat in his study with several colleagues discuss ing postwar plans. The private secretary (it wa Mr. Peck) and I waited patiently for some sig of duty or of bed to appear. The hours passe slowly—2 o'clock, 3 o'clock—and presentl Mr. Peck decided we had better try to remin the Prime Minister of the time. He piled som official boxes on the edge of the table, the jarred the bottom one so that they all fell o the floor. There was a terrible crash; w smothered our giggles and waited, but noth ing happened—though sometimes if on coughed in the office, the buzzer would soun and one would be told, "Too much noise."

Some time later Mr. Peck decided to hav another go. "Now," he said, "I'll show yo what happened when I was on duty the othe morning." He balanced the iron fire shovel o the iron fire guard with the end under the li of the scuttle, where it would obviously be pu

CONTINUED ON PAGE 198

WHITE COLLAR

By CONSTANCE H. DALLAS

Day before yesterday
I saw you there.
Wind in your garments,
Sun on your hair.

Here you come Monday
Sober and neat.
Time on your wrist,
Work on your feet.

PROTECT YOUR GUM LINE, where tooth troubles often start!

The specially designed ORAL B protects both teeth and gums

Ask your dentist about the ORAL B. It does what a toothbrush ought to do—cleans teeth effectively and encourages healthy gums through gentle massage.

This different brush has over 2500 very thin nylon bristles with a soft texture. They fight harmful gum disorders, the cause for over one-third* of all tooth loss. Make your next brush an ORAL B.

©Oral B Company
San Jose, Calif.

The American Dental Association reports 37%.*

AVOID CONFUSION!

Only one texture . . . in 3 sizes for all the family.

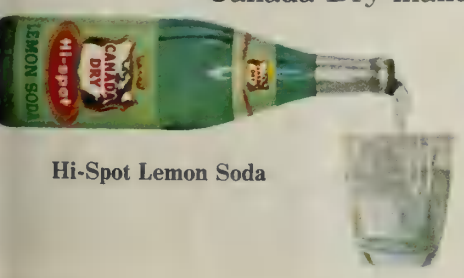
4 more wonderful ways to enjoy Sparkling Canada Dry Ginger Ale

Canada Dry Ginger Ale and Milk
Into half a glass of chilled milk pour this lively Ginger Ale. The natural ginger flavor enhances the taste of milk, and the exclusive sparkling bubbles aid digestion. It's a powerhouse of pep, too!

Canada Dry Ginger Ale Gelatin Dessert
Heat 2 cups Ginger Ale to boiling point. Add package of fruit-flavored gelatin, mix, jell in refrigerator. Bright ginger flavor and livelier carbonation adds a touch of life to this old favorite.

Canada Dry Ginger Ale Ice Cream Soda
First, pour some Ginger Ale into a tall glass, add ice cream. Stir easy. Then fill glass with this delectable pale dry Ginger Ale. The natural ginger flavor comes through, brightens the soda's taste.



Men of Action, and ladies too, need Canada Dry Ginger Ale for a quick-energy lift.
It's delicious right out of the bottle! The natural ingredients perk up dispositions in 10 seconds flat and will not upset mealtime schedules. The delectable flavor completely satisfies the biggest thirst.

Note to shoppers all over the U.S.A.

This month your neighborhood dealer will feature bigger and better buys on food and 6-bottle cartons of Canada Dry Ginger Ale. Look for these savings when you shop.

Canada Dry makes 10 delicious flavors. Try these 3

Hi-Spot Lemon Soda

True Fruit Orange

Old-Fashioned Root Beer

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY
CANADA DRY CELEBRATION

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 196

by the charwoman. Then he sat at his desk near the fireplace and said, "Now, when the buzzer went ——" got up and rushed for the door, knocking the shovel into the fireplace with the most frightful clatter imaginable. I had to retire from the room to have my laugh out. But still nothing happened. At 4 o'clock we just didn't care any longer. Mr. Peck took the shovel as a bat and I threw at him anything I could reach, so that rubbers, balls of paper and small lumps of coal went flying round the room. At last Mr. Stuart emerged from the study, shaking with laughter. He told us that when the worst crash came he laughed, and the P.M., who was much engrossed in his subject, said sternly, "It's all very well for you to laugh, you haven't got any tubercular children." It was 4:30 when bed was finally announced.

And then something tragic happened. In April President Roosevelt died. We had the news about midnight, and I was hurried in to the study for dictation. Mr. Churchill was crumpled up in his chair, his face white. When he dictated his voice sounded quite dead.

April passed and May came. Victory was upon us. One morning at Chequers a telegram came from Field Marshal Alexander, to say that the first overtures for an armistice in his sector of the front had reached him. Having typed this out in great excitement, I rushed up to Mr. Churchill's room to give it to him. However, my enthusiasm was misplaced.

A nation cannot permanently remain on a level above the level of its women. RAMSAY

He was in a bad humor, and displayed not the slightest interest in the news, as if wars ended every day. But later on he was hanging anxiously about the office for the telephone to ring, taking the telegrams direct to his ear instead of via our shorthand books, as thrilled as any boy with the exciting news.

V-E day was a joyful time for us all. In the afternoon the Prime Minister was to make a short statement to the nation, timed for 3 o'clock. The entire staff turned up at No. 10 from the Annexe for the occasion, and we all stood outside the Cabinet Room door. Just before 3 we heard a great trumpeting sound over the loud-speaker as he blew his nose, then some remarks—"Pull down that blind. . . . What are you doing with that? No, leave it there. . . . Move a little further away please"—but of course he was not yet on the air. After his statement we all rushed downstairs and out into the garden, to line the path to the garden door, and when he came out to go to the House to give his statement again we clapped and clapped, and I think there were tears in his eyes as he beamed and said, "Thank you all, thank you very much."

That night he and members of the War Cabinet appeared on a balcony overlooking Parliament Street and Square. Some of us were able to squeeze onto a small part adjoining to watch the fun. Flags and bunting had been put up, and floodlights were directed upon the balcony. A crowd which some estimated at 20,000 stood below, the roar of their cheering seeming almost to lift one off one's feet. As Mr. Churchill emerged, the noise increased almost to deafening point. He congratulated the Londoners on their fortitude, saying, "I always said 'London can take it.' Were we downhearted?" The response was overwhelming. Then he began the first few words of Land of Hope and Glory, and the multitude took it up with a will.

I shall always remember Mr. Churchill as he was at that moment—spick-and-span in black coat and striped trousers, a flower in his buttonhole, a man medium in height and somewhat round of figure, a man whose character contained all the elements of greatness. That was Mr. Churchill's hour. Whatever was to come, nothing could take it from him. The entire nation came forward to show its gratitude and affection for the man whose courage had been an inspiration in its darkest hours. For the next few days he could not move from the office without being mobbed in every street. He took to driving in an open car, so that he could sit on the back and wave his hat to the crowds, who appeared from nowhere wherever he was to be seen. Letters, telegrams and gifts poured into the office from all over the country.

I think he enjoyed every minute of it. He knew he deserved it. Being the old Parliamentarian he is, he knew it could not last. Already his thoughts were fully enmeshed in the trials that lay ahead; winning the peace might prove more difficult than winning the war. Already our relations with the Soviet had changed; there was no longer mutual confidence and exchange of ideas. "How are we to work together," said Mr. Churchill, "if an iron curtain is to be drawn down between us, and only occasionally raised to allow a face, and not a very pleasant face, to peer through at us?"

And now a new phase began. The Coalition Government was dissolved, and a Conservative Caretaker Government was formed until such time as the elections had decided whom the country wanted to rule her.

I found electioneering far less to my taste than struggling along to win the war. In the office Mrs. Hill and I were now to the fore; the private secretaries, being civil servants, could not take part in electioneering.

During June the campaign was at its height. Mr. Churchill made four broadcasts, and did a considerable amount of touring the country, speaking on behalf of Conservative candidates.

One evening Mr. Churchill was to speak at a huge open-air meeting in the Walthamstow Stadium, about forty-five minutes' drive from Whitehall. He left at 6. We watched him away, then returned to the flat, where to our horror we found he had left his speech notes behind. I collared a car and a good driver, and simply flew after him, hatless and coatless. Of course we couldn't catch him. When we reached the

SCHOOLS, COLLEGES AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENT

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' Camps

Sequoyah One of America's truly fine camps. Near Asheville, N. C. 35th year. Noted for fine buildings, strong leadership and comprehensive program which includes riding, sailing, skiing, canoe trips, mountain climbing. Three periods: 5, 8, 10 weeks. $325, $500, $625. SENIOR CAMP, boys 11–16. JUNIOR CAMP, boys 7–10. Each camp has completely separate facilities.
CAMP TSALI—A leadership training camp for older boys, 15–17. Woodcraft, mountain climbing, counselor training, canoe trips, sailing, skiing. 5-day hike Great Smoky Mountains National Park. One period only, six weeks $275.
Write for Catalog
C. Walton Johnson, Box L, Weaverville, N. C.

Len-a-pe In The Penna. Poconos
Boys 4–17. Near New York and Philadelphia. 20 aides include Indian, cowboy, magician, nurse. Excellent care and food. Riding and canoe trips, tennis, aquaplaning. Booklet.
David J. Keiser, 7733 Mill Rd., Phila. 17, Pa. Phone: MElrose 5-1682 (Phila.). Also Lakefront Guesthouse.

Farragut Naval Camps
Summer of adventure on Toms River. Boys 8–18 in 3 age groups. Trips on 63-ft. flagship. 42 land and water activities. Modern buildings. 2 gyms. 2 athletic fields. Approved summer school program available. Write for catalog.
Farragut Naval Camps, Box ABC, Toms River, New Jersey

Adirondack Woodcraft Camps
Fun and Adventure in the Woods. 33rd yr. Boys 7–18. Five age groups. 2 private lakes, trout stream near Old Forge. Adirondack, Canadian canoe trips. Horsemanship. Riflery, forestry, fishing. Moderate inclusive fee. 3 nurses. Bklt.
William H. Abbott, Director, Box 2387, Fayetteville, N.Y.

Camp Lupton on the Shenandoah
A carefully supervised camp for desirable boys ages 8 to 14. Excellent equipment and location on Shenandoah River in foothills of Blue Ridge Mts. All appropriate sports, shops & crafts. Own stable, riding master & instruction. For Catalog: Address The Director, Box 74, Woodstock, Virginia

Idlewild The Oldest Private Camp. 68th year. Lake Winnipesaukee, N. H. For boys.—3 divisions. 8 weeks $495. No extras. Riding. Sailing, canoe, mountain trips. Golf, riflery, archery, speedboat, water skiing, aquaplaning, music, tutoring. Mature staff. Doctor, nurse. Cabins. Booklet. Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Roys, 375 Otis Street, West Newton 65, Massachusetts

St. John's A lakeside Mountain Camp. Sandy Beach on Hunter Lake. Boys 6–16. 2300 ft. alt. 100 mi. from N.Y.C. Modern buildings. Lavatory in each cabin. Hot showers. Excellent meals. Recreational, instructional activities. Mature, professional staff. 1 counsellor for every 4 boys. Jesuit Chaplain. All incl. fee. Catalog.
Robert B. Giegengack, Yale Univ. A.A., New Haven, Conn.

Camp Pacific On the Ocean
80 miles south of Los Angeles. Three programs—Recreational, Music, Tutoring. Six weeks of fun for any boy—July 1-Aug. 12. Catalogue:
Camp Pacific, Box J, Carlsbad, California

Girls' Camps

Moy-mo-da-yo
"Sunny Woodland." 52nd year. Cornish, Me. Where 90 girls from 5–18 enjoy a friendly, relaxing, and happy atmosphere. Swimming, water skiing, sailing, canoeing, land sports, dramatics, dancing, crafts, riding, trips.
Mr. & Mrs. C. C. Peterson, 81-F. Winslow Rd., Waban, Mass.

Kiniya On a Bay of Lake Champlain in Vermont. Girls 6–17. 40th Season. Riding for every girl every day—wonderful trails—own stable. Sailing, swimming, canoeing, water skiing, tennis, archery, riflery, crafts, dramatics, dance. Separate division for girls under 10. Give age. Booklet.
Mr. & Mrs. John S. Williams, 70 Park St., Canton, N. Y.

Lake George Camp For Girls 6–17. On Beautiful Lake George, Glenburnie, N.Y. Mile-long private shore. All water sports. 95-acre woodland campsite. Little theatre professional staff. Riding, riflery, tennis, arts, crafts. 3 age groups. Resident nurse. Brother camp Adirondack for Boys nearby.
Mr. & Mrs. John E. Donat, 15 Walnut Hill Rd., Orange, Conn.

Ogontz White Mountain Camp
For girls. On Ogontz Lake, near Sugar Hill, N.H. Aquaplaning, swimming, sailing, golf, riding, tennis. Crafts, nature study, dancing, music. Outdoor cooking. Mt. trips Tutoring Cabins. 750 acres of woods and meadows. 36th yr. Booklet Abby A. Sutherland, Box B, Ogontz Center, Pa.

Tegawitha on the sunny top of the Poconos. A Catholic camp for girls. 800 acres on private lake. All land sports. Swimming, riding, dancing, dramatics, crafts. Junior and Senior groups. Private chapel on grounds. 41st year.
Director: Mrs. James P. Lynch, Catalog: Camp Tegawitha, Box L, Tobyhanna, Pa.

Long Scraggy Mt. Ranch
In Colorado Rockies. Daily riding western & English. Red Cross swimming instruction. Heated pool. Pack trips, sports, drama, art, music, crafts, dancing. Experienced counselors. 56 girls age 7 to 15. Write:
Mrs. Neva Hayden, Box 7662, Lakewood, Colorado

Girls' Schools

Cathedral School of St. Mary
An accredited Episcopal school for girls. Near New York City. Boarding—fifth grade to college. Strong college preparatory course. Music, Dramatics, Art, Modern Dance. Excellent sports program. Riding. 81st year. Catalog.
Address Registrar, Box J, Garden City, Long Island, N.Y.

Oak Grove A Friends' School for Girls. Emphasizes Preparation for College and Gracious, Purposeful Living. Music, Art, Speech. Grades 7–12. Broadening interests of international enrollment. Riding included. Indoor ring. Winter Sports Featured under Experts. Beautiful new fireproof Quadrangle.
Mr. and Mrs. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Mary A. Burnham School For Girls. 81st year. Graduates are mature, poised, thoroughly prepared for college. Fully accredited. Music, art emphasized. Traditional campus life. National enrollment. Riding, skiing, swimming, all sports. Summer School. Newport, R.I. Catalogs. Mrs. George Waldo Emerson, Box 43-X, Northampton, Mass.

The Grier School In the Alleghenies. For Girls, grades 9–12. Accredited College Preparation and General Courses. Home atmosphere. Music, Art, Dramatics, Typing. Exceptional riding. Winter, team sports. 1000 acres. Gym and pool. 106th year. Accessible Chicago, Washington, New York. Catalog.
Mr. & Mrs. Thomas C. Grier, Co-Heads, Box 114, Tyrone, Pa.

Samuel Ready School Girls. Grades 4-12. Resident and day. Accredited preparation for college. Music, art, dramatics, dancing; secretarial. Daily chapel, family life emphasized. Sports. 20-acre campus. Modern buildings. Est. 1887. Catalog.
Miss Evangeline Lewis, Headmistress, 5126 Baltimore National Pike, Baltimore 29, Md.

Hewlett School
On Long Island. Girls 8–18. Established 1915. Accredited by N.Y. Bd. Regents. College prep & general courses. Music, Art. Small friendly classes. Field trips. Full sports program. Riding, tennis. Shore-front campus. 50 mi. N.Y.C.
Jeanette J. Sullivan, Headmistress, East Islip, L.I., N.Y.

Charles E. Ellis School Girls, grades 6–12. MSA accredited. College preparatory, art, music, home economics, secretarial. Small classes. Individual guidance. 300-acre campus, modern stone buildings, suburban Phila. Separate dorms for younger girls. Sports, riding. Gymnasium. Est. 1910. Catalog.
Arnold E. Look, Ph. D., Pres., Newtown Square 14, Pa.

Howard Accredited college prep. for girls. 83rd yr. Grades 8–12 & P.G. Art, music, speech, dramatics, typing, shorthand. Small classes. Supervised study, personalized guidance. Gym & auditorium built 1956. New classroom bldg. includes science & language labs. Automatic sprinklers. All sports. Riding. Near Boston.
Mrs. Vida A. Clough, Box 22, West Bridgewater, Mass.

Stuart Hall
In Virginia's Shenandoah Valley. An Episcopal girls' school. Fully accredited. Grades 9–12. Notable college entrance record. Music and art. Charming atmosphere. Attractive campus. All sports. Gymnasium. Indoor swimming pool.
Martha Dabney Jones, M. A., Box L, Staunton, Virginia

Chapel Hill
Carefully supervised college preparatory and general courses for girls. Grades 7–12. Small classes. Moderate rate. Music, art, drama. Typewriting. Social, athletic, creative activities.
Wilfred C. Clark, 327 Lexington St., Waltham, Mass.

Coeducational Schools

The Arnold School Trains boys and girls, 6–18, for self-reliant living. Work, study, play program. Stress on fundamentals. Thorough college preparation; also general, agricultural courses. Guidance. Family atmosphere. 165 acres. Operating farm. Sports, hobbies for all. 27th year. Write for catalog.
Nathan H. Arnold, E. Pembroke, Mass.

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep. Grades 9–12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog. R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

Special School

The Training School at Vineland, N.J.
An adventure in happiness for retarded & slow-learning boys & girls, 6–21 yrs. (min. 4-yr. social, mental level). Summer program June 30–Aug. 29. Cottage living. All therapies. Professional staff. Hospital, lake, pools, farm on 1600 acres. Write: Box L, The Training School at Vineland, N. J.

Coed Camps

Olivet College Fine Arts Workshop. A "Camp on a Campus." Primarily for high school juniors and seniors. Music, Art, Drama. College instructors. Excellent facilities. Dormitory residence. Recreation. Swimming. Rural Michigan. June 23 to Aug. 15. Tuition, board, room: $295. Catalog.
Director Summer Program, Olivet College, Olivet, Mich.

Dartmuthe—Cape Cod Theatre—Art Dance—Music
Coeds 12-20 share artistic interests in relaxed, congenial group; give weekly stage and dance performances, art exhibits, concerts. Beginners and advanced. Professional staff make learning fun. Swimming, tennis. Boston, NYC interviews. Mrs. C. C. Crocker, Box 22, East Brewster, Mass.

College

Emerson College Specialization in radio, television, drama, speech, speech and hearing therapy within a broad liberal arts program. B.A., B.S., M.A., M.S. degrees. Coed. College-owned theatre, radio station and completely up-to-date electronic TV production studio. Dormitories. 78th yr. Catalog.
Admissions Dean, 126 Beacon St., Boston 16, Mass.

Junior Colleges

Harcum Jr. College Education to combine with Philadelphia's Main Line, distinguished educational and social community. Two-year assoc. degrees in liberal arts, nursery school ed., medical technology, merchandising, music, drama, art, business & medical secty. Write for catalog. Harcum Jr. College, Bryn Mawr, Pa.

Averett College
For girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Pre-professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 99th yr. Catalog.
Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville,

Linden Hall
Junior College and School for Girls. Cultural and Vocational. Music, Home Economics, Secretarial Studies. Liberal and Commercial Art. Dramatic Art. Preparatory and General Courses. All sports. Riding. Swimming Pool. Moderate tuition. Address: Byron K. Horne, D.D., Box 74, Lititz,

Pa. School of Horticulture
Stimulating careers for out-of-door girls. H.S. grads study Floriculture, Landscape Design, or Agriculture. Jr. college level. Lib. Arts plus tech training & experience. Greenhouses, gardens, farm. Nr. Phila. Social activities, riding, etc. Job aid. J. W. French, Box L, Ambler,

Vermont College A two-year college for women. Terminal, transfer courses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, home ec., art, nursery teaching, secretarial, medical secretarial, medical tech., general. Spacious hilltop campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 16 bldgs. Glee Club, choir. Est. 1834. Catalog. R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier,

Gulf Park By The Sea Fully accredited. Jr. College, 2 yrs. H.S. Stre
Liberal Arts program prepares young women for college entrance or transfer. High academic standards. National patronage. Music, art, dance, home economics, secretarial, speech. Water sports on Gulf of Mexico. Trips. Catal
William G. Dwyer, Ed. D., Box J, Gulfport, Mississi

Nichols Junior College For Men. Executive Courses in Business Administration, leading to degree. Conservation & Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in higher education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment. James Conrad, Pres., Nichols Junior College, Dudley 6, Mc

Greenbrier College Junior College & 2-yr High School. In beautiful Alleghenies. 146th year. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Sec'l., Mds'g., Music, Art, Dramatics. Sports & recreations at famous Greenbrier Hotel. Personal guidance. Fireproof suites. Addah Belle McClask
Director of Admissions, Box L, Lewisburg, W.

Music School

Sherwood Music School Train for a successful music career. Two- and three-year certificate courses and four-year degree courses. Faculty of distinguished musicians. Member Nat'l Assn. Schls. Mus. State accredited. Coed. Well-equipped building on lakefront. Dormitory for women. Founded 1895. Write for catalog. 1014 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5

Business & Secretaria

SHORTHAND in 6 WEEK

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Easiest to learn, write, transcribe. Lowest cost. Over 350,000 graduates. Typing available. 35th Year. Write for FREE booklet to Speedwriting®

Dept. 9904-8
55 W. 42 St., N. Y. 36

Chandler School For women. Professional secretarial training combined with advantages of living-in-Boston available to H graduates. 2-yr. Medical, Legal, Executive courses. 1 skills course. Resident facilities with cultural, social program at Franklin Square House. Write for catalog.
Dr. G. I. Rohrbough, Pres., 440 Beacon St., Boston 15, M

Bryant College B.S. degree in 2 or 3 yrs. Professional training for business leadership. Business Administration: Accty., Management, Marketing. Exec. Secretarial: Admin., Legal, Accty., M Business Teacher-Ed.: 4 yrs. 1-yr. Sec'l Diploma. C 25 bldgs., dorms. Vet appr. 95th yr. Sept., Feb. entra Catalog: Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6,

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding train Three-practical courses: One-Y Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Spe Course for College Women. Residences. For catalog w Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; N York 17, 230 Park Ave., Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

ium, a football ground surrounded by ds and buildings, I leaped out and battled ay through the crowd to the front en- ce, where I managed to get inside.

lodged under a rope and through a row of pous-looking officials; one grabbed my , but I shook him off, pelted to a man in orm who was standing by an inner door, gasped, "Oh, do take me to the Prime ister, I've got his speech notes." I suppose ppearance convinced him, for he escorted wiftly to a room within, which Mr. Church- as about to leave, having had a few pre- nary words with the party officials. He ed when he saw my scarlet face, took his notes saying, "Poor lamb, have you run all the way behind the car?" and went off to his meeting.

But on that occasion Mr. Churchill had more heckling than usual, and a day or two later, when he was touring South London, a Labour stronghold, someone threw a stone and hit him. It hurt, I'm sure—not actually, but inside. It was not the kind of thing one would have expected from political opponents; the British are not normally stone throwers.

On July 5th Britain voted, but the poll was to remain sealed until the 27th of that month, in order that the votes of the forces overseas might be counted in the total.

The Potsdam Conference took place in the latter half of July. Mr. Churchill, Mrs. Hill and others from the office went off to it, and in the middle the Prime Minister returned to England to be present for the declaration of the poll.

I was on duty the morning of that fateful 27th. Mr. Churchill seemed much as usual when I went in at 8:30, though he said he had not slept well. Of that horrible day I do not like to think. From unsuspecting confidence we turned to mere hope, from hope to doubt, and from doubt to the certainty of failure. At 10 o'clock the first result came in, from Salford, near Manchester, where the Labour candidate had won, and from then on the figures advanced, the map-room boys coming every few minutes with fresh results. By midday we knew for sure that the landslide had taken place, with over 300 Labour victories; they were in and we were out.

The shock and sense of catastrophe were overwhelming. It seemed that a lifetime had passed since 8:30 that morning. We began to realize things we had never thought of. We no longer belonged on the Prime Minister's staff. We should have to get ourselves and all our belongings out of No. 10 and the Annexe, and this pretty quickly. Mrs. Hill and I were now private secretaries to the Leader of the Opposition.

But the little we felt for ourselves was completely lost in what we felt for Mr. Churchill. True, he was a tower of strength and self-control. Perhaps his long life had taught him that those who hold high office are forever open to such disappointments. Though knowing that the nation was voting out his party rather than himself, he must still have felt the most terrible, searing hurt, intensified because of the welcome he had received on his tours of the country.

But it was more than the hurt. It was not being allowed to lead the peace, which had been his dream while he was still leading the war. When you have worked for something day in, day out, night in, night out for five years—and held all the strings in your own hand, and seen your carefully planned schemes coming to fruition—then you cannot have that responsibility snatched away without feeling the gaping hole it leaves. It seemed particularly cruel that this should happen at this very moment, as an anticlimax, without warning, apparently without cause—and with the war against Japan still to be finished. Roosevelt dead, Germany beaten, Churchill out—how swiftly things can change.

I shall not say much of the weeks that followed. It was a busy time. Mr. Attlee went back to Potsdam for the remainder of the conference, taking with him the private secretaries, Marian and others. Within a few days we had removed from the office the visible traces of our residence there, said good-by to Chequers and its happy associations and bundled ourselves off. In addition to moving out, we had to cope with the greatest flood of mail ever to be received at the office, as half of the populace vented their regret and dismay that the other half should have shown such ingratitude and inflicted such a stroke upon their hero, who was indeed everyone's hero, the man who had arisen in the hour of supreme trial.

The Churchills were to buy a house at Hyde Park Gate, but in the meantime moved into the Duncan Sandys' flat in Westminster. We worked there during the week, and at the weekends we went to Chartwell. Though the subject matter contained in our box was far less important and interesting than it had been during the last five years, Mrs. Hill and I found ourselves just as busy as before. Getting adjusted was an uncomfortable time for all—including Mr. Churchill.

Then came the dropping of the two atom bombs and the defeat of Japan. That afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Churchill invited Mrs. Hill, Ham and me to join them in a glass of champagne, to celebrate the end of the war. We drank it to him, naturally. We could not feel the joy we had felt at V-E.

Later in August, Mr. Churchill decided to accept an invitation he had received from Field Marshal Alexander to spend a holiday at Lake Como. He said he was going to do some painting, and that I should go, too, to look after the office side, though there would not be much work. On September 1st we flew there, and were soon settled into a magnificent villa on the lake shore.

And now comes the end of my story.

I had some time previously told Mr. Churchill that I intended returning to Canada when it was convenient for him to replace me. He had then kindly asked whether I would not come back after a holiday at home, but I felt I must go back to Canada to stay. Now on our first morning beside Lake Como I had to tell him that I had changed my plans.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

SE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

BOYS' SCHOOLS

ALLEY FORGE
MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the ne time be trained for a commission in the Armed rvices. Small classes, highest academic standards. ep. School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages -20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band, Senior vision ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

eshire Academy Junior School. Grades 6 to 8. Thorough ground- subjects anticipating college preparatory study on campus. Emphasis on fundamentals. Flexible pro- for each boy develops good habits of concentration. ate classes, dormitories, activities. Remedial instruc- Arthur J. Sheriff, Headmaster, Cheshire, Connecticut kiomen Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading es, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 8-12. s, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New City, Philadelphia. 84th year. Summer school. Write atalog. tephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Penna.

EEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY year. Successful College preparation. High vement records in College and Life. Non profit. learn to study. Small classes. Personal interest in oy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. t coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 7-12. ner session. For illustrated catalog write: master, Box 401, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

:wood School An accredited coeducational Friends Boarding School. 9-12. Strong college preparation. Religion, art, shop, typing. Guidance. Work program. Sports. activities. Country campus 75 miles from New City. Founded 1796. Catalog: C. J. Hutton, Principal, Poughkeepsie, New York. GLobe 4-9400 lius led 1869. For boys. Accredited. Grades 7-12. Complete preparation. ROTC. Highest U.S. Army rating for 0 years. 126-acre campus. Remedial reading. Sports. Summer session. Tutorial assistance. Catalog. obert A. Weekes, The Manlius School, Manlius, N.Y.

die A college preparatory school with a tradition of outstanding success preparing boys for and for life. Grades 7-12. Endowed; fully accredited. nce; developmental reading; public speaking required. ate Junior School. All sports, golf, tennis. Gym, swim- ool. 280 acres. Summer session. 93rd year. Catalog. O. Morong, Headmaster, Box 4-M, Hightstown, N. J.

eret School or College prep. Accredited. 1st Grade to College. classes. Proper study habits. Reading Techniques. Homelike dormitory. Large gym. 40 acres atop e Mt. Moderate rate. New York trips 20 miles. st booklet D-16. Carteret School, West Orange, N. J.

ord College Preparatory School for Boys. Famous for its teaching since 1916. s 8-12. Homogeneous grouping in small classes helps good study habits, assures maximum achievement. thletic program and extra-curricular activities. Spacious campus. Summer session July 7. Catalog. m D. Pearson, Headmaster, Milford 12, Connecticut dentown Military Institute accredited. College preparatory and general courses. on. Outstanding record of college entrance. ROTC. aught how to study; small classes; individual atten- ll sports. Junior School. 77th yr. Summer session. for catalog. Registrar, Box 404, Bordentown, N. J.

n School Thorough college preparation. Grades 8-12. Builds character, sibility, leadership. Small classes, understanding mas- imulating instruction. Large gym. Extensive sports m for all. Outing Club, Glee Club, Debating, Mod. t. Est. 1845. Early application advised. Catalog. J. Gordon Jeffries, Dean, Box D, Tilton, N. H.

niral Farragut Academy accredited college preparatory. Toms River, New St. Petersburg, Florida. Naval training. Separate Schools. Testing, guidance for college and career. boats; bands. Summer camp and school. Catalog. Farragut Academy, Box AB, Toms River, New Jersey rdon Hall ys, Grades 3 through 12. Sound college preparation. classes. Strong remedial education program. Individ- dance and testing. Team sports. Riding, tennis, golf. rips. 45 acres. 40 miles from N.Y.C. Summer Session. John J. Carr, Pres., Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

Donogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1-12. Accredited. Prepares for leges, service academies. Small classes. Individual ice. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi- ry. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre y campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog. L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY
★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9-12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2-indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4-8) has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 864, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Baylor School for Boys
65th Year. College prep. Accredited scholarship. Boys 12-18. Semi-military. Endowed awards. Ideal location. New gym. Championship athletics. Non-sectarian religious guidance. Summer camp, boys 8-15. Catalog.
129 Cherokee, Chattanooga, Tennessee

Massanutten Military Academy
59th yr. Accredited. New Dorm & classrooms. Small classes. College Preparatory. Supervised study. ROTC. Band, Rifle team, Riding, Tennis, Football, Basketball, Baseball. Athletics for all. Gym, Pool. Grades 6-12. Catalog. Col. R. J. Benchoff, Hdmr., Woodstock 4, Va. (Shenandoah Val.)

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5-12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influence. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8-12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Miami MilitaryAcademy Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory high school, junior school. Small classes. Boys learn to study. National Defense Cadet Corps Honor School. Sports, sailing; pool. 35 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 33rd year. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

STAUNTON
MILITARY ACADEMY
In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J-4. Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U.S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS.

Founded 1860

Junior Military Academy
Boys 4-14. Semi-military. Kindergarten-8th grade. Family life and affectionate care. Food from our own farm. 12 months' enrollment includes 2 weeks at Camp Whooppee. Enter any time. Moderate rate. 39th year. Catalog.
Maj. Roy DeBerry, Box L, Bloomington Springs, Tenn.

Fishburne Military School
A distinguished military school for the young man seriously concerned with making adequate preparation for college entrance. Accredited since 1897. Grades 9-12. Highest ROTC rating. Summer School. Write for catalog.
Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

Tennessee Military Institute
Boys planning to attend engineering schools and leading colleges need thorough preparation. T.M.I. provides that foundation. Over 90% of graduates enter colleges. Grades 8-12. Small classes. Summer School. 85th year. Catalog.
Colonel C. R. Endsley, Jr., Pres., Box 810, Sweetwater, Tenn.

Gordon Military College
Accredited. Grades 8-12. Also two years college. ROTC trains for military or civilian leadership. Supervised study. Stimulating activities program. 350 acres. Golf, all sports, pool. $995 inclusive rate. Founded 1852. Catalog.
Col. C. L. Harris, President, Barnesville, Georgia

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8-20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1200. Catalog. Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Riverside Military Academy
Outstanding record. ROTC. Winter at Hollywood, Fla. Accredited college preparation. Outdoor sports year round. Progress guaranteed. Reasonable all-inclusive fee. Separate Junior High, grades 7-8. Illustrated Catalog, address:
Gen. Sandy Beaver, Pres., Box 504-L, Gainesville 5, Ga.

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5-12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 80th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

Villanova Preparatory School
Boys' Residential Catholic High School. Est. 1924. College Preparatory. Fully Accredited. 9th to 12th Grades. 131 Acre Campus. Healthful Climate. Near Santa Barbara. All Sports. Fall Term Registration Now.
Augustinian Fathers, Route 2, Box 10, Ojai, California

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7-12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 74th year. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, Box 348, Delafield, Wis.

Western Military Academy
Develops desire to succeed. Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7-12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 80th yr. Near St. Louis. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-4, Alton, Illinois

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School. 70th yr. Grades 5-12. Fully accredited. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Essentially college prep. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 30-acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 978 Main St., Mexico, Mo.

Kemper Military School
Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes; personal guidance. 8th Grade, H.S. and Jr. College. Approved ROTC. All sports, pool; flying. 114th yr. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, 1648 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. New dorms and pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Summer Camp. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1748 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

Greenbrier Military School
146th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-604, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Retailing

Tobé-Coburn School for Fashion Careers
Prepare for career in buying, advertising, fashion coordination, radio/TV. Field trips, cultural activities, store work with pay. One and Two Year Courses. Lifelong placement service. Begins September 3. Ask for catalog K.
851 Madison Avenue, New York 21, New York

Fine & Applied Arts

Ray-Vogue Schools
Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Dress Design. Fashion Illustration. Interior Decoration, Commercial Art; Photography. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter 1st Mon. each mo. Write Registrar. Rm. 706. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 North Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Moore Institute of Art 114th year. Professional College for Career Women. Internationally known artist-instructors. State accredited 4-year B.F.A. or B.S. degree courses. Advertising Art, Art Ed., Fashion Design & Illustration, Interior & Textile Design. Painting & Illus. New residence hall. Catalog. 1384 N. Broad Street, Philadelphia 21, Pa.

Home Study Schools

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39196C

American School High School at home. Many finish in 2 years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H43, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Medical Technology

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for thorough training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A. 251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Faculty. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory, X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. G. I. approved. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

By Valda Sherman

Did you know there are two kinds of perspiration? "Physical," caused by work or exertion; and "nervous," stimulated by emotional excitement.

Doctors say that this "emotional perspiration" is the big offender in underarm stains and odor. It is caused by special glands that are bigger, more powerful, pour out more perspiration. And this kind of perspiration causes the most offensive odor.

Science has discovered that a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this offensive "emotional perspiration" odor. And now it's here . . . the remarkable ingredient Perstop*—the most effective, yet the gentlest odor-stopping ingredient ever discovered—and available only in the new cream deodorant ARRID.

Use ARRID daily and you'll be amazed how quickly this new ARRID with Perstop* penetrates deep into the pores and stops this "emotional perspiration" odor. Stops it as no roll-on, spray-on, or stick could ever do.

You rub ARRID in—rub perspiration out . . . rub ARRID in—rub odor out. When the cream vanishes, you know you are safe, even when you are nervous or stimulated by emotional excitement. Doctors have proved that this new ARRID with Perstop* is actually 1½ times as effective as all leading deodorants tested.

Remember—nothing protects you like a cream . . . and no cream protects you like ARRID with Perstop*. So don't be half-safe. Be completely safe. Use ARRID with Perstop* to be sure. Only 43¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants.

She's always satisfied most with a BRAND that's made a NAME for itself!

THE BRANDS YOU SEE ADVERTISED IN THIS MAGAZINE ARE NAMES YOU CAN TRUST!

BRAND NAMES FOUNDATION, INC. • 437 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

BRAND NAMES WEEK April 13-20th

Better buy by BRAND NAME the famous makers' names you trust!

I had never felt that to be a secretary was my ultimate goal, but had known that if the right man came along, be my work infinitely exciting and important, I should choose marriage.

And then, just at the moment when I most needed it, when I was feeling tired and worn out with work and longing for something for myself, it happened. In May I met Lieutenant Frans Nel, a mighty South African, from Pretoria in the Transvaal, about a week after he had been released from prison camp, having been captured at Tobruk way back in 1942.

There wasn't any doubt. This was it.

We had odd moments together, and I cried off the Potsdam Conference so that we could see a little of each other—it was a little, for there was still work to do at the office. Then he sailed away for South Africa without making any definite plan.

Live among men as if God beheld you; speak to God as if men were listening.
SENECA

Then—Frans was gone, we were thrown out of office with a resounding wallop, and life was one wedge of unhappiness. I staggered along unable to collect myself and unable to sleep, longing for the time to pass and for something to happen to decide matters.

The night before we were to fly to Como, I arrived at the Kensington flat and there was a cable from Frans saying all was well, he had a job, and would I please pack up as soon as possible for South Africa? Next morning, as we took off for Italy, I was in a happy daze and nearly got left behind.

I told Mr. Churchill, and I think he was pleased. He said it was time I was married (I was then twenty-seven). The three weeks spent at Como were among the happiest I can remember, a time of rest in beautiful and peaceful surroundings with everything in life to look forward to. I had been long away from my own family, and now I should be farther off than ever. But something told me they would come and visit me before long. I had looked forward to relaxing after the struggle and strain of the war, but now I was no have this, for I knew that Frans and I wo be starting out together from scratch. H ever, "A change is as good as a rest"—ne forget that!

We were soon back in London, my repla ment was arranged, and I said good-by Winston Churchill. I shall not try to relate feelings on leaving him. I left also feelin different person from the one who entered all innocence, the whirl of haste, excitem and perpetual crisis that surrounds him. T phase of life was ended. But even after all th years, hardly a day passes that I do not th of him.

I shall never forget the kindness with wh Mr. and Mrs. Churchill bade me farewell. was in bed with a s throat, and could speak o in a whisper; Mrs. Churc ill was sitting beside hi They told me I must ha four children (as they hav and said together, "One f mother, one for father, o for accidents and one f increase." After telling r a little of South Africa as had known it, Mr. Churchill looked down t expanse of his bed and whispered hoarsely, know you'll keep the flag flying."

I hope he would think I have done so. few weeks later Frans and I were married Pretoria.

I am a South African now, and a ve happy one. Our children are being broug up to put South Africa first. I think they a fortunate in their dual heritage, and in go time they, like me, will be able to spe Afrikaans as fluently as English. But I reme ber, also, to teach them about Winst Churchill and the things he has stood for his long lifetime. Courage. Strength. Resol tion. Steadfast loyalty. Love of country. If can only teach them these things I shall ha done something, be it ever so little.

I shall never see him again. England is to far away, when you have a husband wh works hard and three small children who d pend on you. But I shall never forget.

WHAT MAKES A CHILD AGGRESSIVE?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

clear that he was to be the wiry, restless, tireless, insistent kind.

As he got into the more independent stage after a year she found him increasingly mischievous and disobedient. She says she kept after him and tried many forms of discipline, without effect. At four he is said to be overactive, often rude and defiant at home, sometimes destructive to the neighbors' property and mean to other children. This case has unusual elements, but it's a clear example of the point that children do things to their parents as much as the other way around. I think that the aggressive behavior has been increasing because his mother rubs him the wrong way with her irritability and is prevented by her guiltiness from exerting a consistent control. Anyway, she has decided, wisely, that she needs some professional help. She and the boy should be able to profit from it.

Aggressiveness can be stirred up by other family relationships. Most parents with two or more children have seen it stimulated by a small child's jealousy of a new baby. It's especially in children under three years that the hostility is apt to come right out in the open and be directed at the baby in the form of blows or pinches or squeezes. I remember a very clear-cut story of how this hostility can be deflected outside the family. A 2½-year-old girl was attending a nursery school, an unusual one which took children under the age of three. When her baby brother was born there was no visible hostility toward him at home, but she began immediately to make sudden attacks on the only two children younger than herself in school. When one of them would come within a few yards of her she'd pounce like a leopard and sink her teeth into his arm. An assistant teacher was assigned to stay close to her for a few days just to prevent these attacks, but the teacher's attention would wander sooner or later and the bite would occu again.

Once in a while you see a child becomin temporarily aggressive as a result of extrem pressure arising from outside the home: cor stant bullying from a neighbor child, for in stance, or a severe reading disability in fir grade, which will make a boy feel suddenly in adequate, ridiculous and resentful.

But most cases of aggressiveness start wit tensions inside the family and have to b solved by relieving these tensions. In some c these situations the parents are completel baffled as to where the cause lies. In other they feel that they understand the issues an yet the remedies they apply don't bring results The usual explanation is that the most funda mental cause is not apparent and this is wher an outside professional person is able—be cause he is not in the thick of things—to help shed light.

A child psychiatrist in private practice o a child-guidance clinic is a direct approach but such facilities are available in only th largest cities and they sometimes have wait ing lists. Another approach is to consult a family social agency. (The name of the mos appropriate one can be secured through th Community Chest office.) A social worker' training and experience enable her to give mothers the help they need in solving th problems of many aggressive children. If th social worker finds that a different kind o treatment is needed, she is in a position t assist the mother in finding a psychiatrist o guidance clinic for the job. In the case of schoo children, there is often some type of counseling service in the school or at the board o education.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

Printed in U.S.A.

JOURNAL

May 1958–35¢

The Magazine Women Believe In

AT MUST BE DONE WITH OUR HIGH SCHOOLS? By A. WHITNEY GRISWOLD

COMPLETE NOVEL JONATHAN FOUND CONDENSED IN THIS ISSUE

OM-AND-BATH VACATION COTTAGES FROM $2300 TO $3900

JOURNAL READERS REPORT SADISTIC PRACTICES

CRUELTY IN MATERNITY W

"CANNON COMBSPUN PERCALES FIT MY WAY OF LIVING

they go on so easily, wear so well, look so lovely!"

It's child's play to make the beds—with Cannon's Ezy-Matic Corners. My fitted percales slip on without mattress lifting, stay tucked and smooth. Sturdy bias tape goes all the way around, for snug fit and long wear. Size is marked in several places, so I find it without unfolding the sheet. And they need never be ironed.

Gay stripes give white sheets a lift—so economically! Cannon Combspun Percales wear extra long, too. They are 186 count—certified colorfast by the American Institute of Laundering. I love their beauty, their smooth touch. And they are cool to sleep on in summertime. I use them to brighten all of our bedrooms.

TRADE MARK REG. U.S.A. CANNON

Only Cannon Combspun Percales give you so much beauty, so much comfort, so much wear

CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 Worth Street, New York 13, N. Y. · Towels · Sheets · Bedspreads · Draperies · Stockings · Terry Cloth

— generic

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

..its distinct taste tells you so

- New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.
- Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

ipana® TOOTH PASTE

Look for the BIG cap— only on NEW Ipana

Another fine product of Bristol-Myers

PIER ANGELI co-starring in "MERRY ANDREW"

A Sol C. Siegel Production—MGM Release, in CinemaScope and Metrocolor

a beautiful example of a Lux Complexion

"... soft pastels and white ... the rich lather ... most of all, the gentleness, the mildness ..."

THAT'S THE BEAUTY OF LUX

That's Pier Angeli speaking about Lux—and she should know. Her complexion is a beautiful example of what gentle care every day with naturally gentle Lux can do for a girl's skin!

Put your trust in Lux, too. Its rich Cosmetic lather cleanses thoroughly yet is so mild. The Lux fragrance is delightful—a blend of several costly perfumes. And now both complexion and bath size Lux come in four soft, lovely pastels as well as white.

Lux is the proven beauty care ... used by more beautiful women all over the world than any other soap. Try it soon, won't you. Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees complete satisfaction with Lux Soap or your money back.

9 out of 10 Hollywood Stars depend on Lux

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 5

May, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Cecil Maiden

One of our editors said of CECIL MAIDEN'S Jonathan Found (page 40): "If there's a likeness to Little Lord Fauntleroy, let the hard-boiled gender make the most of it. I liked Little Lord Fauntleroy—and so, if they'll remember and be honest, did they!" We never knew his young lordship, but we like Jonathan Found strictly on his own merits. The author was born in Southport, Lancashire, and educated at Merchant Taylors School and Reading University. He started writing articles and short stories for magazines in his school days and has been writing ever since. During World War II he served as a flight lieutenant in one of the film production units of the R. A. F., making documentary and news coverage of events in the air war. He has written film scripts for Walt Disney and Universal Studios. Although engaged in various film and television assignments at the present time, he says he prefers "straight writing."

Neal Stuart

NEAL GILKYSON STUART came to the JOURNAL after being woman's page editor for an evening paper in Portland, Oregon. "Documenting the human beings I meet on JOURNAL assignments," she says, "is to me the happiest work in the world. At home I have three children, ages six, nine and ten, whom I have given up trying to document. On weekends we fly kites in Valley Forge Park, which is fine exercise if you stick, as we do, to temperamental kites of unusual design that keep falling. We live in a house that is 117 years old, with a fort in every dark corner, and cracker crumbs under most of our living-room cushions. A How America Lives story right in Philadelphia (Mother is a Doctor Now!, page 131) was an occasion for rejoicing, but the children said, 'What, no present for us when you come home this time?'"

Nathaniel Benchley

NATHANIEL BENCHLEY reports: "I graduated from Harvard in 1938, and worked as a city reporter on the New York Herald Tribune until 1941, when I embarked on what turned out to be four and a half years in the Navy. There followed a brief stint as assistant entertainment editor on Newsweek, and for the last ten years I have been free-lancing, doing mostly fiction. I have written one short-lived Broadway play, one motion picture, a couple of television shows and three books. In the summer of 1938, my college roommate and I had an experience startlingly similar to the one in Anything You Can Climb (page 42)—so similar, in fact, that the only difference is that we were not husband and wife."

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

JONATHAN FOUND, Cecil Maiden . 40

Stories

ANYTHING YOU CAN CLIMB, Nathaniel Benchley . 42
THE KNIFE, THE CHAIN AND THE SCHOOLYARD, John D. MacDonald . 46
ICE PALACE (Second part of three), Edna Ferber . 48

Special Features

WHAT PRICE LIBERTY?, Dorothy Thompson . 11
FORCING CHILDREN BEYOND THEIR ABILITIES IN SCHOOL, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 16
WHERE CHILDREN FIND UNDERSTANDING . 27
HELP FOR THE TEACHER, Margaret Hickey . 27
JOURNAL MOTHERS REPORT ON CRUELTY IN MATERNITY WARDS, Gladys Denny Shultz . 44
HIGH SCHOOL TO COLLEGE, A. Whitney Griswold . 50
THE CHALLENGE OF THIS CENTURY, Glenn Matthew White . 51
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 65
WILLIAM GOES INTO THE DARK, Polly Toland . 97
HOW AMERICA LIVES: Mother is a Doctor Now!, Neal Gilkyson Stuart . 131

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 24
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 32
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 34
FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 39
THIS IS A RECORD-WRECKER, Munro Leaf . 147
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 150

Fashion and Beauty

SEVEN WONDERS OF WORLD TRAVEL, Wilhela Cushman . 52
CAPSULE WARDROBES IN SYNTHETIC FABRICS, Nora O'Leary . 56
THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT HER, Wilhela Cushman . 58
"I LOST 146 POUNDS," Dawn Crowell Norman . 60
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 84

Food and Homemaking

APPLEYARD BIRTHDAY PARTY, Elizabeth Kent Gay . 66
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: Salad . 68
"WHEN I ENTERTAIN," Mrs. Howard Phipps, as told to Nancy Crawford Wood . 93
KITCHEN CORNERS, Margaret Davidson . 118
SIMPLY GREAT TEEN COOKING, Liane Waite . 156

Architecture and Interior Decoration

VACATION COTTAGES THAT COST FROM $2300 TO $3900, Richard Pratt . 62
H IS FOR HOUSE . 108

Poems

OUT OF SIGHT . . ., Eleanor Averitt . 14
EASY DOES IT . . . OR DOES IT?, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 82
TWO VOICES, Elizabeth McFarland . 95
QUESTION, Anne C. Culbert . 112
THINGS LIKE THIS I DO NOT UNDERSTAND, Merrill Moore . 143
DOUBLE ENTRY, Frances Bragan Richman . 144
THE HEART FLIES HOME, Jesse Stuart . 160

Cover by Frances Pelligrini

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1958 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

Expecting?

Curity®
DIAPERS

DRY FASTER
Indoors or out

WASH EASIER
Stains disappear like magic

MORE ABSORBENT
Thirsty surgical weave works wonders

LONGER WEAR
Last entire diaper period — and more

Curity diapers are softer and smoother, even after countless launderings, when washed in quality products like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Don't forget Curity dress up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Kendall Mills Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. JA58
Enclosed is (indicate choice):
☐ 50c for Curity PIN CHECK Diaper
☐ 25c for full size Curity Regular Diaper
☐ 75c for both
☐ Free copy of Layette List
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii

NATALIE WOOD, beautiful Lustre-Creme Girl says: "My Shampoo is Lustre-Creme! It always leaves my hair silky-soft and so shiny. No wonder Lustre-Creme is Hollywood's favorite shampoo!" Lustre-Creme is used by the world's most glamorous women—shouldn't you use it, too?

For the most beautiful hair in the world

4 out of 5 top movie stars use Lustre-Creme Shampoo

When Natalie Wood says, "My shampoo is Lustre-Creme Shampoo," you're listening to a girl whose beautiful hair plays a vital part in her glamour-career.

Your hair can have that Hollywood-lovely look with Lustre-Creme Shampoo. Under the spell of its lanolin-blessed lather, your hair will sparkle with highlights, shine like the stars! Yet it's so easy-to-manage—behaves like an angel—even right after shampooing. Waves are smooth—curls springy.

You'll see—and he will, too—how much lovelier your hair can look when you change to Lustre-Creme, the shampoo of the stars!

Lanolin-blessed creme or lotion never dries . . . it beautifies

OUR READERS WRITE US

A Father's Place . . . is in the Home?

Burlingame, California

Dear Editors: For almost one full year, I was the housewife in our domicile. A male, six-foot-two, 200-pound housewife.

Admittedly, it made a few door-to-door salesmen nervous; and the neighbors, also, were a bit unsettled at the sight of me—each weekday morning—standing in the doorway and waving to Joanne as she left for work. But it worked out wonderfully well for my family.

Our difficulties started when our two children arrived. At her heftiest, Joanne weighs a paltry 115 pounds; our daughter now weighs 60 pounds; our son, a mulish 45 pounds. By simple calculation, the lifting and pulling of two such children—on a conservative average of between fifteen and twenty-five times a day—involves lifting approximately 2300 pounds a day. That's over a "long ton" of weight.

Anyway, as a consequence of all the lifting, tugging, dressing, Joanne developed bursitis in both shoulders. Treatments and a painful operation were unsuccessful. So there we were. Two children and a mother who couldn't "mother" them. A father whose sales duties seldom permitted him to be home before nine at night. The nearest relative over a thousand miles away.

I blithely went out to hire domestic help. A staggering jolt: we simply could not afford such help. Nor did we want to leave the children in a nursery school every day.

Before we were married, Joanne had been an accountant and office manager. Now she made inquiries and was offered immediate jobs, with salaries in the neighborhood of $350 a month. The doctor said she would have no physical difficulties working at a desk.

We could do it—if I would stay home and run the house. Joanne and I reversed roles—and our solution was successful.

First, I came to know my two children in a way that most fathers seldom have an opportunity to. They were no longer little semisavages who had to be tolerated while my mind plotted a business deal; instead, they were individuals on a smaller scale, with loves, hopes, fears, talents and sensitivities which I had not suspected.

In turn, my growing awareness of my children had a beneficial effect on them. True, in my first days they had difficulty acquainting me with the ground rules (such as: I was to be on call, all day), but I soon learned. And as a result of my masculine approach to their problems, they became more self-reliant and resourceful. For example: a ball was thrown through the living-room window. It was not a catastrophe, as they clearly feared. It was something to be fixed. Of course they're not capable of installing a window themselves (as I did), but I hope they've begun to learn that just about any problem can be solved, once you tackle it and leave off the hand wringing.

The running of the house was also more efficient when I was doing it. With the greater strength and endurance which God gave to male bodies, I was able to start cleaning house first thing in the morning and work straight through without stopping. Outside, the lawn and gardens were in tiptop shape. And there were no more hurried calls to plumbers, electricians or repair men. That went for minor TV repairs too.

There was no physical drudgery in or around the house which overtaxed my strength, whereas Joanne had often been in a state of exhaustion by the time the children were bedded for the night. This is the ludicrous incongruity of our society: the male was given physical strength to survive and to provide for his family. But today, with the exception of laborers, farmers or athletes, the average man keeps "in shape" at golf, tennis or in gyms. All the while, his delicate mate is generally outworking him.

Mentally, my own "turnabout" was quite radical, in that, for the first time, I came to appreciate the feminine role in this world. My life had previously been—like that of most men—compartmentalized into business, travel and entertainment, and lastly (I'm afraid) home. I began to realize what women seem to have always known: the family is our reason for being. All other considerations are secondary. And I venture to suggest that a large portion of American males would do well to relearn this basic truth—and thereby eliminate some of their anxieties and tensions.

At last, Joanne's bursitis disappeared and I went back to work.

Naturally, I have tried to alter my previous habits; but despite my efforts, I again begin to spend increasing amounts of time and thought in the world of business. And as meetings last far into the night, my wife waits at home, alone with two sleeping children, and hungry for the sound of an adult voice. (A TV personality is no substitute—I know now.)

I'm on the way to business success, all right—I'm told that nothing can stop me.

Nothing, perhaps, except that niggling doubt: weren't we really better off, reduced income and all, when I stayed at home and Joanne was working? Or am I just being selfish because I'd like to be with my children more than twenty hours a week? Sincerely,

B. T. MILAN

Latin Up-to-Date

She came. . . .

He saw. . . .

She conquered.

RUTH WATKINS

Ageless Journal

Dallas, Oregon

Dear Editors: I've read LADIES' HOME JOURNAL since I was a girl some 35 years ago, and this magazine is like a group of good friends who might come each month

CONTINUED ON PAGE 36

it's easy to draw a man with

PINK 'N ORANGE

not pink! not orange! Max Factor's outrageous new color creation that captivated all Paris!

Got designs on a man? Then this is for you: The soft flattery of pink plus the brilliant excitement of orange —all in one shade. It's bold. It's feminine. It's the shade Paris says will make him yours, and the one shade daring enough to flatter you in all your new bright fashion colors. Max Factor brings you this different, delicious lipstick color! In his creamy, rich Hi-Fi formula that stays on... stays lovely 'til you take it off.

$1.25
PLUS TAX

only in Max Factor's new hi-fi Lipstick

All through your active day...

new MUM® stops odor without irritation

So gentle for any normal skin you can use it freely every day

If you've ever worried about your deodorant failing . . . or about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum Cream will stop odor right through the day and evening. And new Mum is so gentle for normal skin you can use it whenever you please. Even right after shaving, or a hot bath.

Contains no aluminum salts

Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way.

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor. Mum contains no astringent aluminum salts (often the villain when it comes to irritation). It keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria!

When Mum is so effective—yet so gentle—isn't it the deodorant for you?

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

MUM contains M-3 (bacteria-destroying hexachlorophene) ... stops odor 24 hours ■ day. Won't damage clothes.

Start her Persian Princess set with a French Purse...in her favorite size!

Now you can pick the French Purse that custom-fits her taste and needs! Newest, the dainty, demi-size "Demoiselle," with leather-lined change-purse; compartmented billfold luxury-lined in rich rayon faille. All three French Purse sizes shown, in glamorous Persian Princess style—twinkling "jewel"-studded polished Gahna cowhide in exciting exotic colors.

get your money's worth for your money... give

PRINCESS GARDNER® Persian Princess accessories

PRINCE GARDNER COMPANY, 1234 S. KINGSHIGHWAY, ST. LOUIS 10, MISSOURI. AT FINE STORES EVERYWHERE. *PLUS TAX

Bufferin® relieves pain twice as fast!

Di-Alminate makes the difference

Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

Bufferin combines aspirin with an exclusive combination of two antacid ingredients called Di-Alminate. These speed the pain reliever into the blood stream twice as fast. So ..

Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

1. All leading pain remedies, including other compounds, rely on aspirin! But...

2. Aspirin without antacid is relatively slow-acting. It is acid and can irritate your stomach.

3. Only Bufferin adds to aspirin an exclusive combination of antacids called Di-Alminate. So Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast as aspirin—won't upset your stomach!

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does!

"Goodness! So many elastic bras to choose from!"

"Yes, but this one is satin elastic – A'Lure by Warner's"

Here, the famous A'Lure. Rayon satin elastic; embroidered nylon marquisette cup tops. #1045. White or black. $3.95. For extra help, the foam-lined version. #1049. In white, $5.00.

Circular-stitched A'Lure — for high firmness. Embroidered and plain nylon marquisette and satin elastic. #1047. White. $5.00.

For added support this A'Lure has special cups, a softly-lined 2-inch band. Nylon lace cup tops. #1075. White. $5.00.

As you live and breathe, darling– so does your satin elastic A'Lure

Did you know that every time you breathe, your bra size changes? Does your bra change with you? Does it move with you—through one of your bending-lifting-on-the-run days? Chances are the answer is no. So why not wear an elastic bra? (Especially if you're an in-between size, which half the women are.)

And be sure it's A'Lure®—for all elastic bras are not alike. Others are woven with cotton—tend to be hard-stretching, even stiff. But Warner's® A'Lure is made with soft, pliable-as-you satin elastic. That's why it fits, feels, wears so wonderfully. Just look at A'Lure. You'll see what we mean. At your nicest stores.

The cleanest clean under the sun—

New Tide Clean!

NEW TIDE

with RESERVE CLEANING POWER

...wonderful extra cleaning power to get your whole wash clean and fresh as an ocean breeze. What a beautiful sight when your wash is done! Everything, even problem wash comes out more than bright, more than white... really clean! So clean smelling, too...with a fresh air and sunshine cleanness you'll love. Yes, the cleanest clean possible is new Tide clean!

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

LANDSCAPE, FRUIT AND FLOWERS. Fruit or flowers were quite the vogue in the mid-nineteenth century. Currier & Ives produced many such prints. This composition was created by Fanny Palmer in 1862.

WHAT PRICE LIBERTY?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

The most dangerous illusion from which free men suffer is the widely held idea that freedom maintains itself by the mere fact of its being.

Government of, by and for the people through freely elected representatives; impartial courts to judge under laws made by such representatives; constitutional protection of life, liberty and legally acquired property; freedom of individuals and of voluntarily organized groups to express and pursue their interests and ideas without interference by the police power—these, common to all the more advanced and civilized societies, seem to us to constitute a form of government conducive to the greatest happiness, material prosperity and human creativeness, and one that will, therefore, sustain and spread itself by sheer force of example.

But civilizations are not so sustained or furthered. Their survival, as Arnold Toynbee makes clear in his monumental work, A Study of History, depends upon their capacity to respond to challenge. Abraham Lincoln, one of the greatest of our Presidents, was also one of the most somber. He knew that human societies as great as or greater than ours had, in the past, declined and eventually perished if only to rise again, centuries later in greatly modified forms, in places far from their points of origin.

Of all forms of government and society, those of free men and women are in many respects the most brittle. They give the fullest freedom for activities of private persons and groups who often identify their own interests, essentially selfish, with the general welfare. They tend to reduce the function of legislators to rubber-stamping popular demands or steering a course of uncertain compromise between them. They diffuse, and thereby dissipate, responsibility. They offer the people the widest possible range of choice.

But freedom of choice does not obviate the necessity to choose well.

It does not guarantee that any choice, or any choices, will prove compatible with survival. It often leads to such paralysis of decision that a leader arises to "take matters into his own hands," a step which is all too often welcomed by the masses of the people, ready to relinquish responsibilities that have become onerous and confused in exchange for their liberties. History, from antique times to the modern present, is replete with such examples.

It is not the fact of liberty but the way in which liberty is exercised that ultimately determines whether liberty itself survives.

The West today—the civilization out of which America was born and of which it has become the leader—is as challenged as was the great civilization of Rome immediately before its decline and fall. But our response to that challenge is feeble, contradictory and confused.

One reason is that neither our leaders nor our people have clearly analyzed the challenge. They have thought it sufficient to extol the virtues of liberty, the superiority of the American and Western standard of living, to point out the vices and failures of the Communist regimes, and to keep this country and the West in a formidable military posture.

For the last, Congress, backed by the American people, has always been willing to appropriate whatever moneys were required, sometimes, even, in excess of Administration requests. But the challenge in other sectors has gone largely unheeded.

Until Russia put the first Sputnik into orbit, it was almost tantamount to treason to point out any virtues in Communist regimes from the viewpoint of their possible superiority in the race for the survival of their civilization over our own. To do so meant to be called "pro-Communist." That is as silly as it would be to call a person who puts in a fire alarm "pro-fire."

Nor is it basically relevant to count the costs in human suffering that Russians have paid for their indubitable achievements. No Westerner is, or should be, willing to pay such costs, nor could our civilization permit them and remain free. To do so would be to throw in the sponge and admit surrender. But the problem still remains: What are these achievements, and what are we, as free men and women, prepared to do, and to sacrifice, to meet the challenge the achievements present?

CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Elizabeth Hart
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Abbot Mills
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel, Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Duncan Wright.

EVENING ENSEMBLE BY SCAASI

I dreamed I made an impression in my maidenform bra!

Lights, camera, action—I'm the center of attraction in my new Twice-Over Long-Line bra! Here's terrific Twice-Over styling with airy elastic cut criss-cross under the arms—and double-stitched circles on the broadcloth cups. Now it's yours in a long version that makes you seem sizes slimmer! Hurry! Try Twice-Over Long-Line by Maidenform! A, B, C and D cups. Full and ¾ lengths, from 5.95

And ask for a Maidenform girdle, too!

Look for this colorful package everywhere!

© 1958 MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK 16, N. Y. *REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. PAT. PEND.

Wonderful Dial Soap!

Real mildness. Rich lather. Colors, too. But Dial gives you more. Much more. Dial gets rid of skin bacteria, protects your complexion all day—even under make-up. Wonderful Dial!

Match your tile with Dial!

NO OTHER ANTISEPTIC
not even iodine
IS SO EFFECTIVE
YET SO SAFE!

Johnson & Johnson First Aid Cream fights infection without stinging.

Cuts, burns, abrasions heal faster because it doesn't burn or harm tissue. Greaseless, stainless.

The modern first aid treatment for the whole family.

Johnson & Johnson

"We only compel students to fail if we make them take courses beyond their abilities."

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

ABBOT MILLS

The American people believe all children should have the benefit of a high-school education.

Forcing children beyond their abilities in school

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M. D.

I worry that the criticism of our high schools that has been provoked by the launching of the Soviet Sputniks will persuade our citizens that we ought to throw away some of the educational aims and methods we have developed instead of strengthening them.

I know that there are serious deficiencies in many of our schools. Our educators have not been complacent about them. They have been imploring us to correct them for two decades now. In many parts of the country we have paid little attention.

We, the richest nation in the world, have spent proportionately less on public education than Russia or England. We spend infinitely more on cars and household appliances, more on tobacco, more on liquor, more on cosmetics than we spend on education. We have let school building fall far behind our requirements. We aren't offering sufficient salaries or prestige to recruit anywhere near the number of teachers we need. Many whom we are using are only partly trained. Two thirds of our brightest high-school graduates fail to go to college, most commonly for financial reasons.

The reasoning of many critics has been as follows:

Our schools give too many "soft" courses and do not require a lot of mathematics and science as Soviet schools do. That must be the reason why we have fallen behind in the scientific field of missiles and satellites. Therefore we should get rid of "soft" courses and teach much more science.

There are serious gaps in this reasoning. It is true that the Soviets have developed scientists by giving their brightest children an intensive schooling, providing them with full scholarships in college, rewarding them with high salaries and prestige. But there is no evidence that America is behind the Soviets in most aspects of science and technology—far from it—so there is no proof here that our educational system, with all its insufficiencies, is not working at least as well as theirs.

The people in charge of our satellite programs have complained so far as I have heard, not that they were unable to find scientists but that they were not granted sufficient funds. For a number of years we have been cutting our defense budgets, to the point where skilled workers and engineers in defense industries have recently been unemployed. Under such circumstances it seems farfetched and unfair to jump on educators first of all, at least until there is more evidence.

Before we discuss further our own schools, I'd like to clarify some points about Soviet education, so far as I am able. The most startling statement we have all heard is that the youth who graduate from Russian high schools (at the end of the tenth grade) have had four years of chemistry, five years of physics, advanced algebra, geometry, trigonometry and elementary calculus. We should realize, however, that in the past only a minority went through ten grades. The rest stopped after seven grades. It was in 1951 that the Soviets decided that they would make ten grades compulsory for all students, and they set 1960 as the date. By 1955 about a third of their students were getting that far. But according to the bulletin of our Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Soviet press reported at that time that "in many cases from 30 to 50 per cent of the children were failing in grades 8, 9 and 10." As a result, "the material was simplified and condensed," and more time was allotted to practical experience in the sciences. I feel sure that by the time all the rest of their youth (including the less bright and less ambitious ones) are going through tenth grade, they will have to make still-greater "simplification." This is no reflection on the Russians. A majority of American high-school students could not take courses in advanced algebra, geometry, trigonometry either, nor traditional academic courses in chemistry and physics. It requires an I.Q. of more than 100 to understand such subjects, yet in the population as a whole there are as many with I.Q.'s below 100 as above.

To be sure, there are aspects of chemistry, physics, geology, biology which can be successfully taught at any level of age and intelligence. They are taught in many American elementary as well as high schools. My own opinion is that these are excellent subjects for all students to take in reasonable amounts because they both train the child's mind and give him an understanding of the real world around him. (I think mathematics is fine training, too, so long as we recognize that when it gets to algebra and beyond, it can't be simplified much.)

The main point I'm making, though, is that it's impossible that the Soviets have found a magic educational system that enables average and below-average pupils to absorb stiff academic subjects, as some of the critics seem to assume. We should realize that only a small proportion of the youth of any country can be

CONTINUED ON PAGE 18

You get a Cleaner Wash with CLOROX®

Whitest and Brightest!

Add Clorox to your washday suds ... every time... and you add extra cleanliness to your laundry. White cotton, linen, nylon and rayon come out extra white—extra clean. Colorfast cotton and linen come out extra bright—extra clean.

Clorox does a better job of bleaching and stain removing than any other type of laundering product. So, if you want the cleanest wash you can get ... you want a wash that's Clorox-clean!

Safest for Health!

Clorox gives you added health protection, too! No other bleach, no other laundering product, equals Clorox in germ-killing efficiency.

To safeguard your family's health, wash your clothes sanitary-clean with Clorox...every time!

KEEP AN EXTRA BOTTLE HANDY FOR HOUSE CLEANING!

CLOROX®

©1958, The Clorox Company

Shop this ad for the Daystrom dining furniture you like best

FAMILY LIVABILITY! Sleek and sturdy, this 5-piece set features Coloramic® black legs tipped with gleaming brass. Wood-grained table top is of burn, scratch and stain-resistant Daystromite®. Wide choice of vinyl patterns and colors. About $79.95.

TRINIDAD! A new vinyl covering with gay stripes, designed to brighten moods as well as rooms. Two-tone Daystromite® top. Legs in black, bronze or Platinum Gray. Every inch of Daystrom whisks clean with a damp cloth. About $179.95.

DINING ELEGANCE. With leaf added, (all tables shown have leaves) this Round Table becomes a graceful dining oval, attended by smart Wire-back Chairs. Self-leveling glides keep Daystrom steady on uneven floors. About $159.95.
(Prices slightly higher in West)

America dines best on daystrom FURNITURE OLEAN, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

trained to be scientists. There wouldn't be jobs for a lot more even if they could be trained. We only compel students to fail if we make them take courses beyond their abilities.

Incidentally, it is good to know that we do not have to depend only on parents with superior intelligence for our crop of superior children. Though parents of average intelligence produce an intellectually superior child only occasionally, nevertheless there are so many more such parents altogether, that they contribute more of the superior children in the final count.

Next I want to take up the complaint of many critics (especially the older ones) that American high schools today allow students to take all kinds of easy and practical and "life adjustment" courses, instead of sticking to the stiff academic curriculum they remember from their own school days.

The composition of the student body of our high schools has changed enormously. A century and a quarter ago there were no public high schools. There were private academies where a few sons of educated parents who expected to be ministers, doctors and lawyers were prepared for college. In 1870 there were 80,000 high-school students, in 1900 there were 500,000, and in 1940 there were 6,600,000. This extraordinary change took place because the American people came to believe that all children should have the benefit of a high-school education and passed laws making it compulsory.

An Arabian sheik needed one more horse for his entourage before setting off on a trip to the desert. Two horses from a village nearby were brought to him, but the owner of each horse, not wanting to give up his animal, insisted his horse was worthless, broken-winded, crippled, and so on. "It's a simple thing to settle," said the sheik. "We will stage a race between the horses. The winning horse will be taken."

An adviser stepped forward and whispered, "It won't work, Your Highness. Neither man will let his horse ride fast."

"They will," said the sheik. "Let each man ride the other's horse."

Ken Murray's Giant Joke Book
Published by Ace Books, Inc.

Every Western nation has wrestled with the problem of how to draw the lines between different categories of students and different types of education, when all youths are required to attend. The tendency in Europe, where schools are run by the central government, has been to select by about the time they reach eleven years of age the small minority of the students who show particular aptitude for academic work and to give them an intensive academic high-school course which prepares them excellently (in intellect, anyway) for a university. The rest are given a shorter, less demanding course, with the opportunity to learn a vocation.

In America, of course, educational policy is decided in each school district, under some supervision from the state. In effect, our citizens have declared: "We don't want our schools to select, before the seventh grade, the minority of students they think should be prepared for college, and to give all the rest a vocational training. We want the door left open for each pupil to choose the kind of education he thinks he can profit from." This is fine in theory and works out quite well in large prosperous cities, where every type of high-school curriculum is available, including a wide variety of vocational and general courses for average students, intensive college preparation for the brightest ones. But in smaller and poorer cities and towns, which cannot afford as much variety, the tendency has been to concentrate on a general high-school curriculum,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 23

"I wouldn't dream of giving my child anything but St. Joseph Aspirin For Children"
—Mimi Benzell

MIMI BENZELL (Mrs. Walter Gould) Star of Opera Television and Concert, and son Jonathon

More doctors approve St. Joseph Aspirin For Children for fever and pain than any other medication for children.

This specialized tablet assures accurate dosage, no cutting or breaking necessary, no messy liquids to measure. Pure orange flavor. It's a mother-and-child favorite!

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

. . . and for my family's adult aspirin needs, I always buy regular St. Joseph Aspirin

CORNS

Removed by Mosco, also Calluses. Quick, easy, economical. Just rub on. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

MOSCO ★CORN★ REMOVER

SHOWER CADDY®

by the makers of world-famous Drizzle Boots.® Handy bathroom accessory to keep shower items neatly in place, ready to use. Eliminates dangers of broken glass. Flexible hooks fit on faucets, shower doors, curtain rods or towel racks. Silver in color, adds beauty to bathroom decor.

Ask for it at notion counters or send $1.25 to Coffey-Hoyt Products, a division of PRINCIPLE PLASTICS, INC., Gardena, California.

Residents of California add 4% state sales tax.

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

A telephone call from out of town takes the blues out of the night

Talking over the telephone with someone who's out of town can brighten the evening at both ends of the line.

So much can be said in a telephone call. Why not call right now?

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM
Call by Number. It's Twice as Fast.

You save money when you call Station-to-Station instead of Person-to-Person

For example:	First 3 Minutes Person-to-Person	First 3 Minutes Station-to-Station	Each Added Minute (applies to all calls)
New York to Baltimore	85¢	55¢	15¢
Cleveland to Chicago	$1.15	75¢	20¢
St. Louis to Omaha	$1.30	85¢	25¢
Albuquerque to Los Angeles	$1.65	$1.10	30¢
Boston to Miami	$2.25	$1.50	40¢

These rates apply nights after 6 o'clock and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

How scientists scored a major victory in the fight against one of our most stubborn diseases

The Mysterious Quonset Hut That Made Dental History

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

"What in the world can they be doing inside that Quonset hut?"

Since 1952, many a perplexed citizen of the Midwestern town of Bloomington has asked that question. Day after day, a stream of people passed through the doors of the hut—yet the purpose of the "dental study unit" there remained largely a mystery.

Today, the mystery of the Quonset hut is gone. As all of Bloomington knows, the hut was headquarters for America's newest weapon against tooth decay—a stannous fluoride toothpaste now called Crest.

And the thousands of grownups and children who came to the hut for four years? They were taking part in tests on Crest—the greatest series of "in-use" tests ever made on a toothpaste.

I think you'll agree that these tests made dental history when you look at these results—

In one test with adults, those who brushed with Crest had 42% fewer new cavities than those who used ordinary toothpaste.

In another test, this one with children, those who used Crest had 49% fewer new cavities.

On the average, including both grownups and children, Crest cut decay almost in half.

Norman Rockwell has dramatized on the opposite page a happy youngster who had no new cavities at all between dental checkups. This exciting result of using Crest with Fluoristan took place frequently in the Bloomington tests.

How does Crest work? Scientists explained to me that virtually all of us have "soft spots" on our teeth—weak places where cavities usually start. Crest, with its special fluoride formula called Fluoristan, strengthens those soft spots against decay.

Yes, the Quonset hut at Bloomington was a mystery—but a mystery with a "happy ending" for all of us!

GROWNUPS AND CHILDREN REPORT to the Quonset hut in Bloomington to take part in the most extensive toothpaste tests ever made. A series of dental examinations showed that those who brushed with Crest Toothpaste had far fewer new cavities, compared with those who used ordinary toothpaste.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"

Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter.
©1958, The Procter & Gamble Co.

BRINGING UP BABY®

HINTS COLLECTED
BY MRS. DAN GERBER
MOTHER OF 5

the spotlight's on baby

Reserved for the most important people: National Baby Week —April 26 to May 3. Food for thought on this special occasion: In the hustle-bustle of doing things for baby, few of us stop to think what baby does for us. I like this mother's interpretation:

"The most wonderful thing about babies is that they enrich your life, give direction to your dreams and provide a reason for rising above the humdrum."

feature of the month

Exclusive Gerber Offer ☆ ☆ ☆ Starring Rosemary Clooney

For mothers of lovely babies everywhere: Gerber offers an original recording called "What is a Baby," narrated by Rosemary Clooney . . . charming TV star and mother of 3. It's an irresistible biography of your baby and all babies, told with the tenderness, humor and insight all mothers will understand and cherish. On the other side of the record, Miss Clooney sings two favorite lullabies: "Close Your Eyes," and "All the Pretty Little Horses." Both are sure to delight you and your family. For your copy of this 7 inch, 33⅓ Lp Columbia record of "What is a Baby," just send 50¢ and 6 labels or boxtops to Dept. 85-8, Gerber Baby Foods, Fremont, Mich. In Canada, send to: Gerber Baby Foods, Niagara Falls, Canada. Offer expires Dec. 31, 1958.

tuned to baby's taste

5 inviting ways to make your tyke like to eat. Gerber Baby Cereals are prepared to please your baby's uneducated palate . . . both from the standpoint of taste and texture. Each has its own interesting but delicate flavor—all have the good-feeling texture babies like. Gerber Baby Cereals are prepared in the nutritional interests of little ones. All 5—Rice Cereal, Barley, Oatmeal, Mixed Cereal and High Protein Cereal are fortified with iron, calcium and B-vitamins. The High Protein Cereal has a 35% protein content. Ready to serve, too! Just add formula or milk.

quality first

Every week is baby week at Gerber, so far as your baby's well-being is concerned. As a mother who wants the most nutritious food for her baby, you'll be pleased to know that all Gerber Baby Foods are quality-tested in 28 ways to insure absolute purity, true flavors, appealing colors and the highest possible nutritive value. For when it comes to babies . . . mothers and Gerber agree, it's quality first.

rugged individualism . . . baby style

All parents feel the need to be reassured that baby is developing normally. So they often compare baby's achievements with those of other children . . . sometimes to their delight, more often to their disappointment. Comforting findings from a survey on child behavior: (1) No two babies develop in the same way at the same time. (2) There are approximate times when some babies do certain things, but behavior patterns vary so widely, few comparisons can be made. (3) No matter what they do when, most babies catch up with each other in the end.

dinners to invite delight

All savory goodness and substantial nourishment—that's the story on Gerber's Strained High Meat Dinners. For they have 3 times as much meat and much more protein than regular vegetable and meat combinations. Selected vegetables and cereal are blended with this extra meat for exceptional flavor and excellent nutritive value. 3 Strained varieties: Beef, Chicken or Veal. Also in the Junior minced texture for tots who enjoy chewing.

Babies are our business...our only business!

NATIONAL BABY WEEK

Gerber® baby foods

FREMONT, MICHIGAN

5 CEREALS • OVER 80 STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS, INCLUDING MEATS

America's Most Popular Nurser

evenflo SUPER PLASTIC NURSERS MADE OUR TRIP EASY

"We had to drive across the country when Karen was two months old, and I was so grateful for Evenflo Super Plastic Nursers," writes Mrs. Vincent Drayne, Jr. of San Diego. "It was a real convenience to have unbreakable bottles I could sterilize, and Evenflo Super Plastic is so translucent that I could fill bottles accurately and see how much formula Karen had taken."

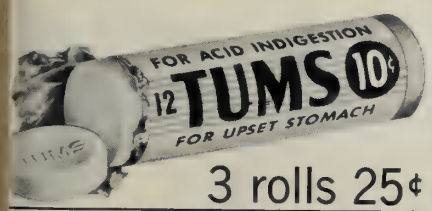
Evenflo Super Plastic Nursers also feature the famous patented Twin Air-Valve Nipple that allows formula to flow freely when nursed.

Because they are easier to nurse, handier to use, more mothers use Evenflo than all other nursers combined.

Hospital Tested
Guaranteed Sterilizable

Complete with Twin Air-Valve Nipple, matching cap and disc. Pink, Blue, Mint, Maize, Natural.

4-oz. 35¢ 8-oz. 39¢



evenflo®

These and other quality Evenflo Nursers, Sterilizers and Accessories are on sale everywhere.

EVENFLO RAVENNA, OHIO

EXPECting?

Heartburn and acid indigestion are often a problem during pregnancy. Tums gives total relief in just 4 seconds from excess stomach acids. Tums are high in calcium—convenient to carry in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

MASSAGE Your FEET!

Enjoy wonderful relief from tired, aching feet and legs THIS NEW, EASY WAY!

Exclusive 30 Degree Angle allows Feet, Legs to rest naturally, comfortably while you read or relax.

Dr. Scholl's Electric FOOT MASSAGER improves circulation in feet and legs; relieves fatigued, aching feeling, rests, revitalizes the feet.

AN IDEAL GIFT MASSAGER model for both feet $16.95. Single foot model $8.95. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores. Mail orders filled. DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. M 2, Chicago 10, Ill.

Dr Scholl's Electric FOOT MASSAGER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 18

designed for the average student, which is not very specialized in any direction. A small high school has often been unable to offer advanced mathematics and science for several reasons. There may not be enough students with the aptitude and desire for such courses to justify the cost. Even if the school wants instructors, it will have difficulty today finding people in these fields who will work for a schoolteacher's salary. Furthermore the sciences can't be taught without expensive, space-consuming laboratories.

What can America do, then, to bring more students to college and through college with a strong background in mathematics and science? We'll need to use all possible approaches. I myself don't see how we can get along without a very broad scholarship program, to make it possible for every superior student who wants to go to college to go. It would be quite unfair to restrict it to students heading for scientific careers. Our country is entitled to all the bright educated people it can develop, in all fields. Who knows whether it might not be a statesman or a minister of the gospel who will someday show the way out of the senseless rivalry between the Soviets and ourselves?

There will probably be further consolidation of schools. The larger the school, within sensible limits, the wider the range of classes it can provide in any one subject, in order to adapt the instruction to the aptitudes of different pupils.

There may be ways developed to utilize more widely the science instructors we do have,

The modern minds in such generation are the critics who preserve us from a petrifying world, who will not leave us to walk undisturbed in the ways of our fathers. EDITH HAMILTON

The Greek Way
Published by
W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

through television, for instance, or by loaning to schools which lack them the part-time services of those who can be spared from other schools, colleges and industries.

Even so, we shall need many more instructors, and the essential first step in getting them will be through substantial salary increases. Since some states and districts are much poorer than others and since the Federal Government collects three quarters of the taxes, a majority of educators believe that there will have to be Federal subsidy. That's my personal opinion too.

The point I feel most sure about myself is that, in belatedly trying to improve our science and mathematics, we must not do it at the expense of other aspects of our educational system which are developing other potentialities in our children. It would be tragic if, in a panic in one respect, we jumped to the thoughtless assumption that the Soviets are wiser than we in all respects, and that our only solution is to ape them. They have made colossal blunders in the past and are having many kinds of trouble at the present time—with their satellite countries as well as with their own citizens. Their university students are said to be impatient with endless propaganda and resentful of some of the inequalities in the system. An interesting detail in the survey of their schools made by our Department of Health, Education, and Welfare was that a committee of Soviet physicians had complained to the government that the intense pressure put on the academic pupils (four hours of homework in the high-school grades) was undermining their health.

I think we'll do all right if we can ever take full advantage of the political, social and educational systems we possess.

In another article I want to talk more about those aspects of American education which are being called "soft."

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

Serve that Sizzler

on strong, wiltproof CHI-NET® paper plates

CHI-NET paper plates are just made to hold thick, juicy steaks with all the trimmings. Individually molded to shape, they stay rigid even when piled high with food . . . CHI-NET never gets limp.

CHI-NET paper plates are available in a variety of shapes, sizes and colors. Look for them in their attractive transparent packages at your favorite food or variety store. The CHI-NET oval on the wrapper tells you that here is a new and different kind of paper plate.

WORK-SAVER SUGGESTION

New CHI-NET paper plates are wonderful for all kinds of meals, indoors or out. For picnics and parties . . . quick meals and snacks . . . breakfast, lunch or dinner, or for storing leftovers, they're always right for modern, easy living.

Be Wise-Buy KEYES MOLDED PRODUCTS

KEYES FIBRE COMPANY • WATERVILLE, MAINE

No Sugar to add to these APRICOT COCONUT BALLS

And no cooking with Eagle Brand Milk and Baker's Angel Flake Coconut.

1½ cups dried apricots, ground
2 cups Baker's Coconut
⅔ cup (½ 15-oz. can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk

1 So quick! So easy! Combine apricots and coconut. Add Eagle Brand and blend well. Only Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk with the sweetening already in it gives you such double-rich smoothness. It's pre-cooked!

2 Shape into small balls. If desired, roll in confectioners' sugar. Snowy, tender-thin Baker's Angel Flakes add such luscious appeal, party fun!

3 Let balls stand until firm. Makes 32 candies 1¼" in diameter. Try a batch tonight. You'll love 'em.

Baker's and Angel Flake are registered trade-marks of General Foods Corp.

FREE!

Get Elsie's 28-page full-color recipe book.

The Borden Company
Dept. LHJ-58, Box 171
New York 46, N.Y.

Please send me Elsie's free recipe book, Borden's Eagle Brand 70 Magic Recipes.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"She had it gold-plated—it's the millionth dish she washed."

In years gone by but not forgotten, the Hippodrome used to stand at 44th Street and 6th Avenue, New York, and opposite it the office of Vanity Fair. Robert Sherwood, playwright-to-be, worked on the magazine, and a troupe of midgets worked at the Hippodrome. Sherwood, nearly seven feet tall, was afraid of the midgets, who would sneak up behind him and ask how the weather was up there. "Walk down the street with me," he used to ask his friends.

His friends were Dorothy Parker and Bob Benchley, who worked in the same office; and in an interview, Dorothy Parker now tells considerable about them and about her other old friends.

Of the late editor of The New Yorker she says, "Harold Ross had a profound ignorance. On one of Mr. Benchley's manuscripts he wrote in the margin opposite 'Andromache,' 'Who he?' Mr. Benchley wrote back, 'You keep out of this.'"

Her interview appears in a collection of particularly good interviews from The Paris Review: WRITERS AT WORK, edited by Malcolm Cowley (Viking), and including E. M. Forster, Thurber, Sagan, Wilder, Faulkner, Capote.

●

Victoria Sackville-West was always a figure in literary England, author of All Passion Spent, Family History, Pepita and many other fascinating pictures of top-drawer English life. She was born at Knole Castle, the famous old house given by Queen Elizabeth I to her cousin, Lord Treasurer Thomas Sackville. She became one of the "Bloomsberries," along with Lytton Strachey, Virginia Woolf, Bertrand Russell, the Sitwells. She married Sir Harold Nicolson, author and diplomat, and with him now lives in Sissinghurst Castle in Kent. There she has a garden which she works, and about which she writes. (As Tagore said, "God grows weary of great kingdoms, but not of little flowers.") A JOY OF GARDENING (Harper) is her latest book, a practical notebook filled with pretty notions—like a hedge of grapevines, a patch of Alpine meadow in the back field, scented flowers, advice on a very small garden. A good book for May.

In THE STEADFAST MAN, by Paul Gallico, St. Patrick slips out of the cloud of hazy glory with which legends and myths have surrounded him for sixteen centuries, and appears in person.

This is beyond any doubt the most authentic portrait of him we shall ever get. Gallico has based it on the only two undisputed documents from the saint's own pen: he has studied the history of the Ireland and Britain and Gaul that Patricius knew in the fourth century: he has himself walked over the hills of Ireland and along the brooks where St. Patrick walked. Out of this research he has made clever and reasonable deductions. The Irish among us may be disappointed to learn that Patrick was not Irish but a Romanized Briton, and that during his forty years' sojourn in Ireland, he never ceased to long for home; also that there is no record whatsoever of ousting the snakes. But St. Patrick remains one of the most truly religious men of all time, and a superb organizer. Singlehanded he converted ■■ island of untamed tribesmen into one of the most Christian countries of all Europe. This is a rewarding biography in the best tradition. (Doubleday.)

●

A novel which men will undoubtedly like, THEY CAME TO CORDURA, by Glendon Swarthout (Random House), is set during the punitive expedition into Mexico after Pancho Villa. It is the story of a formidable trek by five cavalrymen under a courageous leader, who had to cross the whole state of Chihuahua to reach Cordura and safety—a dramatic story of thirst, hunger, brutality, lust and the will to live.

●

For pure entertainment I nominate THE OLDEST CONFESSION, by Richard Condon (Appleton-Century-Crofts), one of the most exciting thrillers I have come across in years. Set in modern Madrid, among vodka martinis and art experts, a duquesa and a bullfighter, and ■ trio of the slickest and most likeable criminals you could ever want to meet, this is humorous, sophisticated, clever as to plot, bristling with action and suspense.

Many of us have the dream, but here's a woman who stepped right off the porch of domesticity—farm, household responsibilities, two children, dog—hoisted her pack and bedroll onto her back, and hitchhiked alone to the Yukon. AS FAR AS YOU'LL TAKE ME, by Lorna Wishaw (Dodd, Mead), is high-spirited, good-humored and astounding.

On the other hand, HEAVEN ON THE DOORSTEP, by Charlotte Edwards (Hawthorn), will appeal to the women who prefer to stay home, a story of spiritual faith, simple and personal, told in the vernacular. Never ponderous or preachy.

●

THE TEN THOUSAND THINGS, by Maria Dermout, is a timeless novel, a book whose beauty lingers. The author is a Dutchwoman, now seventy, who has lived all her life in the spice islands of the East Indies, and here mirrors that distant paradise in limpid, beautiful writing. (Simon & Schuster.)

●

By far the best factual book about India (in my reading) is THE HEART OF INDIA, by Alexander Campbell, a Scot who works for Time, Inc., and knows how to tell what he sees. It is specific, not generalized. It covers the country, is close to the soil, and steps also into high places. I am convinced that this is the book for all who want to understand the people and problems of that strange land. (Knopf.)

●

P. S. Look for a very important and highly readable book coming along, called* SCHOOLS WITHOUT SCHOLARS, which lays bare the conditions in our schools, with emphasis on curriculum and on higher-up mistaken educational policies. Author is John Keats, who wrote The Crack in the Picture Window. *(Both books, Houghton, Mifflin.)

AMERICAN MAGAZINE

JOE CAMPBELL

"The title of my composition is 'More Pay for Teachers'!"

Also for ■ remarkable life story, THE BRIDGE IS LOVE by Alma Mahler Werfel (Harcourt Brace). More of this later.

And take note that Rumer Godden's captivating GREENGAGE SUMMER is now out in book form. (Viking.)

New BRILLO soap pads shine aluminum fast—give you more free time!

Speed through pot and pan clean-ups, have more time for family fun

For faster cleaning, instant shine... there's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

No other cleaning product lifts off burned-on grease and scorchy stains faster. And only Brillo contains special soap with Jeweler's Polish . . . to bring back like-new shine at the same time! Results are guaranteed. You get a new utensil free if Brillo fails to clean! Nothing cleans and shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads.

Brillo Soap Pads (red box) . . . soap-filled metal fiber pads
Brillo Cleanser (green box) . . . pads plus cake of soap

Note to husbands

Brillo does your clean-up jobs faster!

EXTRA VALUE! EXTRA PADS!
Only BRILLO gives you Jeweler's Polish and extra pads in every box Big 5, 12 & 20 pad boxes Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

Refreshment Time!

New ideas from Betty Crocker

"Desserts—for 'C'mon over for dessert' time. Snacks—for neighborly TV watching. That little 'something extra' to share at coffee time. Our Betty Crocker Cake Mixes were born to make refreshments easy, to make entertaining something you'll want to do often. Bake one up, why don't you, for refreshments . . . and the family . . . today!

"I guarantee a perfect* cake—homemade-perfect— cake . . . after cake . . . after cake"!

Betty Crocker General Mills

Second breakfast—Hot Buttered Cake! Use 1 extra egg yolk in Betty Crocker Honey Spice Cake Mix batter. Bake in two 8½x4½x2¾" loaf pans 35 to 45 min. at 350°. Serve hot with butter and jelly. Mmm!

Afternoon coffee break—Upside-Downies! Follow cupcake directions on Yellow Cake Mix pkg. Place ½ tsp. butter, 1 tsp. brown sugar (packed), and 1 peach half in each of 14 custard cups before adding batter.

Teatime treat—Loaf Cake Sandwiches! Use Betty Crocker Marble Cake. Bake batter in two 8½x4½x2¾" loaf pans 35 to 45 min. at 350°. Put slices together with Betty Crocker Chocolate Fudge Frosting Mix. Cut in party shapes.

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

WHERE CHILDREN FIND UNDERSTANDING

. . . Utah Child Guidance Clinic

JOHN REES

When you're only eight, it's important to have an understanding adult to talk to. Dr. Marlow R. Harston, of the Utah County Child Guidance Clinic, shown posing with his son Myles, fills that need for many youngsters.

Help for the Teacher

By MARGARET HICKEY

Behind newspaper headlines of violence and brutality often is a story of failure to treat emotional problems early in childhood. Every teacher knows that a child in emotional difficulty cannot learn well or develop a healthy personality. Teachers' estimates of the number of children with emotional problems range from 5 to 15 per cent of the total class. The question "How can I help this child?" often goes unanswered because there is no one to advise and guide the teacher.

In Utah County, Utah, where everyone pitched in to establish a child-guidance clinic, teachers frequently sit down with the clinic staff to study a child's particular problems. There are only about 760 such clinics in the country—not nearly enough for all children who need this service—and only about 2300 school psychologists. However, many other communities also are working to develop sound mental-health programs.

In Iowa, with its large rural population, schools needing consultation can call upon one of three regional public-school psychologists employed by the Department of Public Instruction. A number of local school systems—sometimes working jointly—have, with financial aid from the state, hired their own psychologists to give counseling to children who need it. Many systems also employ supervisors of special education, experienced in finding and helping children with problems.

In Mississippi, traveling mental-health clinics are reaching many children, especially in rural areas. Once, sometimes twice, a month the county health department invites youngsters recommended by their teachers to be interviewed by the traveling clinic team. Afterward, the team confers with the teacher, suggests ways to work with the child.

Schools in 149 Massachusetts cities and towns may call upon area mental-health centers for consultation about pupils' problems, and parents may request diagnostic and treatment services whenever they are needed. There are now thirteen of these centers, developed by the Department of Mental Health in partnership with local groups.

In New York City, schools have suffered a series of tragic incidents, but are constantly pushing mental-health programs. At eight elementary schools, most of them located in racially mixed, low-income neighborhoods, teachers may send disturbed children to a therapeutic play group held in the school building. These weekly one-hour sessions have helped many to the extent that their behavior changed noticeably for the better in their regular classes and at home. A number of boards of education now are beginning to experiment with special classes for children with emotional problems. Among those that have already reported a degree of success are Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Montgomery County, Maryland; Clark County, Nevada. END

The boy who waited outside the principal's office kicked impatiently at the corner of the rug. Freddy, no higher than your elbow, was dressed neatly for an eight-year-old—trim haircut, creased brown trousers, polished oxfords—but his record at elementary school in Provo, Utah, showed that he had a temper tantrum almost every day, bullied other children, and there was no one he could call a friend.

On the other side of the door his teacher, her eyes smarting with tears, was saying to the principal, "I simply can't take any more. You don't know that child!"

The principal answered quietly and thoughtfully, "Indeed I do know the boy. At recess today he gave me a good swift kick in the shin."

The principal then hit upon what he must do. Summoning Freddy's mother, whom we shall call Mrs. Wells, that very afternoon, he told her that Freddy needed help immediately—and that Freddy was a lucky boy because help was available at a clinic right in Utah County.

"Child Guidance Clinic?" Mrs. Wells echoed. "Of course I've heard of it. Why, I even contributed to the fund drive last fall." She was a slender, attractive woman whose face showed concern for her son. Then she paused uncertainly. "But I never thought of it in connection with my own family. I've always insisted that Freddy be at the top of the class. Isn't the clinic for children who are . . . well, a bit crazy?"

"No, that's not the word," the principal corrected her. "I like to think of it as a place where children who don't get along well with other children, or with their parents or teachers, or even with themselves, can be helped."

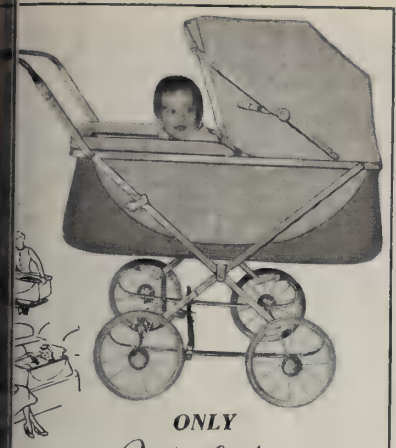
The tenseness in Mrs. Wells' face eased. "How soon can I get an appointment?" she asked.

Before January, 1955, when the clinic opened, Freddy's future might have been no brighter than that of the little ten-year-old boy packed off to the state mental hospital—which has no facilities for children—simply because there was no other place that could treat him. The only child-guidance clinic in Utah at that time was in Salt Lake City, 45 miles away, and it already had far more patients than it could handle—from eleven Western states.

But just by coming to the clinic and talking about herself and her family, Mrs. Wells soon began to learn how she herself was responsible for Freddy's problems and how she could help resolve them. "My husband and I loved Freddy very much, but we made him feel unsure of our love because we expected too much of him," Mrs. Wells came to understand with the help of Dr. Marlow R. Harston, the clinic director. "There was always hanging over Freddy the threat that we wouldn't love him any more if he didn't measure up—so he let go his frightened, angry feelings at school. But luckily we discovered this in time. Now that we can accept him as an 'average' boy, he no longer acts as though he hates the world, and has more young friends than ever before in his life."

The Utah County Child Guidance Clinic is a comfortable place to be—from the moment a child and his parent step into the cozily furnished reception room and are greeted by smiling Mrs. Shanna Reece, the receptionist and secretary. Mrs. Reece was one of the many mother volunteers in Utah County who worked with the Welfare Department, Juvenile Court and public schools to bring this psychiatric service to Utah County. On an average day she may make an appointment for a little girl long neglected and finally abandoned by her parents. The welfare worker, now responsible for her care, has brought her to the clinic to find out something about her I.Q., her personality and her emotional stability—all of which will help decide what kind of foster home she will best fit into. Or there may be a little boy who thinks he must act like a girl in order to please his mother who had so much wanted a daughter. And there is frequently a child who, like Freddy, "acts out" his feelings about his parents against teachers and other children.

Until the clinic opened, a question frequently asked in Utah County schools was, "What do you do about these disturbed children who need help so badly?" One teacher at Joaquin School insisted on a rocking chair in her classroom to be used for cuddling and soothing troubled children. Today there is more effective treatment. Schoolteachers frequently are invited to sit in on conferences with Doctor



CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

so good in glass

. . . because soft drinks just naturally taste "extra special" when you enjoy them in clean, sparkling bottles. Because pure glass can't take away any of the original refreshing flavor. That's why all your favorite soft drinks come in shining glass bottles.

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVE., NEW YORK

ONLY

Welsh

MAKES THE WORLD FAMOUS

"Boodle-Buggy"

CARRIAGE! BASSINET! TRAVEL BED!

IN 1958 FASHION FABRICS IN LOVELY PASTELS, PLAIDS AND DARK TONES

At Leading Stores

LSH CO., ST. LOUIS 4, MO.

w To Hold

FALSE TEETH

More Firmly in Place

your false teeth annoy and embarrass lipping, dropping or wobbling when you laugh or talk? Just sprinkle a little TEETH on your plates. This alkaline (non- powder holds false teeth more firmly more comfortably. No gummy, gooey, taste or feeling. Does not sour. Checks e odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH y, at drug counters everywhere.

OLD AT PAINT, HARDWARE, EPARTMENT AND DIME STORES

Callouses

ain, Burning, Tenderness at Ball of Foot?

Dr Scholl's BALL-O-FOOT Cushion

astest Relief Ever Discovered!

You Actually Walk On Cushions

Stops High Heel Soreness at Ball of Foot almost like magic!

u never tried anything so wonderful. The hion—not you—absorbs the shock of each o. Made of soft, flesh color Latex Foam. ops over toe—NO adhesive. Washable. rn invisibly. Beautifully tailored—yet cost y $1.00 pair. At Drug, Shoe, Dept., 5-10¢ res and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. Dr. Scholl's BALL-O-FOOT Cushion. If obtainable locally, send price and state if woman or man. Satisfaction guaranteed.

SCHOLL'S, Dept. 78B, Chicago 10, Illinois

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 27

Harston and Miss Bonnie Wilson and Wayne DuBois, the clinic's two psychiatric social workers, so that they can better understand a child's problem and help whenever they can in the classroom. Often there's lack of love and attention in the home of a youngster who comes to the clinic. If the teacher knows about it, the staff feels, she can create little experiences in school to make the child feel important. One teacher reported that little Winthrop has been standing up straighter and even taking pride in doing homework since she asked him to take care of the classroom parakeet. Or if the child is too strictly disciplined at home, the teacher can give him more "free rein" than she might otherwise. "I still get angry at Billy," one teacher says of a boisterous little boy, "but I understand now what makes him angry and can control my feelings better." The clinic always backs up the teacher in matters of discipline. Set limits, the staff urges, since many children have none at home. If a youngster finds he suffers consequences for his actions, it's likely he will start to conform.

The idea for such a clinic in Utah County began to take shape one evening in 1952 when a group of Provo High School students met with adult community leaders to plan a recreation program for teen-agers. The committee of twenty had practically decided on an after-school canteen when someone casually remarked that the same young people seemed to come to all the dances—that there were many "on the fringes" who never seemed to take part in any school activities. Why was that, and how could they be included too?

"In my counseling," Mrs. Stella Oaks, guidance director for Provo schools, said, "I've always met children who don't mix well with the crowd. Sometimes they 'act up' to get attention; sometimes they just withdraw into themselves. I wish we could do something for them."

"What we really need more than a canteen in this town," Mrs. Elsa Harris, child-welfare worker, spoke up, "is a professional guidance center to help these youngsters. In the whole county there's not a single private social agency, such as Family Service or Children's Aid Society, for people with problems."

Within the next few weeks batches of letters went into the mails under the signature of a newly created board of directors (among them Judge Monroe J. Paxman, of Juvenile Court, eager to save youngsters from the state industrial school; Mrs. Oaks, Mrs. Harris, representatives from the county medical association, civic clubs and P.T.A.) for a proposed clinic. Some went to national agencies, some to state officials, others to directors of foundations—all asking, "Can we get any financial help?"

The advice of Dr. C. Hardin Branch, head of the department of psychiatry at the University of Utah School of Medicine (when asked if his staff could help out part-time), was: raise the money and get your own clinic. As prospective director he suggested Dr. Marlow R. Harston, of Warmsprings, Montana, who wanted to bring his family of six children (including a thirteen-year-old Navaho

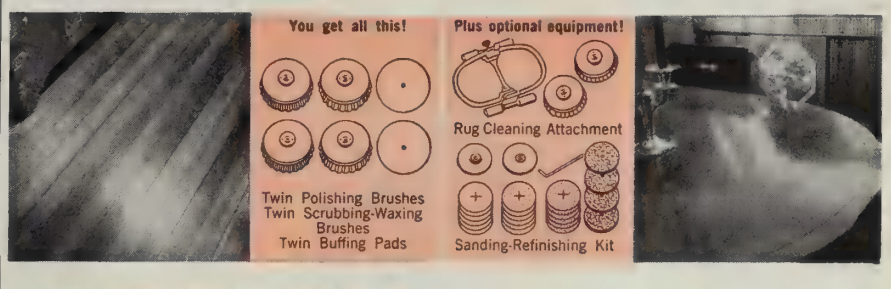
"You have a pound, I have a pound," said one man to another. "We swap. You have my pound and I have yours. We are not better off. But suppose you have an idea and I have an idea. We swap. Now you have two ideas and I have two ideas."

One of the best ways to keep your faith is to give it away. One of the quickest ways to lose it is to keep it to yourself.

If you try to share with others the best that is in you, you strengthen yourself. The more a tree branches out, the deeper the roots sink.

ST. THÉRÈSE DE L'ENFANT JÉSUS
Just for Today
Published by
Burns, Oates & Washbourne, Ltd., London

ONE WONDERFUL REGINA makes all your floors always beautiful and it's so easy for you!



does it all and does it right with the right brushes, right speed and weight for professional results

Scrubs, waxes, polishes, buffs! And it's a snap for you! Just glide Regina and all hard floors sparkle like jewels.

Works wonders! quick and easy! Lightest possible weight to do an expert job. Just-right twin brushes scrub and wax double-fast. Just-right twin brushes polish professionally at ■ just-right 600 rpm.

What a difference! Only Regina builds professional results into a home polisher. One polishing lasts so long, you rarely wax. And weekly buffing will keep your floors shining every day.

Does more than the floor! Buffs table, counter tops mirror-bright. Cleans rugs, sands, refinishes with optional extras. New '58 model is even better than ever. Priced for modest budgets!

NEW '58 REGINA TWIN-BRUSH POLISHER and SCRUBBER

America's No. 1 Polisher! Many giving trouble-free service after 25 years. Made by the world's largest manufacturers of twin-brush polishers and scrubbers . . . makers of the famous Regina Electrikbroom.

FREE! Send today for informative booklet!

The Regina Corporation, 35 Regina Ave., Rahway, N. J.
Please send free "Bulletin 44 — Care of Floors," and name of nearest dealer.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

*City*_____ *Zone*_____ *State*_____

IN CANADA: Send coupon to Switson Industries Ltd., Welland, Ont.

SPORTS ENSEMBLE BY GRETA PLATTRY

foster daughter) to the beautiful Wasatch Mountain valley, with its rich farmlands, plenty of living space and Mormon tradition, to make their home. That was in June, 1953. Mrs. Harris wrote Dr. Harston right away: "We don't have any money to offer you at this time—all we have is an idea, but you'll hear from us."

He did—a year and a half later. Since no offers of financial support came from outside Utah County, board members and interested parent volunteers took Dr. Branch's advice and appealed to local school boards, mayors of local towns, county commissioners, welfare officials, businessmen and civic leaders. Their efforts brought pledges of $17,000—enough to carry the clinic through a full year—plus twelve months' free rent in five-room quarters on the second floor of a business building in Springville. On January 1, 1955, the Harstons, bundled into two automobiles and towing two small trailers, headed over icy roads and through blizzards toward Utah County.

Within a month after it opened, the clinic had a waiting list nine months long. And the demand for clinic services continued to grow so that despite the steady income from fees (paid by patients themselves or by Juvenile Court or the Welfare Department for their clients) the total amount wasn't enough to cover expenses for the next year. Since there was no United Fund in the county to help the struggling clinic, the only answer seemed to be a public subscription of $9000.

In August, board members began telephoning civic leaders in each of the county's towns. They in turn mobilized 1500 house-to-house canvassers.

In Provo, Mrs. Carlyle Lambert, president of Wasatch P.T.A., made her kitchen tele-

Never tell evil of a man, if you do not know it for a certainty, and if you do know it for a certainty, then ask yourself, "Why should I tell it?" LAVATER phone headquarters for workers in her neighborhood. Committee members took turns rocking her new baby while she assigned blocks for canvassing. Among the doorbell ringers was Steven Allen, a round-faced fourteen-year-old, whose mother considered him too young to go to school dances, but who lined up $8.23 from his friends. Other donations came from Central Junior High School, which sold $88 worth of cookies and cakes they made themselves. The Cadmus Women's Club in Pleasant Grove gave $25 from its welfare fund. In Orem, a housewife who had a hard time getting prospective workers hopped on her bicycle and made the rounds of the neighborhood herself.

Keeping tabs on each town's campaign leaders and handling publicity took every spare minute of Lawyer Ted Bullock's time as chairman. Mr. Bullock also happened to be running for district attorney. It was late at night on October 25 when all the tallies were in and Mr. Bullock announced the total to his workers: $11,098.39. His smile was jubilant even after the November election returns came in. "Well, I lost the election, but won the fund campaign," he grinned.

The struggling clinic is continuing to rely on the community's annual contributions to help all the children who need psychiatric counseling—more than 200 of them every year. There is one campaign contribution, however, which will never be spent. It came from a tousle-haired boy of six who knocked at the door of Mrs. Jerry Hill, a member of the clinic board of directors, in Pleasant Grove. Mrs. Hill recognized him as a little neighborhood mischief-maker who had been going to the clinic for some time. He stretched out a fist to her, opened it and showed her seven pennies.

"I want you to give this to the 'guided' place," he said. "I got guided and I want to help another kid."

These seven pennies are now enshrined on a velvet plaque—a symbol of what the clinic did and can do for a youngster. END just a moment for a miracle!

SPOTSTIK

It's medically recommended. There is no substitute!

Beautifully covers all skin spots. Waterproof, sunproof. Safe on the most delicate skin. Carry it with you! It's a handy weapon! Department and drug stores. Six shades. Only $1.50.

Lydia O'Leary

Creator of famous COVERMARK; L.O.L., the wonder lotion ☺; COLORLES Finishing Powder keeps all foundations from changing color.

Write Department J, LYDIA O'LEARY, INC. 41 East 57th Street, New York 22, N. Y

Libby's is Twice-Rich: rich in flavor, rich in vitamins (including vitamin C!)

WHAT SIZE SWIM SUIT THIS YEAR?

Non-fattening Libby's ...3 times a day... helps you stay with your slimming program!

Going to be a slender mermaid this summer? Let Libby's Tomato Juice help. Never thin and watery, Libby's is satisfying—quenches between-meal hunger. Gives you a healthy bonus of vitamins and minerals, too. And speaking of slim figures, how's this: 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass. Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago 9, Ill.

See Libby's Tomato Juice label for special offer on Slimdown Cocktail Glasses

Parents may know what they're talking about

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

WHY MARRY IN A HURRY?

"I was sick and tired of being treated like a child by my parents. I fell in love with Bill on our second date, and we ran off and got married six weeks later. I was only seventeen. I don't know why I thought I loved him, but I knew I didn't before our honeymoon was over."

"After Henry got his draft notice, we decided to get married. We had been dating only three months, but I was so infatuated I thought I was in love. Then he was sent overseas, leaving me pregnant and trapped into living with his parents, whom I had never met. We don't get along at all, and I'm miserable, but there's no way out."

"My parents begged me not to marry John, but I wouldn't listen. In the six months we've been married, he's been fired from three different jobs. He isn't working now, and he's heavily in debt because he spends all the money he can get his hands on drinking and gambling. Although I'm pregnant, I have to agree with my parents that divorce is the only way out."

These letters are fairly typical of many that come to me, telling of disappointment and disillusion following a hasty, impulsive marriage. Though details vary widely, they are alike in revealing the immaturity of the couple, their unwillingness to seek or heed the advice of older, wiser heads, their disregard of unfavorable circumstances that warn of probable future trouble.

Though happiness in marriage is always a matter of the personal adjustment of the individual husband and wife, it is also true that certain factors always create a handicap. They should be recognized as genuine hazards, and the marriage should be postponed until they can be eliminated or minimized, or, at the very least, realistically faced. What are some of these hazards?

Inadequate acquaintance and association. Obviously a man and woman (or boy and girl) need ample opportunity to get to know each other before committing themselves to a lifetime together. A "whirlwind courtship" seldom provides this opportunity, especially at age seventeen.

Each should know the main facts of the other's previous life, background and present situation. They need to explore the differences and similarities in their hopes, ideals and goals for the future. They need to test their capacity for companionship in a variety of situations and under different circumstances. The couple whose time together has been mostly spent in going dancing, to parties or the theater, may find after marriage that they share few other tastes and interests.

Above all, they need time to test the depth of their love. A relationship that cannot stand the test of time before marriage is unlikely to endure afterward.

Defects of character. Every wife discovers and tolerates minor weaknesses in her husband which weren't apparent before marriage—as he does in her. But such flaws as excessive drinking, habitual gambling, violent temper, promiscuity, dishonesty are not minor. Any one of them is a serious threat to happiness in marriage. They can be concealed or suppressed temporarily, but are likely to be discovered over a period of time, if not by the girl, then by her parents. If he can't control his weakness before marriage, let her not delude herself that she can reform him afterward.

Inappropriate motives. The trustworthy motives for marrying are the love of two people for each other, their wish to establish a home, the desire to live and work together toward common goals for the rest of their lives. But a marriage primarily prompted by extraneous considerations—the desire to escape from parents' domination, to quit work, to keep up with the other girls—rests on a flimsy foundation.

Parental disapproval, though not always conclusive, should always be seriously considered, and regarded as a hazard. Strong parental opposition is usually based on one or more factors which research shows to be commonly associated with divorce. Parents' judgment is worth heeding, for it is based on wider experience and observation than the young couple have yet accumulated. In any event, their opposition will be a serious hindrance, since it will deprive the couple of the co-operation, counsel and perhaps material help that would get the marriage off to a good start.

Lack of resources or readiness. If the man has not completed his education, he should make definite and dependable arrangements to do so (perhaps with the girl's help) before undertaking marriage. Otherwise he may be forced to abandon his chosen field, with resulting resentment and frustration. There should be evidence (his job record) or sound reason to believe that he will be able to earn a living. A girl should have, or be willing to acquire, at least rudimentary housekeeping skills. Deficiencies in these respects create practical problems that even love may not surmount.

Profound differences in background, education, religion. Though none of these presents an insurmountable obstacle to married happiness, each is a handicap which should be faced and evaluated before marriage. It should be noted that these differences, along with extreme youth, are among the commonest grounds for parental opposition.

Unfavorable circumstances. Marriage gets off to a poor start if the couple must live with in-laws or be separated by the husband's military service or job requirements. Why not wait until the situation can be corrected?

If you are considering marriage, ask yourself if any of these hazards confronts you. And remember, the younger you are, the greater the risk.

GROWN UP, BUT NOT ADULT

As we all know, the early years of adolescence are a period of dramatic growth and change, a time of storm and stress for parents as well as child. But by the sixteenth birthday, the worst may appear to be over.

The boy (or girl) has probably attained full growth, or nearly so; much of the time he looks and behaves like an adult. He has attained some adult privileges (such as the right to a driver's license in most states) and he feels that he is grown up. He is in fact approaching maturity, but he has not yet reached it.

The five-year span sixteen through twenty is in my opinion one of the two most crucial periods in life. In the first, the preschool years, a child's attitudes are formed. These will affect his personality and character through all the years ahead. During this period, his parents are by far the most important influence.

In the age span sixteen through twenty, the parents' influence will be comparatively less. The "pre-adult" will be eager to assert his independence of the family, and will at the same time be highly receptive to the opinions, standards and behavior of his friends, his school and the community in general.

Yet he is called upon to make crucial decisions which will affect his entire future. Shall he continue his education? Shall he take a job? What field will he enter, whether in training or as a worker? Shall he become engaged, married? And if so, is his choice of partner a suitable one? In these vital decisions, and in lesser ones (going steady, dating hours, use of spending money, manners and deportment), his parents wish to share. But they cannot do so with the absolute authority of earlier years. If their opinions and standards are to be heeded, they in turn must respect the beliefs of their child and his society.

Much of the trouble between parents and their teenage children results from the failure of either or both to recognize and respect the rights of the other. The "pre-adult" has a right to a growing measure of independence; the parents have a right to demand in return a measure of responsibility, of observance of agreed standards of conduct.

No specific rules can be offered which will apply to every family. But if certain principles are observed, a relationship will develop in which the "pre-adult" can benefit from his parents' guidance, without being compelled either to bow to it, or rebel against it.

Define rights. For example, it is the right of the parent to determine the conditions under which the teen-ager may use the family car, but only after the teen-ager's wishes, needs and opinions have been thoroughly discussed. It is the teen-ager's right to expect his parents to feed, clothe and educate him, within the limits of the family budget, without taking the position that he is in their debt.

Define privileges. Latitude in hours, freedom in bringing friends home, amount of allowance and similar questions affecting the operation of the household are matters of mutual convenience as well as of manners or morals. If definite, though flexible, rules are adopted and observed, many conflicts will be eliminated before they arise.

Define obligations. Every privilege implies an obligation. If the teen-ager assumes the responsibility for tending the lawn in return for the use of the car, he should fulfill his promise or forfeit the use of the car. By the same token, the parents should live up to their obligation to let him use the car as specified.

Define standards of behavior. Conduct considered outrageous in one generation may be commonplace in the next. Through calm, thoughtful and frequent discussion, differences in point of view can be better understood, if not reconciled. And when understanding is reached, compromise becomes possible—on both sides.

Every human being must have a philosophy of life, a notion of how and why he wants to live, whether or not he can put it in words. Your teen-ager will develop his philosophy through the example you set and the guidance you offer (not the demands you make). If you can share decisions with him rather than decide for him, you can trust him to seek your goals. In fact, you can't afford to do otherwise.

DO YOU AGREE?

Can two people be in love without being companionable?

Yes; but married love rarely grows or endures unless companionship is present or can be developed.

ASK YOURSELF:

Are There Danger Signals Ahead?
Should We Wait to Make Sure?

If you are thinking of early marriage, or about to become engaged, this brief inventory may help you recognize some of the factors that will affect your happiness. Answer each question with an honest Yes or No.

Have You and He:

1. Gone steady for eighteen months or longer?
2. Completed your education?
3. Had a courtship free from serious conflicts?
4. Come from happily married homes?
5. The same standards, ideals and religious beliefs?
6. Won the approval of both sets of parents?

Is He:

7. As well educated as you are?
8. Regularly employed in work he likes?
9. Earning at least $250 a month?
10. Free from any serious defects or habits?

Are You:

11. At least eighteen (twenty if college girl)?
12. Willing to forgo a career if necessary?
13. A fairly competent cook and housekeeper?
14. Fond of his friends and relatives?

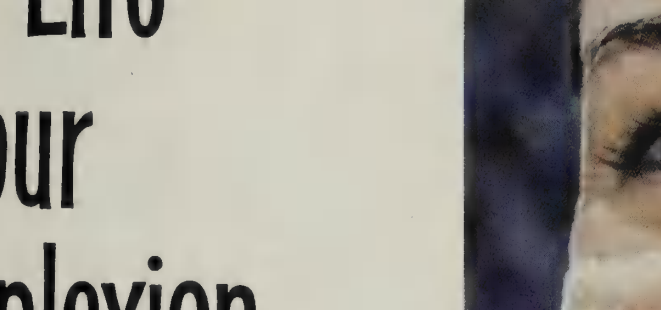
The average happily engaged couple answers "Yes" to 12 of these questions or, if in college, expects to earn the same score before setting the wedding date. Any "No" answer should be interpreted as a danger signal and should be sensibly handled before making a final commitment for either engagement or marriage. (Note: If you are unhappily married, the "No" answers that you would have given on your wedding day will probably explain why.)

New Palmolive gives



New Life to Your Complexion Safely... Gently!

Palmolive's Rich Lather Contains –

No drying detergents!

No harsh perfumes!

No irritating deodorants!

You can give your complexion new life—leave it softer, fresher—with New Palmolive care!

And you'll see results after just a few days—as New Palmolive care gently washes away dirt and make-up . . . cleanses so effectively it actually gives your complexion NEW LIFE!

New Palmolive's rich, mild lather lets you cleanse far more thoroughly than you'd dare to do with harsher soaps. Palmolive contains no drying detergents, no strong perfumes, no irritating deodorants—just the gentlest of natural cleansing ingredients. So get that "new life" look with gentle New Palmolive Soap!

All New! lather fragrance color wrapper

Are you paying for a second car without having one?

"Millions of families are spending enough on one big gas-guzzler to pay for two cars," says GEORGE ROMNEY
President, American Motors Corporation

THERE are 40,000,000 "no-car" wives in one-car families today, virtually prisoners in their homes because they do not have cars of their own. Many of these women genuinely need a second car. Yet, if asked, most of these "no-car" wives would say, "It's all our budget can stand to keep one car, much less a second one." In fact, a big car may cost nearly $1,500 a year to own and operate when all the expenses are added up.

Rambler can cut car costs in half

Nearly half a million American families have found the answer to high car costs in Rambler. Many started out by buying one Rambler and soon found they were saving so much money that they could afford to own two Ramblers for no more than it had formerly cost them to drive one oversized "gas hog."

Ideal family car

Rambler costs less to buy, costs less to run, and is tops in trade-in value. It has as much room inside as far larger, costlier cars, but it is the easiest of all American cars to drive—to steer, to park, to get in and out of your garage and driveway. It is the safest car at any price, with modern single unit construction that is twice as strong and far safer than ordinary cars.

Beautiful interiors

Women tell us the new Rambler interiors with their high fashion colors and fabrics are as beautiful as you will find in any car. They also like the many conveniences—Airliner Reclining Seats for napping children, pushbutton transmission, pushbutton windows, power steering, power brakes and many other features.

If car expense is taking too much of your budget, why not see Rambler?

George Romney

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Offhand, I'd say it's a money tree."

A better way to make a man diet: Arrange a bathroom with a big mirror so he can see himself naked in his tub or shower bath. His reactions change rapidly from sheer disbelief to grim resolve.

Three of us ordered three different omelets at brunch: Spanish, herb and Denver. Picture our confusion when all three reached our table exactly alike: each with a little ham and onion.

"I pass for a highbrow," confides Peter Comfort, trying to catch that mole with a lethal three-pronged contraption, "yet I have a tricky time remembering which is the old gent in Hamlet—Polonius or Laertes."

You can now buy for $10 an airplane insurance policy that'll pay your heirs $125,000 if anything unpleasant happens to you flying around the world. The premium has gone down since I paid $40 for $125,000 when I flew to Russia two years ago.

Proudest mother in our town: one whose son (a biggie in the big city) arranged to have a bunch of violets delivered to her each week. Unless other sons top this, other mothers may feel envy pangs.

Ha, a valuable truth: Before you go on a trip people listen tolerantly to talk about your trip, even urge and question you. But when you return they won't hear a word of it.

I'm waiting for the new U.S. Dept. of Welfare to tackle the marriage snarl. Only two thirds of the people ever get married! What's better for the republic's welfare than 1,000,000 extra marriages sparked by those blessed doting bureaucrats?

My dad was stunned when his father died. After a time he invented a bitter little joke to cover the pain. "You children can't do this to me!" he would say. "I'm an orphan, I haven't any father or mother." (Eventually, aren't we all?)

When my daughter-in-law in Japan bought a can opener at Yakota, she bulletined a coincidence: The frugal hardware merchant had wrapped her purchase in this page from an old Ladies' Home Journal.

When I bought a girl a malted milk as a boy, I never ordered the same flavor she did. Otherwise I'd get the thin dregs from her chocolate shaker. If I ordered vanilla I'd get a shaker of my own, thick.

At our luncheon table downtown somebody said a smart young fella has started trip insurance for automobiles, like airplane-trip insurance.

"He'll lose his shirt," says our moderator, spooning ice cream with his pecan pie.

Our new bathroom (the ex-pantry) has eleven strangely assorted tiles imbedded in its walls—from Amalfi, from Helsinki, from Lima, from the Taj Mahal. (Best of all I like one of three fish kilned by my red-haired daughter.)

Recently I happened to overhear Harry Truman call his wife, Bess, "the madame." I've tried it on my Dream Girl and she says, "Better wait till you are an ex-President."

When we took off on our trip around the world our youngest said earnestly, "Dad, when you get to India will you do something for me?"

"Certainly, son," I said. "What?"

"Please touch an untouchable."

Late bulletins signify that Harlan III can now walk, at the age of eleven months, heavily across an ordinary room, shaky, determined and proud. (This we must travel halfway around the world to see.)

At the bridge table I learn another grievance that makes a wife indignant: a husband's refusal to praise a dress which she herself suspects is a mistake. (Petty of him.)

All the way around the world you encounter young sons and daughters of your home-town friends involved in farflung American activities. As an airline pilot put it, "You can baby-sit your way around the world."

I suspect this new hi-fi passion for serious music among our young is linked to this era's uncertainties. They like to climb a remote peak away from the quibbles.

We enjoyed a laugh when the plumber finished our new bathroom in triumph with the hot water squirting out of the cold-water faucet. But I deduce it's standard practice, a holy tradition.

Whenever my family reads a short poem at the breakfast table three days in a row, I stand ready to take 'em out to dinner. They love to dine out, yet how often they forget!

My Dream Girl and I have agreed never again to be away from home in May, when the green shoots spear up through the sweet black earth. Then no place on earth is more fascinating than your own back yard.

You should see the remodeled Kappa Alpha Theta house in our town. Once an old mansion, it's now as modern as next year's sophomores, and no matter what the Kappas and Tri Delts say, I congratulate their architect.

An old collie in our neighborhood looks so wise and patient that the kids call him "The Thinker." Actually I'm not sure he's bright; he yearns to curl up under your wheels if you're going less than 25 m.p.h.

Since our neighbor the retired general showed us his new house, what we really want is a rheostat for every room, to brighten and dim the lights. But so far we can't find one that'll perform its marvels with anything over 60 watts.

Before we took off around the world my Princess of Sheer Delight insisted on a roast turkey over a weekend. "When I'm in India," she said, "I'd like to remember the American way of life."

Maybe you don't need to remodel, but it's a wonderful chance to get acquainted with the American workman. Carpenters, plumbers, painters, electricians and tilemen are a saltier lot than the white-collar worker. (One even gave us some elk meat.)

When the Russians reach the moon they might find it knee-deep in empty beer cans.

. . . When our youngest valiantly signs up for trigonometry just out of curiosity,

. . . Or our daughter telephones across the continent twice in a row, not collect,

. . . And Junior sends us by airmail an hour-by-hour schedule for our exploration of Japan,

. . . And my Lady Love turns out under pressure to be the equivalent of any $9000-a-year secretary,

Then I try to wipe that complacent smile off my face for fear they'll think I'm oversold on the joys of family life.

Art Linkletter and his daughters, Dawn and Sharon—three happy "Links" in a closely knit family of seven. "We even read one another's minds," said Dawn. "Dad guessed I was longing for my own sterling and we both fell for the same pattern. It's new 'Young Love' in Heirloom* Sterling—sheer inspiration in design. Then Sharon got so dreamy-eyed over my set of sterling, Dad gave her a place setting to start her own!"

Momentous father-daughter occasion—Mr. Linkletter takes Dawn and Sharon to a gala première. Momentous father-daughter gift—beautiful new "Young Love" in Heirloom Sterling

*Trademarks. ©1958, Oneida Ltd., Oneida, N.Y.

NEW! A BREATH-TAKING ORIGINAL IN SILVER DESIGN . . . Never, never until "Young Love," could you see so much new excitement in a silver pattern! The delicate flower stems are deeply engraved . . . the full-bloom roses richly sculptured. You've never seen a lovelier pattern—or such wonderful introductory prices! "Young Love" place settings: 6-piece, regularly $34.75 now $24.75—4-piece, regularly $24 now $17.50. Limited time only! And with Federal Tax included.

*Young Love in HEIRLOOM STERLING

CREATED IN THE DESIGN STUDIOS OF ONEIDA SILVERSMITHS

Your hair has hidden highlights only egg can reach

Sense something healthy happen as your fingertips feel this protein-fresh lather – that's the first luxury of egg.

Only SHAMPOO PLUS EGG can give lather like this – lather that rinses instantly, completely, leaves hair radiant.

Feel first day control – no more "fly-away" hair! A touch of egg restores natural oils other shampoos strip away.

Know an inner glow of beauty – a radiance less luxurious shampoos can't match! It takes the magic touch of egg.

Hidden highlights come to life—a thousand thousand natural highlights yours only with the protein-fresh lather of Helene Curtis SHAMPOO PLUS EGG.

OUR READERS WRITE US

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

to help me to have more tolerance, more humanness, and a real sense of humor. In the pages of this magazine are the very latest ideas for better living.

NAME WITHHELD

▶ We're curious. Has anyone read the Journal since 1883 or 1884? Will you write us? ED.

To Assure Pure Foods

Washington, D.C.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: The LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is to be congratulated for the February editorial which encourages readers to take an interest in the problem of adequate regulation of chemical additives to food. This editorial carries on the historic policy of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL in supporting pure food and drug laws and their enforcement. We are happy to know that this tradition is being maintained because in our increasingly complex society both consumers and honest business are protected by intelligent scrutiny of our food and drug supply.

Sincerely,

GEORGE P. LARRICK
Commissioner of Food and Drugs
Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

Lost Their Buttons?

Staten Island, New York

Sir: May a mere man have a word? Why do makers of imitation fur coats, and many cloth coats as well, insist on forcing "clutch" type models on the long-suffering public? Have these office strategists ever seen a woman struggle with packages, trying at the same time to keep a clutch coat closed? Is a coat for protection of its wearer or for the benefit of its seller only?

Sincerely,

KNUT HALLE, D.D.

Letter from Holland

Wassenaar, Netherlands

Dear Sirs: I wish to tell you how much I always have—and shall—enjoy your magazine. I almost read it from cover to cover.

In particular I like your special features and the pages on fashion and beauty. I learn a lot about it! My two children—aged six and three years, both girls—also enjoy many beautiful pictures about America. We've many happy hours together reading and reading about it all!

Happy readers.

We live very near the beach where this picture was taken. Yours sincerely,

LILIAN BOOT

Prayer as a Guided Missile

Tampa, Florida

Dear Editors: Lately a guided-missile project was built in Florida. I was helping my daughter with geography, and as we studied a world map I thought: Prayer as a guided missile. Here was the answer to the aching need to do something about that uneasiness that comes with frenzied world-wide war preparedness.

I have always found strength in having Biblical verses and brief prayers over my kitchen sink. Now there is also a small world map, and as I do the dishes or prepare meals, I pray—sending guided missiles of prayer to all corners of the world: Africa, Russia, Israel, China.

This, I am sure, is creative prayer—and as such can build peace faster than any master plan of military experts. It takes no time from daily duties. You need not kneel, pause, or even seem to be praying. As the Stoic, Epictetus, said: "More often than you breathe, think of God." That is prayer.

This project needs a million volunteers. Will you join? Sincerely,

RUTH HAYWARD

Not a Racial Religion

Buffalo, New York

Dear Editors: So, the Moslems "reject Judaism as a racial religion"! (Dorothy Thompson, December JOURNAL.) Maybe they do, but no American magazine should print such a statement without refuting it as patent untruth.

As an "Aryan" convert to Judaism I must take strong exception to the statement and feel peculiarly qualified to witness against it. Though I was born of a German family of loosely Protestant affiliation (thus neither racially nor ethnically Semitic or Jewish), I became a Jew a few years ago in a ceremony which involved declaring myself willing to enter into "the Covenant of Israel" and to fulfill all the commandments incumbent upon a "daughter of the Covenant." I have been a full-fledged Jew ever since, fully accepted as such in the Jewish community.

Then what can be the meaning of Judaism as a "racial religion"? Haven't you ever heard of the Negro Jewish Community in Harlem?—of the Falasha Jews in Abyssinia?—or seen pictures of people walking down the street in modern Tel Aviv, Israel—verily a United Nations as far as races are concerned. And all of them Jews.

And it has always been so. Doesn't the Bible itself tell of Ruth, the Moabitess (of a completely different racial and ethnic stock), who became a Jew, and so great was her simple faith and loyalty that she was chosen to become the great-grandmother of King David, of whose lineage the future Messiah was to be born?

One argument that might be advanced is: Why don't the Jews have a missionary movement? Doesn't that look as though they wanted the truth only for themselves? Quite aside from the fact that both Christianity and Islam have been great world powers in recent history and have had the means to make forced converts, while Judaism was practiced by a small minority living in ghettos, barely tolerated by the powers that be—there is an inner reason why Judaism in the last 2000 years has not actively gone out to make converts. And that reason is that in order to fulfill its mission in history, to witness to the living God, the Jewish people must remain true to itself and to its sacred tradition. It dare not compromise in order to make it easier for converts to embrace it. But, it does not believe that being a Jew is a necessary condition for salvation. "All the righteous of the world have a special part in the world to come" the Talmud says. Judaism is the special vocation of the Jewish people and of those gentiles who feel called to it. But the Jewish God (the one God we Jews believe in and were the first to proclaim) is the God of all the world, the creator and redeemer of the whole universe and Father of all mankind.

Moslems, and Christians as well, may reject Judaism, but if they do, let there be a truer basis for their rejection than the fairy tale of a "racial religion."

ELSA DORAN

Diet for Happiness

Tokyo, Japan

Dear Editors: Sometimes I go on a "mental diet." The symptoms of overindulgence are self-pity and faultfinding with other people.

The diet begins by planning something nice for those I find fault with. Sometimes I take them something—a cake I baked, flowers from my garden—or I telephone or write a note with an offer to help them in some way.

By becoming interested in others there is no time for self-pity and very soon I return to normal!

With best wishes to you and the JOURNAL,

BEVERLY MUIR

Convenient Pure-Pak cartons help make life more fun!

Today's relaxed living owes a lot to easy upkeep, functional styling, new ideas. That's why today's families appreciate Pure-Pak's safe, easy-to-use, disposable container. No dribble, no drip. No bottle washing. Just pure, delicious milk from the world's most sanitary container—Pure-Pak! It's available everywhere.

Ask your milkman to deliver your milk in Pure-Pak.

Pure-Pak
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER

25 MILLION TIMES A DAY, SOMEONE BREAKS THE SEAL ON A FRESH PURE-PAK CARTON

Easy way to make a great new tossin' Dressing

Start with 1 cup of velvet texture Kraft Mayonnaise . . . blend in ½ cup of Kraft Italian Dressing

As soon as you see how quickly and smoothly Kraft Mayonnaise mixes with the tart Italian Dressing you'll realize that Kraft's has special blending qualities. In no time at all the mixture's completely blended. Smooth as velvet—never any curdling. No other mayonnaise mixes like velvet texture Kraft's. And its delightful flavor—delicate yet piquant—is extra special, too.

Add ¼ cup shredded Kraft Parmesan to the smooth, smooth mixture...there's your great new dressing!

It tastes just heavenly, thanks to Kraft's touch with seasonings. And it's gloriously smooth, because of the way Kraft Mayonnaise blends. Kraft's is true mayonnaise—made with lots of eggs and extra egg yolks, too—but it takes more than eggs to make mayonnaise mix like this. Only Kraft's blend of oils and special beating process can give such velvet texture.

Caesar Salad—presto! Mixed greens, garlic croutons and your new tossin' dressing.

No other Mayonnaise mixes like Velvet Texture Kraft's

JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN

EDITED BY: JEAN ANDERSON - ABBOT MILLS - EILEEN SHARPE - GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

WHAT WE DO
WHERE WE GO
WHOM WE MEET

Associate Editor Mary Lea Page with grandchildren Jamie and Winkie.

50 years ago in the Journal

In May, 1908, the Senate debated and rejected a resolution making Mother's Day an official holiday, to be observed by wearing white carnations. A subsidiary of U.S. Steel, the Henry Frick Company, ordered its employees not to use liquor on or off duty. Bessie McCoy, who married dashing correspondent Richard Harding Davis, was singing The Yama Yama Girl. Take Me Out to the Ball Game was a hit tune, and Trail of the Lonesome Pine was written.

In the May, 1908, JOURNAL the author of Six Weeks in Europe With One Suitcase adds: "For the steamer trip, take an extra canvas carryall with a steamer rug, ■ pillow, a worsted suit, a sweater, ■ warm waist of flannel, ■ pair of woolen tights, thick wool gloves and ■ hot-water bag."

"Is it customary at a church wedding for the bridegroom to kiss the bride?" a reader wants to know. "No," answers the Good Manners expert. "The custom has not been observed for many years. Modern brides are spared that ordeal."

"A brassière is an idea from Paris which combines the prettiness of a corset cover with the support of ■ corselet vest," writes the Fashion Editor. "For morning wear under a loose-fitting dress or for an invalid, the garment suggests real comfort."

"When meeting first at the breakfast table, should the parents or children say good morning?" asks Perplexed. Answer: "As ■ mark of respect, the children should say it first."

"When a Girl Travels Alone: If you get an upper berth, do not mind, as the air circulates more freely up there. But carry a scarf or thick veil to protect your head from drafts and your hair from cinders. Wear a black silk kimono, and in the morning the porter will help you down, holding the curtains to shield you."

"A good vegetable cook never needs ■ garbage bucket," believes Food Expert Mrs. Rorer, who calls cabbage "my best winter friend."

"In any park where babies are airing, two thirds of them will be seen sucking away on a 'pacifier,'" writes Doctor Coolidge, formerly of Babies Hospital. "Tonsillitis, diphtheria, tuberculosis and other diseases may be easily started this way."

After her daily bouts with publishers, agents and cartoonists in New York—a twelve-hour-a-day schedule including commuting from Paoli, Pennsylvania—Mary Lea (Biffie) Page remains so peppy she is the wonder of the Workshop. How, we asked her, do you maintain such high vitality? "It's how you relax," she said. "Come out to my house and I'll show you." We did—and there was Biffie in blue jeans. She pointed to her stone house. (Lesson 1) "My husband, Tim, and I selected every one of those stones individually—forty tons." (Lesson 2) "We cleared these thirty-five acres—it was a jungle." (Lesson 3) "We built this do-it-yourself log cabin—all you need is trees." (Lesson 4) "We planted five thousand tulip bulbs, the shrubbery and the grass."

On the warranted assumption that anyone on the* JOURNAL *staff is a success, we asked a half dozen their formula. Guess what Glenn White said—diligence, hard work, regular hours! Margaret Parton named curiosity, plus a continuing education. Jean Freeman recommended perseverance and "liking what you do." Laura Lou Brookman said it differently: "Do as little work as possible (if what you are doing is work, you're on the wrong track)." And Mary Bass, enigmatically: "To be a success with one's husband, family, or in any personal relationship, be absolutely uncritical at all times!" We like also to ponder the words of Herbert Bayard Swope: "I don't have a formula for success, but I know a sure formula for failure—try to please everybody."

Back to the house we came panting and collapsed in a chair. Biffie went off wagon-riding with her grandchildren, Winkie and Jamie. When we left she was doing a headstand for them (Lesson 5).

Letters editor JOYCE POSSON has a habit of drawing tiny faces on everything she writes, as: ☺ which means what that means, or this: ☹ which means what that obviously means. A typical Posson memo: "I ■■ so ☹ that I don't have anything 😳 for your column this month—my mind is a perfect ○."

BEATRICE GOULD has the ability to seem self-effacing while placing ■n unerring pencil ■n what's wrong with ■ writer's efforts. "Doesn't anything ever please her altogether?" one writer asked her husband. "Why, almost everything pleases her," BRUCE GOULD assured him. "That's why she has to be ■o careful."

While helping a friend clean out an attic, Elizabeth Goetsch, who helps plan our kitchens each month, found some old phonograph records and was told to help herself. She picked out several of Irving Berlin's early hits—"I Want to Go Back to Michigan," "My Bird of Paradise" and "When It's Night Time in Dixie Land"—and took them home to show her neighbor—Irving Berlin. "Belle Baker introduced 'Michigan' at the Palace," he told her. "'Dixie' was done for a play called 'Watch Your Step.' It was dropped from the play, though."

Picture a young Moslem mother, swathed in her sari, possibly veiled, so completely engrossed in ■ book she is oblivious of the clusters of children playing about her. What would you guess is the title of the book? William Spaulding, chairman of Franklin Publications, an organization that arranges for the translation and distribution of American books abroad, told Mary Bass it is probably BABY AND CHILD CARE, by Benjamin Spock. That title heads the list of popular books among Moslem women.

New appliance in the Workshop kitchen is a range with a song in its heart—or someplace. Put a roast in the oven; set the timer. When it's done, chimes sound, "Tenderly . . . tenderly . . ."

When associate editor Glenn White, with his wife and two young sons, set out on a 10,000-mile Volkswagen tour of Europe last year, Margaret Hickey gave him the names of a few people she knew in Paris, London, Rome and several other places. The Whites were thus assured of pleasant chats with people who knew these cities. But it didn't work out. "We tried it in Paris and London," Glenn reports, "and were treated so hospitably we were tempted to stay indefinitely. I thought it better not to phone any more of Margaret's friends." At a remote beach on the southern tip of Spain, below Malaga and not far from the Rock of Gibraltar, the travelers settled down for a few weeks in the sun. Trudging out of the Mediterranean Sea came a huge man with a red beard. Neptune, perhaps? No. It turned out to be an Australian journalist—and after asking Glenn what he did, his next question was: "Do you know Margaret Hickey?"

You'll soon be seeing Maria Schell in 2½-hour "Brothers Karamazov." It was only one of the movies she made last year, her first in America. For the others—Dostoevski's "White Nights" in Italy, de Maupassant's "Une Vie" in France—she dubbed in three extra languages, no chore because she speaks French, German, Italian and English fluently. "They say I do not dress well, out of my roles," said Maria, troubled by criticism. "That would be ■ fourth profession—I already have three professions: actress, wife, housewife; and I travel with only two suitcases." For an intense 56-day shooting on Karamazov, Maria learned ice skating, "and only three steps of dancing—so I will dance like a woman in love, not like ■ dancer." To critics who call her incandescent, Maria is grateful. "Acting is my work—I must do it well. Sometimes I care too much and make people angry. But I must try to portray what is genuine and lasting—woman, she is helpless, but she is hardy too."

MILLS

Actress Maria Schell—"incandescent" is the word for her.

The shooting had stopped. Now there was only the sound of the wind in the grass

Jonathan Found

By CECIL MAIDEN

They were talking in whispers again. Every now and then the two of them would pause to listen—with strange, afraid expressions on their faces. Jonathan did not know why they were whispering. Had they been talking in English, there might have been good reason for it, but both Sala and Mrs. Ho knew very well that he did not understand much Chinese, especially when it was spoken so quickly. Perhaps it had something to do with the strange remark his mother had made yesterday—that there were things happening in Taishun these days that a boy of seven could not know about.

The door to the kitchen was not quite closed, and it was on the living-room side of it that Jonathan was standing, still as the door itself, peering through the long, thin crack. He could see across the kitchen to the open door and past Mrs. Ho, to the yard beyond and the church schoolroom. For several days none of the mission children had come up the hill to school.

Sala was on her hands and knees, polishing the floor. Sala was old and yellow, and in her black cotton work trousers and the black jacket she seemed very thin these days. Now and then she would sit up and rest, and cough a little. It seemed hard for her to breathe sometimes, but she could still smile. She smiled, he thought, like a kindly and lovable dragon.

In one of her sitting-up moments, Sala turned her head and looked directly through the crack of the open door at him. For a moment she was startled, but as she recognized him a smile came to her face.

"Jonny!" she said. "Why you stand there like that? What you so quiet for?"

He opened the door and took a step into the kitchen. The room was bright and clean, and there was a wonderful salty-meat-and-pepper smell from the soup on the stove.

"When is mother coming back?" he asked. "And father? And Bozzy?"

The smile on Sala's face was suddenly different. "I wait for them, Jonny," said Sala. "Think they come back very soon now."

"Why did they take Bozzy, Sala? I heard Mr. Ho tell one of those men it wasn't safe for dogs to be in Taishun any more. He said they were shooting them. Father wouldn't let them shoot Bozzy, would he?"

"No. He watch over Bozzy, I think."

"But they went long ago this morning. They never even came back to eat."

On the ground out in the small yard, Jonathan suddenly saw Bozzy's empty food tin. It looked terribly by itself out there. He glanced away, turning his back also on Mrs. Ho. Mrs. Ho must think him very rude because of that. His mother had said last week, "You must remember Mrs. Ho is the gardener's wife, Jonny. You must be specially good to Mr. and Mrs. Ho. Between them they keep the mission looking beautiful—and that's about as important as father preaching on a Sunday!"

Sala said, "Come and help me polish the floor, Jonny."

Mrs. Ho picked up her broom and went off across the yard. She was like a brown old leaf, and though there was not any wind, it almost looked as if she were slowly blown into the schoolroom on the other side.

"Kneel on this," said Sala, and Jonathan knelt with his bare knees on the scratchy brown mat.

She gave him a rag that already had a big flat smudge of the goldeny-brown floor polish on it. He liked the way it slithered about on the linoleum. While Sala worked nearby with another polishing rag, he swirled his own rag round and round on the floor, and when he had polished a complete circle he leaned over and saw his own reflection.

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

Copyright 1957 by Cecil Maiden

JONATHAN FOUND
will soon be published in book form by Thomas Y. Crowell Co.

d the two of them breathing—but in Jonathan's ears the sound of the shooting went on . . .
and on . . .
and on . . .

"So you're home at last!"
she cried,
and held him very tightly.
Yet something inside Jonathan was still afraid.

His open-necked white shirt and his gray orts looked blurred, and so did his face.
morrow his reflection would be different, ause tomorrow would be Sunday, and would be wearing the new blue suit his ther had sent all the way to Shanghai for.
sat up and glowed inside about it.
"Did mother get one, too, Sala?" he ked.
"Get what, Jonny?"
"A new suit. From Shanghai. Like mine."
"New dress," said Sala. "Yes. I think w dress. Blue one. Very pretty."
"Will she play the piano in it, in church morrow?"
"If people come ——" Sala began, but e did not finish what she was going to say.
He looked down at the reflection in the or again, and began to think about to-orrow, and his mother's new dress, and nday dinner. And he thought about go-g out, after the mission people had gone me, through the gap in the fence with ozzy, looking for wild creatures. Only ozzy was a bulldog, and snuffled so loudly at everything always heard him coming,
d ran or flew away.
It was while Jonathan was wondering if ere might be any way of putting a silencer Bozzy, as father said there was on the r, that the noises began in the distance.
At first it sounded like firecrackers, and listened excitedly. But it was louder than ecrackers. Sala got quickly to her feet and me over and grabbed his hand.
Before she could say or do anything, Mrs.
o was there at the door again. Things ben to happen quickly. Still clutching his nd, Sala ran out into the hallway. There e opened a drawer and took out some ys. Back they went with the keys to Mrs.
o, and all of them ran across the yard the church room, and locked the or.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

ANYTHING YOU CAN CLIMB

What does a man do when he finds his wife has strength greater than his own?

By NATHANIEL BENCHLEY

The road from Interlaken to Grindelwald becomes narrower as it winds its way up through the pine forests, and the dark branches that close in above it give a feeling of oncoming night, even when the distant mountain peaks are sparkling in the sunlight. Rough wooden bridges cross and recross a tumbling glacial stream, and a blast of cold air makes a wintry wall that rises from the white water.

Norton Stanley gunned his Citroën roadster around a turn, thundered over a bridge, and swung up the road along the other side of the stream. Beside him, Elizabeth, his wife, closed her eyes and breathed deeply. "Just smell that!" she exclaimed. "It smells like everything cool and fresh in the world!"

"Uh-huh," said Stanley. He kept his eyes on the winding road, which disappeared into the darkness of the forest ahead.

"It's such a relief after the heat," Elizabeth said. "I thought I was going to die there, in Rome." Stanley said nothing, and she went on, "We've covered a great deal of territory in the last three weeks, do you realize that?"

"That's what we're here for," he replied.

"Yes, but I'd like to relax a little. I'd like to take a day off every now and then." She listened to the roaring of the stream, which filled the woods and seemed to come from all around them, and then she said, "You know what I'd like to do? I'd like to take tomorrow off, and just walk. There must be lots of trails around here where we could walk, and I think the exercise would do us both good. I know it would me."

"I get all the exercise I need behind this wheel," he replied. "I'll bet I've added two inches to my biceps in the last month."

"You don't get all the exercise you need," she said. "You don't ever get enough exercise."

"What do you mean? I get as much exercise as anybody else we know."

"Look at George Walters. He plays squash at least twice a week, he plays at least thirty-six holes of golf over the weekends, and he walks to the station every morning."

"All right, you look at George Walters. He is a head-crushing, card-carrying bore."

"At least he's healthy. He's hard and lean, and he does not, if you will pardon the expression, sag in certain places, the way you do."

"I do not sag. That is simply muscle that has gone a little soft, that's all." Stanley drew in his stomach, and sat straighter in the seat. "And furthermore, I'll bet that by the time I'm forty, I'll be in a great deal better shape than George Walters. If ever there was a man who is asking for a coronary, he is it."

"Anyone who keeps himself in shape has no need to fear a coronary," said Elizabeth.

"And furthermore, how do you know where George Walters sags?" Stanley asked. "How do you know he isn't corseted from here to there?"

"A girl can tell," Elizabeth said quietly. There was a long silence, and then she said, "Anyway, is it so terribly much to ask that we take a day off and just walk? Are we going to lose anything important by altering our schedule by one single day?"

Stanley took a deep breath. "No, I guess not," he said.

"I'm sure the man at the hotel will be able to tell us," she said. "There must be lots of wonderful trails all through here."

"All right," he said. "I'll ask about it."

It was late afternoon when they reached Grindelwald, a post-card-type Swiss town hemmed in by towering, snow-covered mountains. The sky was clear and blue-green, the afternoon sun splashed the mountaintops with orange, and everything else was in soft shadow. There was a pastel quality to the shadow, but the snow-covered crags blazed as though painted in oils. The air was thin and cool, and it smelled of pine needles and hay. Somewhere, on the other side of the town, a dog was barking.

"My, but this is beautiful," Elizabeth said softly. "This is where I could stay forever. Right here."

They found the hotel with no trouble. It had dark wooden beams and a peaked, overhanging roof, and it was the first big building they came to. Stanley had no sooner stopped the car than a boy darted out of the hotel and down the steps, opened the door for Elizabeth and then scrambled around among their bags, trying to pick them all up at once. Somehow he managed to get every loose piece of luggage, and he tottered back up the steps, grunting and giggling. Inside the hotel were the same heavy beams that decorated the exterior, and the desk was dark and massive. Heads and skulls of chamois, deer and steinbok peered down dimly from above.

As Stanley was registering, Elizabeth came up beside him and said, "Remember to ask him about walking."

"Oh, yes," he said. He turned to the clerk, a thin man with wispy, drooping mustaches. "Are there any trails around here where we can walk?" he asked.

The clerk stared at him, and his eyes clouded. "Trails?" he said.

"Yes," said Stanley. "You know"—he reached back CONTINUED ON PAGE 158

"Boy, this is the life," he said.
"This is the best idea you ever had."

ILLUSTRATED BY TOM LOVELL

JOURNAL MOTHERS REPORT ON

Cruelty in

Motherhood should be a happy and reassuring experience, yet it is questionable whether all modern hospitals make it so. Last November, the reader-mail column of the Journal contained a brief letter from a registered nurse asking for an investigation of "the tortures that go on in modern delivery rooms." Few full-length articles have elicited such a flood of letters from Journal readers. Many relate childbirth experiences which are so shocking that Journal editors feel, after consulting leading obstetricians, that national attention should be focused on such conditions wherever they exist in order that they may be ended—since the Journal does not question that the overwhelming majority of both obstetricians and maternity hospitals resent such practices as much as the victimized mothers.

"Recently I had the most delightful time giving birth to a son with the aid of natural childbirth. My husband was allowed to be with me during labor and was made to feel a part of the whole process."

R. N., URBANA, ILLINOIS

"So many women, especially first mothers, who are frightened to start out with, receive such brutal inconsiderate treatment that the whole thing is a horrible nightmare. They give you drugs, whether you want them or not, strap you down like an animal. Many times the doctor feels too much time is being taken up and he either forces the baby with forceps or slows things up. I know, because the former happened in my own case. Please, can't something be done?"

ELKHART, INDIANA

SHELLY GROSSMAN

"THE CRUELEST PART OF CHILDBIRTH IS BEING ALONE AMONG STRANGERS." BOZEMAN, MONTA

"Just let a few husbands into the delivery rooms and let them watch what goes on there. That's all it will take—they'll change it!"

FORMER TEACHER, DETROIT, MICHIGAN

HOW TO MAKE CHILDBIRTH A JOY

"My first two deliveries were pure torture; the third had unnecessary unpleasantness. But the fourth was all that the joyful ushering of a child into the world should be—a wonderful experience in every way. I had the best prenatal care and was treated like a human being—not a cog on an assembly line. During labor my husband was allowed to be with me constantly until the moment of delivery. A cheerful nurse came in often to check my progress. I had pain, but it was bearable in such sympathetic surroundings. The delivery went off smoothly. I had no anesthesia and needed none—I was given a rubber apparatus to hold in my hand and to take a whiff of when I was too uncomfortable. To my amazement I even carried on a conversation during the delivery and never lost control of myself. I felt my baby being born and then the world became radiant and I felt like singing! My baby was brought to me whenever he was hungry and we all got along fine. My stay in that hospital was like a lovely vacation. I even had meals served to me in front of the television in the lovely modern sitting room and also received visitors there as though I were a hostess in my own living room. The doctors and nurses there acted as though they actually liked babies!" JEFFERSONVILLE, N. Y.

"We do not believe that mothers should be strapped to the delivery table, except as is necessary to keep the patient from contaminating the sterile area. Further, we do not believe that the mother's legs should be strapped together to keep the baby from delivering, nor do we believe that general anesthesia should be used to prevent the patient from delivering. To my knowledge these practices do not occur in hospitals under the jurisdiction of the Chicago Board of Health. If they occur in any hospital anywhere, the patient should lodge a complaint with the head of her local Board of Health, or the hospital head or other responsible medical authority so that disciplinary action can be taken.

"According to the rules and regulations of the Chicago Board of Health all procedures in the delivery room shall be in accordance with generally accepted principles. We in Chicago interpret these to mean that medical care, personnel and facilities must be of the highest type, as well as that no mother shall be treated with brusqueness or indifference.

"You are to be commended for your desire to improve maternity care to patients throughout the country and have our best wishes for success in your endeavors."

DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN, PRESIDENT, BOARD OF HEALTH, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

"I've seen patients with no skin on their wrists from fighting the straps. As a nurse of thirty years' standing in both Canada and the U.S., I can surely testify to real cruelty in the delivery room."

ONTARIO, CANADA

Maternity Wards

By GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ

Few full-length articles have elicited such a flood of letters as this brief plea, published in the mail column of the JOURNAL in November, 1957.

Chicago, Illinois

Dear Editor: I feel compelled to write you this letter asking you to investigate the tortures that go on in modern delivery rooms.

When I first started in my profession, I thought it would be wonderful to help bring a new life into this world. I was and am still shocked at the manner in which a mother-to-be is rushed into the delivery room and strapped down with cuffs around her arms and legs and steel clamps over her shoulders and chest.

At one hospital I know of it is common practice to take the mother right into the delivery room as soon as she is "prepared." Often she is strapped in the lithotomy position, with knees pulled far apart, for as long as eight hours. On one occasion, an obstetrician informed the nurses on duty that he was going to a dinner and that they should slow up things. The young mother was taken into the delivery room and strapped down hand and foot with her legs tied together.

I have seen doctors who have charming examination-table manners show traces of sadism in the delivery room. One I know does cutting and suturing operations without anesthetic because he almost lost a patient from an overdose some years ago. He has nurses use a mask to stifle the patient's outcry.

Great strides have been made in maternal care, but some doctors still say, "Tie them down so they won't give us any trouble." I know that thousands of women are expertly and considerately treated during childbirth for every one that endures cruel treatment. But that one is too many. You of the JOURNAL have long been a champion of women's rights. I feel that an exposé of this type of medical practice would go a long way to aiding child-bearing women.

REGISTERED NURSE

▶ We occasionally hear of discourteous, inconsiderate or, as in this case, downright inhumane treatment of young mothers and others in hospitals. We hopefully assume it is extremely rare. Would other readers care to report? ED.

"Childbirth at best is not pleasant. But there is no reason to make it a hell on earth."

This statement from an Overland Park, Kansas, woman summarizes the feeling expressed to us by hundreds of Journal mothers. They wrote us—from east coast and west coast and all the states in between—commenting on the letter we printed from Registered Nurse.

A number of nurses and doctors deny indignantly that any tortures ever take place in modern delivery rooms, and attack Registered Nurse for having written to us. An equal number of nurses confirm that they do take place, and applaud us for bringing the facts to public attention.

A doctor's wife in San Marino, California, stands up for her husband and his colleagues: "I have broken many an engagement, kept many dinners warm, and cut vacations short because of my husband's concern for his patients. The first thing a doctor guest does when he enters our home is to go to the phone to 'see how everything is.'"

But a registered nurse in a Hudson River town tells us: "Because of what is politely termed 'medical ethics,' the truth of much bad practice is kept from the public. Personally I feel it is comparable to the 'ethics' which keeps criminals from telling on their accomplices. I know from personal experience that a great majority of doctors, nurses and hospital personnel are good and devoted people who are doing their best under difficult conditions. What makes me angry is that the incompetent and unscrupulous people get away with so much."

There were the same contrasts in the letters from mothers. A number spoke in glowing terms of the kindness and sympathy, the consideration for their comfort, that they had encountered in maternity wards.

A woman formerly from Chicago felt that Registered Nurse should have named the Chicago hospital where she had witnessed cruel treatment of mothers, in fairness to other hospitals in the city. "I have had four babies delivered at Presbyterian Hospital. I was treated like a queen, never shown any impatience. I had all births without anesthetic, watched the birth of my twins, and those residents really worked for me. I could never repay in money the courtesy and kindness extended in the delivery room. Dr. Bundesen is a great and good man and a fair man. He would rapidly change any wrong treatment of patients in a hospital if he were told about it." St. Luke's Hospital in Chicago was commended by another mother.

Women in several parts of the country came with militant loyalty to the defense of doctors, hospitals and all hospital practices because their own doctors had been men of high humanity and sensitive understanding.

"My doctor allowed my husband to stay in the delivery room, in violation of the hospital rules," wrote a woman from The Dalles, Oregon. "He had tears in his eyes when he told us that he feared our baby, as yet unborn, was dead. Because he thought enough of me as a patient to prepare me before the delivery of my stillborn baby, I was able to stay in the maternity ward, see the babies every day, and leave the hospital with plans to return as soon as possible for another baby."

However, the majority confirmed one or more of the charges, and added others. Of these mothers, a significant number had had several babies, in different hospitals and under the charge of different doctors. Many reported fine treatment on one or more occasions, as against coldness or actual brutality on others. These mothers were not complaining because it is the lot of womankind to endure pain in bringing forth a child. They asked only that the inescapable suffering should not be made worse.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 152

"My baby arrived after I had lain on the table in delivery position nearly four hours. When I asked why I couldn't be put into a bed the nurse told me to quit bothering her so much."

WEST COVINA, CALIFORNIA

"Medical students, interns and nurses should note especially that the morale of women in labor is sometimes shattered by careless remarks. Thus, comments outside the rooms of patients are often overheard to their discomposure. Laughter in the environs of the patient (about some entirely different matter) is inevitably interpreted by the patient in the light that it is she who is being laughed at. For some fifteen years the famous lines of Oliver Wendell Holmes have had a prominent place on the wall of the doctors' office on our delivery floor. Medical students and interns would do well to memorize these words and take them to heart:

"'The woman about to become a mother, or with her newborn infant upon her bosom, should be the object of trembling care and sympathy, wherever she bears her tender burden or stretches her aching limbs. God forbid that a member of the profession to which she trusts her life, doubly precious at that period, should hazard it negligently, unadvisedly or selfishly.'"

DR. NICHOLSON J. EASTMAN,
PROFESSOR OF OBSTETRICS, JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY, AND OBSTETRICIAN-IN-CHIEF TO THE JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

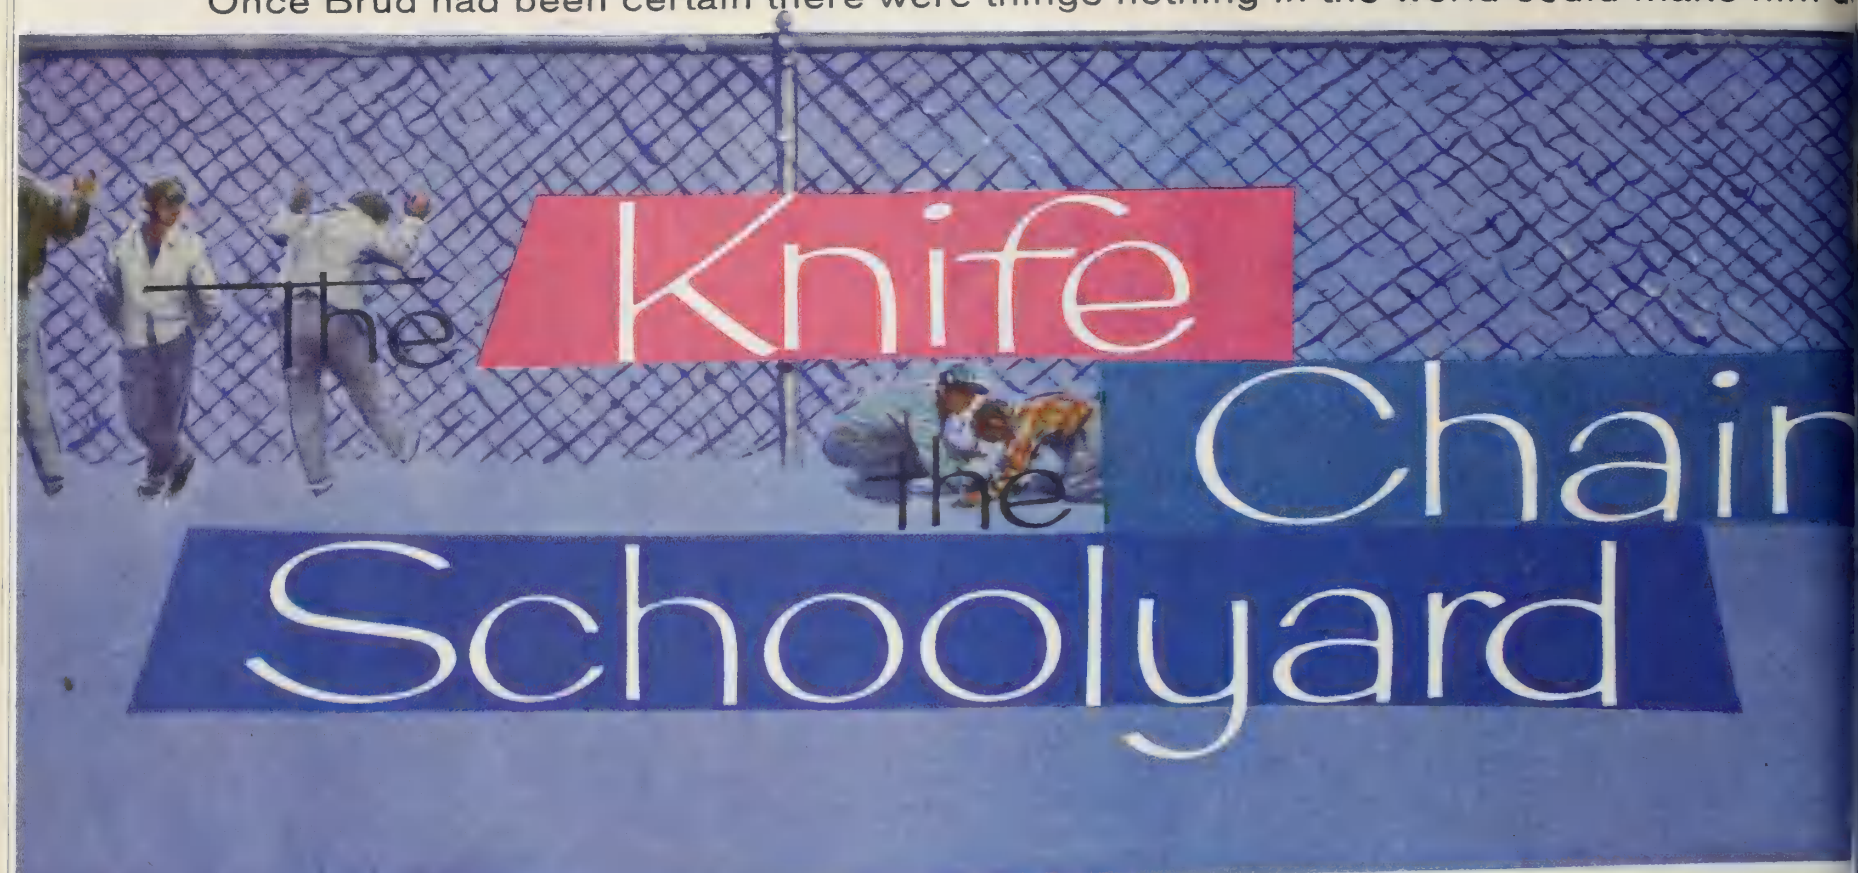
HOW TO MAKE CHILDBIRTH A NIGHTMARE

"I have had three children and three different doctors who delivered my children in three different hospitals.



"The practice of obstetrics is the most modern and medieval, the kindest to mothers and the cruelest. I know of many instances of cruelty, stupidity and harm done to mothers by obstetricians who are callous or completely indifferent to the welfare of their patients. Women are herded like sheep through an obstetrical assembly line, are drugged and strapped on tables while their babies are forceps-delivered. Obstetricians today are businessmen who run baby factories. Modern painkillers and methods are used for the convenience of the doctor, not to spare the mother. There is so much that can be done to make childbirth the easy natural thing it should be, but most of the time the mother is terrified, unhappy, and foiled in every attempt to follow her own wishes about having the baby or breast feeding (most hospitals consider this an unusual quirk on the part of the mother which should be squelched at once)."

COLUMBUS, OHIO

"If I have another baby, I would rather have my husband with me than any specialist. A loving husband's hand in yours is by far the best sedative in the world."

MARIETTA, GEORGIA

Once Brud had been certain there were things nothing in the world could make him d

The Knife the Chair the Schoolyard

By JOHN D. MacDONALD

It took a long time for dad to build that dam. All the time from when I was in the second grade until I was twelve years old and in the sixth grade. It was high there, and all mountains, with the air clear and fine in the morning when the big yellow bus would come and take me and Bingo miles away to the central school. Bingo is three years behind me. I can remember a little bit about the road job dad was super on before he got to build the dam.

During the last part of the sixth grade, when the dam was almost done, I would hear dad and mom talking about where we might go next. Dad knew what jobs the company was bidding on, and I could tell that he was most interested in how tough the job would be, while mom wondered about whether it would be a nice place to live.

Bingo was pretty stupid about it. He couldn't understand why we had to leave the mountains. He liked it there. We all did. But when the job is done you go to a new job and build something else. That's the way it is when you're a super.

Anyway, just before school was over, one of the company planes picked dad up and he was gone four days and when he came back he had a big roll of prints with him, and he would sit up late in the kitchen, drinking coffee and smoking his pipe and using his slide rule and making big long columns of figures. Mom acted kind of low about the whole thing. Dad showed me the job. It was a map of a big city named Athenia more than a thousand miles away.

"This is the new job, Brud." My right name is Lyle Baker, but it got to be Brud when Bingo first started to talk because he called me that, and I don't mind it. "These people got themselves all choked up with too many cars and too narrow streets. So I have to build them six miles of highway. It starts here and goes to here. Three miles of it will be up in the air, and then we bridge the railroad yards and the river and come out at a traffic interchange at this turnpike."

So we went to Athenia, and it was a kind of a funny lonesome summer. Mom found us a house on a narrow shady street not far from downtown. The house was old and, because of the trees and because the other houses were so close, it was always kind of gloomy in the house. And it had a stale smell that never went away. And it was an awful hot sticky summer. Dad would come home kind of cross, and mom looked wilted like.

Where we used to live Bingo had his crowd and I had mine, but we were back to playing together that summer in Athenia. There was a funny bunch of kids around that neighborhood. They went around in gangs dressed alike, and even the little bits of ones smoked. They had names, like the Sportsters—they were one of the clubs that used brass chains for belts on their blue jeans—and the Playboys with red baseball hats, and so on. They didn't have time for anybody. A few blocks away there were foreign kids and beyond them there were colored kids and they had their own gangs too. At night you could nearly always hear sirens.

Bingo likes to wander around by himself, but he gave that up the first week when he came back to the house so mad he couldn't talk, and so pale his freckles stood out. And all bloody. Somebody had chunked a rock at him and it took three stitches to close up his forehead and the scar is still there. He'd seen some kids down a street playing a game where they whanged a tin can around with sticks and he'd gone down there and they'd chunked rocks at him, so many he couldn't duck them all, and hit him a couple of times in the back end when he was running. It was the running that made him so mad. I was for going back there after he was sewed up so he could show me the street and the kids. He didn't know the name of the street. But mom said no, wait until your father comes home.

When he came home she talked to him and then he talked to us. And he made it sound pretty stupid to go looking for trouble. We agreed to stick pretty close to the street we lived on. Dad is a big man, and there's nothing chicken about him. I remember one time when he let me come out on the job with him when he was building the dam. And a man driving a Euclid talked nasty to him. The driver was big. My dad jumped up onto the bracket thing you step on to climb into the cab and grabbed the man and pulled him out and down onto the ground and picked him up by one leg and the back of his neck and heaved him all the way up onto his own load of fill. The man decided he would rather lie still up there than climb down. Dad acted real calm, but when he loaded his pipe I saw how bad his hands were shaking. It was a thing they talked about on that job a long time. So when dad said it would be stupid to try to go after those kids, it made it all right for us not to.

There wasn't any trouble during the summer, but I felt kind of uneasy about how school would be. Then school started and it was ten times as bad as I could have imagined. Bingo went to the grade school about ten blocks away, and, being in the seventh grade, I had to go to the junior high, about seven blocks in the other direction. It was a great big brick building, and the schoolyard was fenced with wire and paved with bricks, and there were a lot of broken swings. The classes were real big, with extra chairs along the sides and in the back so that there could be forty or fifty kids. Half the time you couldn't hardly hear the teacher. Kids threw stuff and made weird noises and nobody seemed to be able to do anything about it. The whole school had a funny smell, like acid and sweat and something perfumy, and after classes it had the loudest bells I ever heard.

Back home—I mean back in the mountains—they'd called me Brud in school, but here the teachers CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

But in this new world were the Black Dukes and the Sportsters.

and the

Finally I said,
"Don't be hard on Bingo.
he'd been just a little older. . . .
The thing is . . .
we've got to get out of here."

TOM LOVELL

EDNA FERBER'S ICE

SYNOPSIS OF PART I Aboard the morning plane from Seattle were influential businessman and politician Dave Husack, with his son Bayard, his "shadow" Sid Kleet, his secretary Dina Drake; Wilbur K. Distelhorst, of the Department of the Interior; a retired general now head of the National Fish Pack Company. Ordinarily, distinguished visitors were met at the Baranof, Alaska, airport by Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce Ott Decker, and his self-appointed helper, Bridie Ballantyne. But today the welcoming committee included Mayor Bogard, legendary Czar Kennedy and dazzling Chris Storm. Born in Alaska, tragically orphaned in infancy, and brought up by her powerful and mutually antagonistic grandfathers, Czar Kennedy and Thor Storm, Chris was as beloved in Baranof as the fantastic Ice Palace, built by Kennedy as a symbol of the city's great future. It was said Chris had broken many hearts—her own belonged to Alaska.

Young Bayard Husack, though supposedly engaged to Dina Drake, still loved Chris. Hoping to see her, he had fallen in with his father's ambitious plan of grooming him for the governorship of Alaska. He did not know that his father and Czar Kennedy also conspired to further their political ambitions by marrying him to Chris. They had insisted that Dina accompany Bayard on his tour of Alaska in the hopes of rousing Chris' jealousy—and had paid her well for her role. But Dina had plans of her own. She intended to marry Bayard—and, eventually, to be First Lady of the United States.

PART II

From the beginning no two men could have been more unlike than Thor Storm and Czar Kennedy. Together they had come to this weird, wild land. They had planned and worked and fought together, each had been left wifeless and childless in young manhood, neither had remarried, each waged a silent persistent battle for the welfare—as they saw it—of the girl Christine. Each loved Alaska in his own way.

Thor Storm still lived in a log cabin as he had in his twenties. It boasted electricity and plumbing of a sort now, but structurally it was basically unchanged. Baranof and the whole territory respected him, admired him, were baffled by his way of life.

But Czar Kennedy—there was a man they could understand. A picturesque and romantic figure, he had a quiet word and a smile for everyone. You sometimes saw him eating his breakfast at the drugstore soda counter; you'd never know he owned the building, lived in the best house in town. Sometimes he secretly paid for the breakfast of a boy or girl there at the counter, and he would vanish before they had finished their meal.

"No charge," the counterman would say to this one.

"What do you mean, no charge!"

"Party paid for your breakfast. Told me to say you're his guest this morning."

This pleased and impressed some, but it rather annoyed others. One morning at eight o'clock Addie Barnett caught him at the coffee counter. It was Northern Light weekly press day, and she had been at the office since five A.M. In a spirit of pure mischief she had quietly paid the counterman for Czar's breakfast and slipped away to station herself, unseen, behind the revolving bookrack. The counterman rather enjoyed going into the customary routine. In reverse, this time.

"No charge, Mr. Kennedy."

"How's that?" sharply.

"Party paid for your breakfast. Said you're their guest this morning."

Rarely caught off guard, Czar now was in a temper. "You can't do that. I don't like it, understand!"

"Oh? Well, you do it."

"That's different."

Addie Barnett ran the story in next week's Northern Light.

Shuttled back and forth from the cushioned comfort of Czar's house to Thor's neat little log cabin—three months with Czar, three months with Thor—even an adult might have been shredded by this split existence. That Chris survived as a whole human being, though scarred, was miraculous. Oddly, she was happier in the three-room shack at the water's edge than in Czar's ample house with its bouncy mattresses, its thick carpets, its plate-glass windows. Through the protective panes she could see the splendid panorama of sky and water and mountains, yet here the child never had the feeling of security, of belonging. The world looked unreal and distant, somehow, viewed through all that glass. At Thor's cabin the mountains and the water and the land were part of her daily life.

Together she and Thor trudged the hills, fished the waters, slogged through the tundra gathering the delicate low-growing wild flowers, picking the low-bush wild cranberries for jelly. There were blueberries, too, and salmonberries. Thor held forth in terms of philosophy and economics and history. She was too young to understand it all, but much of this must have stuck in her memory and been preserved in her emotional storehouse. Years later she brought it forth, undimmed, like golden coins retrieved from a buried treasure chest. Not only Thor, but often Czar and Bridie, spoke to her in adult terms, and though she often was confused by this she thrived on their competitive affection.

With Czar Kennedy she lived in the finest house in Baranof, she wore dresses bought in Seattle, she ate the best the town afforded. On one of his rare trips to Seattle, Czar even took Christine with him.

Most Alaskans did not dream of staying at the Olympic Hotel when they visited Seattle. It was too grand, too costly. With or without Christine, Czar stayed at the Olympic.

This glimpse of the Northwest metropolis had dazzled the child, and puzzled her. Like an Alice in Wonderland she stared, confused and sometimes unbelieving, at the hotel's luxurious appointments, at the wide streets, the shopwindows, the handsome houses.

"Baranof doesn't look like this," the child said. "Why doesn't it?"

"No money."

"Then why doesn't Seattle give them some money?"

He stared at her, startled. He had been hearing this question lately, from other sources. Then he laughed. "No, that wouldn't do. That's the wrong way round."

Not wishing to leave her alone in the hotel, he took her with him when he had a business conference with Dave Husack or Sid Kleet or any one of a half dozen other Northwest nabobs.

Sunk in the depths of a vast armchair, a book in her lap, the child was so quiet that the men actually forgot her presence. She heard every word the men said. It did not interest her, she understood none of it, she merely retained it. They CONTINUED ON PAGE 70

Copyright © 1958 by Edna Ferber. All rights reserved.

The complete novel is being published in book form by Doubleday & Company, Inc.

This was a part of Alaska she had never seen;

a side to Ross's character she had not guessed.

PALACE

"I've made up my mind
I'm going to show you Oogruk today,"
Ross said.
"I'll do it if it costs me my job."

HIGH SCHOOL TO COLLEGE:

TIME TO REPAIR THE BRIDGE

By A. WHITNEY GRISWOLD,
PRESIDENT OF YALE UNIVERSITY

It is now generally recognized throughout the United States that our high schools are not performing adequately one of the two main functions they are supposed to perform in our educational system. This is the function of a bridge between elementary school and college. Whatever they may be accomplishing in the preparation for citizenship of students who do not go on to college—and there is widespread dissatisfaction with that, too—as bridges to higher education they are buckling in the middle.

Less than half of the top quarter of our high-school graduates, the group best qualified for college education, move on into it. The rest drop out of the procession largely for sheer lack of motive: they fail to see the purpose of an education commensurate with their native talents and ability. Others of the same academic potential follow lines of least resistance and do not make their way to the top of their high-school classes. Still others, of less ability and lower potential, drift into public institutions obliged to admit them, only to fall by the wayside as soon as they encounter bona fide university standards. Even among the top quarter of high-school graduates there are too many instances of ground lost to inadequate preparation in particular subjects that has to be made up in the freshman year of college at the cost of more valuable educational opportunities.

Sometimes this ground is not regained until much later, if ever. Witness the recent recommendation of the Association of Graduate Schools that an examination in basic command of the English language be required for admission to those schools. That the graduate schools of our universities should find such a requirement necessary for candidates for the Ph.D., the highest earned academic degree awarded in the United States, is striking evidence of shortcomings farther down the educational line. The foundations of basic command of our native language, the essential tool for all learning, should be laid in grammar school and completed in high school. The time for this test is at the beginning of college, not the end of it.

All this constitutes a waste of the most precious of all our natural resources—our human resources—and this at a time when we are wondering how, or even whether, we can keep up with the Russians and are calling for "talent hunts" and "brain-power quests" to assist us. Meanwhile we are informed by such authorities as the United States Office of Education and the Educational Policies Commission of the National Education Association and the American Association of School Administrators that the Russians are investing substantially more time, money and energy in grammar and high schools as a preparation for college education than we are. Their students complete in ten years what ours do in twelve (spending an average of 1234 hours in school in each of their last four years, compared with our average of 895). A considerably larger proportion of them are enrolled in the academic curriculum than is the case with us; and what is more to the point, within their academic curriculum, such basic subjects as language, literature, mathematics and the natural sciences receive much greater emphasis and attention than they do in our own. Russian language and literature occupy 28 per cent of that curriculum; history, nearly 7 per cent; geography, 5 per cent; foreign language, 7 per cent; mathematics, 20 per cent; biology, physics and chemistry together, 13 per cent.

"The emphasis on science in Soviet schools contrasts sharply with the situation in the United States," says the United States Office of Education in its report, Education in the U.S.S.R.

"Whereas the Soviet students graduating from secondary schools in June 1955 had taken courses in physics for five years, astronomy for one year, chemistry for four years, biology for five years and mathematics, algebra, geometry and trigonometry for ten years, less than a third of the American high-school graduates had taken a year of chemistry, about a fourth had had a year of physics, and less than a seventh had taken advanced mathematics."

Although the Russian science courses are not, in all cases, full-year courses, it is nevertheless true that every Russian ten-year-school graduate will have had 4.4 full years of mathematics and 5.9 full years of science. The Office of Education also reports that in Russia all students in the ten-year schools (whose last three years roughly equate with our four-year high schools) are required to study foreign languages for six years, in the last two of which instruction is conducted in the foreign language; whereas less than 15 per cent of our high-school students study any foreign language and most of these for not more than a year.

We may draw various conclusions from the Russian system of grammar- and high-school education. The almost complete repression of freedom that accompanies it undoubtedly limits the ultimate benefits it might confer upon Russian society, especially in the fields of the humanities and the social sciences, where freedom of thought is of the essence. We may question the distribution of emphasis in the curriculum and ask whether such a stiff dose of science in secondary school will yield all the results that are expected of it. Nevertheless, we may safely conclude two things. The first is that any student who completes satisfactorily as much mathematics and foreign-language study as the Russian academic curriculum requires should have a better-disciplined mind than his American counterpart, whatever he may do with it. The second is that any student who has completed as much foreign-language study together with the study of his own language and literature as the Russian curriculum requires should have a better mastery of both than does his American counterpart. These facts, added to the obviously stronger foundation for proficiency in science and technology afforded by the Russian curriculum, make the weaknesses in our own curriculum seem all the more glaring.

For more than a decade critics of American education have been trying in vain to open our eyes to the existence of these weaknesses. The Russian deus ex machina has succeeded in accomplishing what they could not accomplish. Like the great depression that shocked us out of the illusions we held with respect to our economy in 1930, and the bombing of Pearl Harbor that shocked us out of illusions regarding our military security and our position in world affairs in 1941, the sudden revelation of Russia's scientific advance has at last shocked us out of our educational illusions. Though scarcely visible to the human eye, the two Sputniks have bathed our high-school curriculum in a flood of light and magnified the voice of its critics into a national chorus.

This is not a wholly unmixed blessing. To be sure, the first step toward correcting any fault is to recognize it. But there is now so much criticism of our high schools from so many points of view, surcharged with so much wounded pride, that there is danger that constructive criticism may be drowned out and the initiative necessary to put things to rights lost in the shuffle. No citizen has look very far to discover evidence of trouble our high schools. If he is fortunate enough find none in his own school he need look farther than Little Rock or New York, here the mere preservation of law and der has required the occupation of schools the Army and the police. If these are ex-me cases, representing social more than ucational problems, they are nonetheless mbolic of cases in many other com-unities, where amid classrooms crowded suffocation and double—sometimes triple—sions, overworked teachers exhaust them-ves trying to maintain elementary disci-ne. Some of this trouble is symptomatic a teen-age bravado and defiance of au-ority which, though apparently world-de in scope, seems to have reached its peak der the auspices of permissive parenthood the United States. It is symptomatic, , of teacher shortages, cramped quarters d lack of essential equipment caused by oring our population curve and failing to id its plain educational implications.

Economic reports of these conditions have been en almost continuous publicity, but they have t produced a remedy, for these are not economic enomena. A nation's schools are part of its ture, and the indifference with which ours have n treated bespeaks a cultural rather than an nomic failing. We have always had the money provide for their needs and provide for them erally. We have it today. Last year we spent re on tobacco and liquor; more on new and d cars; more on recreation than we spent on r entire system of education, including all our mentary and secondary schools as well as our leges and universities, public and private. Once need for more intensive research in intercon-ental and space missiles, costly as it is, is borne upon us we have little difficulty in providing the ds for it. Our failure to support our schools in ilar fashion is fundamentally a failure to see ir purpose in our civilization.

Such a failure could lead to disaster. The pages history are full of instances of the collapse of tions and the decline and disappearance of ilizations that began with cultural decay and re accompanied and hastened by it. Failure of United States today to live up to the ideals d fulfill the promise of its own civilization could ve similar results. We are engaged in something re than a race into space. The prospect is that, hough we may soon go voyaging among the nets, we shall have to return from our travels d continue to dwell upon the earth. Our ability do so successfully—that is to say, more success-ly than other animals and civilizations that have come extinct—will depend upon two things. We all have to produce not only a scientific com-tence but also a political and a social compe-nce equal to the task. Both of these responsi-ities devolve upon our educational system, par-ularly upon our high schools. Their capacity to charge them depends, in turn, upon what value attach to our way of life.

One thing is certain. We shall not achieve the nimum military security essential to the con-uance and further development of that way of unless we improve upon one particular kind education. This is the kind that culminates in stery of the basic sciences, the humanities d the social sciences, that produces through its llowers the scientific discoveries upon which our chnology is founded and so much of our physi-l welfare and our military security depends; the owledge and wisdom that shape our laws and cial institutions CONTINUED ON PAGE 144

HOW ONE SCHOOL SYSTEM IS MEETING

THE CHALLENGE OF THIS CENTURY

By GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

When one considers in its length and in its breadth the importance of this question of the education of a nation's young, the broken lives, the defeated hopes, the national failures which result from the frivolous inertia with which it is treated, it is difficult to restrain within oneself a savage rage.

In the conditions of modern life the rule is absolute, the race which does not value trained intelligence is doomed. Not all your heroism, not all your social charm, not all your wit, not all your victories on land or at sea, can move back the finger of fate. Today we maintain ourselves. Tomorrow science will have moved forward yet one more step, and there will be no appeal from the judgment which will then be pronounced on the uneducated.

—ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD
Presidential address to the Mathematical Association in England, 1916

I feel very strongly that we need to gain acceptance in this country of the importance of differentiation by intellectual standards throughout our whole educational system. . . . To recognize the comprehensive tasks of the high schools and in addition to give adequate opportunity to the gifted—this is the big problem. This is where the next great push ought to be, to provide for this quality group.

—JAMES R. KILLIAN, JR.,
"Are High School Standards Too Low?",
Ladies' Home Journal, September, 1956

The danger that confronts this country . . . lies in the cult of mediocrity. No country has a stronger tradition of faith in education than the United States; in no country is there more information available on differences of ability than in the United States; and yet with all the faith and with all the knowledge less is being done than elsewhere to give the best education to those who might do the most with it. A fallacious interpretation of democracy has tended to reduce equality of opportunity to identity of education. . . .

—I. L. KANDEL,
"Leadership and Education in Other Times and Other Lands," Teachers College Record, (April, 1939).

"What am I to do with Johnny?" a teacher asked. "All he wants to do is read the college textbooks his father wrote." "Should Sally spend all her time reading Shakespeare?" another wanted to know. "She's only nine!"

What to do with unusually intelligent children in public-school classrooms has always been a puzzle for teachers. They are not always the best-behaved, nor do they do consistently superior work. There is a legend among teachers of gifted children that one bright child on his very first day in school turned on his teacher and snarled, "Get away from me with that pusillanimous primer!" Probably no child ever said it in quite that way, but every teacher knows a book that might hold the interest of average children in a classroom is a bore to some and impenetrable to others in the same classroom. What is one to do with the child who can read well but is just too bored to do so?

In 1953, Lucille Nixon, a consultant in elementary education for the Palo Alto (California) public schools, found herself swamped with such questions. She took them to the superintendent, Dr. Henry M. Gunn. "We should have a program," she said, "for exceptionally able children throughout our entire school system." He agreed. He appointed a committee to plan such a program; two years later it was approved by the school board and put into action. Since its inception, every possible evaluation, study and test of the Palo Alto program shows that—

▶ The creation of a "snob" or "elite" group of children—a fear often mentioned when any proposal is made to single out those with high I.Q.'s for special attention—did not occur in practice. Children can be grouped in special classes for a portion of the day, or offered special opportunities in other ways, without the slightest damage to their relationships with others.

▶ Children not included in the program are generally not jealous or envious of those who are. (This finding is based not merely upon expressed opinions, but upon special "social distance" tests.)

▶ Many more children than previously supposed can profitably skip a grade in elementary school. They compete successfully with older children without developing social or emotional problems.

▶ When exceptionally able children are grouped in a special class for only one subject, their work improves, not only in that class but in all their regular classes as well.

▶ The community generally approves of special provisions for CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

Universal suit (left) is lightweight pale beige tweed for planes, cool-weather cities, taking on summer personality with a water-color printed silk blouse, soft straw cloche, red calfskin bag.
The skirt becomes a separate combined with sweaters, knitted overblouses. By Philippe Tournay.
The hat by Francis Nelkin, blouse by Lloyd.
The ravishing, pink-of-fashion coat (below) knocks convention into a cocked hat but is positively earthbound and purposeful.
What could be better over black, white or beige, linen, tweed or chiffon? By George Carmel.
The white low-waisted dress in Arnel crepe, an extra or alternate, by Julia Richards.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

SEVEN WONDERS OF WORLD TRAVEL

Universal suit, a coat in color, a black dress, one jacket dress, a casual globe-trotter, something beige or white, one "divine" for evening.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN Fashion Editor

Defining a fashion travel wonder, we say it means: vitally current but enduring as the Sphinx, basic and beautiful in the same breath, and a pure phenomenon of adaptability. The total seven must include something wool to face the facts of weather, summer silks, linens and prints, a gadabout dress easy as a slip, a printed chiffon for evening, intensely feminine, with the grace to look lovely at the very last stop. Any woman well tuned in will travel as weightlessly as possible—hence the strict selectivity. She will take black, white and beige—simple as one, two, three. Then add smashing color—the new pink of fashion or her own favorite shade, both for the sake of fashion and her own pleasure. Accessories that point up tomorrow and give simplicity the spark it needs: printed cotton hats and bags for plain-color dresses, brilliant collapsible silk turbans, bright polka-dot bags or slippers, crystal beads in rainbow colors.

Beginning with the gadabout (right): the chemise has made its reputation on two continents (let it be no shorter than looks well sitting as well as standing), a nothing of a dress that can mean everything in comfort and usefulness. This one is black silk-and-rayon shantung with brass buttons by Robert Crystal, worn with a young, young breton of glossy black straw by Adolfo of Emme, white gloves; patent leathers by Jean Bandler.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

SEVEN WONDERS OF WORLD TRAVEL

The dress with a jacket is a convincing fashion witness to the fact that the best world travelers are also many times the best for any cosmopolite at home. The pink tweedy silk-and-cotton (above) is prepared for town with a soft lattice-top cloche from Mr. John's Junior collection, and a leather bag. Slip off the jacket as the Fahrenheit rises. By Andrew Arkin. The pink-and-red silky cotton print by Leonard Arkin (right) has the endearing kind of dress underneath that you can snatch out of the suitcase for dinner in split seconds. A bit of veiling and roses by Francis Nelkin. Basic red pumps by Rangoni.

The quiet, mannerly little beige shantung chemise dress (below), 100-carat strong for pure usefulness and for any spike of color you like. By Robert Crystal. A polka-dot silk bag to match red pumps is a good thought, plus a bow-veil. Proof that a fashion that travels as effortlessly as your lingerie can be cause for ovation is the printed chiffon evening dress with the jeweled midriff at the right by Frank Starr. Fresh flowers around the chignon.

NATURALLY . . . THERE WILL BE ALTERNATES: These seven costumes are cosmopolitan world travelers. Depending on your timetables and destinations, you will add and take away. Museum lovers need the comfort and the rightness of a little shirtwaist dress and low heels, whereas more for evening is indicated for the music festivals. Seashore and shipboard call for play clothes, mountains for more casual wools. The forever rule: take one thing that leads to the where-did-you-get-it questions—a dress in a crazy color, a silhouette that you but not everyone could wear.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Capsule Wardrobes...

IN SYNTHETIC FABRICS

This capsule wardrobe started with a crisp white Arnel sharkskin. We combined a sleeveless blouse and a skirt with unpressed pleats. The printed long skirt in the same fabric combines with the original blouse. The blue Orlon-and-wool jersey overblouse goes with the white skirt as well as with the red Dacron-and-linen slacks. The sweater is white ribbed Orlon with an all-over flower print in shades of blue.

The blouse, Vogue Design No. 9505.
The long skirt. Design No. 9504.
The overblouse and skirt. Design No. 9503.
The slacks. Design No. 9494.

SHOES—JEAN BANDLER
SWEATER—HANS BOEPPLE
CHALK BEADS—DOROTHY ADAMS

CRISP WHITE SHARKSKIN + BLUE JERSEY OVERBLOUSE + RED SLACKS AND A SWEATER = A SUMMER'S WEEKE

A TWO-PIECE PLAID DRESS + A TWO-PIECE BUTTON-FRONT GREEN RAYON LINEN = FOUR COMPLETE COSTUMES.

This gay Dacron-and-cotton plai shades of pinks, yellows and gree a cool summer fabric that washes ease and needs little ironing. The piece shirtwaist dress has a cummerbund. The shirt combines the green rayon-linen skirt for s wear. The plaid skirt combines wit green sleeveless top, for dressier sions. With the two-piece green we have added accents of turqu

Plaid dress,
Vogue Design No. 9490.
Green dress,
Vogue Design No. 9502.

COLORED BEADS—EDGAR ROEDELHEIMER
GOLD CLIP BRACELETS—STEVE CADORO
STRAW HAT—GOBBI

SUMMER USUALLY MEANS A SERIES OF EXCITING WEEKENDS — SHORT WEEKENDS WHEN YOU WANT TO TRAVEL LIGHT BUT DRESS PRETTILY. WE HAVE WORKED OUT FOUR COMBINATIONS THAT COULD TAKE YOU TO THE COUNTRY, TO THE CITY OR TO THE BEACH. WITH ANY ONE GROUP, YOU WILL HAVE AT LEAST FOUR COSTUMES . . . IN SOME CASES EVEN MORE.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

A print coat is one of the gayest summer fashions. Ours, an all-over rose print on Arnel sharkskin. The red Dacron-and-cotton linen-weave sheath is the basic part of this wardrobe and looks equally well with a printed overblouse or the short pink jacket. The pink jacket matches a pair of shorts (to wear only if you are young and slim; otherwise, make a matching pink skirt) and is Chinese in effect, fastening with braid frogs. Another combination would be the pink shorts with the overblouse.

Printed coat, Vogue Design No. S-4871.
Red sheath, Design No. 9382.
Pink jacket and shorts, No. 9494.
Printed overblouse, No. 9506.

RED AND WHITE CHAIN BAGS—RICHARD KORET
PINK BEADS—BRIAN BISHOP

A PRINT COAT + A SHEATH + A PINK SHORTS COSTUME AND AN OVERBLOUSE = A "GO ANYWHERE" WARDROBE.

A TURQUOISE SHEATH + NYLON-CHIFFON SEPARATES + A GLEN-PLAID TWOSOME = A YOUNG, PRETTY LOOK.

Turquoise, a favorite summer color (so pretty with a tan), is the key color in this wardrobe. The nylon-chiffon separates combine to look like a one-piece dress, but the skirt can also be worn over a turquoise rayon-linen sheath for dancing. The two-piece glen-plaid acetate-and-rayon costume is a true "go everywhere" dress and the top does double duty worn over the sheath dress.

Nylon blouse, Vogue Design No. 9506.
Nylon-chiffon skirt, Design No. 9210.
Two-piece plaid, Design No. S-4878.
Turquoise sheath, Design No. 9429.

© Vogue

BLUE SATIN BELT—BEN KING
YELLOW BAG—ELIZABETH STRAUSS

For back and other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Patterns, see page 149.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto. Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT HER

Mrs. Stroud thinks a bright coat both a luxury and a necessity. Brilliant example — this red rajah-textured many-season style worn over a perfect little black dress is for important luncheons or a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Dallas Museum of Contemporary Art.

Early spring in Texas. A short silk-and-wool coat over a matching dress.

"I like this white dinner dress b cause I can wear it so many places

Mrs. Ethan B. Stroud II, of Dallas, Texas, is a blond, blue-eyed, soft-spoken native Texan of many interests. Color is her first thought in planning her clothes. "I love and wear almost every color. . . . I never like anything that is too much of a fashion, but I do like soft, feminine things that last a long time." She looks for new ideas but always prefers the "modified version" to any exaggerated fashion. She narrows down essentials to a "bright coat, black dress, pretty sweaters and skirts, evening clothes." At home she enjoys slacks combined with sweaters and blouses. Her days are filled with variety—from driving the children to school to civic activities as director of the Dallas Council of World Affairs.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN Fashion Editor

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Sweater and skirt for busy mornings. Mrs. Stroud drives off to school with daughter Joyce and son Ethan, gathering up neighbor children on the way. Her skirt is felt, the sweater plaid cashmere. Her shoes, low-heeled red leather pumps.

"A suit with a soft easy look." The pleats are made for walking. The intense blue, a color she adores.

Cotton print, young and simple—"the kind of dress I wear so much all summer."

Left—fabulous white organdy with embroidered appliquéd pink roses for the most beautiful ball, worn with her favorite necklace.

"I practically live in slacks at home with a fun sweater or blouse." Mrs. Stroud loves to combine colors—violet mohair sweater and lemon-yellow cotton at-home slacks.

High-school graduation day. I was 18 years old and weighed 225 pounds. All the other members of the school band wore ready-made uniforms. Yards and yards of extra material had to be bought so that mine could be made to order. I'll never forget our senior-year band contest. Proudly we marched onto the stage in front of teachers, judges and audience and sat down to play. Suddenly there was a thunderous crash — and there was old Marge in a heap on the floor, chair splintered under her! Even the drums couldn't drown out the sound of the laughter. Another time I was equally chagrined was the Sunday I led a line of folks into a pew of our church. I came to a pillar I couldn't squeeze past. The only solution was for all the people behind me to back out to the tune of the organ music so that I could sit elsewhere. Telephone booths were a problem too. And driving. As a fatty, I'd have to push the car seat back as far as it would go. Later, as I dieted, I'd slip the seat forward a notch. Since my stomach seemed always to be pushing the wheel, it took quite a while before fellow passengers discovered I was losing weight.

You'd think a girl wearing a cap and gown could manage to hide a figure problem—but not a girl weighing over 275 pounds! Here I am with my mother, niece, brother and father on the day I graduated from college. As you can see, I was the only fatty in the family. This was the year I was asked to sing comedy songs in our senior-class show. One of the songs was called, When Francis Dances With Me. Was I a hit when I came to the line "I fit in his arms like a motorman's glove!"

This was considered a very flattering picture of me in 1952 at 275 pounds plus. Even though the photographer kindly retouched away my extra chins (left), you can compare these pictures and see that I am now less than half the woman I once was. It's no wonder some of my long-time acquaintances have failed to recognize me. At our college-class reunion last year I caused a near riot showing up in a slinky sheath dress (size 14). I actually had to introduce myself to girls I had known for four years!

"I lost

Here is Marjorie Tubbs' photo albur

to diet and reduce from a mountainous 294 pound

BEFORE AND AFTER MEASUREMENTS

	HEIGHT	WEIGHT	BUST	WAIST	HIPS	UPPER ARM	THIGHS	DRESS SIZE
BEFORE	5'8"	294 pounds	50"	44"	59"	19½"	30"	42 pattern size. (With inches addec
AFTER	5'8"	148 pounds	35"	27"	39"	11½"	20½"	14 or 16

Look again—it isn't a trick of the camera that makes me appear twice the size of my friend. I was more than twice her size. By now there were doorways I couldn't squeeze through, store aisles I had to walk along sideways, stairs I had to huff and puff to climb. But I could always make it out to the kitchen to while away the afternoon with sandwiches, cookies and hot chocolate until dinner was ready. Next to eating, I was best at cooking. Even won a county baking contest.

Here I look like the original model for "They laughed when I sat down at the piano!" This was taken in 1953 during my first year of teaching. Weight: approximately 290 pounds! In those days the only compliments I ever received centered on a new scarf or bracelet. Nowadays friends exclaim enthusiastically over my pretty dresses or my figure. When I was whistled at as a fatty, I wanted to sink into the sidewalk, knowing it was my hideous appearance that prompted the attention. Today I am secretly thrilled that the occasional whistles and "Wow!"s are meant to compliment instead of condemn.

Me in my very first sports outfit which I got just last spring. I've always loved sports, but until I reduced, my enjoyment of them was limited. I did make the high-school tumbling team. As "low man," that is, sometimes supporting as many as nine of my classmates piled on top of me to build a pyramid. During my diet I did daily exercises—fifteen minutes each morning and afternoon. There were times when my folks thought our house might fall apart—but those exercises, which I still do, keep my body firm.

146 pounds"

with notes telling what it looks and feels like o a trim-figured 148.

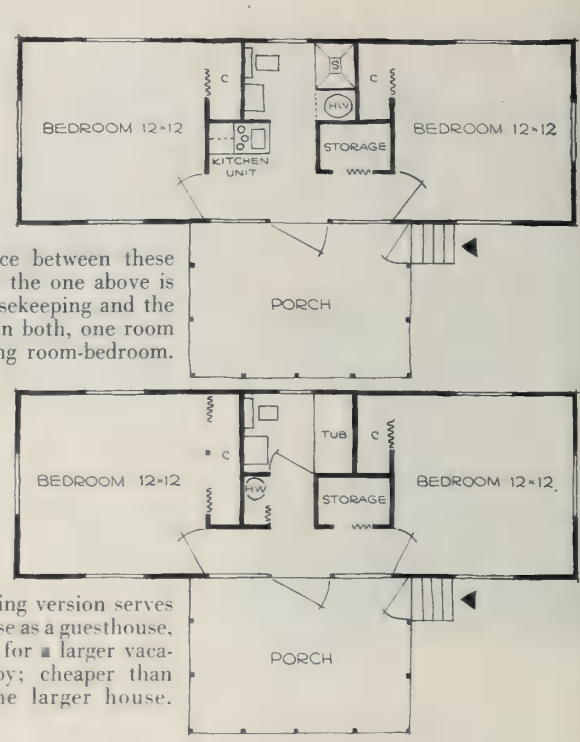
By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

"As a youngster my weight was normal, but when I reached my teens I developed an enormous appetite and proceeded to accumulate the pounds that went with it," says Marjorie Tubbs, Chenoa, Illinois, high-school music teacher. "When my family and friends tried to persuade me to reduce, I'd pause in eating long enough to answer, 'Tomorrow.' When I was teased about my weight, I'd laugh it off—the teasing, that is. When I wasn't invited to dances, I went to them anyway—as saxophonist in my family's orchestra. It wasn't until the fall of 1954, when I got tonsillitis, that I came to my senses. My doctor looked at me in dismay and warned. 'It isn't the size of your tonsils I'm worried about.' I started dieting that day and in two years I lost 146 pounds. I had two short giving-up periods when I regained some weight, but otherwise it was approximately 1000 calories a day for me. Happily, I had very few hungry days. I ate three well-balanced meals each day, cut out between-meal eating and substituted fruit desserts for the rich, fattening things I had been eating. Though I often yearned for a hot-fudge sundae or chocolate cake, I never really felt starved; never felt weak with hunger. I've maintained my reduced weight of 148 pounds for a year and a half now and continue to feel as marvelous as friends say I look. This spring one of my fourteen-year-old students confided in a boyish, blushing stammer, 'Miss Tubbs—er—ah, you'll make some man a pretty nice wife; I mean a nice pretty wife.' And one of my young girl students exclaimed at our senior prom, 'Gosh, you're as glamorous as Marilyn Monroe!' Maybe some women would fluff off such compliments as teen-age nonsense, but to this ex-fatty those words are music (and I know music) to my ears!"

Marjorie's diet outline and tips on how to diet while eating out appear on page 148.



ROGER PRIGENT

Isn't this a grand finale—a really happy ending to a fatty's story? Imagine me in a flower print, size 14! Until I dieted I never had a chance to dress in bright colors. When the JOURNAL took this picture of me I felt as glamorous as a model. The photographer told me I moved as gracefully as a model too. All members of the Beauty Department just kept ooh-ing and ah-ing and saying, "Readers will find this hard to believe—we can hardly believe it ourselves." I'm thrilled. Cinderella has nothing on me!

STOLLER

Here you see the version with the low-pitched gable roof and the screened-in flat-roof porch. Note the textured attractiveness of the solid wall panels of plywood with vertical grooves; window panels of a plain-surface plywood with sash openings cut out for chosen type of window—in this case, adjustable jalousie glass-louver sash with aluminum frame and fitted screens. As in all versions, this cottage is supported off the ground on posts, thus preserving the site.

The main difference between these two layouts is that the one above is fitted for light housekeeping and the one below is not. In both, one room can double as living room-bedroom.

The nonhousekeeping version serves a very useful purpose as a guesthouse, or overflow house, for a larger vacation home close by; cheaper than an addition to the larger house.

VACATION COTTAGES THAT COST FROM $2300 TO $3900

And with more strength and style than most everyday houses, these JOURNAL holiday homes go up in two weeks or less, depending on how you do them.

By RICHARD PRATT

I think you will agree that comfortable, attractive and inexpensive vacation cottages are relatively rare. And I'm sure it's not because people don't want them to be better, but because really good vacation cottages are deceptively difficult to design. So small, so simple, so unassuming, you say—why, anybody should be able to do one! I used to think so myself; but I know differently now.

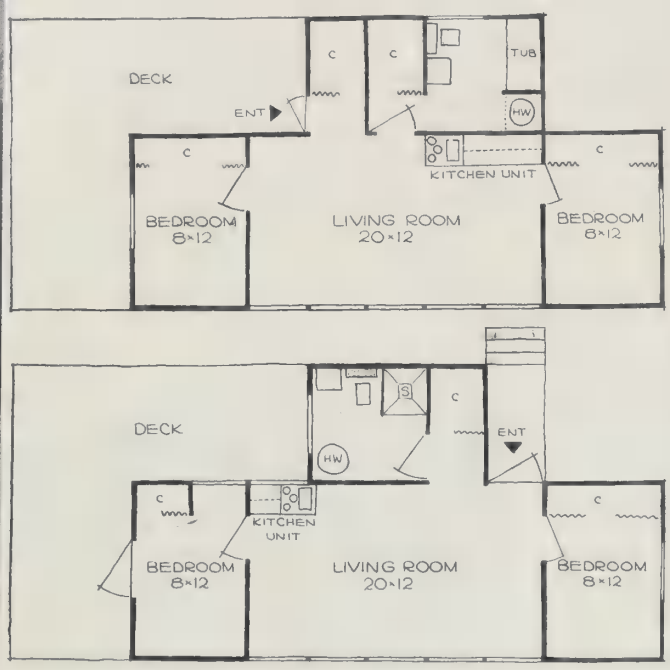
A good stock vacation-cottage design that anybody can build from should adapt equally well to a lot of different locales: lake shores, mountaintops, seasides. It should adapt to all different types of terrain: smooth, rough, hilly, flat, hard, soft. It should be safe, sound and dry in all conditions of wind and rain; cool and airy in the heat; cozy on nippy nights and dismal days. In its parts and pieces and the way it is put together, it should take advantage of today's efficiencies and economies. Most of all, it should please a wide variety of likes, and satisfy a wide variety of needs. I'll come later to the question of how little it needs to cost.

The version of our vacation-cottage design pictured here on these first two pages is identical in its dimensions and structural scheme with the version on the third page. Yet observe how unalike are their looks and their layouts. These two cottages happen both to be 12′ wide and 36′ long. Two plan possibilities are illustrated for each cottage. But the pattern from which you build shows still further possibilities, and shows how you may build a longer cottage from the same pattern, or a shorter one. Only the 12′ width must remain fixed; a very human and livable width, as you can see.

The design idea permits the placement of windows, doors and partitions pretty much where you want them, though you will be wise to follow our recommendations. It also CONTINUED ON PAGE 64

FOWLER

A yellow cotton rug, eminently washable, brings the sunlight into this room with its neat, washable corduroy bedspreads and pillow shams. Gay striped curtains made of toweling and pillows which pick up the colors of the curtain stripes add to the general air of carefree brightness. One of the nicest things about the room is the sturdy knock-down chest which takes only minutes to put together.



OWLER

INTERIOR DECORATION ON THESE PAGES BY CYNTHIA MCADOO WHEATLAND, INTERIOR DECORATION EDITOR

This porch, open to the sun, sea breezes and sound of pines, might easily become the favorite spot in the house on the strength of the wonderful view alone, but a bright red, white and blue color scheme used with attractive and comfortable rattan and iron furniture—happily resistant to the ill effects of sea air—and gay red-and-white director's chairs set around the table makes this porch, with its screen that cuts the sun, the ideal place for leisurely breakfast, after-swim gatherings, or relaxing at any time.

Here again a pretty bedroom—this time in cool tones of blue and green—takes on a practical nature. Everything in the room is geared to making summer housekeeping as easy as it can possibly be, from the pressed-wood-chip wall panels and towel curtains with rust-proof plastic clip-on rings to the painted floor which makes no problem of sand tracked in from the beach.

The versatility of these JOURNAL vacation cottages is indicated in the two layouts for the version here, which substitutes a bathroom, storage, entrance lean-to in the rear for the covered screened-in front porch of the version on the preceding pages; both plans show two bedrooms fully partitioned from the living room.

The vizor-cap roof projects just far enough over the sunny southern facade to shade the windows from the summer sun; the lower sun of spring, fall and winter shines in, providing pleasant solar warmth. This version demonstrates how easily the steel-post supports adapt to the roughest, rockiest sites without any alterations to the terrain, which would be prohibitive. Another demonstration here is the attractiveness of the exterior walls faced with grooved plywood panels.

VACATION COTTAGES THAT COST FROM $2300 TO $3900

CONTINUED

This interior is the version with the low plastic divider between living room and one bedroom, where the layout is planned primarily for vacationing couples; the great thing here being the twenty feet of windows facing the view. The sash are all fixed in place; a plentiful supply of fresh air being available through screened-louvered openings under two of the sash. The seine-net ceiling creates a cozy effect with overhead airiness.

FOWLER

gives you a choice among various specified types of doors, windows and other fittings, likewise with recommendations. Planned appendages attach easily and optionally. For instance, the first cottage here has a built-on screened-in porch; the second cottage has its bath built on instead of built in.

The design does even more in this direction. It takes the point of view that a roof is really no more than a hat, and that, as such, you choose the type that suits you best. The first cottage here likes a low gable for the main structure, a flat roof for the porch. The second cottage, with its back to the woods and its face to the view, finds a visor-cap roof a little more to its liking. Practically, roof differences almost don't matter. Their cost differences are likewise inconsequential. The pattern impartially lets you decide which type you want; describing when one might be more desirable than another.

A most important feature of the design is that the cottages are supported off the ground on piers or posts. This means several things, all good: the cottage draws no dampness from the ground; tempts no termites; discourages rodents; but most of all, the cottage keeps dry. Furthermore, the pier or post supports make it possible for the cottage to stand on any site, however uneven, without a lot of costly grading that can create a permanent scar, and be a waste of money. Conventional foundations can be an extravagance in a vacation environment, risk danger of dampness, and be structurally less strong.

The secret of the style, strength, flexibility of layout, and low cost above all, in these cottages, if you can call it a secret, lies in the building materials and building methods involved. The frame is the simplest, the strongest: post-and-beam. The walls, the floor, the roof are plywood panels, 4′ wide and 8′ long, which determine the disciplined modular dimensions of these cottages by making 4′ the unit of measurement. Fortunately for the general attractiveness, there is a fairly new plywood panel with vertical scorings, giving great style to the exterior. This can be stained the color of your choice. The roll roofing has a fine gravelly surface, pure white for heat reflection.

Here's the cost story in a nutshell. The materials to make the complete 12′ x 36′ main structure of four walls, roof, floor, windows, including doors, posts, hardware, roll roofing, nails, screws, bolts, exterior stain, and either the 12′ x 12′ screened-in porch of cottage No. 1 or the closed-in lean-to of No. 2, will cost $1300 at the building-supply yard; a few dollars more or less, depending on local prices and what types of windows and doors you choose. CONTINUED ON PAGE 148

Can this Marriage be Saved?

Many millions of young families have an elderly parent living with them. Only once in each hundred cases is the arrangement completely satisfactory to both generations—so said a sociologist recently. His estimate may be far too pessimistic. The arrangement sometimes works well on a farm, where there is more space and more for old people to do, than in a city apartment or duplex. But at best there is much unnecessary unhappiness. Negotiations between close relatives are often delicate and difficult, and the intermediation of a neutral third party may often be needed. The American Institute of Family Relations, Los Angeles 27, California, is a national nonprofit educational agency which is always ready to put readers in touch with the most reliable help in their own neighborhoods. . . . The case here described originated in our Los Angeles office and the counselor was Dr. William O. Walcott.

PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

SHE: "Dick's callous attitude toward mother is wrecking my nervous system and making me hate him. He and I can no longer discuss the subject sensibly. Whenever I speak of our obligations to her, he stalks out of the room and often leaves the house."

HE: "Joan has made our home, literally, a hospital. I feel like an interloper, somebody whose sole function is to pay the bills. Her mother is jealous and possessive and so demanding that no amount of service will ever satisfy her."

DON ORNITZ

"According to the doctor, my mother-in-law doesn't need a wheel chair and shouldn't be dependent on one."

JOAN TELLS HER SIDE: "Last night I had a terrible dream," said thirty-four-year-old Joan, married seventeen years and the mother of three. A tall woman, slender to the point of emaciation, she lighted a cigarette with shaky fingers. "I dreamed I was lying on a bed of smoldering coals in my girlhood home—I was in my mother's old room—and that Dick, my husband, was shoveling fuel to feed the fire. I awoke screaming.

"Dick wasn't in the house. We had quarreled several hours earlier and he'd gone to the apartment of a bachelor crony to watch the late show on TV. My eldest daughter and my mother, who has been visiting us the last three months, heard me scream and came into the bedroom almost immediately.

"Of course mother saw that Dick was gone and probably guessed we had quarreled about her again. Dick doesn't criticize mother in her presence, but I know she is aware of his complaints to me. Yet I've never heard her say a word against him, although there must have been times when the temptation was great. Both Dick and I are indebted to her for assistance in the early years of our marriage.

"Jenny is sixteen years old and at a noticing age, but mother's matter-of-fact manner seemed to convince her there was nothing odd about Dick's absence. Finally the two of them went off to bed. I took a sleeping pill—lately I've suffered dreadfully from insomnia—but I couldn't close an eye. I walked the floor until almost dawn, sick with nerves and worry.

"Dick's callous attitude toward mother is wrecking my nervous system and making me hate him. He and I can no longer discuss the subject sensibly. Whenever I speak of our obligations to her, he stalks out of the room and often leaves the house. Then, more than likely, I burst into tears or have hysterics.

"I'm losing all control of myself, and my health is being undermined; in the past three months my weight has dropped twenty pounds. My doctor has prescribed sedatives for me, but he says I am really in need of psychological advice. All I know is that I'm desperate.

"My mother is sixty-seven years old and a semi-invalid; she is diabetic and her eyesight is failing. Until three months ago she was shuttling back and forth between her ten-acre ranch miles outside the city and my sister Ella's home. But then in April she got an infected finger and telephoned me from the ranch in mortal terror; even a minor infection, as you probably know, can be fatal to diabetics. Fortunately the infection cleared up quickly, but I decided to bring mother in to stay with us. Ella had had her turn. I thought it was mine.

"Mother used to be highly independent, a beautiful and a brilliant woman, but with age and illness she has changed. She is now inclined to be impatient and querulous, and there is no denying she needs a lot of care. She likes to be 'babied,' as she expresses it. Who can blame her? She can't put on her clothes without my assistance. Her hair is long and thick and she refuses to have it cut; it takes me a good half hour to dress it to her satisfaction. It takes considerably longer to prepare her meals. Every ingredient has to be weighed and measured to make sure she gets a well-balanced, nourishing diet with an absolute minimum of sugar. Nor is giving mother her daily insulin injections easy for me.

"However, I don't complain. But I feel that Dick, who escapes the worry and the work, should stand back of me in my trouble instead of adding to my burdens with his nasty temper and his grumbling.

"Dick has always been quick-tempered, but he used to be gentle with our three daughters and me. You would never guess it now. He makes dinner a misery by picking on the two little girls about their table manners and choosy appetites. CONTINUED ON PAGE 94

Boned stuffed leg of lamb, roasted tender and juicy; young shoots of fresh asparagus, creamed wi ushrooms; a daffodil birthday cake.

The trees are rehearsing their spring colors, the grass has started to grow, the world has an expectant, spacious air.

Appleyard Birthday Party

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

My mother, Mrs. Appleyard, has her birthday in May. It comes at the end of the month, along with apple blossoms, bluebirds, lilacs, Memorial Day, and all the other signs of New England's slow-stepping spring.

No matter how marvelous a cook she is, no lady should be allowed to prepare her own birthday dinner, so my hazel-eyed daughters and I turn out a dinner fit for a queen—well, anyway, queen of our own Appleyard Center!

Such an important, full-scale birthday dinner must be planned well in advance. We're going to start with a smooth, rich pâté of duck, ham and chicken livers (mother's recipe); then we'll have a roast of lamb, boned and stuffed with a savory rice, raisin and bacon dressing. There will be velvety brown gravy, and a big bowl of creamed asparagus and mushrooms. Cynthia, my eldest daughter, being in an experimental mood, has planned a tossed green salad with fresh pear chunks and little sections of bright-colored mandarin orange. The crowning event of any birthday party is, of course, the ice cream and birthday cake. We're having mother's favorites—smooth, delicious strawberry-rhubarb ice cream, and a yellow-and-white daffodil cake with a lemony icing swirling around it.

Mother's pâté is an invention of several years back, the aftermath of one of her party suppers of roast spring duckling. She says, however, that one can start from scratch with a seven-pound duckling, and gently simmer it till the meat falls from the bones. Here's how she makes

PÂTÉ MAISON APPLEYARD

Place one 7-pound duck, singed and ready to cook, on a rack in a large Dutch-oven-type kettle. Pour 1½ cups cold water into the pan, cover and simmer gently until the duck is tender (the leg joints will move easily). Remove the duck, cool and then chill well (save stock). Skin the duck, then cut most of the meat from the bones (don't worry about stripping the bones of all the meat—they'll be cooked longer). Set the duck meat aside and keep refrigerated. Now simmer the duck bones in 3 cups water (or use leftover stock and add enough water to make 3 cups). Add 2 peeled onions, 1 stalk celery, 1 carrot, the duck liver and gizzard. Season with 3 whole cloves, 3 small dried red chilies, 1 small bay leaf and ⅛ teaspoon each cinnamon, nutmeg, allspice, orégano, rosemary and marjoram. Cook all together, covered, until the duck meat falls from the bones. Add 3 peppercorns and cook 10 minutes longer. Strain the stock, saving the gizzard, liver and remaining meat. Cool the meat and chill the stock until it jells. Skim the fat from the top. Save some for greasing the pan for baking. Grind together the cooled, cooked gizzard and liver and enough of the duck meat to make 1 cup. Grind also 2 raw chicken livers and mix with the ground duck. Finely dice enough of the refrigerated cooked duck meat to make ½ cup. Meanwhile, dry out about 10 to 12 slices of bread in a very slow, 250° F., oven. Roll to fine crumbs—there should be about 1¼ cups. Now mix together the ground duck meat and chicken livers with 1 pound of your favorite uncooked sausage (it should be lightly seasoned). Add ¾ cup fine bread crumbs, 2 cups jellied stock, 2 eggs, well beaten, and 1 small onion, minced. Mix well. Last, add the ½ cup finely diced duck meat along with ½ cup finely diced, cooked ham. Blend in well. Lightly grease a 1-quart glass loaf pan with a little duck fat and spread ¼ cup fine bread crumbs over the bottom. Put the meat mixture into the pan, packing well into the corners. Top with ¼ cup bread crumbs, cover with heavy aluminum foil and set the loaf pan in a pan of hot water. Bake for 3 hours in a very slow, 250° F., oven. Cool the pâté well in the pan, then chill for several hours before serving. Unmold and use as a spread for crackers. Makes 1 loaf.

At the present moment we have three ewes and three lambs munching their way around our property. They CONTINUED ON PAGE 141

COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

Salad

A classic with new flavor: greens tossed with anchovies, bacon, garlic-buttered croutons.

STUART

Traditionally, greens make the salad. Certainly they do in Italy, where a caress of dressing leaves each leaf succulent and aromatic.

Not every good salad, however, is a green one. Scandinavians like "fishier" salads. Their favorite is a colorful combination: chopped herring and boiled potatoes with diced beets and dill pickle made tart from a tossing in vinegar dressing. In Indonesia, chilled shrimp nestle in a garland of greens beneath a golden dressing, pungent with curry. Armenians like their salad vegetables cooked, then chilled. Native to Hawaii: fruits. So for a Hawaiian specialty, the islands' bounty, fresh and luscious in a sour-cream dressing.

Whether domestic or foreign, simple or sophisticated, every proper salad has identity in a menu. It is carefully, artfully planned with the whole meal in mind. And so is its dressing.

Perfect for summer-long salad days is this round-the-world collection: unpronounceable salads full of foreign intrigue. Continental classics too. Each a collector's item from the JOURNAL Kitchen and from New York restaurants where dining is excitingly international.

ABBOT MILLS

Salad sampling at East of Suez: Kathy McDonald chats with Carl Henderson and Chef Dick Wu.

To begin with, a Javanese favorite served at East of Suez, a dimly lit brownstone where Oriental rugs drape the walls, tropical plants grow out of elephants' feet and where Mr. and Mrs. Carl Henderson serve Indian and Indonesian dishes collected on their world travels. "It's wonderfully good," said Mr. Henderson, "this shrimp salad topped with our own curry dressing."

Javanese Shrimp Salad: Simmer 1½ pounds fresh shrimp in water with 1 parsley sprig, 1 stalk celery, 1 lemon, sliced, 2 peppercorns and 1 tablespoon salt for 10 minutes. Shuck and devein the shrimp, then cool and chill until salad-making time. For the curry dressing, brown together 1 onion, chopped, 2 celery-stalk tops and ½ green pepper, sliced, in 1 tablespoon salad oil. Add 2 cups water and 2 chicken-bouillon cubes and simmer until vegetables are tender. Remove sauce from the heat and purée. Now add 1½ tablespoons curry powder (less if you don't like "hot" dishes) and simmer the sauce 10 minutes more. Remove from heat and cool. Blend ¼ cup of the curry sauce with ½ cup mayonnaise. Mound chilled shrimp on a bed of greens and top with curry dressing. Makes 4 servings.

Sardi's, eating place of the theatrically famous, has come up with a salad classic for the calorie-conscious. "We call it Hollywood Salad," said Mr. Sardi, Jr. Tossed with crisp bacon, anchovies and croutons in a lemony egg dressing, this green salad (375 calories per hearty serving) is nearly a meal in itself.

Hollywood Salad: Cut up enough day-old bread or rolls to make a cup of 1" cubes. Warm 2 tablespoons each butter and olive oil in a skillet with 1 clove garlic, minced, and brown the croutons. Then dry out in a slow oven, 275°F., and drain on paper toweling. Break 1½ heads romaine into a salad bowl, making sure pieces are bite-sized. Add ½ cup cooked, crumbled bacon and 8 anchovy fillets, diced. For the dressing: Beat 2 eggs well, then blend in 1 tablespoon lemon juice, 1½ teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Add ⅓ cup olive oil, stirring constantly, ¼ cup grated Parmesan cheese and ¼ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Dress the salad and toss lightly. For the final touch, top with crumbled garlic croutons. Makes 4 servings.

Down on 14th Street is Luchow's German restaurant. Built 75 years ago when this area was the hub of cultural activity, its mahogany-paneled rooms and hearty food continue to draw famous faces. The specialty is German potato salad. Chilled for summer eating, Chef Emile Zahn's recipe is tartly invigorating.

Specksalat: Wash and boil 7 medium potatoes in their jackets until tender. Peel, cut in half lengthwise and slice while hot. Dissolve 1 chicken-bouillon cube in 1¼ cups boiling water and pour over the potatoes. Add 1 tablespoon finely chopped onion. Mix together 1 beaten egg, ¼ cup white vinegar, 1½ tablespoons sugar, 1 tablespoon bacon drippings, 1½ teaspoons salt and ⅛ teaspoon white pepper. Pour over potatoes. Finally, add 1 tablespoon each chopped parsley and cooked, crumbled bacon. Mix all together and serve hot or cold. Makes 4 good servings.

In Greenwich Village is a new Armenian restaurant called Sayat Nova. In this cozy basement dining room shish kebabs come sizzling to your table, feathery freshly baked Paklava pastries perfume the air. Popular here among salads is Iman Bayeldi, chilled, baked eggplant stuffed with a mellow mixture of tomato, onion and parsley.

Iman Bayeldi: Wash 1 medium-sized eggplant; remove stem and quarter as you would a melon. Now, make a deep slit on either side of each wedge—cutting down into the flesh. Mix together 2 thinly sliced onions, 2 chopped tomatoes, ½ cup chopped parsley, 4 minced garlic cloves, 2 teaspoons paprika, 1 teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Stuff each pocket with the mixture. Put eggplant in a baking pan, add 1 cup olive oil and 1½ cups water. Spoon any leftover stuffing over the top of the eggplant. Cover pan with aluminum foil and bake in a moderate—350° F.—oven for 2½ hours or until eggplant is tender. Baste occasionally with drippings. Before serving, cool and chill eggplant. Serve on lettuce cups. Makes 4 servings.

Uptown and on the East Side is the Gripsholm Swedish restaurant where the long smorgasbord table is jeweled with ice and crowned with flowers. The décor is classical Empire, the food classically Swedish—meat balls, pancakes with lingonberries, herring salad. Beautifully pink with accents of red, this hearty seafood salad makes cool summer lunching.

Swedish Herring Salad: Soak 2 salt-herring fillets overnight in cold water. Drain, rinse and dice, removing all bones. Meanwhile, boil 3 medium potatoes in their jackets until tender. Cool, chill, then peel and dice. Also dice enough pickled beets to make 1 cup; 1 red apple, leaving the skin on; and 1½ dill pickles. Mix together ½ cup vinegar, 1½ tablespoons sugar, ½ teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon each dry mustard and pepper. Combine the herring, potatoes, diced apple, beets and pickle, top with dressing and toss lightly. Chill and serve on lettuce. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

A block east of the Gripsholm is the Luau 400, new Hawaiian room complete with trickling stream and bamboo bridge. Here under the shade of palms you can roast shrimp at your own table. Salads are fragrant garlands of pineapple, mango, bananas, melon. For a salad surprise, try this fruit-ginger sherbet combination topped with Chef Paul Gredig's special sour-cream dressing.

Hawaiian Salad: Combine 1 cup sour cream, ½ eight-ounce can frozen limeade concentrate, 2 egg whites, stiffly beaten, 3 tablespoons each finely grated preserved ginger and syrup from the bottle. Tint pale green, using vegetable coloring, and freeze. Meanwhile, cut up enough fresh fruits to make 4 salads (melon, watermelon, bananas, pineapple, mango, grapes, and so on). Cut melons into slim, peeled slices, the bananas in half lengthwise, and sprinkle with lemon juice. Halve and seed the grapes, cube the pineapple. Make a pin-wheel arrangement—or experiment with design, using alternating slices of fruit. Add an artistic cluster of grapes and pineapple cubes. Sprinkle with toasted chipped coconut. With a ball scoop, make balls of the sherbet and arrange in and around the grapes. The dressing comes to the table in its own dish. Combine ¼ cup mixed fruit juices (any combination), 2 tablespoons each vinegar and sugar and ½ cup salad oil. Now mix ¾ cup fruit dressing with ¾ cup sour cream. Makes 4 servings.

The unexpected element makes these salads collector's items. Each, different from the others, shares a common rule, the secret of successful salads: suit the salad to the menu, handle it lightly, arrange it artfully, dress it in good taste.

Tomato-Ham Loaf. Combine 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup with 1 lb. each ground lean ham and pork. Add 1 cup dry bread crumbs, ½ c. chopped celery, ¼ c. minced onion, 2 beaten eggs, and ▪ dash black pepper. Pack lightly into greased loaf pan. Bake at 350° F. about 1½ hours or until done. For sauce, heat 1 can Tomato Soup with 1 to 2 tbsp. horseradish. 8-10 servings.

Celery-Salmon Loaf. Drain 1 lb. can salmon; keep ¼ c. liquid; mix with 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup, 1 cup dry bread crumbs, 2 beaten eggs, ½ c. chopped onion, 1 tbsp. lemon juice. Pack into greased loaf pan. Bake at 375° F. about 1 hr.; cool 10 min. Turn onto platter. For sauce, heat 1 can Cream of Celery Soup mixed with ½ c. milk, 1 tbsp. minced parsley. 6 servings.

3 SOUPER SUPPER LOAVES

Make it different, make it delicious, make it with Campbell's Soups. Here are three suggestions for souper supper loaves, but why stop here? Try your own creative combinations. Campbell's Soups will make them "something extra," timesaving, too!

Mushroom-Meat Loaf. Combine ½ cup Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup with 1½ lb. ground beef, ½ c. dry bread crumbs, ¼ c. chopped onion, 2 tbsp. chopped parsley, 1 beaten egg, ½ tsp. salt, dash black pepper. Shape into loaf or pack lightly in greased pan. Bake at 350° F. about 1 hr. For sauce, blend rest of soup with ¼ c. pan drippings; heat. Serve with loaf. 6-8 servings.

Good cooks cook with Campbell's Soups

The strange case of the shark's teeth

. . . and some important facts about yours

Had Mother Nature made the same provisions for our teeth as she did for the shark's, good dental health would be no problem at all.

For when a shark loses a tooth, a new one soon grows in its place. Once we lose a tooth, however, it is gone . . . and gone for good.

Yet, the second set of teeth which Mother Nature gives us is strong and durable enough to last a lifetime . . . if given proper care. Unfortunately, too few of us give our teeth the care they need.

Proof of our neglect comes from some of the findings of the American Dental Association. It reports that only 40 percent of all Americans get reasonably adequate and regular dental care.

The rest get emergency care or none. Moreover, one out of 7 adults has never been to a dentist.

There is more to be gained from regular dental care than simply keeping the teeth clean, bright and healthy.

For instance, proper care helps prevent tooth and gum infections which may play a part in arthritis, kidney disorders and other conditions affecting general health.

When teeth are neglected . . . when decay strikes, when gums become diseased, when abscesses form at the roots of teeth . . . a center of infection is established from which germs may enter the blood stream and cause disease in other parts of the body.

Even the smallest break in the enamel can pave the way for infection in the interior of a tooth. In fact, infection may exist at the roots of an apparently healthy tooth. The dentist can usually detect such trouble by X-ray examination and check it before serious damage occurs.

Healthy teeth . . . for children as well as adults . . . depend upon three things:

1. Diet—which should supply all the elements for good teeth, especially calcium and vitamins C and D.

2. Cleanliness—or proper brushing, which should be done after meals and always before retiring.

3. Check-ups—which should be made every six months or as often as your dentist recommends.

If you see your dentist regularly, he will get to know your individual dental requirements and how they can be met to your best advantage. If you cooperate with him, your chances will be far better to keep most of your teeth most of your life.

COPYRIGHT 1958—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

ICE PALACE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

talked quietly. One would have thought, from their manner, that their subject was, perhaps, philanthropy.

"Thing to do is put pressure on him, give him the screws."

"Lubbock says he wants to see the situation from every angle before he makes his report."

"Lubbock wouldn't know a salmon from a herring if he ate it."

Sid Kleet's dry nasal voice: "Gentlemen, I would like you to give me authority to bypass fisheries commissioners and directors and little stuff like that."

"What have you in mind, Sid?" It was Czar's question. He knew the answer, he wanted it stated in words uttered by the group's legal representative.

"Go over their heads," Kleet barked.

"What'll you do with Lubbock?"

"Same as we did with Diener. Get him."

"Yeh, but how about old Storm?" Dave Husack demanded. His voice, booming from that barrel chest, had the effect of a bellow in the quiet, almost somnolent room. Czar waved a cautioning hand toward the child.

Very early in her childhood Bridie had impressed upon her the vileness of tattling. "Now don't you go tattling to Czar about Thor, or Thor about Czar. You got anything about either of your grampas, just tell me."

"Wouldn't that be tattling?"

"No. I'd be kind of a judge, like Judge Gaylord here. I'd think about it, not leaning to one or the other, and then decide about it and try to fix whatever is wrong. I'd do the best I could for all three."

As Chris' keen mind missed practically nothing, and as she had almost total recall, the plums that fell into Bridie's lap were rich and juicy. This office conference, for example, conveyed quite innocently in Christine's childish terms, sent Bridie scurrying to the office of the Northern Light. She was discreet, she did not give her source, she merely hinted.

"We'll be able to block that plan. We'll merely print it in full," Paul Barnett said. "Each one will think the other blabbed. And they'll all probably blame old Einar."

Thor said, almost sadly, "It's like that old cartoon of Nast's—the famous one—of the circle of political thieves each pointing to the man next him and saying, 'He did it.' They're old-fashioned plunderers, but it still seems to work."

Now, in the big luxurious Seattle office, as Czar cautiously indicated the child at the far end of the room, some atavistic instinct told Christine to shut her eyes. Snuggled in the engulfing depths of the chair by the window, the men saw the golden head touchingly cushioned against the plump tufted leather.

Czar relaxed. "She's asleep."

Dave Husack did not relish this cozy interlude in the battle of big business. "You shouldn't of brought her here in the first place."

Czar's tone was mild, paternal. "I make it a rule never to go anyplace I couldn't bring her if I was so minded." His eyes were cobalt.

"How's that again about who was it?" old Einar Wendt asked. Czar's father-in-law was over eighty now. He cupped his right ear with his hand, he spoke in the high monotonous voice of the deaf.

"Storm!" Husack bellowed. "Thor Storm, the old crackpot who runs that paper."

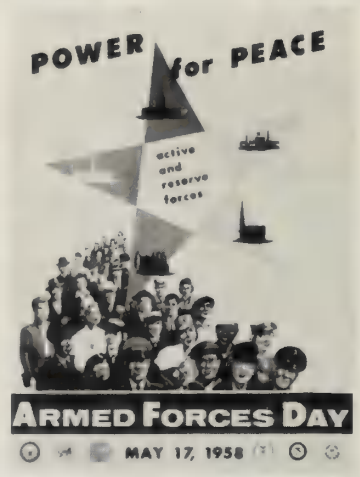
"What about him?"

"He's raising a stink, that's what. Papers outside are copying his stuff, he's been running articles and editorials and so on, he's got a column full of snide remarks about me and Kleet and the whole cannery crowd. He cor right out with names in Washington, it's lit we could sue him for a million dollars only poor old moosehead ——".

"No libel suits," Sid Kleet snapped. "T much publicity. There's other ways."

"Such as what?" Mort Caswell demand

"When the lifeblood stops flowing to y heart, what happens?" Kleet asked.



"I bite," young Mort said. "And I'll s time by answering. The heart stops beat and you die. R-r-right?"

Sid Kleet scarcely unclenched his teeth say, "Right. So what is the lifeblood o newspaper? Advertising. And when the adv tising stops, what happens? The newspa dies. So, gentlemen, if we tactfully convey the Baranof businessmen that they'd b ter quit advertising in Storm's Weekly No ern Light, or else their business might fall why, in practically no time that stink y spoke about will kind of evaporate away."

"No," said Czar Kennedy mildly.

"What's the objection?"

"No objection, Sid boy—that is, no ob tion to the plan as a plan. It's workable, say. But I believe in competition. Now, you advertising is the lifeblood of the newspa publishing business, and so it is. But comp tion makes a horse r as the fella says. I've ways been a great liever in competit Thor moves out with weekly, why, some o fella moves in wit weekly, some new cr pot. Now, Thor, know his gait and sp and staying power, you get a dark hors there, he's anybo guess."

"You mean you w go along with thi Dave Husack deman of Czar.

"Not for the p ent," Czar said gen "Not for the pres Dave boy."

Mort Caswell sl fled the papers on desk. He pushed back his chair. "Well, gen men, I don't believe there's anything m just now. We'll be meeting again tomorr I hate to be the one to break this up, b have a luncheon appointment at one ——"

Dave Husack stood up, a towering fig "Anyway, that advertising idea is kid stu Belligerently he turned toward Sid K "Tell Baranof businessmen to take their vertising away from Storm and they'll he's getting a tough deal, they'll stick by that's the way those crazy Alaska people There's other ways, better. When the comes, stop his print-paper supply."

Three now were standing. Only Czar mained seated. "Thor Storm," he said though ruminating, "has got a young there in the Northern Light, working for he's got a little bit of money in the paper Barnett his name is. Paul Barnett. He Harvard boy, but smart, you've got to h it to him. Real smart."

"What's that got to do with it?" Sid K snapped.

"Nothing. Maybe nothing. Only when talk about taking away the Northern Lig advertising and stopping the print paper so on, why, you don't know Thor and don't know Barnett. Boys, Thor would that weekly out if he had to print it on t paper with a lead pencil."

He rose leisurely, and walked the lengt the room to where the child sat. He place hand tenderly on her shoulder. "Christ Christine child."

She opened her eyes, she looked up at h "Grampa Czar, I'm hungry."

"Well, sure. So am I. We'll go back to the h and have a fine lunch. Rock crab and ice crea

CONTINUED ON PAGE 72

New deodorant preferred by 7 out of 10 women!

ban® rolls on protection that stays on!

More effective than messy creams*, easier to apply than drippy sprays! Not a crumbly stick!

Stops odor—checks perspiration round the clock!

- ✓ Won't irritate normal skin!
- ✓ Won't harm delicate fabrics!
- ✓ No mess, no drip, no waste!
- ✓ Exclusive patented applicator can't clog or freeze!
- ✓ Rolls on just the right amount!

*IN A SURVEY AGAINST THE LEADING CREAM DEODORANT, 7 OUT OF 10 PREFERRED BAN.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 70

She jumped from the chair, shook herself like a puppy. "I don't want to have lunch at the hotel. I want to have lunch down by the water at that place where the vegetables are all spread out, like a garden. And the Japanese sprinkle them with watering cans. And we can eat those tiny shrimps out of a paper bag."

She was startled by the whoop of laughter from the men. "Czar, you sure picked yourself a girl won't break you," Dave Husack shouted.

Her hand in Czar's, they walked down to the water front, and to the color and sound and delicious smells of mingled fruits and vegetables and berries and coffee and crullers and cheese and fish and apple pie and flowers of the Farmers' Market.

"I didn't like those men," she said. "Where we were."

"Why not?"

Something warned her not to reveal what she had heard. "They aren't like the people in Baranof."

Triumphantly he said, "That's just it. That's why I brought you with me to Seattle. I want you to get used to the way people act Outside. When you get older you're going to school Outside. Here, maybe. Listen to me, Christine. You're going to come into money someday. Big money. People are going to try to take it away from you, but you'll be too smart for them. I want you to know what it's good for and how to handle it."

"I know what it's good for and how to handle it, too," the child announced, with pride. "When I go to the Nugget Drugstore fo chocolate-nut bar I give the man cents and then he gives me a cho late bar."

"Chocolate bars!" But then he flected aloud, cannily, "Well, tha God, everything'll be in trust."

The United States Army ba sprang up, and the crystal Alaska was torn by the screeching and thu dering of fighter and bomber plan Young men wrapped in white pranksters on Halloween stepped f ward to the open doorway of a pl high in the sky, and at a given w they stepped out into nothing, kno ing that life depended on the jerki of a cord that might whimsically fuse to respond to the pull. Like gr snowflakes, they drifted down out the sky. Beneath the white coveri they bore lethal weapons that w no part of a prankster's equipme and in their heads was knowledge how one might survive for a br time on a terrain which ordinarily c not warrant human survival.

One would have thought that e perience such as this would ha bred in these men a deep distaste f the wild, relentless north country. curious thing happened. Scores them who had frozen and sweated the numbing cold and the clam heat of the Arctic mountains a tundras and forests and waters n with their G.I. college rights in th pockets, elected to come back to g an education at Baranof College.

They added fresh life to the town Baranof. Some of them stayed a became Alaskans. Army bases ring the town. Gay-hued private cars a drab Army cars and trucks swarm the pavements and pretty you mothers and vigorous young men a perambulators and strollers and to dlers imparted to Gold Street a virili that hit you with the impact of a blo Girls began to arrive from ever where. Again they were following t men into Alaska, but they were not all like those girls who had come the turn of the century. They look terribly young as they stepped off t plane into the icy airport in the i adequate pale blue coat and the litt high-heeled pumps, hatless, the pret dress belling out over the bouffa nylon petticoat.

No one in Baranof quite knew ho Bridie Ballantyne had become u official welcomer, chaperon, witne arranger and matron of honor for these girls. Perhaps, in the beginnin one of the Air Force men or one the construction workers had sa "Uh, Mrs. Ballantyne, I'm going be married day after tomorrow, thought you'd like to know, you be mighty nice to me getting me a quainted round. I'm having son trouble getting her a place to st overnight, she's coming in on t noon plane from Seattle tomorrow.

The girl on the plane had kept h hair in pins until the last possib moment and had then rushed to t lavatory to unpin the curls that spra in lovely tendrils to frame the flushe or pale face, the heart hammering s that it was hard to tell which w heartbeat and which the throbbing the great plane's engines. She put h hand to her breast where his A Force ring hung suspended by a sle der gold chain. Her face was presse against the window; as the pla taxied in, her eyes searched the figur at the airport gate. There he was, an beside him a white-haired woman wh looked a little like her mother, onl more smartly dressed.

There had arrived dozens—scores- hundreds of these in Baranof in th past few years. Now Bridie met th

PETER LAWFORD, STAR OF NBC-TV's "THE THIN MAN"

"You can always tell a HALO girl"

Her hair has that look-again look

You can always tell a Halo Girl,
You can tell by the shine of her hair.
The magic glow of a Halo Girl,
Goes with her everywhere.

The magic of Halo shampoo is pure and simple. Halo's modern cleansing ingredient is the mildest possible . . . the purest possible.

He'll love the satiny shine Halo's rich, rich brightening-and-smoothing lather brings to your hair.

Get that look-again look, today—with pure, sparkling Halo.

HALO glorifies as it cleans

COPYRIGHT 1958, THE COLGATE-PALMOLIVE CO

ne whenever asked. It became one of her ny projects and, urged by Thor Storm and Barnetts, the town finally voted her a tiny ury for the work.

Now she had an impromptu sort of office a remote corner of the Ice Palace lobby. desk was a ramshackle affair salvaged en the Miners' National Bank next door nt in for modern decoration. Daily Bridie at this desk for hours, while over its time-rred top passed such tales of romance, fail-, nostalgia, love unrequited, love fulfilled, es, despair as would have staggered any pient less sturdy than Bridie.

nevitably Chris Storm was drawn into this hazard project. She found herself repeat-y acting the role of bridesmaid at the wed-g of two people she never before had laid s on. Chris' first wedding was that of Paul nett and Addie. Addie was twenty-six en she arrived in Baranof for her wedding, to the seventeen-year-old Christine she med middle-aged, or almost. A college . Majored in journalism, had run the col-paper, and had even had a year of gen-l reporting on a Boston daily.

t was at the Barnett wedding that Chris-Storm met Ross Guildenstern for the t time. It might have been considered a ner odd little wedding party in any place Alaska. Besides the bridegroom there e Bridie Ballantyne, matron of honor; or Storm, Barnett's boss; Christine Storm, desmaid; Ross Guildenstern, groomsman. Chris looked at the young half-breed Es-o without designating him as a young half-ed Eskimo. She merely thought that he was rmously attractive and that this might be only in contrast with the other males of the wedding party. Paul Barnett, tall, loose-jointed. Grampa Thor Storm, impressive but an ancient in the eyes of the girl of seventeen.

When the energetic, red-haired Addie descended the plane steps Chris thought her rather plain and old for a bride. Then Addie had smiled and called out, "I never saw anything so dazzling in my life!"

"Who? Me?" Paul Barnett asked.

"Certainly not. The scenery between Juneau and here."

She stood looking up at him a moment, he down at her, with a sudden terrible shyness. Then she stood on tiptoe, he bent to her, his arms went round her.

"Scenery!" Bridie said. "Well, that's more like it."

The young bride seemed to find nothing extraordinary in the wedding attendants: the elderly man and woman, the girl of seventeen, the handsome olive-skinned young man. An hour later she was Mrs. Paul Barnett, properly married in church by the Reverend (Flying Missionary) Mead Haskell. The little group had scarcely reached the vestibule when Addie said, "I'd like to see the Northern Light office."

"Not now, for the love of heaven, girl!" Bridie, the romantic, was outraged. "We're having the wedding lunch at Nick's Caribou. Thor here is giving it, wine and all."

"Afterward then?"

Gently Thor said, "Perhaps lunch first would be the thing. And then the office. Don't expect anything like your Boston plant."

Christine thought this was not at all the way a new bride should behave, but the bridegroom was grinning and shaking his head waggishly.

"Remember what I told you yesterday, Thor? I said you and I would be lucky if we could keep our jobs after Addie came in."

It was not that Addie Barnett lacked the qualities of warmth and affection. Paul Barnett knew this and the others soon learned it. She became a fond and capable wife and mother, but she was a born newspaperwoman. Before the day was finished Addie knew almost as much about Baranof as many others who had lived a full year there. The red hair seemed to send out sparks, the face, plain in repose, was brilliant with animation.

On the drive from the church to the restaurant she sat between her husband and the Reverend Mead Haskell.

"Just Mr. Haskell," he said, in answer to her first question. "Or Mead. We don't do much about titles and forms and ceremony in Alaska. I suppose it's because everybody's working so hard."

Nick had arranged a corner in the vast private banquet room. "It looks like a barn in here, one table. But you don't want 'em all crowding in on you, day like this."

"I'm going to like it here," Addie said. She looked around the table. "I like it already."

"Wait," Ross Guildenstern said, "until the Eskimos boil you in seal oil, and the polar bears gobble you up, and the snow is over the rooftop, and there's nothing to eat but caviar and champagne and Persian melon and tenderloin of beef."

"Are all Eskimo men as handsome as you are?" Addie asked.

"My bride," Paul Barnett said plaintively, "on her wedding day."

The others laughed, but Ross said gravely, "Wait till you see me in my pilot's uniform. Kill you."

It was then that Chris, delighted, said, "I didn't know you were a pilot, Mr. Guildenstern." Suddenly she felt very adult.

"I only fly a freight crate. Maybe someday they'll give me a passenger plane."

"Why not now?" Addie demanded.

He shrugged. "Eskimo, I guess."

"But Guildenstern?" Addie pressed on.

"My father was Danish. But no relation to the gentleman you've met in the book."

On Ross Guildenstern's left temple, just below the hairline, there was a scar. It showed a thin white tracing against the darker skin. Chris looked at it, fascinated. She must ask her grandfather or perhaps Paul Barnett about that scar.

Addie Barnett saved her the trouble. "Is that scar on your temple a war memento?"

"Not really."

Mead Haskell took over. "He's war shy." He glanced round the table. "Tell them the story, Ross."

But he would not. Christine heard it later and remembered it always. So did the others, including Addie. But by that time World War stories were not even back-page news.

It looked almost like a toy, a silver-and-scarlet toy, standing there on the runway, if any unknowing eye had seen it. But it was Alaska winter night. There in the tiny cockpit Ross Guildenstern took it up thirty-two thousand feet, at which point the plastic top blew off as completely as you would chip the top off a soft-boiled egg. With it went his oxygen headpiece and that was his only connection with the mechanical reception of the world below him. But almost before that thought could form he had lost consciousness in the rarefied atmosphere. Consciousness returned as the plane nose-dived toward the earth. Instinctively he knew he must pull the ship up again. The toy was not planned for cruising in a low altitude, the fuel would not last down there. He was safe as long as he could stay high, high.

He pulled the plane up. There. Twenty-five thousand. Now again he lost consciousness. Again he awoke as the plane dived. Now, miraculously, below him in the darkness was the almost imperceptible suggestion of what might be Kinkaid Field. No headphone. No connection. Helpless, he looked down at what might be Kinkaid Field, no gas; helpless, the

NEXT MONTH

HOW TO BECOME A BEAUTY—IN EASY LESSONS

Five young women—career girls and mothers—blossomed from demureness to radiance. Dawn Crowell Norman tells you how, with make-up used correctly, a new hairdo and flattering colors near the face, it was done. "Beauty Workshop Lessons in Make-up."

WHAT DOES QUEEN ELIZABETH SEEK FOR HER SON?

The noisy little nine-year-old who is heir to the British throne has learned to make his own bed, shares a room with eight other boys at Cheam School. He gets 30 cents (2 shillings) spending money weekly and last winter had Asian flu. The queen, never allowed to go to school, wants Prince Charles' education to be quite different from her own. James Brough tells about opposition—within the palace and outside—which she is facing: "Can Queen Elizabeth Protect Her Son's Happiness?"

HOLLYWOOD ISN'T THE WAY YOU THINK IT IS

. . . not for the Beaumonts, at least. Hugh ("Leave It to Beaver") and Kathy, his wife, have three children. Starlet Kathy gave up acting when the first child was born. Hugh, a minister for four years, sometimes substitutes in local pulpits. He starred in 25 films before his current TV role. Meet them at home in "How America Lives."

WHEN MOTHERS HURT A DAUGHTER'S MARRIAGE

Is it interference or helpfulness when mothers listen to their married daughters' problems and give advice? Dr. Clifford Adams offers fourteen questions which will tell you, if you have a married daughter, whether you rate as menace or aid in her life. "Making Marriage Work."

ON DIET? DON'T DREAM OF HEARTY DESSERTS. YOU CAN ENJOY THEM.

Actresses, singers, models know how to lose weight but not their dispositions. Peggy Lee, Diana Lynn, Jayne Meadows and others share recipes for delicious beef Stroganoff, Nesselrode parfait and more prize dishes in "Low-Calorie Collector's Items."

THE NIGHT WAS HOLDING ITS BREATH . . .

They walked rapidly. This, Lou realized, was how she had been intended to feel—stared at, recognized, recoiled from. "You're Louise Royce," Sam Ingalls said. "Yes." She looked directly into his grayish eyes. "Is it all coming back to you, Mr. Ingalls?" The new mystery-love story, "The Face of the Tiger," by Ursula Curtis, is complete, condensed, in this issue.

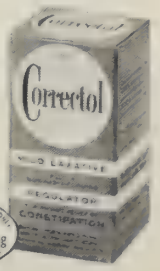
Also "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"; the prettiest dresses and accessories for the summer wardrobe; Dr. Spock's page for mothers; recipes for delicious party dishes to cook, freeze and then serve, and many, many other features, all coming

IN THE JUNE JOURNAL

Because a woman's constipation problems are different

Here's a special laxative for women that regulates without "forcing"

Now, try a new type of laxative! Try Correctol...developed especially for you and your delicate, sensitive system!



Old-fashioned laxatives, as you know, work by "forcing." Correctol works differently!

Even during the changes that a woman's system normally undergoes—menstruation, pregnancy, after childbirth—Correctol gives sure, gentle relief more naturally than any laxative ever before. And it's ideal for women past middle age, too.

The secret of Correctol is a non-laxative miracle regulator—with a wonderful action that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains a small amount of mild laxative—just enough to give regularity a start.

For the fast relief you want—in a gentle, more natural way—get new Correctol. At all drugstores—30 tiny pink tablets, only $1.00.

Correctol®
A special laxative for women

ALSO AVAILABLE EVERYWHERE IN CANADA

unseen faces must be turned up toward him, up there dead or alive in the little silver-and-scarlet toy that was dropping so swiftly toward the earth.

In the small hut near the runway, Ground Approval Control repeated, "You're too low! You're too low!" though Ross could not hear him. Ground Control forced himself to resist the impulse to crouch and hug the floor as the toy seemed to skim the hair of his head.

Ross came down almost gently, he put the plane down on the field in the darkness and they came running toward him. He was a bundle, limp but living, as they lifted his body in the clumsy straps and trappings, the face battered and bloody. "Nice work," they said to the unconscious form. "Nothing like a little fresh air while you're working," they said. A month later he was out of the hospital and flying another dainty silver-and-scarlet toy.

Now the real battle for Christine began. She was seventeen; no longer a child, not yet a woman.

"Washington State University is the place for her," Czar said. "I don't want her to go east to school, the way my—the way her mother did."

"What's wrong with Baranof College?" Thor argued.

Bridie, distracted as a hen whose lone chick is being swooped upon by hawks, entered the fray. "Why don't you let the child decide for herself?"

"She hasn't had the experience to decide a thing as important as this," Czar said.

"But she's experienced enough to live in Seattle alone?"

"She won't be alone. Mrs. Husack and Dave and the Caswells and Kleet will be looking after her. By the time she's finished she'll be twenty-one, a woman grown, she'll know how to behave in decent society."

Thor stood up now, the towering frame seemed to take on even greater dimensions, the blue eyes turned strangely dark, but the rosy face was mild, the tone reasoning.

"I'm as much Christine's guardian as you are. You know that. Until she comes of age."

"She's going to Seattle and civilization. She's going around with a lot of mongrels here. And people too old for her. That Guildenstern I hear he's been taking some G.I. course at Baranof, and flying a bush crate."

"That young man," Thor said, "could make a plane singlehanded if he had to, out of oil drums and a T-model Ford."

"They're all natural-born mechanics, I'll say that for them. But that's not saying I'm going to allow my granddaughter to run around with one of them."

Cheerfully Thor chided him. "Are you pretending you've forgotten Christine is part Eskimo herself?"

Always ivory pale, Czar's skin now took on a curious clay color like the waxen skin of the dead. "I know that my daughter married your son. I suppose he was your son. I wish she had died first."

Bridie flung out her arm as though she had been physically struck. "You can't say that in front of me, Czar Kennedy. You're wishing Chris herself dead when you say that, or never born at all. Shame to you!"

Czar ignored her. He was looking at Thor. "I don't know who you are. Fifty years, and I don't know anything about you. Nobody in Alaska does."

"There's nothing to know, Czar."

"Uh-huh. That's why you've kept your life a secret. I'll tell you what I think. You're a criminal. No man hides out unless he's got a good reason for not wanting his face where it can be seen and traced."

"Let me tell you," Thor remarked cheerfully, "hiding is a difficult feat for a man who is six feet four."

A grayish film seemed to come down over Czar Kennedy's eyes. "I'll get detectives. Private detectives. They'll trace you right back if it takes years."

God is love; and the love of husband and wife brings us nearer to the heart of reality, the knowledge of God, than any other experience.

DEAN WILLIAM RALPH INGE

The ruddy giant shook his head sadly. wish I could make you understand why y want to destroy me. I know. Your hatred understandable to me."

"I don't hate you. Though I know, if wasn't for you, my wife would likely be al today and my daughter, too, and I'd proba have other grandchildren. Now listen. I'm ing to make it impossible for you to have a thing to say about my daughter's child. N week I've a man going over to Norway, h track you, fifty years is nothing to him."

Bridie looked at him and saw danger in face, now flushed, that habitually was so c orless. "Now Czar, you'll be sick, a man your age. A stroke, if you're not careful."

He glared at her. "Get out of this, Bric This is between the two of us."

Thor had been silent, his clear blue e fixed on Czar speculatively. Thor said, "Y win, Czar. I'll make a bargain with you. I tell the truth about myself—and you prove it easily—will you credit ten thousa dollars to Christine's account in the Min National Bank?"

"Take me for a fool?"

"It costs money to send men to Cop hagen and Stockholm and Oslo. Cheaper give it to Christine and let me tell you."

"How will I know you're telling the truth

"You will know. From past experience. I will warn you it will sound ridiculous."

"How do you mean—ridiculous?"

"I'll make it brief as possible. You'll w a check now, made out to Christine for thousand dollars. Bridie will hold the ch until I've said what I have to say. If eithe you feels that I'r possible disgrace Christine ——"

"—— then I'll sole guardian," C finished for him.

Thor considered a moment in siler "Yes. With this sec provision: neither you will ever speak what I'm going to you, to Christine, to anyone else." He sm at Bridie. "That's going to be harder for than for Czar here."

"I promise." She raised her right hand.

Czar had taken a checkbook from an in pocket, his pen from another. He wr swiftly. He looked at Thor. "I'll promise, it's for Christine."

Thor said, "The truth is, Czar, I come stock and class that would be called old-fa ioned now, here in modern American Alas I come of the Scandinavian nobility—N wegian as you know; but the Norwegian r family is all mixed up in its history and politics with the Swedish nobility, and Danish especially."

"Nobility?" Czar repeated the word though not quite hearing.

"I was nowhere in line for the crow don't mean that. But I was a studen wanted only to study and know. Every knew that Oscar would resign in time ——"

"Oscar?"

"The king. But of course he wasn't a N wegian, he was a Dane, and then when he up the crown, Haakon came in—anot Dane—and his wife, Queen Maud, was E lish, the youngest daughter of Edward of E land. By that time I had gone, and well ou it. I was to have married a Danish ——"

"—— princess!" Bridie yelped.

"I don't believe a word of it," Czar s

Thor said, "My papers are in the bank in Seattle. They've been there for years years. You can see them. I want you t Smiling, he turned to Bridie. "No, Bridie dear, she wasn't a princess, though she princess now, if she's still alive, which I th she isn't."

Almost—but not quite—defeated, C put a last question. "If it's true—and I d swallow it—what do you want here? W are you doing here?"

"I've lived the life I wanted to live. earned my living as you know, fishing in summer season, trapping in the winter; read and learned. And I've written. I've pu

CONTINUED ON PAGE 76

Change These "Danger Zones" to "Beauty Zones" in Just 7 Days with this new 2-way moisturizer!

★ Frown lines!
★ Crow's feet!
★ Flaky patches!
★ Expression lines!
★ Crepey throat!

Now flood precious moisture deeper into the "danger zones" where dry-skin lines tell lies about your age! Get the two-way benefits of new Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. This remarkable blend of skin softeners and rich, beauty-giving lanolin acts to moisturize and soften your face and throat.

Woodbury's new deeper moisturizing ingredients and deeper softening ingredients penetrate as never before to help your skin feel fresher and smoother, look younger!

Use this silky, fragrant cream as a moisturizing cleanser and as a skin softener. In just 7 days you'll see the "danger zones" change to "beauty zones" or your money back! 25¢ to $1.

WOODBURY LANOLIN RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

New...and softly pink

Serena® by Modess®

The luxury sanitary napkin...gossamer-soft to pamper you...contains a deodorant

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 74

all down, year after year. Maybe no one will ever read it. The history of this Alaska."

Czar stood up, his hands in his pockets, he began to pace the room. Suddenly: "Christine know this? Any of it?"

"No, no! I told you that. That's the bargain."

"What would her—uh—her title be?"

"Nothing."

"She's the daughter of a fella whose father is supposed to be a—well, anyway, was ——"

"You see how foolish it sounds! Counts are passé and barons and kings and queens and princesses."

But Czar was not listening. Almost wistfully he mused aloud, "I'd have liked Christine to be a—what was it?—a ——"

"She isn't. If you repeat any of this I'll deny it. What a snob you are, Czar! You pretend to be plain and simple. You love power and position."

"You two," Bridie commanded, "stop calling each other names and get practical. It was Chris' schooling started this, so let's go back to it. I'm holding this check for ten thousand, Czar. I guess you don't think what Thor's been telling us is a disgrace, exactly. Well, then?"

"Let's have her in," Thor said. "It's her education, it's her life."

When the girl came in she looked from one to the other. "I decided long ago. I'm going to Baranof two years and then to the University of Washington two years. I put in my application long ago, Ross told me you have to, with all those G.I. rights ——"

"Learn you, I hope," Bridie said to the two silent men. "She's grown up."

She was seventeen. It was June. Three months of Arctic summer, three months of daylight twenty-four hours around the clock before the wintry autumn came; the autumn of her freshman year at Baranof College. The rapier rays of the constant sun forced every growing thing into fabulous maturity. month ago there was ice on the rivers a lakes and inlets. Now they were merry with t shouts of swimmers. The cabbages, the ros the rhubarb, the delphinium seemed to spri overnight (or overday) from seed or bulb full-grown product. Christine Storm, too, those blindingly brilliant months, emerg from the chrysalis of girlhood into woma hood.

"In a way," Thor had said that first week June, "these next two years belong to me, far as Chris' education is concerned. In way."

A strange pair—the massive old man a the lovely young girl—as they traveled t next two years up and down this glittering most mythical world of the Arctic. Sometim Bridie joined them, a vivacious and galla third in her modish clothes that defied col discomfort and occasional danger.

Chris was as stuffed with Alaska lore as Strasbourg goose is with grain. They travel by plane—single-, twin- and four-engi planes. They traveled by dog sled. They ev used trains once or twice.

At the close of the first college year h friends said, "What are you going to do th summer, Chris?" They had plans for a sur mer at the lake cottage, a trip to McKinl Park, a job at Cramer's Curio Mart.

"I'm going salmon fishing with my Gram Storm."

"Just you and your grandfather?" th asked incredulously. They felt sorry for her.

Out with Thor on his boat, she felt so for them. Here she was, gay and yet relax She could not account for it, she did not t She would turn on the radio and now a then something would come through- squawk of news, a crooner's whine. She was and out, buffeted by the cold wind, soothed the cabin's coffee-scented warmth.

"I feel as if I were floating in a vacuum she said.

"You're afloat all right," Thor said. hope."

"Are we going to Oogruk this summer?"

"Depends."

"Ross Guildenstern said that if he knew th date ahead of time he might wangle things as to pilot us."

He looked at her thoughtfully. "Perha we'll put it off until next year."

"Oh, no!"

"Why are you so crazy about Oogruk all a sudden?"

"I've always wanted to see it. It sounds fa cinating." Then, naïvely, "Ross Guildenste was born there. He knows everybody Oogruk."

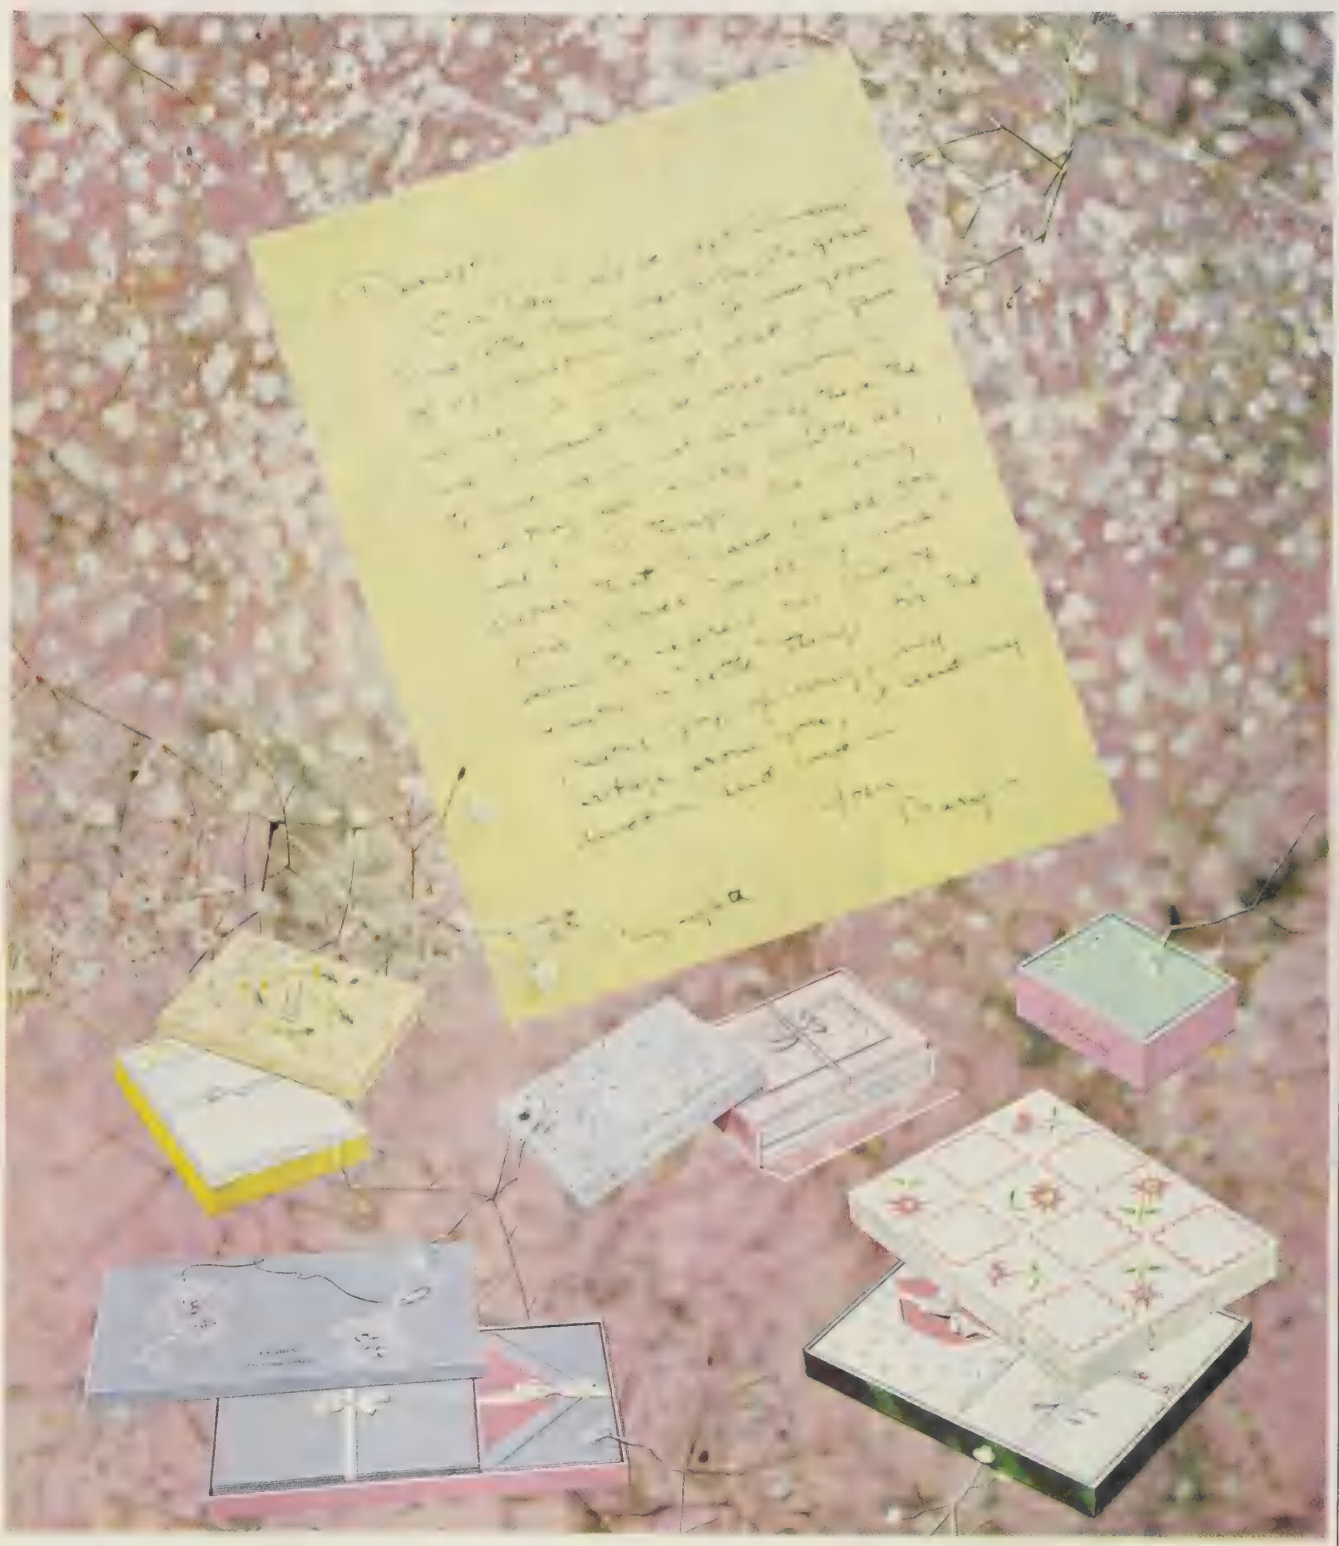
"That would make it more interesting," I said rather flatly. "Of course I know Oogr pretty well." He was silent. She waite "We'll see."

Seattle said that Bayard Husack hadn't a justed. They did not phrase it that way. Seattle put it, "That young Husack—Ba they call him—hasn't taken hold since he ca home."

He had returned from the war in late 194 handsomer than ever, feminine Seattle agree And not a scratch on him, male Seattle adde But six years had gone by, he was thirty-or and whatever it was that he had been su posed to take hold of had eluded him.

Bay's mother said to Dave Husack, in d fense of their son, "He'll take hold in time."

Louise Husack loved her son blindly, a believed this. Dave Husack loved his son, wi reservations, and rejected this.



"Time! He's been playing around for s years now."

"He's at the office every day."

"Two hours for lunch. When I say I wa him to go to Alaska for a few weeks, lea something about where all that dough com from he spends on cars and boats and stuff, says, 'No, thank you very much,' as if I made a joke."

Whenever Dave took these matters up wi his son, Bay listened in a polite but detach way which infuriated the older man. Dav seated at his office desk, at the end of the d glared at his son.

"What do you want, anyway?"

For Mother's Day or any day; for those you love the best . . . for those who love the best as you do . . . Eaton's.

BUTTERCUP—Letter paper with a novel top fold abloom with buttercups. $1.25. LOVE LETTERS—Sheerest paper veils the dainty moss-rose envelope pattern. Assorted, five tints. $2.50. PUSSY WILLOW—Notes with the symbol of Spring in an engraved panel design. $1. DECORATOR COLORS—Deckled, hand-bordered paper, lined envelopes. Master-colorist's combinations. $1.59. SHOWER OF FLOWERS—Notes and letters in daisy-decorated envelopes, telling of your good taste. $2.

If your quest be Beauty EATON'S Fine Letter Papers

EATON PAPER CORPORATION PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

t a thing, dad."
u ought to be married by now and vo or three kids and be in shape to run siness—if necessary. Which," he added , glancing down at himself, "it isn't. But loesn't interest you, as a job, what does?
it. What would you like to do?"
handsome head did not turn away from ndow. "I just told you. Not a thing. I ought to say I've been wanting to write , or go into politics, or take up ranch-his business is all right; it's legitimate ccessful, but there's no gamble in it, no for error. It's like a bullfight. No mat-v much he paws the ground and bellows, dead bull before he sets foot in the ring.
s all that fish and timber and metal uff in Alaska, but no matter how much ing and the rest of them roar, it's all I guess I'm just not interested in being ghter. I'm more the audience type."
e Husack's face was dangerously em-
d. "If you don't like money ——"
o. I haven't said I didn't. I think it's I'm just not interested in the art of get-
. I don't even feel guilty about it, the lot of rich men's sons do. I'm no second d generation Rockefeller or Lamont or all Field. I think money's fine."
e Husack's voice started low because as if he were choking, but it rose triumph-y in volume. "Why, you skunk, I've a otion to sock you, big as you are. You contemptible ——" re was a sharp rap at the door. It d.
me in," Bay called.
y out!" Dave yelled. The door opened now, and Dina entered.
ey can hear you as far as the floor. There's a crowd in the standing there the elevators
"
u keep out of ill you!" Dave
.
ignored this. "Will one of you battlers ne home? I mean home to your house.
r is busted and I promised Aunt Louise the place cards and the flowers for the party."
e's face was contorted with inner con-Dinner party. I'm not going to any dinrty."
s you are, Uncle Dave." She placed a of papers on his desk. "And sign these."
aced a pen beside the papers. He seated f heavily, he began to scrawl his signa-s she picked up each sheet. "Drive me Bay?"
hy not?" Bay said.
n't gush," she retorted.
e Husack did not look up as his hand
l jerkily across paper after paper. "I'll go with you. Call Emilio and tell him not e for me."
minutes later the three were seated side le in Bay's car. Any casual observer have seen three extraordinarily hand-people, relaxed, pleasure-bound. The at between the two men, her knee d Bay's lightly, Dave's knee pressed eavily, the three had in common one Seething frustration.

a Drake was the Husacks' official pro-everyone in Seattle knew this. "She's daughter to them," they had said in the ning, because this was Louise Husack's ted phrase. "She's like a daughter to us, ouldn't be dearer if she was our own. Of e her mother and I were brought up al-like sisters in Kansas City. She married enenhauer and they stayed right there in as City to the day they died in that awful
. Dina was in Hollywood—her real name
Dorothy Bienenhauer but she changed it na Drake when she wanted to get into es. They didn't appreciate her in pic-
I don't know why, with her lovely looks ll, but I guess it's all having pull, or
. We kept in touch after the tragedy, she
's called me Aunt Louise when she wrote.
when she kept writing how tired she was,
and lonely, I asked her to come here and pay us a visit. And now I don't know what we'd do without her. We fixed her up with a little apartment of her own and Dave got her to take a kind of secretarial course, and then after my little illness—it wasn't really a stroke—Dina began to kind of help out—pinch hitting, Dave calls it—for me as hostess here at the house. She's like a social secretary and a business secretary and a daughter all rolled into one. She's always there ready to pitch in and help. Dina's close-mouthed too. Sometimes I think maybe too close-mouthed. She never told me she'd been married in Hollywood, it only came out when the fellow was killed in a car crash just like her mother and father's, it's as if she was haunted by tragedy. I hope not. She doesn't complain. Dina's no relation, but I always say she's like a daughter to us."

In the past year Louise Husack had ceased to repeat this oft-told tale. In the past year or two Seattle's eyebrows had gone higher and higher until they threatened the very hairline. Bay Husack was the most eligible bachelor in Seattle. Dina Drake may have been sweetness and light to the Husack household, but she rather antagonized the matrons and daughters and even the sons of the Husacks' social set.

She was, they admitted, lovely-looking. She had enormous natural style. She did not make an effort to be more than barely polite to them. For this she had two reasons. She was concentrating with all her charm, energy, intelligence and ambition on Bay Husack. And she was scared to death of the memory of those months in Hollywood when she had known such insecurity and fear and cruelty as to mark her for life.

So now she spent some hours weekly at the Husack offices. She was on hand to take visiting big-business wives shopping or touring the city. She supervised Louise Husack's dinner and luncheon parties. Sometimes Dina even accompanied Dave on his business trips, now that Louise was more or less incapacitated. No one but Dina and Dave knew how pure in deed, at least, these business trips were. Dina was completely determined and relentless. Security was what she wanted and would have; she wanted no frolic in a big, uninquisitive, luxurious chain-hotel suite.

If Dina, in her secretarial capacity, accompanied Dave on one of these west-east business trips, Dave always returned with a lavish gift for his semi-invalid wife.

"Brought you a little trinket, Lou," he would say. "Dina helped me pick it out. I'm scared of those saleswomen; they could sell me anything, but not Dina. She knows."

The gift might be jewelry, a mink wrap, a cashmere coat soft as cream, lingerie, even occasionally a dress.

"Why, Dave!" Louise would exclaim as she lifted the treasure from its velvet or satin or tissue cocoon. "It's lovely, just perfectly exquisite!" A week, two weeks, perhaps a month would go by. There would be a secret session between Louise and her protégée. "Dina dear, I don't want to hurt Mr. Husack's feelings," she said then, "or yours either, goodness knows, because you helped him pick it out, but I've got no use for these things. White mink." She held it up, she shook it smartly so that the glistening hairs sprang to still more luxuriant profusion. "How would I look in a white mink cape!"

"Why, Aunt Louise, that fur looks lovely against your skin."

She was not altogether without humor, Louise. "Thanks, dear, but the important thing is, how does my skin look against that fur?" She laughed ruefully at her own joke.

In another week or thereabouts, Louise would venture, tentatively, to shift the gift to a more vernal background.

"David, I just love that mink stole"—or sapphire-and-diamond clip, or alligator bag or French lingerie—"but honestly, maybe it's my imagination, but I think it isn't right for me, beautiful as it is. Maybe Dina could wear them or exchange them . . . white mink with her black hair . . . all that jewelry in the bank vault. I don't wear half of it, it just stays there . . . Dina wears those slinky black dresses so much, a good clip just sets the whole thing off."

To her friends Louise would say, "David brings me the craziest extravagant presents, I can't make him stop. . . . Dina dear, show Mrs. Ballinger the new fur piece. . . . There, doesn't she look lovely! I tell David he can imagine I'm wearing it, kind of by proxy."

"And what does he say?" Mrs. Ballinger asked with awful composure.

"Oh, he laughs."

"I bet," said Mrs. Ballinger, biting off the two words, with a look at Dina.

It was the growing opinion that somebody ought to wise up Louise. No one cared to assume this delicate mission.

"Hard as nails, that girl," they said. "But Joe says there's absolutely nothing between her and old Dave. Joe as good as put it to him. Not in so many words, I don't mean. But roundabout, and Dave told him confidentially that Bay and the girl were practically engaged. He said nothing could make him and Louise happier, Dina was like a daughter to them and had been ever since she came. Well, figure it out. I can't."

Too much idleness, I have observed, fills up a man's time much more completely, and leaves him less his own master, than any sort of employment whatsoever. EDMUND BURKE

"I've helped thousands of women plan trips by air. Why don't you let me make your vacation easier . . . and more fun?"

SAYS Mary Gordon TWA TRAVEL ADVISOR

Wondering about what holiday clothes to take . . . and how to pack them? The best way to take your small heir by air? The fare to New York . . . or California? Write Mary Gordon of TWA! She'll answer your questions promptly and send you free booklets brimming with travel hints. Mary's unique "advance" help is one of the many reasons why more women fly TWA than any other airline. Others . . . the wonderful TWA Family Plan . . . thrifty Sky Club Coach service. Ask your travel agent.

For the finest holiday ever . . . mail this coupon now!

Mary Gordon, TWA Travel Advisor, Dept. LH5-8, Trans World Airlines, 380 Madison Ave., N. Y. 17
Please send me the following free information:

NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

FLY THE FINEST
FLY TWA

☐ Climates and Clothes
☐ Let's talk about New York
☐ Let's talk about California

The ounce—fourteen dollars plus tax

PERFUME BY LENTHÉRIC

Sometimes the quietly cynical and observant Bayard Husack thought he, too, could not figure it out. Dina pursued him with the relentlessness of a prey-stalking tigress. Her little apartment was the convenient background for their occasional love-making, but Bay never had said to her, "I love you."

Now Dave Husack and Bayard, his son, and Dina Drake sat in the oversized sports car. The Husacks had stayed up on the Hill overlooking the bay and Puget Sound. Family after family moved to outlying districts, but Dave's house had been his first substantial proof of stupendous financial success. It was a beloved symbol necessary to his self-sustenance. Of its ugly old-fashioned, comfortable and overstuffed kind, it was perfection.

Louise Husack came toward them as the three entered the hallway that had the dimensions of an assembly room. Her face was alight and eager like that of a child or a lonely woman.

"Well, I didn't know what had happened to you. I want to show you something, David; you too, Bay. Guess who's coming here to school at Washington U. next autumn: Czar Kennedy's granddaughter! Here's his letter. I'd like to write him I'd just as soon she'd come and stay right here with us. It certainly would be lovely to have a young girl around the house."

"Hey, mom," Bay said. "Just hold everything. We don't want a kid around the house."

"He sent a picture of her. Look. She isn't a kid. She's grown up."

Dina Drake, on her way to the dining room, turned and joined the three. "In a parka, I'll bet."

But she wasn't. "Say!" Bay exclaimed.

"I remember," Dave said. "Nice little kid. I saw her once when Czar brought her along for a meeting or something. Bright yellow hair. And the blackest eyes."

Dina said, "Do you think she'll stay with you?"

Louise Husack referred again to the letter in her hand. "It says here, no. Czar's letter says in the college dormitory—college rules—and she likes to be independent."

As she and Thor stood at the Baranof airport awaiting their plane's flight announcement, Chris saw him as he swiftly crossed the strip and ran up the loading stairway.

"There's Ross," she exclaimed. "He did get the run." She turned to Bridie, who had just bustled up to join them. "Ross is going to pilot us as far as Oogruk. Isn't it wonderful!"

Bridie Ballantyne jerked her hat forward and settled her shoulders. "Maybe, if he keeps on flying. When I'm on a plane I don't want any pilot to be giving a floor show, visiting around and explaining the scenery. Let them fly the plane and I'll find my own scenery."

The twin-engine plane was an ancient but respectable DC-3. As Thor and Bridie and Chris entered they saw, without thinking it at all remarkable, that the seats had been removed along one entire side. This space was packed with the frozen skinned carcasses of moose mingling affably with the chilled passengers across the aisle.

To offset this slight informality, the old plane asserted her social position by equipping herself with the young and pretty stewardess Gerda Lindstrom, garnished with a manicure, a recent coiffure and a figure-following blue uniform; a pilot and a copilot; snacks served at practically all hours; somewhat cracked loud-speaker dissertations on the weather.

It was too early for the tourist tide. The plane was less than half filled. There were a handful of construction workers, a half dozen young men in Army uniform, and a middle-aged couple with apprehensive faces.

"I'm going to help Gerda with the coffee," Bridie announced and bustled off. "She never gets it hot enough, anyway."

Two of the young Army men were already asleep. While the plane soared over the wastes of this incredible landscape their faces in repose under the pitiless scrutiny of the brilliant Arctic light were as unmarked, as defenseless as the faces of children.

The middle-aged man in the eyeglasses and the Basque beret had been padding up and down the aisle peering through every window except that which belonged to his own seat. He now stopped beside Chris and Thor.

"How do you do, sir," he said.

Thor cheerfully returned the greeting as one who, for fifty years, has been addressed by strangers.

"You made this trip before?" the man asked.

"Yes. Many times."

"Is that right!" He seemed relieved. He raised his voice to address the woman of the flowered hat. "Irma, this gentleman has made this trip a lot of times." He turned again to Thor. "All right, is it? I mean, this plane——"

"You can relax and enjoy every minute of the trip," Thor assured him. "The record of this line is just about perfect. And the land around here is what they call permafrost ground. It's frozen all the year round. You can put a plane down on it anywhere, any time."

"Say! I wouldn't want to do that." Uneasily he looked out at the formidable landscape. "You live around here?"

"I live in Baranof."

The man extended his hand. "Polar is my name. Alwin Polar. My wife Irma back of you there."

"Storm. Thor Storm. This is my granddaughter, Christine Storm."

"Happy to make your acquaintance," the man said. "We played Juneau, Anchorage and Baranof, so that makes us old sourdoughs, I tell Irma. The Roller Polars, our act is called. We do an act on roller skates, so the title isn't only catchy, it describes the act."

"No!" Thor exclaimed, stunned.

"We've toned it down a little the last few years. I don't whirl Irma by the heels any more like I used to; you could do that those days when you had a real stage you could work on. Nowadays those night-club little stages, they're like a postage stamp."

Bridie minced precariously up the aisle, a laden paper plate in either hand. Thor stood up. "Bridie, give one of those to Mrs. Polar there, will you? And you keep the other and sit down beside her. She's never taken this trip before. Mr. Polar and I are going to have a chat in one of those vacant seats."

For the first time in her life, perhaps, Christine felt deserted. She stared out the window at the blue-and-crystal universe. Bridie's voice chattering through the beat of the engines was like a piccolo note through drumbeats. C tine closed her eyes. She must have slept a Someone sat in the seat beside her, she op her eyes instantly. It was only Bridie.

"Those two," she confided. "They've the most interesting life. They're thea people, would you think to look at t They used to be in vaudeville."

The forward door opened, Ross Gui stern came through. "Hi, Mr. Storm, hi, Ballantyne." He looked at Christine. want to come up front, take over the co for a while?"

"No, she don't!" Bridie trumpeted. "I off if she does." They laughed agreeab this timeworn joke. Bridie went on. "You to chat with us, wait till we all get to Oogr

"That's what I wanted to know." He wa looking at Chris. "Where you going to

"The Trading Post," Chris said. "Is right, grampa?"

"Yes," Thor said. "Raffsky's Tra Post."

"It sounds rough," Chris said hap "and like old sourdough days."

Thor and Ross broke into shouts of la ter.

"What's so funny?" Chris demanded.

"You'll see," Ross said. "Look. Aft drop you people at Oogruk I have to these boys on up. I'll be back tomorrow n ing, or maybe even late tonight. I've wa it so I can stay a day and another night a you up to Barrow on the Wednesday ru love to show you Oogruk and Barrow I've got cousins all over the place, my g mother lives in Oogruk. Of course if y got other plans——"

"I just want Christine to see somethi this part of Alaska," Thor was saying. tember will be the end of it for two yea Christine."

Bridie began to fidget, she tucked blanket tighter and, leaning back, shut eyes.

Ross grinned. "I'm going, Mrs. Ballant But everything's under control, really. copilot's up front."

Bridie's eyes flashed open a second, cl again. "If he was as good as you are he' pilot. Nobody ever sold me a substitute. I at those peaks; we just missed that one.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 81

"Fifteen years we've been married and suddenly I realize I don't know you at all."

Maybe that's how you know it's real...

I was in and out of love a couple of times before I met Jim . . . at least I thought I was.

But this time everything is different. Poems about love don't seem silly anymore, and songs I've known and sung all my life suddenly have new meaning for me.

From the moment I met Jim, I found myself wanting to make him happy...to do the things he enjoyed. Then, before we knew it, we were adding up our dreams of what a home should be like.

Oh, we didn't always agree on little things. But on important things we saw eye to eye. Nothing second best. A few good pieces of furniture. Real, solid silver—International Sterling, because we believe every home should start with a possession that is precious and imperishable.

When you choose your family silver, ask to see the many handsome International Sterling patterns. See—hold in your hand—the slim delicate beauty of the newest International pattern, Pine Spray.

Here—captured forever in solid silver—is the sweeping grace of a spray of pine. Beauty that can never be matched in other tableware. Shining, mellow loveliness that will never wear out—only increase with daily use.

Buy your International Sterling a piece or a place setting at a time, or take home the 42-piece Family Living Service for eight. You can pay for it later if you wish, a few dollars a week.

International Sterling

The solid silver with beauty that lives forever.

Sterling for now
d for you

New PINE SPRAY

RHAPSODY

ROYAL DANISH

PRELUDE

The International Silver Co.,
Meriden, Connecticut
All patterns made in U. S. A.
Many also made and
available in Canada

So silky, so smooth, so freshly fragrant!

Cashmere Bouquet Talcum Powder does such lovely things for you!

That skin-slim bathing suit will slip right on without a wiggle if you smooth silky Cashmere Bouquet talc over your skin. Always have it with you at the beach! Carry it in Cashmere Bouquet's "special offer" beach bag. (See right for details.)

Send for your double-duty beach bag! A waterproof bag to carry your suit, towel and talc! And you can blow it up to make a pillow for lazing in the sun. A fabulous value at only 50¢ (incl. Fed. excise tax) plus sales slip from your purchase of Cashmere Bouquet talcum powder. Send to Pillow Bag, P. O. Box 888, New York 17, N. Y.

It's like climbing right into a bouquet, when you feel the cool, petal-soft touch of Cashmere Bouquet talc! Smooth it all over—and there you are—all pampered and perfumed with a Spring-fresh fragrance! Use it after every bath.

Give your face powder a luminous look! Sprinkle a little Cashmere Bouquet talc right into your powder. The imported talc in Cashmere Bouquet is extra-silky and has a lovely luminosity—gives your powder a sparkling lift!

Cashmere Bouquet TALCUM POWDER

The fragrance men love

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 78

Watch for the sea," he said. He was off, he slt the cockpit door, disappeared.

he interior of the plane was colder now. T cold seemed to cut through the closed dor, the windows, the floor boards. "Might a vell be flying in a sieve," Bridie said.

Gerda Lindstrom was entertaining the n nt-club entertainers. "—— and the word E imo means Man Who Eats Sea Animals, tly say. . . . Oh, yes, they still go whaling in sn boats, but things have changed, nowadays s metimes they just step into a little bush p ne, set it down on an ice floe, harpoon a w le and fly back the same day. . . . No, we d n't fly over the North Pole ——"

Christine touched Bridie's arm. "Bridie, I th k we're beginning to come down. My ea s."

Gerda Lindstrom ceased being the hostess. H voice took on the tone of stewardess authority: "Fasten your seat belts, please, we be in Oogruk in about ten minutes. Fasten ur seat belts, please."

There were a few young Eskimo loungers at airstrip waiting to see the plane from Baranof come in. Oogruk did not boast an airt building. The little one-street Eskimo lage squatted on the shores of Bering Strait. Oogruk never had seen a train. Oogruk boasted automobile only. Oogruk traveled by dog l or by airplane.

n the clear air the little wooden houses a e distant were dark dots on the gray of ice l land. A station wagon awaited the passengers.

Standing apart with two local airplane-mpany employees, Ross Guildenstern was cking his papers. Luggage was being unded. A slim young man stepped out of the repit station wagon.

Ross, glancing up, saw him. "Hi, Norman! re, let me help with those." Wordless, the ng man lifted a palm in greeting. "Mrs. llantyne, this is Norman Raffsky—Mrs. idie Ballantyne . . . Miss Christine Storm." Thor Storm joined the group. "Hello, Norn, my boy. There are two more passengers; y're not staying at your place, they're going the Airline House."

Norman transferred himself to the driver's t. The Roller Polars, breathless, scrambled o the back. Bridie and Christine already re seated. Thor climbed in beside Norman ffsky.

Ross stuck his head in at the window which Chris sat. "I'll be back tomorrow, e, and maybe late today if I push it."

The car started with a series of convulsive ks, then they were off in a roar that subed into a succession of snorts.

They were nearing the huddle of houses and acks, they skirted the shore. "Say," Alwin lar quavered from the rear seat, "this sure oks like the end of the world."

"Wait till you see Barrow," Thor shouted ck, "you'll think this is Chicago."

But the others were not listening. Their es were stamped with a look of bewilderent. The station wagon seemed to be standg still. The world was rushing by. "Wait a nute!" Bridie yelled. "What's happening?" Gently Thor said, "Stop a minute, Norman, ll you?" The station wagon shivered to a ndstill. The world rushed by even faster n before. They were on the beach path, d Thor pointed toward the ice-packed ter.

"Why, Bridie! And you, too, Chris. You ght to know. You've seen the spring eakup often enough. Here it's later and bigr and swifter. That's the ice going out. It's shing down from the Arctic to the Bering a. Did you ever see a current like that? If u were to hop one of those big ice plateaus hirling past us there, you'd get a free ride to ome in no time—if you stayed on."

Norman Raffsky started the car again, it aped into the air like a bronco spurred. The r rounded a slight curve and stopped before neat white-painted two-story building. In rge black letters the sign on the front read:

RAFFSKY'S HOTEL AND TRADING POST

"But it isn't a trading post at all!" Chris protested. "It's as big as the Pole Star Hotel back home and better-looking."

"You sound like a tourist, Christine," Thor said almost crossly.

Bridie stepped out into the blinding late-June sunshine, the icy late-June air. She straightened her hat, wrapped her coat more firmly about her.

The Roller Polars peered through the car window. "I wish we were staying here at this place. We'd rather stay here with you folks."

Norman threw the car into gear. "No room." Then, over his shoulder to Thor, "Back with your bags in a minute." He drove on.

In the doorway of his vast store stood Isador Raffsky, trapper, fur trader, merchant. He had come from his native Poland at seventeen. He knew every infinitesimal Eskimo village in the Arctic. His credit was sound from Point Barrow to New York.

"Thor, my boy!" He, not Thor, the older man, became the patriarch. "Mrs. Ballantyne! After all these years you are here."

Thor spoke with serious formality. "Christine, this is my old friend Isador Raffsky. . . . My granddaughter, Christine Storm. I've brought her up here at last."

Isador Raffsky clasped his hands behind his back, he stood looking at Christine as one would survey critically a painting in a gallery.

Bridie had had enough of this drama. "Now Isador, this isn't the Fourth of July. I want Chris to meet Mrs. Raffsky." She raised her voice to reach a woman who was standing behind the counter in a corner across the store. "Leah, you being high and mighty with me?"

The common people—the toilers, the men of uncommon sense—these have been responsible for nearly all the social-reform measures which the world accepts today. W. E. GLADSTONE

Mrs. Isador Raffsky was wrapping a hunk of Cheddar cheese, two cans of cream-of-mushroom soup, a pound of hamburger and a cellophane sack of hard candies. An Eskimo woman in a red calico baglike garment over her long fur parka picked up the paper sack. An infant was pouched on her back, inside the parka. A boy of two or three walked at her side, another child was palpably on the way. Mrs. Raffsky manipulated the cash register, nodded to the woman with as much manner as she now displayed in greeting Bridie. Bridie seemed more voluble than ever, in contrast.

"My, you haven't changed a bit, Leah. . . . Chris, here's Mrs. Raffsky, wants to say hello to you."

Christine stared, unaware that she was staring. By some inexplicable alchemy of the centuries Leah Raffsky's luminous slanting eyes, her high cheekbones curving down to the delicately sensuous mouth, the carriage, the manner all might have been copied complete from ancient Egyptian royalty. Mrs. Raffsky was totally unaware of this resemblance. Amidst the cheeses, the canned goods, the housewares Mrs. Raffsky was wearing a short boxy lemon-yellow jacket with a small standing collar—it was cut with reticent elegance like a Chinese woman's coat—fine black wool trousers and tiny black flat slippers. Her skin was somewhat warmer than ivory, her black hair was pulled back tightly in a knot at the nape of the neck.

Now she inclined her head and smiled in acknowledgment of the introduction. Christine, to her own discomfiture, found herself babbling a bit. "Mrs. Raffsky, what a wonderful store! I thought it would be wolfskins and mukluks and bacon."

With a gesture Leah Raffsky indicated that they were to follow her. As they ascended the stairs their bags awaited them in a neat row on the landing.

Christine had visualized bunks, prickly gray blankets and oil lamps. The walls of this upper hall, wide and bright, were painted pink. On either side the open doors revealed the neat bedrooms furnished in modern light wood, you glimpsed bedside lamps and pale blue coverlets and flowered chintz.

Leah Raffsky made a little gesture toward this room and that. Bridie took over. "Now, Chris, if you want to take this one—it's the cutest—I'll take that one on the other side. Thor, which one you having?"

Thor was enjoying the look of incredulity on Chris' face. "Any one. They're all too luxurious for me, I'm not used to all this roughing it in the wilds of Alaska." He swung the bags into the bedrooms and clumped down the stairs. When Bridie and Chris turned to speak to Leah Raffsky she had disappeared.

"What goes on here?" Chris demanded.

From the far end of the long bright hall came giggles and high young voices.

"It's the Raffsky girls!" Bridie said. "Come along, Chris." She rushed down the hall; Chris, following, saw her throw her arms about two girls in the doorway at the far end. "Chris, meet the two Raffsky girls, this one's Elinor and this one's Nancy. Whyn't you girls meet us at the airport?"

The Raffsky girls, in features, manner and deportment, were like two nice plump upper Bronx girls you might see having an ice-cream soda at Schrafft's.

"Mamma doesn't like us to go down in the store much, except to help out, of course, when they're busy." Elinor's tone made plain that this arrangement was family battleground. "Or the airport either."

"Something smells elegant!" Bridie called out. She had sauntered into the dining room and then vanished into the kitchen.

"Come on," the two Raffskys said happily, and linked arms with Chris. Friendly, outgoing as they were, Chris decided for a question or two even on such short acquaintance.

"Were you born here—I mean, have you always lived here? . . . Where do you go to school?"

The Misses Raffsky had no secrets from the world. "We're going to school in Baranof next year. . . . I love your dress, did you get it in Baranof or send to Seattle? . . . We've invited some people for dinner tonight to meet you, we love company."

"Tonight!" Chris said doubtfully.

"Ross can't make it back by dinnertime," Nancy said with the aplomb of a mind reader.

"How did you know he had planned to get back?" Startled.

"Oh, everybody in Oogruk knows everything about everybody, it's the mukluk grapevine. There's two girls here from Philadelphia, they're coming for dinner, and their husbands are schoolteachers here. Lowell Aragrook is coming, too, he and his wife. He's in charge of all the Alaska reindeer herds, but he's been fishing for beluga ——"

"Chris!" Bridie called from the kitchen. "Come and see this."

The Raffsky girls propelled her into the kitchen—a kitchen that was modern, metallic and pastel as a Ladies' Home Journal double-page ad.

"Just throw your eye over that, would you," Bridie said. Her gesture, as she indicated a mammoth cake—a Mount McKinley of a cake—amounted to a formal introduction. Iced in pink, with chocolate arabesques and pink flutings, it bore a message, "Welcome Thor and Christine."

"There wasn't room for another name," Nancy explained. "We'll bake another cake tomorrow just for you."

"Tomorrow! There's food enough here to last fifty people a week. You must have every room filled and everybody coming for dinner."

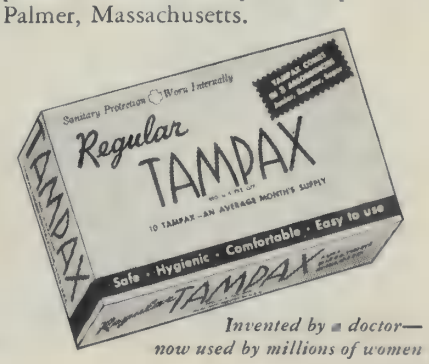
"Roomers! We don't cook for roomers. This is a dinner party for our friends to meet you," Elinor said.

Nancy said, "If there's anything you want, just ask Elinor or me, but now I've got to go and set the table."

Chris said, "Let me help you—that is, I'd like to in just a minute, but first I want to say something to grampa."

She was off down the hall to the stairway. The Tanagralike figure of Leah Raffsky was there at the store counter. She was wrapping a large club of bologna sausage for a waiting Eskimo boy. Male voices and the scent of cigars led Chris to the open door of Isador

Any way she turns...



the picture of

POISE

There's a very special quality about her. It's in the gracious way she moves . . . the artfully simple way she dresses . . . the quietly assured way she speaks. She's the kind of person who goes about her living poised and confident. "Problem days" have no meaning for her. She relies on Tampax—knows it completely protects, while it keeps her secret safe.

With Tampax® internal sanitary protection, she's never bothered with pads, belts, pins . . . never worried about odor forming . . . never concerned with disposal or carrying problems. Invisible and unfelt when in place, Tampax makes her literally forget there's a difference in days of the month!

No wonder millions of smart young moderns use Tampax! It's certainly the nicer way, the better way of handling those days. Why don't you use Tampax, too? Try it this month. 3 absorbencies (Regular, Super, Junior), wherever drug products are sold. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Massachusetts.

Invented by a doctor—
now used by millions of women

Corns, Callouses or Bunions Won't Hurt!

You'll Wear Smart Shoes Comfortably!

Soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads stop painful shoe friction, lift pressure . . . stop corns or callouses before they can develop.

Used with the separate Medications included, Zino-pads remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science. No other method does all this!

Sizes for Corns, Callouses, Bunions, Soft Corns between toes

At Drug, Shoe, Dept., 5-10c stores

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

You Get ALL-YEAR "MOTH INSURANCE"* ©

WITH APEX®

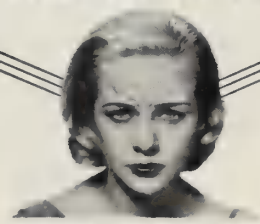
FOR 1¢ A DAY

*You can protect an 84 cu. ft. closet for a whole year with only 1 Apex Closet Protector, refilled every 3 months with 1 lb. of Apex Moth Crystals or Nuggets. Use as directed on label.



APEX MOTH CAKE—2 sizes

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

NO MOTH HOLES WHEN YOU USE APEX!

Better than aspirin even with buffering for

TENSE NERVOUS HEADACHES

Nervous tension headaches need the special relief Anacin® gives. Here's why Anacin is better than aspirin, even with buffering added. Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one but a combination of medically proven ingredients. Anacin acts to (1) relieve pain, (2) calm nerves — leave you relaxed, (3) fight depression . . . and Anacin Tablets do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today!

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients of ANACIN

Raffsky's office. The two men sat smoking, talking.

Thor looked at the girl's puzzled face. "Something you want to know, Christine?"

"Well, you're busy—I thought maybe you'd be just walking around ——"

"If it's about the Raffskys, just ask. Isador'll tell you anything you want to know."

Chris was genuinely embarrassed. "Another time will do."

"Sit down, sit down." Isador indicated a chair by throwing its burden of papers to the floor. "So what you want to know? I came a boy here from Poland, I didn't have a zloty. I ran around on a dog sled, buying the stinking skins from the Eskimos. When I think what I paid them—well, those days it was different in Alaska. But it's over now. My children are going to get an education because it's going to be different. Not like me and Leah had it."

Chris made up her mind to stop this foray into the future. "Mrs. Raffsky?" she ventured.

"What you want to know about Leah?"

"I mean—she's so lovely-looking and—and young—and kind of—well—mysterious."

"Sure she's young. Leah was twenty years younger than me when we were married. Leah's mother was half Eskimo, her father was a missionary. And what do you think he was? A rabbi! Did you ever hear before of such a thing! From Russia. It's a story."

"I've always wondered why they didn't do more proselytizing," Thor mused. "They're so stiff-necked about their religion. Leah's father is the only Jewish missionary I've heard of since Jesus."

Ross Guildenstern had not appeared at dinner. The evening lengthened to nine, to ten o'clock. Dinner finished, the women sat in the big pink sitting room. The men had remained in the dining room.

Chris drifted over to Bridie on the couch. She pitched her voice low for Bridie's ear, but not so low as to be drowned by the constant music of the phonograph.

"What do you suppose they're talking about in there?"

"Alaska."

"Such old-fashioned behavior. I feel like a harem inmate."

Lowell Aragrook, the reindeer herder, was speaking as she glanced again toward the quietly conversational dining room. He was wearing a good navy-blue suit and a bow tie. On entering before dinner Chris had seen his parka just before he took it off. It was of finest seal, bordered with an intricate design in white ermine. She knew the value of these things, the time and labor that went into their making. This was, she knew, a museum piece. Mrs. Aragrook, in the sitting room, was taking absolutely no part in the women's conversation. Amiable, half smiling, she simply sat like a good-natured bronze idol in a good black crepe dress and a good gold brooch and pince-nez.

Oh, dear, what are they talking about in there? Chris wondered. Impulsively she walked into the dining room, pulled up a vacant chair and sat there.

The men stopped talking. "Something you want, Christine?" Thor asked.

"Yes. I want to know what you're talking about."

Only Thor appeared not to be startled by this statement. Bob Shelikov, territorial senator up from Wolverene, became jocular in the political tradition. "You fixing to run for territorial congresswoman, Miss Christine?"

"Not just yet," Chris said, as determinedly jocular as he. "But maybe by the time I'm old enough and know enough it'll be United States congresswoman I can try for."

Bob Shelikov was one of the conservatives who contended that Alaska wasn't ready for statehood. "M'm-m, pretty girl like you will get married and have a family long before that, Miss Christine."

She sensed that Thor was displeased with her. But he answered her question briefly.

"We were talking about something that wouldn't interest women. You've heard it all a hundred times." He turned to the men. "You know Christine was raised by newspaper-publishing grandfathers. So political talk and territorial arguments were her Mother Goose. Uh, let's see. We were talking about Outside labor—you know, you've heard it all. From way up here, Seattle and San Francisco seem far away and not very important. Up here, if you can get a whale or a seal or two, or enough moose or reindeer meat, you're set for the winter. Or it used to be true. So it didn't matter if the big union heads in Seattle wouldn't allow Alaska labor to do Alaska work, and brought in seasonal Outside labor instead, boatloads of them and now planeloads of them. Thousands. And paid them in one lump after they got back Outside at the end of the season. But now it has begun to matter, even up here, and it's going to be more and more important. I've been trying to tell these young men here"—he indicated the two schoolteachers—"that maybe the time has come for a Boston Tea Party right here in Alaska."

A hubbub in the sitting room. "Ross!" shouted the Raffsky girls. He stood in the doorway, he was still in his pilot's uniform.

"Anybody want to see the Eskimo dances?"

Bridie had had enough of the pink sitting room. "Sure do. Where?"

"At the Company Hall down the beach. In about half an hour. I brought some passengers down from Barrow. Look, I've got to change, I'll see you there." He was off down the hall.

EASY DOES IT... OR DOES IT?

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Housekeeping is, say many men,
A snap. There's nothing to it!
They mean, of course, housekeeping when
Some woman's there to do it.

Half the company decided against joining in this festivity. Bob Shelikov wrapped it up neatly for the negative side when he said, "Anyway, if you've seen one Eskimo dance you've seen 'em all."

Certainly Bridie and Thor had seen these ceremonies countless times.

Thor said now, "Doctor Kramer's showing us through the hospital tomorrow, and you'll want to see the schools, and Father Gilhooley has some magnificent ivory and wood carvings and altar pieces. Then there's the dental clinic too."

"Oh, grampa, let's not be so worthy tomorrow. First thing in the morning, I mean."

"What do you want to do?"

"Just wander around and look at things and talk to people on the beach."

"She means, I suppose," Bridie explained, "that Ross Guildenstern's got some plan to show her around Oogruk. I can't see that it's any different from other Eskimo villages, only bigger."

"He was born here," Chris said defensively. "His grandmother lives here and the aunt and uncle who brought him up after his parents died. He said he wants to show us around tomorrow morning. I don't know why he made such a point of it."

"I do," Bridie said grimly.

"Evidently you two are carrying on some kind of woman warfare that I don't understand. We'll see about half an hour of the dancing. You do exactly what you want to do in the morning."

They were walking down the beach path. They could hear the Eskimo drums now. The door of the Company Hall was open. A group whose ages ranged from six to sixty clustered there. Periodically they were shooed away by someone inside.

"Why don't they let them come in?" Chris wondered.

"Costs a dollar," Thor said, "each. Eskimos don't dance for nothing in the tourist season. They've caught on to civilization, right enough. After the dance has really started they'll let these neighbors slip in free."

Arctic daylight at night streaming through the unshaded windows, combined with the artificial glare of electric bulbs overhead, gave to the room an effect half eerie, half sordid. At the far end of the long room the Eskimo drummers sat cross-legged on the floor, the great flat circles of their walrus-tissue drums spread before them. Their voices rose and fell in a chant timed to the beat of the drums. In the center of the floor a group of men and women—twelve or more—were moving together in a slow mystic dance which each individual dancer seemed, nevertheless, to be performing solo. Though the air of the room was close, the dancers wore fur and hooded parkas ornamented with intricate designs, and only their shifting feet were mukluks. The dancers were not, for the most part, young. A few perhaps were thirty or forty. Others looked seventy or more. Now and then a child would step into the rhythmically moving group.

"Hi!" There to greet them was Ross Guildenstern. He had changed from his pilot's uniform to khaki pants and leather jacket. "How about these seats? All right?"

"Well, say!" boomed a familiar voice. "This is great! How you making out?" It was Alwin Polar of the Roller Polars, with his partner, still in the beflowered hat. She and Bridie greeted each other like long-lost sisters.

Thor took up the impromptu explanation. "Eskimos never used to dance for money. It started as a ceremony, they danced to express themselves. These dances act out a story. Every gesture follows the story the drummers are chanting."

"You mean they're saying something—those men there with the drums?" Polar turned to Ross. "You understand what they're saying? What's it mean?"

Ross was silent a moment. His attention concentrated on the drummers and on the women's chorus seated on the floor behind them; on the stylized postures of the dancers.

Now Ross turned back to the tourists. "It sounds kind of foolish when you tell it, a literal translation. Well, this hunter went out to get food for his wife and his children, they had had no food for days because the man had been pierced weeks before by the tusks of a walrus when the man was on the sea in his kayak. And now as he walked toward the sea he saw a wolf, but as he prepared to kill the wolf the wolf turned into a caribou with antlers and it sped toward the water and as it ran the hunter saw that the antlers were turning into tusks like those of a walrus and he knew then ——" Ross broke off, his smile a little rueful. "Well, you get the idea. Tribal stories never are very interesting."

One of the group from Barrow touched Ross on the shoulder. "Cap, you know how to do those dances? Yourself, I mean."

"Yes, some of them. I used to try to do them when I was a kid. You just follow the story as the singers tell it. This means wolf, see. And this means caribou. And this ——"

He stepped forward then and in a moment he had mingled with the dancers and was indistinguishable from them as they moved and turned and gestured.

The next moment, to Bridie's horror and to her own surprise, Chris, too, stepped forward and joined the dancers. She kept her eyes on the dancer just in front of her, she raised her arm thus, she turned her head thus, she shifted her foot this way, that way. She, too, was almost indistinguishable among the shifting dancers except, perhaps, for the shining gold mass of her hair as her parka hood slipped back to her shoulders and the brilliant shaft of the midnight sun pierced the weather-beaten windows of the little Arctic-village Eskimo hall.

Ross Guildenstern came down the beach path on the run. Nine-thirty in the morning. He had said nine. As he ran, the small fry of Oogruk trailed him like the tail of a meteor.

Bridie and Chris, too, were trailed by a like following. A swarm of black-eyed brown

CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

It's a SHORT summer...
make it a BRIGHT one!

SPORTSWEAR BY Jantzen

Surf adds brightness

(to colors, to whites . . .
yes, even to perfect whiteness)

You'll be seeing yourself so many bright ways this summer, in versatile Jamaica-length shorts with camisole tops, gay overblouses and T-shirts. And now it's so easy to keep those whites and colors looking beach-bright. Do it the way that's so wonderful for everything you wash—with Surf, the quality detergent that actually makes white whiter, bright brighter than new! Remember, Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees that Surf will give you the finest results you've ever had from any detergent, or your money back. Watch for savings on Surf at your favorite store.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

skinned boys and girls had somehow sprung out of the earth as the two women had turned into the beach path.

"Hi!" they yelled, as they ran alongside, as they ran ahead, backward, as they trailed. "Hi!" They stared at Christine and Bridie with the embarrassing, inescapable gaze of children. As they ran they pointed and said something that sounded like "Booga."

"What do they mean?" Bridie said.

"Ross could tell us."

"Ross." Bridie rolled the r and hissed the double s. "He said nine, it's nine-thirty or more now, and he hasn't showed up."

"Booga! Booga!" chanted the children. One of them even tugged at Christine's parka.

Chris bent over. "What do you mean, booga?"

"Hi!" shouted an adult male voice from a distance. Ross came on the run up the beach with a stream of merry impish black-eyed children trailing him.

"I'm sorry. I got an A.C.S. message. I had to go out to the airport. Are the kids bothering you? They're not supposed to do this."

"But they didn't do anything," Chris said. "They were just saying something we didn't understand. Booga, or something like that."

His face cleared. "Beluga. Lowell Aragrook is beaching a couple of big ones. Come on. Come on, kids."

"You're upset about something. There was something in the A.C.S. message."

"Look, Chris, do you think yo could go to Barrow late today inste of starting tomorrow?"

Bridie addressed herself to the wor in general. "He's gone daft."

"I mean you, too, Bridie, of cours And Thor! I wish you would. Othe wise I can't fly you up. I just got g ders. I have to pick up a bunch Nome. You weren't going to st more than a night and a day in Ba row anyway. Then I'd fly you bac here—that is, if you want more tin here in Oogruk."

The two were alone in the midst a ludicrous company. Bridie marchin ahead in the splendor of velvet ar fur and gloves like a parade com mander. Eddying all around them th raggle-taggle sprites.

"Of course I'd love to have yo show us around Oogruk. But if yo can't, you can't. I don't see why you so grim about it."

He laughed then, his face clearin like a child's. "I've made up my mir I'm going to show you Oogruk toda And then Barrow if I can. I'll do it it costs me my job."

"I honestly don't know what's th matter with you, Ross Guildenstern."

"Yes you do."

In the half shelter of a single str of raised canvas on the windy beach pretty girl was bent over a mysterio task. A young Eskimo girl. S glanced up as the little processi came by. "Hi!" she called to them.

"Hi!" Ross called in return. "Brid Stop a minute, will you? Come down here, Chris. I want you to me somebody."

The girl squatting on her heels the beach was wearing modish bla slacks and a tailored red shirt, neat tucked into her belt. On her small fe were white socks and stitched loafe of red leather.

She was expertly cutting up a dea seal with an ulu.

"Joan," Ross said, "this is Mr Ballantyne, up from Baranof. An Christine Storm. . . . My cousin, Joa Kungok."

"I'm happy to meet you," Joa said, and indicated the sharp blood implement in her hand. "Excuse m won't you, for not getting up," sh said politely to the older woman.

"Well, for land's sakes," Bridie ex claimed inadequately.

"How—how wonderful!" Chri said, and meant it. "Do you mind if watch you a minute?"

"Of course not," the girl said. "I'm not very good at it. I've just learne how, really. You ought to see m mother do it, or my grandmother

The instrument in her hand w shaped like an old-fashioned me chopper. Its blade was curved, h hand grasped the handle. With m raculous deftness she held the carca with her left hand while she sliced th thick layer of blubber from the ski It rolled down inside the skin as yo would separate the meat of a melo from the rind.

"What are you going to do wit that?" Bridie demanded.

"Eat it," Joan Kungok said blithely "Next winter. I don't like it any mor but the old people and some of th grownups do. There are lots of way of cooking seal meat. You can eat fresh or salted or dried. The old peopl like to eat the blubber. Maybe that why they didn't die of tuberculos years and years ago, the way so man of us young people do now."

"Hold it, Joan." Smiling down a her, Ross raised an arresting palm "These ladies are Alaskans. The know the score. Mrs. Ballantyne use to be a nurse. Tell her what you'r studying for."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 87

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Right now, Barbara J. contemplates a fashion to wear . . .

Spring...and all Summer Long

The forecast: warmer days and more carefree ones with vacation and weekends away. This to Barbara J. means freedom from wardrobe cares as well. She looks for a fashion with complete simplicity and ease (no intricate washing and ironing problems for her!) . . . a dress to live in and love for every day of the week. The excitement might be in the color, the change of mood in an addition to make or buy.

But that's not all. Barbara wants a whole wardrobe complete, accomplished by one investment alone. Impossible? Not at all. The simplest solution of all: a slim slip of a dress. The additions are small dollar-wise, large fashion-wise, and make it a wardrobe to wear all summer long!

By BET HART

DIANE AND ALLEN ARBUS

Dress	$ 9.95
White jacket	6.95
Drawstring blouse	2.98
Print jacket	3.28
Total	$23.16

Besides a multitude of changes for neckline and waist, Barbara likes "cover-ups" for her new investment. These might end at almost any length. . . .

The tiniest top of all, but not short on importance. A white ribbed cotton matching the fabric of the dress. (It is available with the dress, but sold separately for all of $6.95.) The jacket buttons at the back, the bottom is edged with lace and has a tiny bow at the front.

DRESS AND JACKET, MONA ROSET

Just to the waist, the blouse is shirred and tied there. This one in cotton, a red plaid over white. Sleeveless and a convertible neckline; pretty over Barbara's new red dress. She might also wear the new addition with shorts, a summer skirt. The price to buy, only $2.98.

BLOUSE, JOHN NETZKY

*A jacket to make—and easy to sew. It comes just to the hipline. For it Barbara chooses a gaily printed cotton in pink and red carnations. Pretty enough for a city street, casual enough for a country weekend worn with slacks or a skirt. Vogue "Easy to Make" Design No. 9263.

DRAWINGS, MARIBETH

At the office, Barbara wears her new dress. She likes the accent of chalk-white jewelry, jet-black patent against the bright red cotton cord. Her black bag and red-and-pink print beret bought in March are also pretty accents for coming and going. The dress, Barbara thinks, could go on for after-work dates as well. She may add a jewel or tie a chiffon scarf at the waistline for a more romantic touch.

© VOGUE

*For back view, sizes and price, see page 87.

Dress by Lanz

only Sta-Flo® BEAUTY-STARCHES so easily

For crisper freshness, wash to wash!

Into your life for the first time come . . .

Fems

FEMININE NAPKINS

FEMS IS A TRADEMARK OF KIMBERLY-CLARK CORP

For new comfort even when you're active

FEMS are a completely different kind of napkin. They were made to put more comfort into your active, busy days.

FEMS fit better because they're longer napkins. They're designed so as not to shift, pull or bind . . . to stay in place no matter how active you are.

FEMS are exquisitely soft. Touch the comfort sheer covering to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive, and you'll realize why FEMS give welcome freedom from chafing, rubbing and other discomforts.

FEMS assure you greater protection than other napkins. Their exclusive safety-cushion guard against bottom and side stains, whether you're sitting, walking or sleeping. Every inch of the napkin . . . covering, as well as inner material . . . is specially constructed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest menstrual flow.

FEMS cost a little more . . . give you far more comfort and security. FEMS let you feel your best . . . always poised, at ease, sure.

For new comfort in action, switch to FEMS Feminine Napkins.

- You'll see the difference. FEMS' extra length means FEMS fit better, fasten easily, stay comfortably in place.
- FEMS' exclusive safety-cushion virtually eliminates stains that show through.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 84

The girl's serious young face became sud-enly brilliant as she smiled up at Bridie. "I'm training at the hospital here."

"Look at that, now! Bless you, child."

One of the small boys who had been peering to the open mouth of the seal now touched e jagged brown teeth with one plump fore-nger. Then he wagged the finger chidingly, Eat too much candy."

Christine's laugh rang out, and Ross', and ridie's. "You darling!" Christine said, and ooped to kiss the top of the child's head.

"Come on, come on, girls." Ross waved em up the beach.

Joan called to them as they left, "I hear owell brought in the first belugas."

The town seemed to be streaming toward e beach. Men, women, children, dogs. The ectricity of excitement was in the air. Ross egan to run, then he remembered and opped back with the two women. Word-ssly he and Chris each thrust an arm through ridie's. They whisked her, laughing, protest-g, along the rutted stony path toward the owd gathered around the objects in the wa-r below the sloping beach.

"Hello there!" the Roller Polars called to em. "Say, this is worth the trip."

Lowell Aragrook was standing hip deep in e water. With him were two men. The three ere lashing ropes around the circumference three white incredible objects that floated the sluggish surge of the icy waters.

Lowell Aragrook called, "Hey, Ross, give a hand," and flung at him the end of a long ick rope. The men at work in the water ung another rope and another and another, rling toward other strong deft hands on ore. And now the three weirdly beautiful jects that lay so dreamily on the water were cured at last.

They lay gleaming white as ermine, the male nd the female great white whales. The third as pale gray; it was an infant, it still wore its aby fur. Half submerged in the shallow water ey were eerie, spectral.

"Take hold here and pull," Ross said. A zen—twenty—thirty hands were at the pes now. A final tug and the three were ached, high and dry.

Lowell Aragrook had waded ashore, he ood looking down at his Herculean catch. 'm sorry about the little one. But it was too all to make out by itself." He glanced sually down at his dripping mukluks. His tle bow to Bridie, to Chris was both in greet-g and farewell, for now he strode briskly up e beach to the path. The crowd, too, dis-rsed like an audience when the show is nished. Puzzled, Chris realized that there re-ained besides herself and Bridie and Ross nly the swarm of children, the two Polars, and ne stout middle-aged woman in a bright red ulico slip over her parka. The metal object in r hand glinted in the sun and Chris recog-ized it as an ulu somewhat larger than the ne with which Joan Kungok had so deftly iced the seal. The woman was Mrs. Aragrook, e Raffskys' dinner guest of the night before.

"Why did he go away?" Chris asked. Lowell, I mean."

"His work is done," Ross said. "The rest is oman's work. In a half hour she'll have the hole beluga cut and skinned. Come on. Let's ."

The Polars glanced up, glanced down the eak little beach path. "Where you folks oing now?" Alwin Polar inquired.

With candor and sweetness Ross said, "I n taking these friends to my grandmother's ouse. I am sorry that I can't ask you to come ith us."

"Well, sure, you wouldn't want strangers arging in," Alwin Polar agreed cheerfully. We'll just ramble around."

Chris said, very low, "Let the poor lambs me with us, they're lost."

"No," Ross said. "No."

A strangely quiet species of panic possessed ridie as she teetered along the rough beach ath with Ross and Chris. She conducted a mewhat frantic conversation with herself: his isn't just boy-and-girl stuff any more. He's ally in love with her, he's ten years older than e is, well, that's all right but she isn't going to ke him seriously if I can help it. He's up to something. Czar was right, I guess. It's time Chris got away, saw something besides Alaska.

They stopped at a one-room shack connected by a ramshackle passageway with a frame house. The door of the little dwelling was open and inside and outside small children and big dogs were playing. They became quiet as Ross stopped at the doorway. The children's faces were upturned with the mute adoration that had been reflected in the faces of the children on the beach.

From his pocket Ross took a little sack of candy, he opened it and counted out a handful of hard bright balls. "One for each of you, that's all, because sugar is good for you but too much is bad for your teeth. The rest of it is for my grandmother."

"No teeth," one of the boys said quickly.

"That's right. Now out, kids, stay outside until we leave. I'm bringing visitors to see my grandmother."

"Tourists?"

"No." He looked directly at Christine. "Grandmother lives alone because that's what she wants to do, and she works because that makes her feel she isn't a burden. My uncle and his wife live next door here, and they look after her. She's almost blind, but she wants to be as independent as—well, as you want to be, I suppose, Chris."

BACK VIEW, SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE PATTERN ON PAGE 84

Vogue Design No. 9263. "Easy to Make" jacket; 12–20 (32–40). 60c.

Ross Guildenstern's ancient grandmother looked up brightly as they entered. Her withered yellow face creased into a smile of a hundred wrinkles as she recognized his voice. She spoke his name.

The old woman sat on a board bed that was like a shelf in the wall. It was supported by wooden blocks and stood perhaps eighteen inches above the floor. Her head was thrust a little upward and her chin a little forward, and her face wore the uncertain half-smile of the sightless or nearly sightless. The young man spoke to her in the language of her people and she nodded and smiled. She raised one hand in greeting. Then the hands resumed the work on which she had been engaged.

"God bless her, look at the cut of her, would you!" Bridie said. "Working, mind you."

She was making thread for the sewing of skins. The threads would hold together forever the wolfskins, the wolverine skins, the sealskins, the otter, the fox. Fur parkas for the men and women and children. Mukluks. Hoods. Gloves. The thread was made of moose or caribou sinew, and it was the old woman's proud task to roll the strands so expertly that they made the unbreakable thread.

Ross Guildenstern leaned over and touched her cheek with his strong brown hand that bore the Air Force ring, and murmured something. The grotesque old mask lighted so that for one moment between the young man and the indomitable old blind woman a curious resemblance sprang into being.

"Oh, Ross!" Chris said, as they called good-by to the children and walked down the road. "It's dark in there, and it can't be healthy. Shouldn't she be in a comfortable place, and not working? She's so old and feeble."

"Grandma isn't really that old and she's as tough as that thread she's making. She's doing what she wants to do, she loves it. If you took it away from her she would die."

Caution told Bridie that there now had been enough of Ross Guildenstern's family. "Now what? I'm beginning to be hungry. Your grandpa'll be looking for us, Chris."

"No he won't," Chris said calmly, "and besides, how lost can you be in Oogruk?"

"I like to know where I'm going," Bridie snapped, "before I go."

Ross pointed to a turn in the rough path. "Right there. That hammering sound you hear is what we're headed for."

"I suppose that's your aunt, building a house," Chris said.

"Not quite. But you're warm."

Ross' uncle and aunt were working in the cluttered yard of their weather-beaten house. Six or eight sled dogs yapped and snarled in their compound. Ross threw more charm than was absolutely necessary, Chris thought, into the introduction.

"Hi, Aunt Angeline! . . . This is my aunt, Mrs. Asakluk. . . . Over there working on the boat, Frank Asakluk. Hiyuh, Frank! . . . Mrs. Ballantyne . . . Christine Storm, they're up from Baranof to see the sights."

Frank Asakluk waved a hammer at them gaily. He went on building his boat. Angeline Asakluk did not rise or offer her hand because both her hands were dripping with blood and grease. Her friendly smile beamed above the headless carcass of a seal suspended on a rack in front of her.

"I'm making a seal poke," she said.

A protective feeling surged warmly over Chris for the second time. Ross' eyes were on her. Her natural curiosity overcame her repugnance to the blood, the decapitated cadaver.

"Tell me, I'm so interested in what you're doing. I know it isn't the same—we were watching Ross' Cousin Joan cutting up a seal—but what's a seal poke?"

"It's the Eskimo freezer," Ross said. "Tell Chris how you do it, Angie."

"I'm taking out the insides. I reach through this hole where the head used to be and cut everything away and take it out. You have to be careful not to cut the skin. Then we turn the whole skin inside out and clean it and we blow it up for drying and we rub it with ashes so that it will dry better. And when it's dry we fill it with meats or berries or green-leaf plants for storing all through the winter. It makes the best freezer you ever saw."

"Now," Bridie observed, "I've seen everything."

"Angeline can do anything," Ross announced cheerfully. "What a girl! She isn't really my aunt, you know. Frank's my uncle; Angeline's his second wife. Angeline used to teach at the Native Service school." He glanced across the yard at the open door of the house, he looked up and down the road. "Where's Rolf? I thought he'd be here."

"He was here a minute ago. Rolf! Rolf!" Angeline called, but not loudly.

"Rolf!" Ross shouted.

Angeline laughed aloud then, and pointed to where her husband stood, busy with his boat. Over the rim of the trestled boat's edge a red sombrero rose above a pair of black eyes.

"Hi, Rolf!" Ross shouted. "Come here."

Over the boat's side there clambered a boy of perhaps six. He dropped agilely to the ground and ran toward Ross, a handsome compact child. He was in full movie-cowboy regalia—sombrero, plaid shirt, chaps, boots. He carried two guns in a holster and as he ran toward the group he pulled out the guns.

"Why, it's Hopalong Asakluk!" Chris said, falling into the spirit of the thing.

"Stick 'em up!" yelled the boy, a gun in either hand. Obligingly feigning terror, they raised their hands high over their heads.

"I don't think he ought to play with guns, Angie," Ross said. "I hate to see kids play with guns." Then he stooped, picked up the boy and held him high, but the small booted feet beat a tattoo in remonstrance and Ross set him down.

"Sorry, old boy," Ross said. He laid a hand gently on the child's shoulder. "Chris, this is my son Rolf. He was named after my father."

(To be Concluded)

No more tears

from soap in the eyes

Use the shampoo that can't burn or irritate eyes.

Leaves hair silky-soft, easy to comb.

Johnson's BABY SHAMPOO

"How I use
Murine
to rest my eyes after a day outdoors"

JIM SHOULDERS
first three-time world's champion
All Around Cowboy
(Rodeo Cowboy's Association rating)

"I have good eyes, but they usually smart after a day in a dusty arena," says Jim Shoulders. "Murine really helps make my eyes feel clean and clear again." Good tip to remember when outdoor exposure or work tension irritates your eyes. Murine cleanses and soothes gently. Use Murine morning and evening. Gives your eyes quick comfort.

MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES*

New! Unbreakable dropper

THE MURINE CO., INC., CHICAGO, U.S.A.
*TRADEMARKS REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

THE CHALLENGE OF THIS CENTURY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

the most able when it is informed and aware of what is at stake in public education.

The Palo Alto plan is comprehensive, involving all the schools in the system—twenty elementary, two junior and two senior high schools. It directly involves about 1000 children in the secondary schools and 500 in the elementary. From the start, care was taken to avoid creating a "little snob" class, although actually, as assistant superintendent Jack Rand points out, the danger of good students' becoming a clique of snobs is not very great. The opposite extreme is more likely—and more common. In most schools smart youngsters assume the attitude expressed by their less able classmates—"Don't be a D. A. R.," meaning "Don't be a damned average-raiser!" Those who violate this edict are called "queers." Palo Alto's "cradle to college" program for exceptionally able children is an additional effort to raise academic standards in a university town where the standards are already comparatively high.

At Stanford Elementary School, for example, fourth, fifth and sixth graders are getting a taste of such heady subjects as physics, chemistry, geology, philology and logic. A tape recording of nine-, ten- and eleven-year-olds discussing their "interest groups" seems the more incredible for an occasional lisp among the childish voices: "Well, in chemistry we made this model of a battwy . . . we filled it with a solution of sulphuric acid." . . . "Sulphuric acid is very dangerous—the formula is H_2FO_4." . . . "Then we used an elec-electron pump and charged it for three or four minutes." . . . "Susan's hair was supposed to stand on end, but it didn't because hair is not a very good conducer of electricity." . . . "Our teacher brought in an electroscope. Besides telling us what an electroscope was he showed us how to make our own."

The nonscientists are also vocal. In philology (word study): "We had lots of fun. We learned a lot of Latin and Greek—prefixes, roots and suffixes. It was lots of fun." . . . "You felt kinda like you've got something, kinda secure." In art: "We learned a lot of words we didn't know too. We went to a stable and drew a horse." . . . "We also had a real kitten for a model." . . . "I didn't know you started with shapes—I thought it was faces." In modern dance: "I had never seen it and never taken any part in it. What I liked best was the composition, making up dances just as you felt like to music." In storytelling: "You can tell stories to younger children—and that's good." . . . "Storytelling is a lot like acting." . . . "Most people don't think it takes much to tell a story—but it does!"

As this last child said, it takes something—probably the glow of bright young faces and sparkling eyes—to tell the story of Palo Alto's gifted-child program. The interest groups, which in most of the elementary schools meet twice a week for twelve weeks during the winter months, are led by teachers who themselves have special interest and training in a particular subject, or by other adults in the community who volunteer.

Some of the group leaders are from the faculty of Stanford University or are employed by research or engineering firms located in Palo Alto. These experts, many of them renowned in their fields, share with very young children knowledge most people assume belongs only in higher education. Parents with years of practical experience in less erudite occupations also lead interest groups.

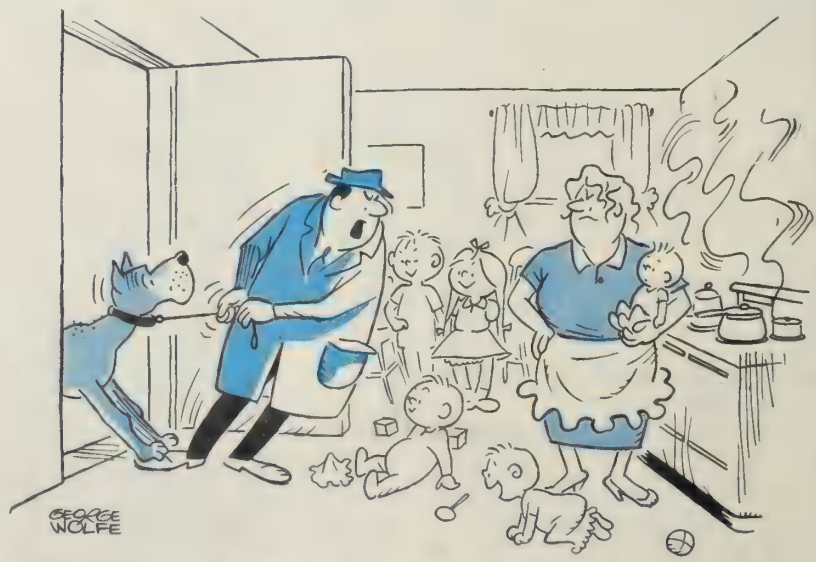
The children love it. "I hardly knew anything about physics before I started," one blue-eyed nine-year-old girl confided. "It's fun—you get out of schoolwork and you learn things you didn't know before," said another. The purpose of the interest groups is to give direction to a child's natural curiosity and, incidentally, to help him understand why reading, writing and arithmetic are so important. Without mastery of these tools, he soon discovers, he can't find out what he wants to know. "The idea," said one boy, "is not to teach a great deal about a certain subject but to open new doors."

Group leaders are equally enthusiastic. Albert Robinson, a "semiretired" electronics engineer and father of five children under twelve, led a group in the study of electricity at Barron Park Elementary School. He entertained the children by constructing motors and other devices out of bits of tin, wire and nails. "I wanted to see how simple I could make things to show some of the fundamental and universal concepts of physics," he said. He made a small car powered by a battery and the starter motor from a junked automobile in which each child could have a ride when he was able to explain how an electric motor works. One boy brought his father to the Robinson home and asked him to repeat the experiments he had performed in class "so dad can understand them." The rudiments of physics, Mr. Robinson believes, can be taught to children "as soon as they can talk."

Elena Greene, a young mother who speaks Spanish, conducted a group in the study of that language at Green Gables Elementary School. She used no textbook—"Most Spanish textbooks have not been revised since the year one." She began by teaching her group to sing simple Spanish folk songs while she accompanied them on her guitar. She had no discipline problems and feels the children got a basic feeling for the Spanish language during the short time she had with them. "Children listen with their whole selves, even when they appear not to be," she said, "and that is the way to learn a foreign language—to give yourself to it without thinking about it. Very young children are able to do this best."

The success of such a program depends largely upon the support of parents. "Without the help of men and women in the community who volunteered their services, our interest-group program would have been impossible," said John Bracken, principal of the Barron Park School. In the support of parents, the Palo Alto school system is fortunate. The town has more than a normal share of well-educated, able and energetic citizens—people who value learning highly. Parent-Teacher Association meetings are invariably packed and the discussion more often deals with fundamental matters of education than how to get new equipment. At the school administration offices there is a card file of more than 500 community "resource persons" who have indicated a willingness to appear before school groups. The topics cover a wide range of human activities: business and industry, cattle raising ("will show a small group branding at my ranch"), community and government service, dance, drama, electronics (thirty cards under this heading), health, hobbies and collections, travel, transportation, music (one card, that of a former symphony conductor, noted, "will describe the evolution of symphonic music"), the United Nations, vocations—and many others. The Palo Alto Times publishes a daily column of the writing of school children called "Youth Said It."

The Gifted Child Committee, made up of seventeen teachers, principals, parents and special consultants, met for the first time in the fall of 1953 and spent two years in study and discussion. Preceding this the California Congress of Parents and Teachers had sponsored a study of the education of gifted children and published a report. A large section of the Palo Alto chapter of the American Association of University Women devoted all its meetings to the topic in 1954.



"There was some danger," one member of the committee noted, "that the program would be expected out of existence by those who looked for miracles before it even got started." Nevertheless, when the school board approved the formation of a gifted-child program and an expenditure of $20,000 for the first year of its existence, it came as a surprise to almost no one. Dr. Kenneth Martyn, now associate dean of Los Angeles City College, was appointed director of research.

The Gifted Child Committee set as its goal the grade acceleration of at least 25 per cent of the students with I.Q.'s of 140 or above. Screening to identify the gifted child, on the basis of tests and teacher evaluations, was established as a continuing process beginning with the third grade. (Some 6 per cent of the children in Palo Alto were found to have such high I.Q.'s, as compared with about one in 400 in the general population.)

Contrary to the myth that "bright kids don't need help—they'll find their way," many children with high intelligence quotients do not do especially well in their schoolwork. They are often bored and literally shut their minds to unchallenging material. To undiscerning teachers, some of them might appear to be stupid.

There are two types of specially grouped classes in the Palo Alto junior and senior high schools. The so-called Research Classes, of which there are ten, are for children with I.Q.'s of 140 or above, even though some of them did not do outstanding work in their regular classes. These students get a broader, deeper presentation of the same material given ordinary classes. There are twenty-five Advanced Standing Classes for students who have done superior work even though their ability may be only slightly above average. Candidates for the Advanced Standing Classes are selected on the basis of ability, achievement and aptitude, as determined by tests and consultation with teachers and parents. These students proceed with advanced work in one

CONTINUED ON PAGE 90

"But I did consult you—you said last night a great Dane was all we needed around here!"

WHETHER you're at your favorite neighborhood theatre . . . or a drive-in . . . you'll agree today's modern people are feature attractions. Their trim, slender figures are the happy result of the modern trend toward lighter, less-filling food and drink.

Pepsi-Cola heartily supports this sensible diet plan. For today's Pepsi, reduced in calories, is never heavy, never too sweet. It's the modern, the light refreshment. Say "Pepsi, please"!

PEPSI-COLA

The Light refreshment

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 88

or two subjects usually at least a year ahead of their normal age group. Both Research and Advanced Standing students attend other classes with the normal assortment of good, bad and indifferent students their age. They are not "cut off from the crowd" and many of them are leaders in student government, athletics, dramatics and other extracurricular activities.

Most of the Research and Advanced Standing classes are small, ranging from seventeen to twenty-five students, although one biology class at Jordan Junior High has more than thirty. At Cubberly High School there is one eleventh-grade Advanced Standing English class of twenty-five students which has two full-time teachers. They alternate in the classroom and both keep busy because of the amount of preparation needed. The head of the department, Wade Robinson, looks forward to the day when he will have at least three teachers for every two classes. This arrangement he can show is most efficient, although for most high-school department heads it must remain only a dream.

Jean White, teacher of a ninth-grade Research class in English at Jordan Junior High, said, "Small classes give the teacher a chance to move around, to have various students working on different projects at the same time. We had book discussions and it turned out that we had two space-fiction addicts. They were always talking about space fiction in terms none of us could understand. Other members of the class pinned them down, and it turned out they weren't sure what they were talking about either. No student can get away with much when the rest of the class is right up with him. It was a great chance for me to show how important it is to know how to write, say, think what you mean, without hiding behind blurry jargon."

"When you first have a class like this," Robert Leon said (he has a Research class in tenth-grade English at Palo Alto Senior High), "you think the kids are somehow different from others, special—but they're not. You soon find they behave about like the rest. They are often challenging and, of course, alert, but as a group it's just like any other class."

Even a casual observer will note some differences, however. The exceptionally able youngsters tend to drift into the classroom early—and, like normal groups, they talk. But then they linger after class and talk some more, the chief difference being they talk about something. They seem to be thinking and, blessing of blessings, they have others to talk to.

For example, in Clyde Parrish's senior science seminar, an Advanced Standing class at Cubberly High School, class began long before he entered the room. One boy had drawn a design for a perpetual-motion machine on the blackboard and was challenging others to tell him why it wouldn't run forever. "I know it won't," he was saying, "but why won't it?"

"Because 'forever' is too long a time!" another boy informed him.

By the time the teacher arrived the small group was warmed up for an avid discussion of friction, the perpetual motion of a pendulum, forms of energy and why some machines will run forever—if it is not too long. Mr. Parrish concluded the discussion by suggesting that the boy actually try to build a perpetual-motion machine instead of endlessly theorizing about it. "One of the things I've learned," he said, "is that—in science, at least—some of the highest I.Q.'s don't like actual work. It may be that they haven't had a chance before and never got into the habit."

In Henry Martin's science seminar at the Palo Alto Senior High, students choose whatever excites their interest and explore it to the fullest. His students are engaged in individual research projects dealing with such matters as rocket fuel, rare earth elements and automation. One boy is working on a plan for a computer which he hopes will be able to calculate the possible matchings of biological characteristics in parents and give the odds on their having a "made-to-order" offspring. Two boys took a day off to visit an elementary school and explain to a second-grade class, with appropriate demonstrations, why and how Sputnik stays up there.

Much of their work is directed toward competition in various science contests such as the Westinghouse Scholarship Contest and the National Science Fair. (A local science fair is the first step to the final which is held in Washington, D.C., and the prizes include money and college scholarships.) Five of the gifted students from Palo Alto High School have spent the summer at the University of Nevada for an intensive program called "The Junior Engineers' and Scientists' Summer Institute." Eight students have been placed during the summer in research laboratories at Stanford and nearby research firms.

Mr. Martin pointed out that colleges are overloaded with information that did not exist ten or twenty years ago and that high schools have got to provide more of the fundamentals in each science. To accomplish this, some subjects must be "stepped down" to the earlier grades. He laments the lockstep in secondary science teaching. "Many students can learn the fundamentals much earli than they do now," he insisted. "Instead how to cook and social adjustment, youn sters need to meet the vistas of knowled much earlier.

"I'm also interested in seeing that they g a sense of the history of science. In this ag it's easy for students to get the idea that a l of things—telephone, radio, TV, and fl great industrial and medical advances—gre on trees, because they have been around all their short lives. I keep trying to show th sacrifices, the years of defeat and plain ha work, that went into them."

Since Advanced Standing classes are ha work and take much of a student's time, n all who are selected as eligible choose to tal them. Some already have a heavy schedule activities; others prefer not to work so har They are not required to do so and may pr ceed with their regular classes. Those who c so, however, may complete during their seni year in high school as much as a year of co lege English, mathematics, science or soci science. If they pass standardized tests and me requirements, many colleges will give the advanced standing and credit for the wor

According to Robert Shutes, co-ordinat for the Palo Alto program, the "little snol question seldom rears its ugly head. He r called an incident of one little girl who we home from school in tears because she thoug she was not eligible to take a difficult ma ematics test. But it turned out she was eligib and along with seventy other junior-high s dents who completed seventh-grade math the sixth grade, she is n happily at work on alget in the eighth grade.

At the end of the day flattery and censure never know which has done the most harm.

HENRY S. HASKINS
Meditations in Wall Street
William Morrow and Company

Most students in special classes are too bu keeping up with the oth to feel boastful about th accomplishments; studer in the ordinary classes ha little reason to envy th labors. Since the plan cove all schools in town, fro the early grades throu high school, it is accepted by most as mere another aspect of busy school life. Evaluatio based upon the Classroom Social Distan Scale—a kind of opinion survey among st dents in a class to determine how they rate o another as persons—show that the students lected for the special classes remain as friend and are chosen as friends as widely as befo

Parents agree. The comment of Mrs. Thatcher, whose daughter has been in seve English Research classes, is typical: "The was some worry it might make for a bad a titude, but it certainly hasn't. Members of t class do not have any feeling of superiori because they have to work so hard to keep with the others." Mrs. Arthur Ellis, whose s Hugh, has been in Research classes in jun and senior high school, said: "At the st people worried about the kids' becoming sn bish, but in actual practice nothing like t has happened. I think that it has done a gr deal of good for children who seemed to lone wolves."

The cost of such a program is hard separate from general school expenses. T biggest investment is probably in the time teachers and that of the psychological test service. The total budget allotted specifica to the project in Palo Alto last year w $52,050. The budget for the program for mentally retarded was $57,530. The progra for the mentally retarded directly affects o seventy-five children. The gifted-child p gram, exclusive of the interest groups wh are for all, directly affects 1500 children of total school enrollment of about 10,000.

Superintendent Gunn is satisfied that program has demonstrated its worth in three years in which it has been operati "Tests show that children in the program achieving more," he said.

Even so, according to Lucille Nixon, administrative consultant whose suggestio started the program, it is far from a co pleted accomplishment at the present tim "Don't tell people we have all the answer she begged. "They'll write and ask us how i done—and we don't know!"

SAVE $2.50

on this beautiful

CARVEL HALL FOOD SERVER

A $3.50 retail value—
yours for only $1 plus a tab from Armour Star Lard carton

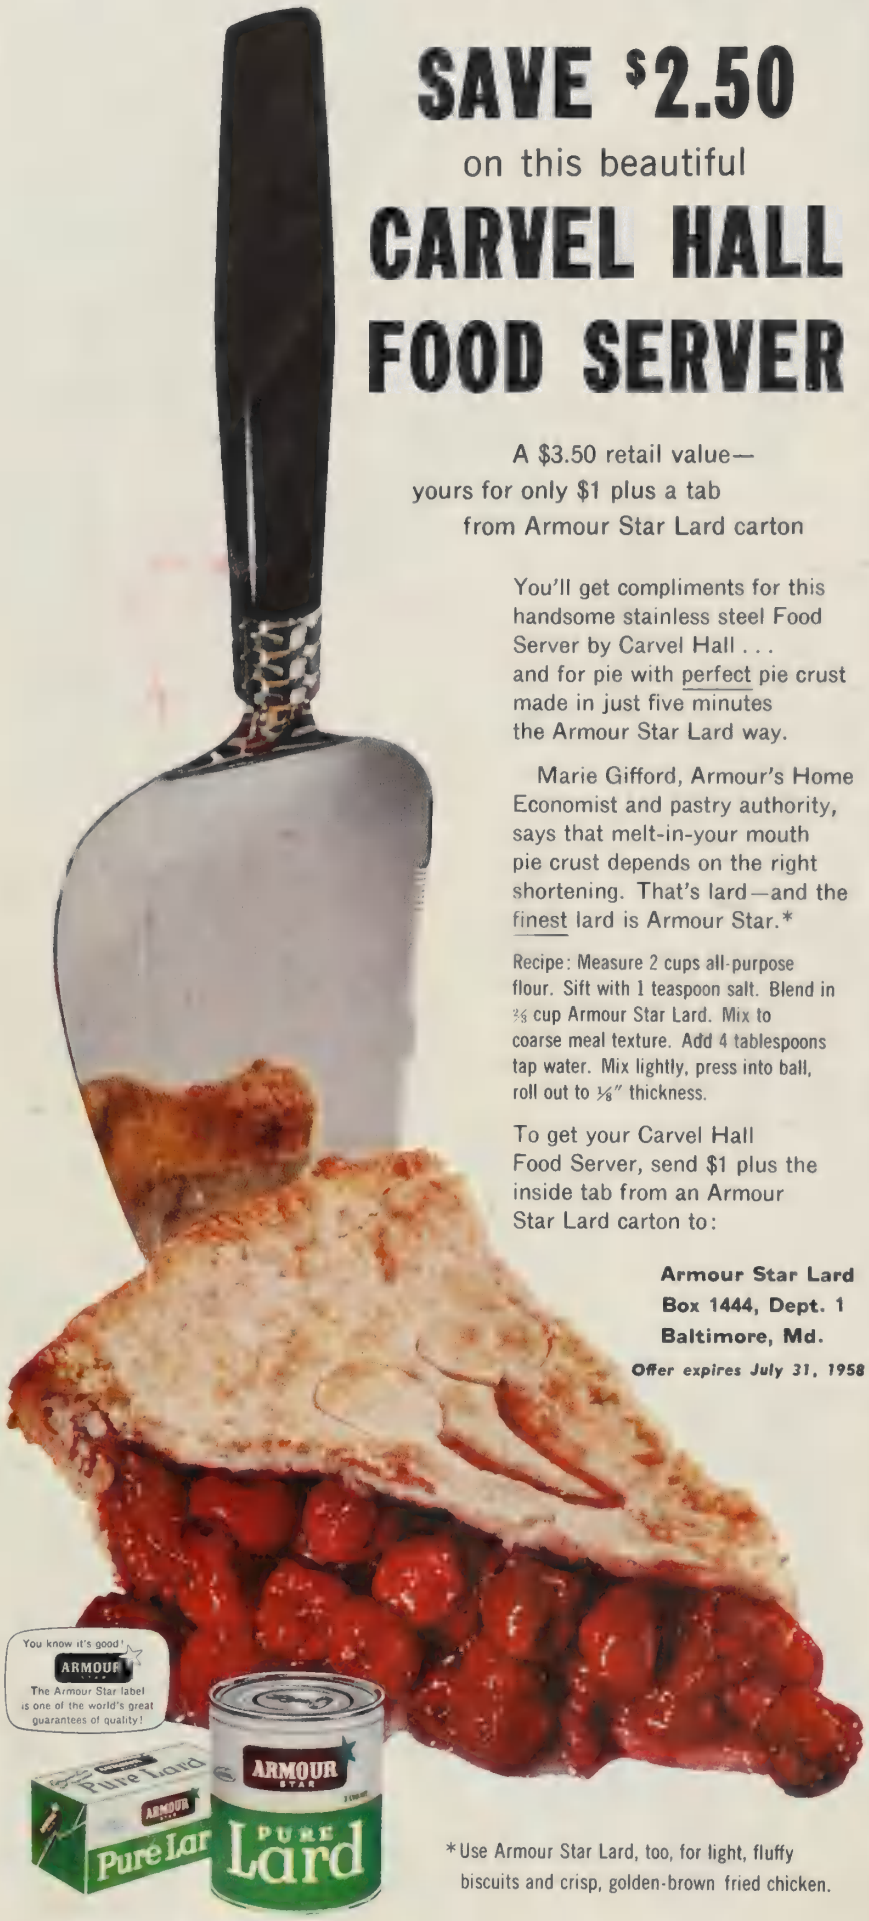
You'll get compliments for this handsome stainless steel Food Server by Carvel Hall . . . and for pie with perfect pie crust made in just five minutes the Armour Star Lard way.



Marie Gifford, Armour's Home Economist and pastry authority, says that melt-in-your mouth pie crust depends on the right shortening. That's lard—and the finest lard is Armour Star.*

Recipe: Measure 2 cups all-purpose flour. Sift with 1 teaspoon salt. Blend in ⅔ cup Armour Star Lard. Mix to coarse meal texture. Add 4 tablespoons tap water. Mix lightly, press into ball, roll out to ⅛" thickness.

To get your Carvel Hall Food Server, send $1 plus the inside tab from an Armour Star Lard carton to:

Armour Star Lard
Box 1444, Dept. 1
Baltimore, Md.

Offer expires July 31, 1958

*Use Armour Star Lard, too, for light, fluffy biscuits and crisp, golden-brown fried chicken.

Busiest tomatoes in town!

making dozens of dishes quicker and easier they're ready-seasoned with onion, celery, green pepper

How deliciously different can an easy vegetable be? Just try DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes! They come seasoned with onion, celery and green pepper, ready to heat.

You'll fix this gourmet vegetable in minutes when you start with DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes. Serve them piping hot, with crunchy, garlic-salted croutons.

Everybody has a favorite macaroni dish that calls for tomatoes, onion and green pepper—don't you? Save time and work by using DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes.

It's so easy to give rich flavor to pork or veal chops, chicken, lamb shanks. Brown the meat, add DEL MONTE Brand Stewed Tomatoes, simmer to tenderness.

Making a whole-meal soup like Shrimp or Crab Gumbo, Minestrone, Manhattan-type chowders? Just think, here are four of your ingredients all in one can, ready to add!

Time and time again, you need tomatoes with onion and green pepper for hamburger recipes: meat balls, one-dish meals, spaghetti sauce. Shortcut: Stewed Tomatoes.

What's new in stew or goulash? DEL MONTE Stewed Tomatoes—already perfectly seasoned, so you needn't peel onions, chop green peppers or celery. Just add!

Del Monte® STEWED TOMATOES

Easy Marshmallow Surprises

Kraft Recipe-size Marshmallows

You don't have to cut 'em up! And they're made a new way—so they stay soft.

Sprinkle them over sliced bananas in glasses and fill with apricot nectar for Marshmallow Golden Cocktail; measure them by the cup for molded gelatin treats like Banana Cherry Regal Salad above; broil them as the clever meringue for a luscious pie . . .

Banana Marshmallow Pie:

Slice 2 or 3 bananas into an 8- or 9-inch cooled baked pastry shell. Prepare 1 package instant vanilla pudding and pie filling according to package directions for pie. Pour over bananas. Let stand about 5 minutes. Sprinkle 2 cups Kraft Miniature Marshmallows over top. Place pie under broiler until the marshmallows are lightly browned. Chill for 30 minutes.

Free Recipe Booklet! Write to: Kraft Miniature Marshmallows, Box 1513, Dept. L5, Chicago 77, Ill.

10 miniatures equal 1 regular size marshmallow

The only kind that stay soft!

"When I entertain"

Mrs. Howard Phipps

tells her philosophy of entertaining

to Nancy Crawford Wood

STUART

A tureen of luscious chicken-and-ham gumbo is often the center of attraction on the buffet table. Serve with rice, and an unusual salad—artichoke bottoms filled with mixed vegetables which have been marinated in French dressing. Corn sticks and a vanilla-cream pudding with orange-and-strawberry sauce complete the menu.

DI PIETRO

Mrs. Phipps' favorite menus are based on recipes collected over the years by her mother, Mrs. Theodore Price. (Mrs. Phipps became interested in scouting through her mother's friendship with Juliette Low, founder of the Girl Scouts.)

"My idea of a party is a small party," says Mrs. Howard Phipps. "Whenever it's possible, I like to keep the number of people at a dinner party at a maximum of eight or ten—with lots of delicious food and interesting conversation—that's my ideal! I was fortunate in inheriting a collection of wonderful recipes from my mother, which I rely on for our entertaining; my mother had a sweet tooth, and so dessert at our house is apt to be something glamorous—like a creamy vanilla pudding with a delicious orange-and-strawberry sauce. Or crème brûlée, served with raspberries or strawberries."

Harriet Phipps is a serene and charming person, enormously energetic; a busy hostess who also works tirelessly as president of the Girl Scout Council of Greater New York—a full-time job in itself.

"When I entertain for the Girl Scouts," says Mrs. Phipps, "it's never less than fifty people at a luncheon or tea, so I'm not inexperienced in entertaining large groups—it's just that for dinner parties I think a small number makes the best party.

"One of our favorite menus for a small dinner goes this way: a first course of steaming hot consommé, then hot sliced tongue, served with a delicious mushroom-and-raisin sauce (my mother's recipe), a casserole of creamed spinach, green salad, and individual baked caramel custards.

"My two favorite hors d'oeuvres," says Mrs. Phipps, "are special little open-faced mushroom sandwiches, and something my mother called 'cheese blisters'—thin, delicate strips of pastry, light as a feather, with lots of cheese worked into the dough." The mushroom sandwiches are deliciously flavored with chicken pâté, mayonnaise and lemon juice.

"Another menu of ours which works beautifully at a buffet party has as its main course hot sweetbread timbales, served on rounds of ham, a salad of tomato aspic, made in a ring mold, the center filled with cucumber chunks which have been marinated in French dressing. Hot buttered baking-powder biscuits go with the main course, and there's pineapple sherbet for dessert.

"An alternate main dish for this meal, equally delicious, is a CONTINUED ON PAGE 143

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

He bullies Jenny for using the telephone too much. Since Jenny was obliged to move in with the younger girls to make room for her grandmother, I believe she should be shown extra consideration. Not that Jenny is appreciative of my efforts. She complains to me that her little sisters, who are six and nine, use her lipstick and perfume and meddle in her things. The three of them argue and bicker all the time. If Dick is around he mixes in and there is a battle royal, involving everybody except poor mother, who does her best to keep away from the firing line.

"Dick complains that I'm neglecting him and the girls. It isn't true. Just last month I threw a surprise birthday party for Jenny. A dozen youngsters celebrated with a barbecue in our back yard and then went dancing. When Jenny was late getting home, Dick blamed me; we wrangled for hours. Next morning I woke with a blinding headache. I could hardly stay on my feet, but I managed to keep up with the housework and look after mother too. I'm a better-than-average housekeeper and cook and I intend to maintain my standards. The children and Dick are fond of pies and cake; I bake every day. Mother pays for her high-priced medicines. Nevertheless, our grocery bills have skyrocketed because I'm cooking more expensive foods for her. I make strenuous efforts to economize. Last Saturday I drove twenty miles to a downtown sale to buy Dick a supply of bargain shirts, leaving a neighbor to handle the insulin injections. The neighbor was clumsy with the hypodermic needle and mother's arm hurt so much that for two days I carried her meals to her on trays.

"Dick wasn't sympathetic. He views m mother's presence in our house as a perso affront. After the first few weeks, he prevail on our physician to recommend that she hospitalized or sent to a sanitarium. Whe refused, he urged that she go to Ella aga Now he is arguing that she and Aunt Ma mother's youngest sister, should be set up t gether at the ranch. Aunt Mary is a widow her fifties and isn't strong. It's useless for to try to talk to him about my duty as a daug ter. These days I can think of nothing else.

"I was born in Texas, where my father w a small-town banker. I don't know mu about him. My parents were divorced whe was eight years old. Mother brought my t sisters and me—my sister Anne is dead now out here to California, where she had relativ There must have been some sort of settleme because she was able to buy the small ran where Ella and Anne and I grew up. S wanted us to have a nice place to live and the advantages—pretty clothes, music lesso dancing lessons. It wasn't her fault we did get them. The alimony sent by my father w not adequate; she had to go to work in a estate office to support us.

"She had several chances to remarry; h first boss was crazy about her and she w very fond of him. My sisters and I spoiled th romance for her. On the night her boss pr posed, mother tentatively accepted him. In t morning she asked what we thought of t idea. All three of us objected—selfishly, I n realize—to having a stepfather. She gave in us. She told her boss good-by, quit her job a put any thought of remarriage from her mi

"She tried to make a success in a number different jobs. She finally opened a real-est office of her own. She worked from dawn dusk; days passed when my sisters and scarcely saw her. Even so, her earnings w modest. Occasionally my father sent a che but it was never large enough. To add to t income, mother took paying guests at t ranch. Few of our friends ever knew it. Moth was too proud to tell them and she taught to be equally proud. I can remember the stra of pretending to classmates that our payi guests were family friends or relatives.

"Mother wouldn't hear of our taking jo to help financially. I wanted a job. I w haunted by being such a burden to her. The too, I guess I may have wanted to earn a f pretty dresses. Whenever there was money f clothes, mother usually had to spend it on h self for things to wear to business.

"The only way my sisters and I were allow to help was with the bedmaking and cleanin the dishwashing and sweeping and launderi that went on interminably at the ranch. Moth was too busy to do these jobs. She couldn't p decent wages to servants, and those we g were incompetent and always quitting. F quently I would come in from a date and wa or iron or scrub the kitchen pots before I we to bed.

"I remember the night of our junior pro it was my second date with Dick. We did get home until three A.M. My sister Ella h promised to vacuum the rugs and wash the a trays, but she hadn't done it. The vacu cleaner was in the middle of the living room must have been already half in love with Dic Anyhow, I told him about the paying gue and our precarious finances. He and I did hurry at the chores. We finished the vacuumi and washed the last ash tray at five o'clock the morning. We then had scrambled eggs a coffee and tiptoed up the stairs and left vacuum bottle of coffee at mother's door. I odd, but I can still remember wishing I had t courage to wake her and introduce her Dick. He dared me to knock, but somehow couldn't.

"I wasn't quite seventeen when Dick an ran away and were married. We intended keep our marriage secret. It wasn't possib In no time I was pregnant. Our first daught Jenny, was born before we celebrated our fi anniversary.

"Mother couldn't have been more wonde ful. She forgave us for eloping much mo readily than I forgave myself for deceiving h She hid her disappointment at my cutti short my education and welcomed Dick as son. Dick was twenty-one and in college at t

However you "cream" your coffee now—

You'll love the fresh taste and convenience of PREAM!

OVER THE COFFEE CUPS

by Sally Ross

"Coffee-Break" Dept.: Next time the girls come over for coffee, give them a variety of doughnuts. In separate paper bags, shake plain doughnuts in powdered sugar, cinnamon, and nutmeg . . . delicious!

And if they like their coffee "with" . . . they'll love it with Pream! Its fresh flavor makes a good cup of coffee taste even better. (That goes for tea and cocoa, too.)

Extra creaminess! New Instant Pream® is made entirely from fresh, sweet cream and other milk products, by the exclusive Pream process. Naturally—it's delicious!

Extra convenience! Pream keeps its fresh taste without refrigeration. And New Economy Size Pream "creams" up to 70 cups of coffee . . . costs so much less than other coffee "creamers."

When it comes to cooking . . . more and more smart gals are "Pream-ing" everything from soups to desserts—using Pream every day in so many of their favorite recipes. Try this wonderful Pream-tested frosting:

PREAM-Y CHOCOLATE FROSTING
So-o-o good and so fast!

Combine 3 tbsp. of fresh-tasting Pream (Pream is a blend of pure country cream and natural milk products) with ¼ tsp. salt and 1-lb. pkg. of confectioners' sugar. Add 3 tbsp. of soft butter or margarine, 2 squares of melted baking chocolate, 1 tsp. vanilla and 3½ tbsp. of hot water. No sifting, no fuss. Just blend until thoroughly mixed and Pream-y smooth.

FREE! For more delicious recipes to add to your collection, write for my "Quick Modern Recipe Folder." Address: Sally Ross, PREAM, Box 447, Columbus 16, Ohio.

©1958, H. C. [illegible] CO., COLUMBUS 16, OHIO

ıe, but a year short of receiving his degree.)ther insisted we occupy a guest cottage on ranch and she wouldn't take a penny of t.

'Our intention was to find a place of our n when Dick was graduated. A month be- e he got his degree my sister Anne was ied in an automobile accident. My mother nt into shock. As I look back I don't believe ever quite recovered from Anne's death. moved into the big house to be closer to and then it was awfully hard to get away. ne after time we postponed moving.

'In the end, we stayed at the ranch for rly five years. Dick should be thinking of se years now. He should remind himself of many things mother has done for us. If I ıld support mother and my daughters— ich I can't—I would leave him.

'My mother has sacrificed her life for me. ely it is up to me to do a little sacrificing for

TWO VOICES

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

HE

When we were young,
Old talk pleased best:
Immortality, fate,
The will or the state—
And the high-thinking rest.

Now all that's past
And I ponder late
One theme: how young
Are the wild apples hung
High on time's breast!

SHE

Sir, those long walks
When we two strayed
Deep in the briers
Of philosophy's glade,
To rest at last
On sweet-moss stone—
Those talks were abstract
For you alone:
My words were curved,
And all my wit
Sprang from your heart
And aimed at it.

. I don't know how Dick can be so cruel t he won't admit it."

ck tells his side:

'My wife considers me a brute and maybe I ," thirty-eight-year-old Dick said with a ture of belligerence and defensiveness. "On other hand, I should tell you that I've ked with the doctor at length—he sent me e—and he says in some ways Joan is as as her mother.

'Our present living conditions are impossi- . My daughters and I are, literally, eating sleeping in a hospital. If my mother-in- 's stay with us had even a tentative termina- n date, if Joan were willing to discuss any ctical plan in regard to her future care, per- os I could hang onto my patience. But Joan s hysterics every time I offer a suggestion. e attacks me as though my desire to pre- ve her health and our happiness was minal.

'I love Joan. My family means more to me, sure, than it means to the average man. As oy I never felt I had a real home. I was ought up by grandparents while my mother nt traipsing around the country with my her, an oil prospector who very rarely uck oil.

'My grandparents were kind and gentle but y old and it wasn't the same as having par- s. They did not discipline me in any way. I would shout and yell and defy them and they never once called my bluff or tried to make me control my nasty temper. This may sound funny, but I used to wish I had rules and regulations to follow like the other guys. I could stay out all night if I chose. Sometimes, fooling around downtown wondering whether to go home or shoot another game of pool, I felt as though I'd been thrown into deep, cold water and left to sink or swim with nobody much caring which. It was a lonesome feeling.

"Joan has forgotten it was our lonesomeness that drew us together. She, too, could stay out all hours with no questions asked. Joan was a high-school kid, just a baby, when we met on a blind date; I was in college aiming toward an engineering degree. We went steady for a year before Joan managed to introduce me to her mother; her mother was asleep when we came in at night and was never there in the daytime. But I got a pretty good idea of what was happening. A guest ranch has a lot of custodial and menial work; Joan and her sisters were doing it, cleaning the cabins, laundering the sheets and towels, mopping the floors. Their mother was wearing stylish clothes and working in town. Had she wanted to stay home and bring up the girls, I'm sure her ex-husband would have provided sufficient alimony to support the family.

"I hadn't an extra dime when I married Joan and I had my senior year at college ahead. When Joan's mother offered us the free use of a guest cottage, I was glad to accept. Just before I was graduated from U.C.L.A. the bad luck hit. Joan's younger sister was killed and their mother went into a tailspin. For months she would hardly allow Joan out of her sight. We moved into the big house on the ranch because I felt obligated, and were trapped for five years. I worked around the clock superintending the ranch operation, hating every minute. In what spare time I had I tried to set up my own business.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 97

THE TRADING STAMP:

It helps curb inflation by holding food prices down

In a study of the effects of trading stamps on food prices in supermarkets conducted by marketing experts of a large state university, they found no evidence that stamp stores as a group charge higher prices than non-stamp stores. On the contrary, they found that stamps work to hold prices down in two ways:

1. Stamps have an active competitive effect on non-stamp stores. This may result in the non-stamp merchant cutting some prices and offering give-aways or other inducements to gain customers.

2. Stamp stores, on the other hand, must also keep their prices competitive if they are to gain the increased business volume that stamps can provide.

The outcome is that whether a supermarket gives stamps or doesn't give stamps, the stamps help hold prices down in either case. In these inflationary times, our economy needs every competitive tool, like the trading stamp, that it can get, because competition is the greatest single anti-inflationary force at work.

★ ★ ★

REFERENCE: "Trading Stamp Practice and Pricing Policy." Dr. Albert Haring and Dr. Wallace O. Yoder, Marketing Department, School of Business, Indiana University.

This message is one of a series presented for your information by

THE SPERRY AND HUTCHINSON COMPANY, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, New York.

S&H pioneered 62 years ago in the movement to give trading stamps to consumers as a discount for paying cash.

S&H GREEN STAMPS are currently being saved by millions of consumers.

TOASTMASTER

This automatic fry pan gives exact control over the full range of temperatures

Even a husband who doesn't know a fry pan from a salt shaker will know you did something wonderful with the dinner. But you know the secret. Dinner comes out just as you intended, because you get exact heat control over the full range of temperatures with your Toastmaster Fry Pan.

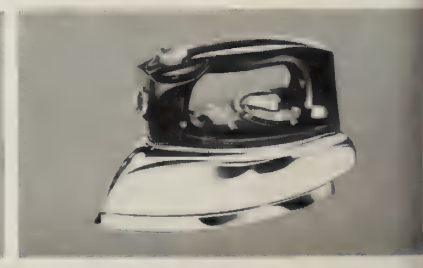
It follows your instructions to the degree, without hot spots or temperature variations. It fries, roasts, bakes, braises—cooks everything from bacon to cake. It's immersible for easy washing . . . has an automatic signal light . . . and gives you a handy cooking guide right on the handle.

Wonderful food will come from your Toastmaster Automatic Fry Pan. Ask anyone who has one. Then give one to your family soon. 11″ size; $19.95; 12″ size, $24.95. Vented covers, $3.25, $4.25.

It's another family friend from Toastmaster, a division of McGraw-Edison Company. Thirty divisions and subsidiaries, searching constantly, in the tradition of Thomas A. Edison, for better ways to serve you and your family.

TOASTMASTER DIVISION,
McGRAW-EDISON COMPANY.

"TOASTMASTER" is a registered trademark of McGraw-Edison Company, Elgin, Illinois, and Oakville, Ontario. ©1958



LOOK! IT EVEN LOWERS THE BREAD!
Toastmaster Powermatic Toaster, with exclusive Power Action, $28.95.

WAFFLES FOR FOUR AT ONCE!
Toastmaster Automatic Grill & Waffle Baker, interchangeable grids, $34.95.

THREE SLICES AT ONCE!
New Toastmaster 3-Slice Automatic Toaster, with Superflex Timer, $28.95.

IRONS FAST—FREES YOU SOONER!
Toastmaster Automatic Steam & Dry Iron, two irons in one, $16.95.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 95

That's enough about the past. I am now a y successful sales engineer; for a long e Joan and I have been comfortable and ng on fine in our own house. But now we trapped again. Nobody in my family is by, not my wife, not my daughters, and inly not myself.

t wouldn't hurt my daughter Jenny to give er room to her grandmother on a tem- ry basis, but 'temporary' is a word she and ven't heard mentioned. Jenny is becoming ated from Joan and me. At sixteen she been forced to look for her major fun and eation outside her home. Joan won't ad- it. When I object to her daughter's late s and remind her of her own neglected ood, she gets furious and denounces me. far from perfect. I know I shouldn't shout nny and the little girls the way I do, but pressures I live with are almost too much ne. My temper is always teetering on the of an explosion and my only recourse s to be to leave home in a hurry. I now like an interloper there, somebody whose function is to pay the bills. Every evening er the house on tiptoe for fear my mother- w may be taking a nap. If her door is d and I want to listen to TV, I remind my- o keep the volume low. Nowadays I find er and easier on my nerves to listen to TV where. I'm wearing out the neighbors' sets. Not long ago I woke my mother-in-law by bling over her wheel chair, a fixture in our living room. Joan glowered at me until I left the house and drove to a neighborhood movie and sat through a double feature all by myself.

"According to the doctor, my mother-in-law doesn't need a wheel chair and shouldn't be dependent on one. She should be employing this particular time to learn Braille and train herself to get about under her own steam. Instead, she expects Joan to read aloud to her by the hour, button on her clothes and even guide her from room to room. This kind of thing isn't good for her and is ruinous for Joan.

"Joan has become a combination personal maid and nurse; she also runs a diet kitchen on the side. My mother-in-law has always liked to dominate and possibly she doesn't realize what a tyrant she is. Joan doesn't protest at her most ridiculous demands but screams at me for dropping ashes on the floor. By nightfall Joan is dead-beat but too keyed up to sleep. When she goes to bed she takes sleeping pills and in the morning she takes other pills to wake her up. She wanders around in such a fog that half the time she hardly knows what she is saying or doing.

"One day she shampooed her mother's hair and dressed it twice; on the first go-around she forgot to put in a rinse. That same day she let our six-year-old Alice go to school with her hair uncombed and wearing a dirty dress, something that had never happened before. She is struggling to help her mother with Braille, although she isn't qualified in that field and her efforts meet with no enthusiasm. When our nine-year-old wanted assistance with a spelling lesson, Joan fell asleep in the middle of the lesson and the youngster came crying to me.

"Last week Joan drove miles to buy me some bargain shirts, although I had plenty of shirts. She was outraged when I failed to thank her. I'm sorry my mother-in-law is sick and, within reason, I want to help her. But Joan's welfare comes first with me. Her mother is jealous and possessive and so demanding that no amount of service from Joan will ever satisfy her.

"She has always been devious. She pretends I'm great stuff, but even when she praises me she somehow manages to convey the impression that, like all men, I'm a selfish, inconsiderate oaf. I don't know what was behind her divorce, but I'm confident her ex-husband wasn't at fault. When she is around, anything I do invariably puts me in the wrong.

"Last Thursday evening was typical. Before I left the office I tried to get hold of Joan by telephone to ask her to look up a customer's address in my files at home. For half an hour our phone was steadily busy; I supposed Jenny was jabbering with some of her teen-age pals. The supervisor refused to break in on the conversation. I needed the address before the close of the business day. On the fifteen-mile

By POLLY TOLAND

William knows that Cowboys never cry, and are always very polite to their mothers; and they're not afraid—even of the dark.

William wonders if the Cowboys really know as much as he does about what's terrible, and snarl-ly, and crouching-all-ready-to-pounce in the dark; because, if they do and are not afraid, then William, who's a Cowboy, too, cannot be afraid.

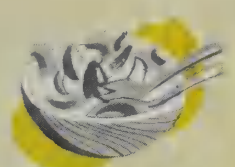
"All right, I'm going," says William, "almost right now."

"Now!" I say meaningfully.

William goes. We say his prayers. He climbs into bed. He gets out of bed and finds Bear. He gets into bed. He has forgotten a drink of water. Finally, I turn out the light.

"Mummy!"

(Heavy sigh.) "Yes, William?"



"You forgot to say you love me."

"But you know I love you, darling."

"I know," says William. "I know," says the Cowboy, "but I like to hear you say it, again and again. It makes it so very much safe."

Real lemonade . . . real easy . . . real good . . . with REALEMON! We squeeze . . . you pour!

REALEMON* reconstituted Lemon Juice makes thirst-quenching lemonade in seconds—a glass or a pitcherful. So simple to make . . . just pour REALEMON from the bottle, add cold water, sweeten to taste. Buy REALEMON Lemon Juice today, enjoy frosty lemonade all summer long. Easy, speedy, delicious. Weight watchers . . . you sweeten it exactly the way you want it. Get a big bottle of REALEMON Lemon Juice today!

REALEMON in Salads: Make cooling salads and dressings with tangy REALEMON . . . fewer calories, too!

REALEMON in Desserts: So easy to make pies, cakes, custards with REALEMON—just pour your lemon juice!

New "Plastic" Lemons: Natural strength juice in ready-to-use plastic squeeze "lemons" and "limes", they sit flat.

we squeeze ...you pour!

*REALEMON is natural strength lemon juice, not a concentrate. "RECONSTITUTED" is your guarantee of uniform strength—uniform flavor in every drop.

A product and Reg. T.M. of REALEMON - PURITAN CO., Chicago 9, Ill., San Fernando, Cal.

drive home I pulled out of heavy traffic five different times, no simple trick, and tried to get through on our line. It remained busy an hour and a half by actual clocking. When I finally got home I burst through the front door yelling like a maniac and threatening to cancel Jenny's allowance for a month.

"Jenny was still at school. My mother-in-law hung up the telephone, looked at me with a stricken expression and explained she'd been talking to her daughter Ella. She begged for my forgiveness and I felt about two inches high. I apologized profusely. These days Joan and I are always apologizing for some darn thing or another. My mother-in-law forgave me. I detest to be forgiven when I've done nothing.

"Our dinner conversation, as usual, began with a discussion of medicines, digestive processes and the exact ingredients of my mother-in-law's food. As a result of this kind of talk, both of our little girls have become problem eaters. They pick at food as though Joan had sprinkled it with arsenic. My mother-in-law was served an elaborate individual casserole. Six-year-old Alice whined for some of her grandmother's dinner. I ordered her to eat what was on her plate. I then noticed that she and the other girls and I had been served a hasty delicatessen dinner of ham and beans. Ordinarily we fare better than that. I should have had the wit to hold my tongue. I didn't. I cracked to Joan about housewives whose cooking consists of unwrapping other people's cooking. If her mother hadn't been there, all ears, Joan might have come back with a snappy retort. She should have smacked me down. Instead she apologized and in a wavering voice offered to heat up something else for me. She sounded both martyred and insincere.

"Her mother sighed deeply at Joan's forbearance and gave her a sympathetic look. I hung onto my temper. But then I noticed that little Alice had been slipped a portion of the casserole against my express orders. I took away the young lady's plate and told her she'd get no supper. Alice began to cry. Her grandmother patted her hand under the table when she thought I wasn't looking. Alice cheered up. In fact, she sassed me and I sent her to her room, a punishment she didn't deserve.

"At that point my mother-in-law dolefully told me that Joan had worked her fingers to the bone baking a lemon pie for dessert. For the ten thousandth time everybody at the table was favored with a detailed list of the sweets—including lemon pie—that diabetics aren't allowed to eat. Some time ago I stopped eating desserts in my mother-in-law's presence; when she hungrily watches, pies and cake stick in my throat.

"Possibly I should be able to brush aside such trifles. But trifles add up. Our home is a place of ever-growing tensions and unless I take a stand I see no end in sight.

"I'm willing to share financially in supporting Joan's mother. For that matter, she isn't penniless and her other daughter is prosperous. I see no reason why Joan and I and Ella and Ella's husband can't get together and figure out some solution that is fair for everybody. I see every reason why we should.

"At present Joan is sacrificing her children and me to her mother, and the arrangement isn't fair to anybody. The sacrifice is making a nervous wreck of her, and as things now stand the two of us have no marriage at all. I cannot comprehend why Joan's affection for her mother should cause her to reject and hate me."

Kind words don't wear out the tongue. DANISH PROVERB

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"This was a complicated and long-drawn-out case that covered a period of many months. From the beginning it was clear that a great deal of time and effort would be required to find any solution to the complex problem. It was clear, too, that Joan required psychological help to save herself as well as to save her marriage. Dick could escape from the dissatisfactions of his personal life into his business—he worked very hard—and by taking refuge with friends and neighbors.

"Joan had no such escape. Important as was to decide how best to care for her mother, I purposely avoided discussing that matter with Joan at first. She was quite incapable of making a rational decision or even of talking calmly to me.

"When our consultations began, she spent nearly all the time berating Dick. She blamed him for everything—the unhappiness of the marriage, her troubles with the children, her chronic weariness, her headaches, her nerves. She painted him as a monster of villainy; by contrast her ailing mother was almost a saint. At the conclusion of our third or fourth interview she left my office in tears. Later in the evening she telephoned and abruptly cancelled further counseling, saying she still badly wanted help but that Dick objected to the expense.

"Within a month she returned to the office but again, before we accomplished much, she broke off the counseling with the same excuse. Dick was miserly and indifferent to her welfare, she said. I didn't believe it.

"Dick hadn't struck me as an ungenerous man financially and his concern for his wife had been very apparent. I felt sure he was not responsible for Joan's unwillingness to proceed. She was breaking off our consultations by her own choice. Why? The answer I decided, was that she was running away from some unpleasant truth. There must be something she was afraid to face, something she was hiding from the world and perhaps from herself. The hidden factor, I surmised, might explain a large part of the emotional turmoil that manifested itself in hysteria, headaches, insomnia.

"My surmise turned out correct. Once more Joan resumed her counseling and the

And here you make your dreams come true. You do your best to keep it a happy world. You choose the best for your baby. Chix knows you really care. That's why extra care, extra quality go into Chix products—gauze diapers, disposable diapers, crib sheets, diaper liners—to make them the very best.

Next to you, Chix cares the most

Chux Disposable Diapers are proof positive of the extra care that goes into every Chix product. They're the most absorbent disposables made. They're medicated to prevent diaper rash. They're soft and gentle. And strong. Try Chux soon for traveling, everyday use.

MADE BY A Johnson & Johnson COMPANY

ne, slowly and painfully, the truth emerged. r years Joan had fancied and had been tell- everybody, including herself, that she was natically devoted to her mother. This was t true. For years, long before disease and old e clouded the picture, Joan had harbored a conscious but very strong animosity to- rd her mother. During her overworked girl- od, she had stored up resentments she could ow herself neither to admit nor to remem- r. In her code it was unthinkable to feel hos- toward her mother. She suppressed the stility. She was carrying this secret burden guilt when her mother joined the household. urred by guilt, she exhausted herself in ching and carrying and in attempting to mpel every member of her family to yield to slightest whims of their ailing guest.

"Moreover, she turned her latent hostility l force on Dick. Nothing he could do was ht in her eyes. If her mother was especially reasonable and querulous during the day, vitably Joan flared up at Dick that evening.

'Technically, this psychological phenome- n is often called 'displacement.' Once Joan derstood her mixed-up feelings, she under- od how those feelings related to her be- vior. She perceived that she had been fight- Dick when inwardly she had desired to arrel with her mother about present irrita- ns and about grievances accumulated years ore. In recognizing the truth, Joan's inner nflict was eased. Her headaches, insomnia d other emotional ailments gradually less- ed. She became able to view the practi- ities of her situation with greatly increased m and considerable fortitude.

'None of this happened overnight. Joan's t reaction to the unearthing of her hidden res of hostility was to swing to the opposite reme and blame her mother for all her cur- nt woes. This reaction is not unusual, but it sn't of any long-range assistance to Joan. entually she saw the futility and indeed the possibility of assessing and placing blame.

'Nobody was to blame for the fact that her ther was old and ill and needed to be looked er, which was the practical problem con- nting her. It was of some comfort to Joan reflect that her problem was not unique; in se days it is a problem which perplexes wing numbers of people. In a large sense, course, no solution to the problem of age d infirmity exists. Compromise and patience n't remedies, but palliatives. Joan steeled rself in advance to the knowledge that she st settle for less than a perfect answer.

'It was at this juncture that she became able convert her bitterness and hostility into re normal feelings and, at last, to see and l with the realities of her situation. She ac- owledged that her mother was neither a nt nor a villain but, by temperament, a ssy, overly possessive person difficult to live with. In seeing the older woman realistically, Joan developed some genuine affection for her. This affection was mature and compassionate, real, not something put on and phony.

"With the aid of her hard-won insight, Joan tried to analyze and understand her mother's foibles. She and I speculated that perhaps the older woman, too, might be the victim of secret guilt. It was possible, Joan thought, that her mother clung more tightly to her surviving daughters because she blamed herself for neglecting the daughter she had lost. I have no way of knowing whether this judgment was correct, but Joan told me this particular speculation led her to feel a true bond of kinship with her mother for the first time in her life.

"As she came to closer understanding, Joan acknowledged that her own irritations at being nagged and ordered around, at the extra work of caring for an invalid, were human and natural. Although her mother was entitled to sympathy and aid, there were others to be considered. Nothing was to be gained by driving Dick out of the house and very probably in the end into the divorce court.

"Joan admitted that Dick and her children had abundant cause for dissatisfaction. Dick, in particular, had reason to feel put upon. He had never hit it off especially well with his mother-in-law. Dick was inclined, as Joan pointed out to me, to equate his mother-in-law with his own mother, whom he actively disliked. It was improbable that he would change or even that he could change. Joan accepted this reality. The tensions between her and Dick relaxed.

"Joan set about changing the entire atmosphere of her home, a rugged assignment. She told her mother frankly she intended to give more of her time to her family in the future and less to nursing duties. Her mother, long accustomed to dominance, sulked and resisted. She entered into a struggle with Joan that continued for a long while. But changes were accomplished.

"The wheel chair was banished from the living room. There were no more boring discussions of dietary restrictions at the dinner table. Joan's mother had her hair shampooed and the proper rinse applied at the neighborhood beauty parlor. In my opinion both Joan and Dick were perhaps unduly disturbed about their sixteen-year-old daughter. Most adolescents pull away from their parents. But at Joan's suggestion Dick dipped into his savings and they remodeled their garage into a recreation room where Jenny could entertain her friends.

"Fortunately money was not a primary consideration in the case. Joan and Ella and the two husbands got together and worked out an arrangement that has proved to be feasible. Their mother now divides the cold months of the year between her daughters' homes and spends the summer at the ranch, companioned by her widowed sister. She enjoys the novelty of moving about.

"A part of the ranch acreage was sold and the proceeds are now being spent on paid services for Joan's mother. A practical nurse comes in three times a week, a physiotherapist, trained in teaching skills to the blind, comes in twice weekly. The invalid now leans less on her daughters. Her progress toward independence hasn't been remarkable, but Joan tries not to be discouraged and does keep her discouragement to herself. She doesn't lay the blame for her blue moods on her mother, her husband or her children.

"Joan completed her counseling about two years ago, but I still see her from time to time. She now speaks with patience of her mother and in praise of Dick.

"Dick, on his part, realizes that she is making an intelligent effort to meet her responsibilities and in turn has words of praise and appreciation for her. Their living conditions are not ideal, but they can talk together as adults about their worries. They now share each other's burdens and their marriage is on a firm footing."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal-zone number in your address when writing us about your present subscription, renewing your subscription,
ordering new subscriptions,
questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines.

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal-zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

now... there's a mattress for 2 babies

the KANTWET®

TWO-TIMER

The finest innerspring crib mattress ever made. Exclusive Crib-O-Pedic construction with double dorsal pads, more and heavier coils give double service and firmer, more resilient support. And TWO-TIMER comes complete with 2 covers: a transparent, wetproof, zippered cover for the first baby; for the second baby, this cover is removed and baby has a clean, fresh mattress with a new heavy "adult" wetproof tick. Tufted or tuftless.
Approximately $24.95

Other fine mattresses by KANTWET, $12.95 up.

best for health and safety
KANTWET® BABY PRODUCTS
The Greatest Name in Baby Sleep and Travel Needs

COMMENDED PARENTS MAGAZINE

FREE! BABY SITTER MEMO PAD . . . get one at your KANTWET dealer's.

ROSE-DERRY COMPANY
NEWTON 95, MASS.

IT'S YOUR TOOTH BRUSH
NOT YOUR TOOTH PASTE THAT DOES THE JOB AND...

NEW PRO
double duty
tooth brush does it better!

No other type of tooth brush polishes teeth so bright while massaging gums so safely!

Your tooth brush—not the brand of paste you use—does the main job of keeping your mouth healthy, your teeth bright! And the new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush does a better job for everyone who uses it.

Perfected in a famous dental clinic, it's a firm brush and a soft brush in one. You'll like the two-tone bristles . . . the two-tone handle, too. Unconditional money-back guarantee. Get the new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush at your favorite store!

THE PRO
double duty
TOOTH BRUSH
Your smile will say it's better!

PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., FLORENCE, MASS.

JONATHAN FOUND

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 41

It was while they were turning away from that door that they caught sight of Mr. Ho running up the lane toward them. In spite of being an old man, he was coming very fast. As he ran, he clutched his shoulder, where it was red and wet.

Mr. Ho began to stumble so badly that Mrs. Ho could hardly get him as far as the kitchen and into the chair by the table.

Sala locked the door after they had come through it. While Mrs. Ho unbuttoned her husband's shirt, and then soaked a clean white cloth in cold water at the sink, Mr. Ho talked in Chinese. Though Jonathan did not know what was being said, he suddenly heard the names of his father and mother.

"When are they coming home, Mr. Ho?" he asked.

For a moment Mr. Ho looked directly at Jonathan and shook his head. He did not say any words in English. He did not even say any words in Chinese.

Something about it was terrible and frightening, even more frightening than the wet, red shirt on the floor, and the dreadful quiet moaning Mrs. Ho was doing as she dipped the cloth in the water again.

"We go now, Jonny," Sala said suddenly. "Not safe stay any more. Come!"

"Where are we going?"

Sala looked fearfully and strangely at him. "Not ask questions," she said. "No time ask questions."

There was the firecracker sound again. Sala reached out a hand and pulled him down the narrow corridor into her own room.

"Stand there at door," she said. "Stand very still."

He stood there, very small and still, beneath the bright wall calendar that the missionary society had sent out to them last Christmas. Sala snatched blankets off the bed and folded them. Then she took some trinkets out of a little drawer, and some pieces of money. These she put in a faded leather bag, and the bag she hung around her neck.

She tucked the blankets under her arm, and rushed him along to his own room. She threw the blankets on the bed and took his own blanket off it, and put on top of them all another shirt, and the old blue sweater his mother had been mending yesterday . . . while he had been lying on the grass in the sunshine, drawing with his new red pen.

The thought of the red pen made him look quickly to see if he could find it. It was the most precious thing he had.

He saw it on the top of his dressing table, and got it. It was a fine, red, ball-point pen that his mother had read about in an advertisement, and sent money away for. It had taken nearly two months.

"Come," said Sala, and stretched out a hand again. The blankets were rolled into a bundle now, and tied with an old black belt. As she went past the window she suddenly put her hand on his shoulder and pushed him down, and crouched down herself.

"Keep head down!" she ordered, and led him, still crouching, into the corridor again—but not before he had had a chance to see something out the window.

What he saw was a string of strange men yellow uniforms, coming up along the hed toward the mission. They were in a hurry, t and they had guns. He knew that it was shooting of their guns he had been hearing.

"Quick!" said Sala. She half led, h pushed him along the corridor, and open the door that led out into the garden.

"Why are the soldiers coming, Sala?"

"Hush!" said Sala. "Not make a sou now. Hold tight with Sala. Run!"

A hundred questions came to him, but S had said he must not make a sound, and e since he could remember, Sala had kno what was good to do, and what was not go He kept his mouth obediently closed, a only when they were at the bottom of garden did he look back at the house.

As he did so, he heard the voice of Mrs. H

"Sala!" she called, and then "Sala!" aga Only the second time she screamed it, and was a horrible, high, long scream that he never heard before.

For a moment Sala stopped. She looked if she would run back again, but glanced do at Jonathan and shook her head quickly, a she were saying "no" to herself.

Then she made for the broken part of fence. He pushed the bushes away for her, a helped to lift the big bundle through to other side. It was while he was doing this t the loud sound happened right behind th in the house. It was a dark, choking kind scream. It sounded as if it were Mr. Ho.

Sala moaned through her teeth, but she not stop running, even though she star coughing, great, noisy coughs. Down the fi they ran, and under the shadow of the Jonathan gripped the thin hand of S tighter and ran breathlessly onward.

"It's very dark now, Sala. It must be getti late."

"Late? Yes, very late for small boy. dark is a good thing. White boy safer wh dark come."

"Is it dangerous here—to be white l me?"

"Now it is. Not always. Just now."

"Why?"

She shook her head as if she were wond ing how to answer. "Many bad men abo Jonny, who hate all white people."

"Do they hate mother and father?"

She nodded. "Even mother and fath When we get place to sleep I tell you son thing your mother told yesterday."

Presently, when they were walking through the dust at the side of the road, "Y see those lights, Jonny?"

He looked in the direction toward wh she was nodding, and saw what looked l the beginning of another village. There w more solid shapes in the night out there n They must be houses, and in many of th lights were showing—warm, yellow lights.

"Yes. Is it another town, Sala?"

"It is Foochang. It is where we will co to the road that goes all the way to Yungk where is the sea. That where we go."

"Tonight?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 102

HOW TO PREVENT TUBERCULOSIS

By PETER BRIGGS

■ Stories about new miracle cures for tuberculosis obscure the fact that the dreaded "white plague," with over 400,000 active cases, is still a serious menace in this country. Now, however, with the blessing of the American Medical Association and the U.S. Public Health Service, a vaccine is available against TB that is every bit as effective as the vaccines against diphtheria, tetanus and smallpox. Nicknamed BCG, developed in France, it is safe and nontoxic. In many countries, such as France, Norway, Denmark, Japan and Brazil, BCG vaccination has become mandatory by law. In the United States its use is strongly recommended by health authorities for individuals who are likely to be exposed to TB (such as hospital staffs), for individuals thought to have a poor resistance to it, and for residents of areas where TB mortality is unusually high.

›r most every kind of pain or ache, BAYER is what millions take because–

BAYER
Brings Fastest Relief

. the fastest, most gentle to the stomach relief you can get!

"I use it for MORNING HEADACHE!"

"I use it for the headachy feeling of HOUSEWORK FATIGUE!"

"I use it for
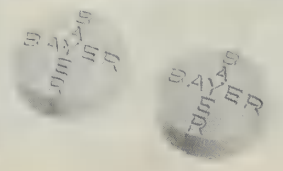
NEURALGIA
and get wonderful relief!"



"I use it for minor
RHEUMATIC PAINS!
They are temporarily relieved—fast!"

n who KNOW medicine say: "Take Aspirin!" . . . . Doctors public health officials are men who know medicine—men who know what's for pain relief. And for headache, backache, muscular pains and fever a cold, these men who know medicine say the thing to take is aspirin. the best aspirin the world has ever known is Bayer Aspirin!

y BAYER makes you feel better fast! . . . . Unlike pain-relieving ets which delay relief because they enter your stomach whole, a Bayer et disintegrates into soft, tiny flakes on its way to your stomach. There- it's ready to go to work instantly—without delay—to bring the fastest, gentle to the stomach relief you can get!

EEL BETTER FAST_with BAYER® ASPIRIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

"No. Tonight we sleep here in Foochang, if God bless."

They plodded on together. He tried to walk on the outside edges of his feet, because they ached so much. They had never ached so badly in all his life.

Some of the houses were quite close now. Soon they were walking between them.

Long ago he had felt hungry, and then, after a while, he had strangely ceased to be hungry. Now the smell of cooking came out to them from a lighted doorway. Sala smelled the cooking, too, and stopped and put the bundle on the ground. She went to the lighted doorway. He followed, pulling the bundle after him.

He caught a glimpse of low floor tables in the lighted room, with people sitting at them. Sala went up to a strange square hole in the wall through which plates of food were being passed. She spoke in Chinese to a man on the other side. At length Sala gave the man some of the coins and he passed across to her two steamy dishes of food.

She gave Jonathan one of the plates to carry. Round the other people they went, to a shadowy corner.

"Eat up all you can, Jonny. Not like food at home. But not much money."

When they had finished eating, Sala took him out into the night again, and into a place that was like a wooden shed, but also like a barn, for there was hay in it.

He helped Sala to unroll the bundle. She coughed quite a lot, but at last the coughing ceased and she smiled and spoke again.

"No money for real bed, Jonny. But the man say sleep in here, and in the morning we go early on road for Yungkia."

"Won't mother be wondering why we haven't gone back yet?"

He sat cross-legged in the hay, just as Sala was doing. She rocked to and fro for a moment.

"Your father and mother very brave people," she said at length. "Mission people all love them."

Jonathan nodded and listened quietly, saying nothing.

"But not everyone like father and mother," she went on, "because they not understand. Some of them very angry because your father refuse to put on schoolroom wall picture that government in Peiping sent him. Also they think he find out too much about China and send these things back to England."

"You mean like a spy?"

"That what they say."

He opened his eyes excitedly. He did not know what a real-life spy did, but it would be wonderful to have a spy right in his own family! It probably wasn't true, though. It couldn't really be true, for what could his father ever find out from the mission people—who did little else but learn their lessons, and pray and sing hymns?

"So there come a time," Sala was saying, "when some of the soldiers are told in Peiping to find your father and mother and take them away. Yesterday a friend come running to speak with your father and warn him. That why your father and mother went away to Taishun."

"Why?"

"I hear your mother say to keep them away from you, Jonny. In town the soldiers find them quick."

"And take them away?"

"Soldiers not always obey what they told. Sometimes they get angry and hurt people. Like Mr. Ho."

The memory of the last few minutes in Taishun came rushing back at him. He closed his eyes.

Sala said, "I hear your mother say if they took Bozzy, he not be here to bark or bite, and make soldiers angry, and do worse things."

"Did they take them away?" he asked. "Where did they take them?"

"Nobody know, Jonny. But Sala care over you!" She reached out her thin yellow hand and patted his own hand. "Sala take you to other white people in Hong Kong, like your mother say. In Yungkia is sea. And I explain to captain of junk that he must take you Hong Kong in a big hurry. And if we not enough money, Sala give him . . . well, look!"

She looked about her to make sure they were alone, then fumbled with the leather bag about her neck. She took some small green things from it, and also a small red one.

"These belong Sala!" she said proudly. "Belong Sala all her life. And mother before that. These are jade, and very precious thing. This one is ruby, most precious still. If the man not take jade, offer him ruby!"

She looked at it, but shook her head and slid her treasures back into the leather bag, and slipped it round her neck.

"Come," she said. "I show you where pump is for washing hands and face."

Sala was sleeping now. Perhaps the up-and-down movement of the waves made it easier to sleep, for she seemed happier now.

As Jonathan stood not very far from the rug they had spread out on the deck for her, he gripped one of the sail ropes tightly, and looked over the edge of the junk to where the mountain was coming nearer.

At the foot of the mountain was a town. Its name, Sala had said, was Hong Kong. It was becoming so clear—all the spread-out, glittering new world of it—that he wished she were awake and looking at it with him.

The day was almost ended now. Some time ago it had been raining, but the rain had cleared before the sunset, and now the red light of the sky was coming over the evening mist. The junk grew more pink, and gold, and purple as he stood there, watching.

He turned his eyes away from the alluring lights of the town and looked at Sala again. These last three days she had hardly talked to him.

Suddenly he saw that she was not sleeping, as he had thought. She was looking at him.

"We're nearly there," he said.

She took no notice, and it occurred to him that if he said it again, a little louder, the words might reach into her ears.

"We're nearly there!" he said again, quite loudly this time.

A fine big sparkle came into her eyes. "Good!" she said, but she started coughing.

She tried to lean on one elbow, so that she could spit into the white cloth they had given her. He tried to help her, but she shook her head, as if she were telling him to move away. He looked about him, but the sailors were busy doing other things.

You will find poetry nowhere unless you bring some with you. JOUBERT

Some of them were starting to unwrap the cargo hampers farther along the deck—and two were quarreling. Another sailor, a Siamese one, was doing something to one of the sails.

Sala stopped coughing and leaned back again, dropping her head on the rug.

The Siamese sailor came up the ladder and along the high poop deck, looking at the sky. He had an incense stick in his hand, and as Jonathan watched he fitted it into its holder before the small spirit house in the stern, and struck a match to light it. He knelt, then, and spoke soft words to the one whose image sat so quietly there. As sailors are supposed to do, he probably asked, Jonathan thought, for a good anchoring . . . for good pleasure ashore, and fine food to eat.

The town was almost upon them. It was a much bigger place than Yungkia. Now that it was beginning to be night, the lights and the shapes of it seemed to go on forever—to the right and to the left, clear up the mountain that soared behind it. And the sounds and the smells stretched out forever too.

Over all these sounds rippled the thin, high, up-and-down voices of the Chinese people. They were different from the voices he had known at home. He did not understand any of them.

The Siamese sailor jerked the rope out of his hands—not roughly, but in the way a man does when there is a sail to furl and a wharf in sight.

Jonathan looked down over the side as the other sailors nuzzled the junk along the dock wall. They were talking and laughing. Mr. Wong, the fat little master of the vessel, was noisier than any of them.

Yet suddenly it seemed as if there were a pause in all the noises. The voices did not actually seem to stop talking, but just where he was there was an odd, quick quietness.

"Jonny!"

It was Sala's voice. He turned sharply toward her.

"Yes, Sala?"

She did not reply. He knelt down to ask her what she wanted, and saw that she had managed to take off the little leather bag that hung about her neck. For a long time there had been only the ruby left in it.

She was trying to hold out her hand to him, and she said "Take!"

He saw that what she had in her hand was the red ruby. He took it. And then, as he looked at her, something funny happened to the smile. It stayed there, but went away, all at the same time. And although her eyes were turned to him, they did not look at him any more.

"We've got here, Sala!"

She took no notice at all, and suddenly with a frightening new emptiness, he felt terribly alone.

He put the little red thing back in its leather bag, and slipped it into the pocket of his shorts—along with his other treasure, the red pen. Then he stood up and shouted:

"Mr. Wong! Come, quick, Mr. Wong!"

But the master of the junk was behind the light in his cabin, and probably did not hear. It was the Siamese sailor who heard and saw. He stepped forward to look. After that he gently closed his hand over Jonathan's, and spoke some words in the Thai tongue. Jonathan did not understand them, but he knew because of the way in which the sailor nodded toward the lighted window, that they mean something about going to talk to Mr. Wong.

Mr. Wong was coming out of his cabin as they reached it. He was a round little man with a large, shiny face and small, bright eyes. He seemed very happy as he straightened the blue silk shirt that he had put on over his black silk trousers for the special occasion of going ashore.

The Siamese sailor spoke loudly. Then Mr. Wong spoke loudly also. They started to go on the deck again, but as Jonathan moved to follow, Mr. Wong turned back and, opening his cabin door, pushed Jonathan gently inside. He spoke some of the very few words of English that he knew—"Very sad small boy, wait! Soon I am back again." And this time the door was closed from the other side, and Jonathan knew that he was locked inside.

They had gone back to Sala. He knew that because of the way they had spoken her name. He wanted to run back there to look after her, but even as he wanted to do this, he knew that it was useless.

He heard strange voices out on the deck, and also Mr. Wong's voice. As he stood listening, the voices went farther and farther away. Then after a while Jonathan heard Mr. Wong's key in the lock. The door swung open, and there was another Chinese face over the shoulder of Mr. Wong.

"Where did they take Sala?" Jonathan asked in English.

Mr. Wong came in. Although he had a very loud voice he now spoke quietly.

"She is dead, small boy."

He did not say any more than that, and Jonathan felt that even if Mr. Wong had known more words in English, it would have been needless for him to use them.

"Dead" meant not hearing or saying anything any more, until they put you in a hole in the ground, and took out a prayer book and read words out of it, as he had once or twice heard his father do. He did not know what the words meant, but reading words did not make people come back again.

He wanted very much to make Sala come back. She would tell him what to say and do without her. All of a sudden his throat ached so much with wanting to ask her these things that he thought he was going to cry, but he remembered that he must try not to do this. Not where people could see him. He bit his lips, and although Mr. Wong and the strangers were watching, he did not utter any sound.

"You know, small boy?"

"Yes, Mr. Wong."

"Come, then. We go to place they care over you."

The streets were full of people. Most of them were in a hurry, and they all seemed to be talking.

Mr. Wong took Jonathan's hand, to make sure that he did not get lost. He did not like to be taken by the hand like this. That was for babies. But he let himself be pulled and edged through the crowd without protest.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 105

The loveliest hair is
-NATURALLY-COLOR-KISSED
by
tiz COLOR SPRAY

NOT A TINT... NOT A DYE

Exciting new color casts are yours without mess or fuss this easy, new way. Just spray on . . . brush in . . . rinse.

There's a shade of TIZ-Color Spray to make the most of your hair . . . naturally! Never a trace of "theatrical color". . . just the ladylike loveliness of well-groomed hair . . . alive with color highlights. TIZ makes hair manageable . . . conditions and improves its texture. Shampoos out completely.

Beauty salons give more TIZ applications than all other creme-and-color rinses combined. For lustrous color casts, ask for a TIZ-Rinse your next appointment and get TIZ-Color Spray for home use between appointments. At beauty salons and cosmetic counters.

$2.25 plus tax. Prices slightly higher outside U.S.A.

Available in nine lovely shades

GRAY HAIR TRIO: Slate, Black, Perl
BROWN HAIR QUARTET: Light, Medium, Coppery and Dark Brown
FOR BLONDES AND REDHEADS: Blonde, Copper

TIZ-PRODUCTS, INC.,
A division of M. Pier Co.,
Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

If you prefer to use a squeeze-bottle, ask for tiz—MIST in one of the nine lovely shades

Canadian Distributor: Park Distributors, Inc., Montreal

Soap dries your skin, but

DOVE creams your skin while you wash

New bath and toilet bar is one-quarter cleansing cream.

BRAND-NEW FORMULA! DOVE is a completely new formula—DOVE creams your skin while you wash. No more of that dry feeling you get after using soap.

RAINWATER-MILD! DOVE has none of the harsh alkalinity of soap. You could wash with mild DOVE twenty times a day—no matter how sensitive your skin!

LATHERS IN HARD WATER! DOVE gives you rich lather, even in hard water. And never leaves a bathtub ring.

CLEANS DEEP INTO PORES. Deeper than any cream, any soap, any liquid cleanser. Lifts out every trace of grime or stale make-up! Leaves your skin so clean.

NEW SHAPE. DOVE is sculptured to fit your hand.

MORE CREAM THAN ANY SOAP. One-quarter of every bar of DOVE is rich cleansing cream.

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll like DOVE for your face, your hands, all of you—or we'll give you back every penny you paid.

Soft whisper of luxury—the negligee in silk taffeta with fragile French roses, designed by Count Sar specially for Scott. Even softer—the luxurious matching Soft-Weve, Scott's superb 2-ply "facial qualit bath tissue. Now wrapped in sparkling cellophane to show you the exquisite Soft-Weve colors.

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

2-PLY "FACIAL QUALITY" BATH TISSUE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 102

t was the tall friend of Mr. Wong who did guiding. Presently they came to part of the vn where there were not so many people, d where the streets were wider.

The stranger said something very loud now, d waved his hand toward a low, white ilding.

Mr. Wong bowed and thanked him, and the l man hurried away. Then just the two of m, Mr. Wong and Jonathan, went through gate and up three steps to a door which od open.

There was a clean, rather nice kind of smell the room beyond the door. It was a bare t of place, with a few people sitting on a d seat which ran around the wall.

Jonathan looked curiously about him as . Wong led him to a high counter. Behind s counter a Chinese girl was sitting.

Mr. Wong spoke to her in Chinese, and she ned over the counter and smiled down on nathan. She said a number of words in inese to Mr. Wong; then to him, in Eng-h, "You'll have to wait here for a few min-s. Then you can go in to see Nurse Fowler."

Mr. Wong took him back to the wall, and people in the black clothes moved so that y could sit down. The seat was very hard, Jonathan closed his eyes and leaned inst the shoulder of Mr. Wong. He was y sleepy.

Nurse Fowler sat in a white uniform behind ig desk. She had fair hair, and the same d of soft, pale, pinkish-brown face as his ther.

Mr. Wong sat on the edge of a green leather air, speaking a great deal of Chinese. Nurse wler listened, nodding from time to time, asionally looking at Jonathan and occa-nally writing something on paper.

Presently Mr. Wong rose and bowed, and ked at Jonathan. "I go now, small boy," said. "This lady care over you until ——"

He did not say any more than "until ——" bbably, Jonathan thought, that was because did not know the words.

Jonathan clung fiercely to Mr. Wong's nd, as if he never wanted to let it go. But rse Fowler came round from her desk, and a hand on Jonathan's shoulder and said, verything's going to be quite all right. ally it is."

Jonathan watched Mr. Wong going out of room. And he listened to the sound of Mr. ng's feet fading frighteningly away down long corridor.

"Mr. Wong's been very kind to you," said rse Fowler. "But he didn't even remember ur name."

"I'm Jonathan."

"That's a fine name. Jonathan what?"

"Jonathan Adams."

"Jonathan Adams," she repeated, and wrote nething down on the paper in front of her. "What's your name?" he asked.

"I'm Nurse Fowler."

e already knew this. He had meant her er name, but he was too shy to try to make s clear.

"Is this a hospital?" he asked instead.

"Only partly a hospital. It's really the head-arters of some people who look after . . . ll, we call it the I.C.A."

"I.C.A.? What does that mean?"

"It stands for International Children's Aid."

The telephone bell rang, and she went to r desk, picking up the receiver. She started conversation with somebody called Bill. nathan pushed his hand into the pocket of shorts to make sure that his treasures were ll there. They were there all right, hard and ooth and friendly. He pulled the pen out to ok at it.

Suddenly he heard his own name mentioned the telephone conversation.

"—— with a small boy called Jonathan. nathan Adams, I think he said. . . . Yes—a ite boy! . . . The skipper of the junk be-ves they made their way from some mission in the interior. . . . No—I haven't asked m yet. I think he's pretty tired."

There was a pause after that. Nurse Fowler rted speaking again, and there was some-ng in her voice which seemed to tell Jon-han that she was very fond of the person called Bill. But she was shaking her head as she talked. "Couldn't say, Bill. . . . Yes, of course. Why don't you bring him along to-morrow afternoon?"

She listened a while longer. Then she said good-by, and hung up the receiver.

"Two new friends for you!" she exclaimed. "They want to come and talk to you tomor-row afternoon."

"From a ship?"

"One of them lives here in Hong Kong. The other is due to arrive tonight."

"Like me."

Nurse Fowler gave him the kind of smile that made him decide he liked her. He even felt comfortable enough to say, "I'm hungry."

Nurse Fowler rose quickly. "What's the matter with me? I never even asked if you'd had anything to eat. They've stopped serving meals tonight, but I think we could fix you some good soup—real, tasty soup. Does that sound all right?"

"It sounds fine, thank you!"

She was pressing a bell on the side of the desk, then glanced at the door as a rather short, fat, bald-headed white man came in. He was also wearing a white uniform.

"Let's find this young man some soup, Glover. Then we'll get him into that empty cot in Upper Three."

"Yes, ma'am."

She turned to Jonathan—"I want you to go with the orderly now. Run along and have that soup."

It was not until the following afternoon that the strange and terrible and wonderful thing happened about meeting Mr. Angus.

All sorts of new faces had come into the day. There was, for instance, the face of the

As long as a woman can look ten years younger than her own daughter, she is perfectly satisfied. OSCAR WILDE strange nurse who had looked in on him just after he woke up—the one who had given him a clean shirt.

There had been breakfast with an egg in it. After that there had been a pleasant, bald-headed man who smelled of carbolic soap and wore a white coat. He had done something called a medical examination.

More food after that, with Mr. Glover in the big kitchen, and then what Mr. Glover called forty winks, though he had not in the least been sleepy.

It was after his forty winks that Jonathan had made a curious discovery about himself. He was something called a "refugee."

Because he was white, and everybody else except the staff was Chinese, he had been permitted to play in a place called Staff Common Room. It had a row of four windows looking down onto a cobbled yard, where pale brown people in dark clothes, with big bundles, were standing in a line.

A woman in the Staff Common Room told him they were "refugees." He asked her what refugees were, and she seemed to think very hard before saying that they were people who had lost their homes and sought refuge in Hong Kong until they could find new ones to go to.

"Like me," said Jonathan.

"Yes. Like you. Only you're different."

He pressed his face against the windowpane. The refugees all looked very tired, and they did not talk much.

Jonathan was busy looking at these people when a pale young man, who also wore a white suit, tapped him on the shoulder and said that he had come to take him to Nurse Fowler again.

When they got downstairs, the young man knocked on the door of Nurse Fowler's room, then opened the door and gently pushed Jonathan inside.

Nurse Fowler spoke reassuringly, "Come in, Jonathan. I hope you had a good nap."

Jonathan nodded. Since there did not seem to be anything to say to her remark, he just stood there, staring at the strangers.

One was a big man with square shoulders and fair hair—so fair that it came out in eyebrows that you could scarcely see.

"This is Mr. Marlowe," said Nurse Fowler.

The big man thrust out a hand. Jonathan took a step nearer and shook the hand held out to him.

"And this," said Nurse Fowler, "is Mr. Angus."

Mr. Angus was a tall man, dark-haired and sunburned, with broad shoulders. He was looking very cool and neat, in a cream-colored suit and a brown tie. A quick smile came into his eyes, and he said, "Hi, Jonathan!" He said it in a warm friendly way.

"Mr. Angus," said Nurse Fowler, "comes all the way from New York, Jonathan. He traveled across his own country, and then across the Pacific in order to get here. And now he's going home the other way."

"Right round the world?"

Mr. Angus nodded solemnly. "Right around the world. You must have been quite a good way around the world yourself in order to get to China."

"I don't remember much about it. I came when I was very young."

"Really? How old are you now?"

"Seven. Are you a cowboy, Mr. Angus?"

Mr. Angus shook his head. "The best I can say is that I sometimes talk to cowboys. I run a travel business. I fix people up with cruises and ——"

"What are cruises?"

Mr. Marlowe said, "When people want to go on long journeys, there's a big organization all over the world called the Robert Angus Company. It sees that they have ships to go in."

Nurse Fowler rose from her chair and said, "Bill, I think it's better not to wait any longer. Perhaps you'd like to come with me and leave them alone for a while?"

"Of course," said Mr. Marlowe.

Nurse Fowler came quite close to Jonathan. "Mr. Angus has something to tell you. It's something I should be telling you, but he asked me if he could. He has a very good reason."

Mr. Angus moved across from his chair and put his hand on Jonathan's shoulder. They watched Mr. Marlowe hold open the door for Nurse Fowler, then follow her through it.

"Let's sit down, Jonny." The short name brought a spark to Jonathan's eyes: it was the way his father said his name. He sat facing Mr. Angus.

"When a boy's seven years old," suggested Mr. Angus, "he can be very understanding, can't he?"

"Yes, sir." Jonathan nodded.

"Now and then, Jonny, there comes a time when we have to find out about something very sad. And when it's necessary to do that it's a good thing for people to stick together and talk it over, so they can find out just what's best for them to do about it."

Jonathan sat there waiting, but something inside him began to feel frighteningly lost.

"It's about your father and mother," Mr. Angus said. "Nurse Fowler's been making a lot of inquiries through the Red Cross."

"Do you know if the soldiers are going to let them go home now?"

Mr. Angus leaned forward and spoke very softly. "I'm afraid they won't be going home any more, Jonny."

Jonathan sat terribly still, and the frightened feeling inside him became so dizzily real that he wanted to be sick because of it.

"They won't be coming home any more because they're dead, Mr. Angus. Is that what it is about them?"

Mr. Angus got up and sat on the edge of the desk. "Yes, Jonny. They died in an effort to make things safe for you. Someday you can find out all that's been discovered about what happened." He waited for a moment. "I asked Nurse Fowler's permission to tell you this because I've got something special to ask you."

Jonathan sat on the chair, looking up at Mr. Angus, but he didn't really seem to see him any more. He saw, instead, his father and mother, and Bozzy, in the car, setting out for Taishun that morning. And his mother was smiling out of the window and saying that he was to be sure to help Sala and Mrs. Ho if they needed him. And good-by now, Jonny darling, and God bless you!

The pain inside him became a lump in his throat, and the lump hurt so much that he wanted to cry because of it.

"All over the world," Mr. Angus was saying, "there are other fathers and mothers who will be very proud, someday, to know the story of your father and mother."

Jonathan stared very hard, and really saw Mr. Angus again, but he couldn't stop the tears from coming out of his eyes, and it did not seem to matter any more.

"So it's time," Mr. Angus was saying, "to tell you about another father and mother—

IMPORTANT TOOTHBRUSH ADVANCEMENT . . .

This different brush protects your gum line, where tooth troubles often start!

Ask your dentist about the specially designed ORAL B. It does what a toothbrush ought to do—protects both teeth and gums. Over 2500 very thin nylon bristles fight harmful gum disorders, the cause for over one-third* of all tooth loss.

These soft, smooth-top bristles add real brushing comfort. For that pleasant "clean-mouth feeling," make your next brush an ORAL B.

©ORAL B COMPANY
San Jose, California

The American Dental Association reports 37%.*

AVOID CONFUSION!
Only one texture . . . 3 sizes for all the family.

who would like to try and make a new home for you."

Jonathan shook his head.

"We're not your own parents, Jonny, and nobody could ever take their place. But we need a son in our family pretty badly. Maybe, over in America ——"

Jonathan did not want to hear any more. All he wanted—more than anything he had ever wanted—was to be alone. He slid quietly off the cold leather seat, and turned and ran out the door. On down the corridor he ran, and past all the Chinese people who turned to look at him on the stairs, and along the landing to Upper Three, and in through the door.

He fell wearily and achingly on the narrow white bed. And he cried for his mother just as he used to in the days when he was a very small boy.

It was not until next day that things began to be all right again. Even by midmorning he was sorry that he had run away from Mr. Angus, and he was terribly ashamed of crying in front of him.

Nurse Fowler had not been even the slightest bit cross—in fact, she had been kinder than ever. There were things to finish saying, however. And since Mr. Angus was to leave Hong Kong next morning, Nurse Fowler had planned another chance for them to be together.

It was she who had given Jonathan permission to be taken out to supper. As he walked out of the hospital between Mr. Angus and Mr. Marlowe, Jonathan felt both small and big at the same time. He felt even smaller and bigger when he was sitting between them in Mr. Marlowe's shiny blue car, which was open to the sky.

This was the time when it was neither day nor night. There were happenings like lanterns being lit, and drifts of smoke with wondrous smells in them, and gongs that boomed and quivered in the distance.

Along the road up the Peak they went, and the wind was cooler up there, but the wonderful smells of cooking faded away beneath the scent of the frangipani blossoms. They were on their way to something called a floating fish restaurant on the other side of the Peak. Here, said Mr. Marlowe, there was the best fried fish in the world.

By the time they got to the fishing village the sea was silvery black and green, and the moon had grown so bright that the light of it was like a shoal of eels on the water.

Just as Jonathan was wondering how the moonlight looked to the fishes beneath the water, his mind was brought back to things that were happening on dry land. A small Chinese woman came shuffling out of the shadows beside the fishing boats to lead the way toward a little sampan tied at the water's edge.

There were dim, round blobs of orange-yellow light along the wharf, and as they walked Jonathan saw how very old the woman was. However, when they were all in the sampan, she rowed it quickly across the water. The place they made for was a lighted staircase. It belonged to a houseboat, anchored a little way off the land.

The man who was waiting for them on top of the steps was Chinese too. He took them out to the top deck—which was the strangest kind of restaurant Jonathan had ever seen.

A smiling yellow-faced boy brought scented towels with which to wipe their faces and hands. After that, they were led to a small round table at the edge of the deck. Once you sat down there, you could look straight down through the rails into the water.

Not that there was much point in wasting time by looking at the water when there were such wonderful lists of food in front of you to choose from.

"Whatever kind of appetite you have," said Mr. Angus, "there seem to be things here especially cooked for it. Crabs and lobsters, all kinds of prawns, soles, and something called garoupa ——"

"Garoupa!" said Jonathan. "May I have garoupa, please?"

"Sure you may—all the garoupa you can eat. Perhaps Bill will tell me what we're talking about."

"A kind of sea bass," said Mr. Marlowe. "And the way they cook it here is something out of heaven!"

"Then let's both have garoupa, Jonny," said Mr. Angus.

Mr. Marlowe gave the order. And after that, Mr. Angus and Mr. Marlowe started talking about Chinese cooking.

The waiter came with a tray, and set a plate of sizzling garoupa in front of them. Then came a sauce, and other fascinating things that smelled so good it would have been impossible for Jonathan not to have remembered that he was hungry.

As he was accustomed to do at the mission, he bowed his head and waited for Mr. Angus to say grace.

The sound of knives and forks on plates made him open his eyes again, and he saw that Mr. Angus and Mr. Marlowe had started eating. It seemed unbelievable to start dinner without thanking God about it.

Jonathan looked from one to the other of them, and slowly picked up his fork.

"Now what's up?" asked Mr. Marlowe.

"Nobody said grace," replied Jonathan.

Mr. Marlowe gave a slight cough and looked about the restaurant. Mr. Angus gazed solemnly at Jonathan and suddenly laid down his knife and fork again. "Why, Jonny!" he said. "Forgive me! That's what comes of being in a hurry!" And then he bowed his head and said quietly, "Bless this food to our use, O Lord, and us to Thy service."

"Amen," said Jonathan.

All the other people in the restaurant were eating, too, and there were four at one of the tables who were laughing almost all the time. Mr. Marlowe quietly drew the attention of Mr. Angus to these people, and said, "In these houseboat restaurants, high spirits are catching. As far as I know, your all-in tourists wouldn't find anything like them anywhere else in the world."

"All-in tourists?" repeated Jonathan.

Mr. Marlowe looked vaguely troubled. "All-in tourists," he explained, "means all-inclusive tourists. You see—I'm the agent for Angus Tours in Hong Kong, and when I talk to Mr. Angus like this—he's the boss of the show—I mean people who are taking the all-inclusive tours."

Mr. Marlowe went on talking business with Mr. Angus, and for a while Jonathan paid more attention to the garoupa on his plate. Eating did not prevent him, however, from listening now and then.

"We mustn't forget that the Group A tours out of New York, can usually spend more than ——" Mr. Angus was saying, but paused as he saw that Jonathan was looking at him.

Jonathan smiled. "New York is where you come from, isn't it, sir?"

"Yes, Jonny," Mr. Angus told him.

"Do you live in a bungalow?"

"No, Jonny. It's quite a house."

"What's it like?"

"Much too big for us—and very old. It was my grandfather who built it—way back at the turn of the century."

"Are your father and mother good to you?"

Mr. Marlowe laughed quite loudly, and even Mr. Angus laughed a little. "My father and mother aren't alive any more," he said.

"Like mine," said Jonathan, and nobody said anything at all for a few seconds. Then he asked, "Do you live there alone, Mr. Angus?"

Mr. Angus seemed to be suddenly very much in earnest. "No, Jonny. You see, there's Vivien—Mrs. Angus. My wife."

"Is she good to you?"

Instead of answering the question, Mr. Angus said, "Sometimes she's lonely, too, Jonny. That's one reason why I'm looking for someone to come and live with us and be part of the family. How does America sound to you?"

"Could I have a dog there—like Bozzy?"

"Towns aren't too good for dogs, Jonny—but I imagine something could be done about that, because we live right across the street from the park. But why 'Bozzy'?"

"That was the name of our dog—in Taishun. He was a bulldog—a patchy kind of dog, but very proud. He had no pedigree, though."

"I can let you into a secret about that. Dogs are privately happier without them."

Jonathan thought about the matter solemnly. "I wish you could have seen him."

"So do I."

Jonathan turned his head away thoughtfully. He was just in time to glimpse, through the rails, a big, wide sampan gliding along the side of the restaurant.

There were lanterns on the sampan, and under the lanterns was a great array of round baskets without lids, containing all kinds of bright-colored foods.

Jonathan got to his feet to peer over the rails. He walked a little distance away, until the loaded sampan was directly beneath him. He could make out quite clearly the voices of Mr. Angus and Mr. Marlowe. "Nobody's saying you can't offer him a good home," Mr. Marlowe was saying. "But aren't you rather taking a chance, with Vivien so upset and so-so different? I wish I could think it was the one Vivien he'd be going home to—the girl we both knew in those old days in Jamaica."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

Feeling "HALF-THERE" due to Upset Stomach?

Settle Your Stomach in Seconds with Milk of Magnesia!

Scientific tests show that Phillips' Milk of Magnesia actually settles your stomach in seconds! That's because Phillips' is one of the fastest, most effective stomach acid neutralizers ever discovered!

So whenever upset stomach, gas, heartburn or other symptoms of acid indigestion have you feeling only "half-there", take Phillips' Milk of Magnesia right away. In almost no time at all you'll be back to normal—feeling bright and chipper again. Get Phillips', either regular or in new, mint-flavored form that tastes delightfully clean and refreshing.

PHILLIPS' Milk of Magnesia

REGULAR • FLAVORED

They who love are but one step from heaven.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

SHIRTS BY HATHAWAY

Avon invites you to a try-on of new make-up

"Avon Calling" to offer you a try-on of Satin Sheen Lipstick! In the comfort and privacy of your home, you choose cosmetics and fragrances with the help of your Avon Representative.

Sheer Mist Face Powder . . . so light-textured that it veils your complexion in a sheer mist of beauty. 14 flattering shades to choose from!

Satin Sheen Lipstick . . . smooth as satin, gleams like satin, clings like satin. 15 marvelous shades.

Try on this new face powder and lipstick. Then you'll want to see Avon's new foundations, nail polish and eye make-up. Your Avon Representative will call soon and offer you a make-up try-on to be sure of your selections.

IF YOU WISH AN AVON REPRESENTATIVE TO CALL, PLEASE CONSULT YOUR PHONE DIRECTORY.

© AVON cosmetics
RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVAILABLE ONLY THROUGH YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE WHO CALLS AT YOUR HOME

COPYRIGHT 1958, AVON PRODUCTS, INC.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

Jonathan did not look round, but he listened very hard. Mr. Angus replied—"Perhaps she hasn't changed as much as you think, Bill."

Again a little silence, then Mr. Marlowe's voice, gentler now. "It won't help, John—blinking the facts away. That boy needs a home as badly as any child ever did. That great house on Fifth Avenue and a flock of servants don't constitute a home. And you know it."

There was yet another wait—then Mr. Angus' voice again, much quieter. "I need him."

"Good! That's what I've been waiting for. Now we're being straight about it. I promise to do all I can for you at this end, John. Jane'll have to go through all the usual I.C.A. red tape, but let's hope it works out."

"Thanks, Bill. And another thing—I don't want him to go short of anything while they're checking on us. I don't suppose he has anything in the world except what he has on."

Jonathan, at the deck rail, understood these last words very well. An eagerness came over him to show them that he really did have something. Two things.

He slipped a hand into the pocket of his shorts and clutched the two treasures. He took them out and held them tightly in his hands, running back to the table.

"I own these!" he said clearly. "That one is a real ruby! Sala gave it to me. And mother gave me this one. It is a very good pen. It came from your country."

Mr. Angus picked up the ruby and admired it. "I don't know any boy who's lucky enough to own a gem like that!" he said. He gently put it down again, and took up the pen. "And that's about the finest pen I've seen! Do you do a lot of writing with that pen?"

"Not much, sir. I like to draw with it."

"You do?" It was Mr. Marlowe this time, and he took a white envelope from his pocket. He pushed the envelope across the table. "What about drawing something for us?"

Jonathan looked from one to the other them and considered the idea carefully. started to draw some parallel lines t stretched almost from the bottom of the velope to the top of it. As he drew, he conc trated so hard that he stuck the tip of tongue out, quite unconsciously, and furiou licked the corner of his upper lip.

After considerable lip licking, he added between the parallel lines, a series of w looked like square dots. And when these w finished, he put a line across the bottom.

He studied the drawing critically. Then, w some misgiving, he held it across the table

Mr. Angus raised one of his eyebrows with a nod passed it to Mr. Marlowe.

"A row of telegraph posts," said Mr. M lowe, and passed it back again. "Very goo Jonathan shook his head. He bit his bott lip and hoped very hard that this time M Angus would know what it was.

Mr. Angus' wrinkled brow became s denly clear and smooth again. "It's a s scraper!" he said. "What else could it be?"

Jonathan, with a triumphant smile, s proudly, "Skyscrapers are what people h in America. I thought perhaps it would m you feel at home."

"Remarkable!"

"Is it like your home?"

"Well—it's like a building near my hom

Exuberantly Jonathan took the envel and drew some people going along the str On top of their heads, Jonathan drew a lo wide-brimmed hats.

"Those are the people," Jonathan explain handing the envelope back to Mr. Angus

"But why the funny-looking hats?"

"They are the cowboys," said Jonathan

At first it was like the sound of a bee. it did not buzz, then pause awhile, buzz pause, as bees usually did.

It was so insistent that the sound came i Jonathan's sleep and woke him. For a seco or so he listened uncomprehendingly. Then a flash he was out of bed and at the windo

It was the noise of an airliner.

Jonathan did not know whether there w other airliners departing from or arriving Hong Kong at daybreak, but he did know t the one with Mr. Angus in it would be starti now. This was just what he had wanted do—wake up in time to see him off. M Angus had said last night that perhaps qu soon they would be together again. But Jon than had discovered that when people s good-by to you, you could never tell for s whether you would really see them again. I hoped so. Beyond any doubt at all, now, M Angus was a necessary friend to have.

Jonathan peered through the window, into the sky. The airliner was a long one, w four engines, and it had a row of windows t glittered in the sunrise. It was a wonderf golden thing.

Soon the airliner was just a speck in the d tance. And then, no matter how hard screwed up his eyes, Jonathan could see it longer.

Tuesday was purple. It was all very well Nurse Fowler to tell him to be patient as t days went by, but there seemed to be so ma of them. They were all so much alike that Jonathan had not had his own ways of disti guishing between them, it would have be hard to keep track of them.

Monday was blue, Tuesday was purp Wednesday was green, and Thursday was a ki of pinkish brown. Fridays, Saturdays a Sundays were not so permanently fixed.

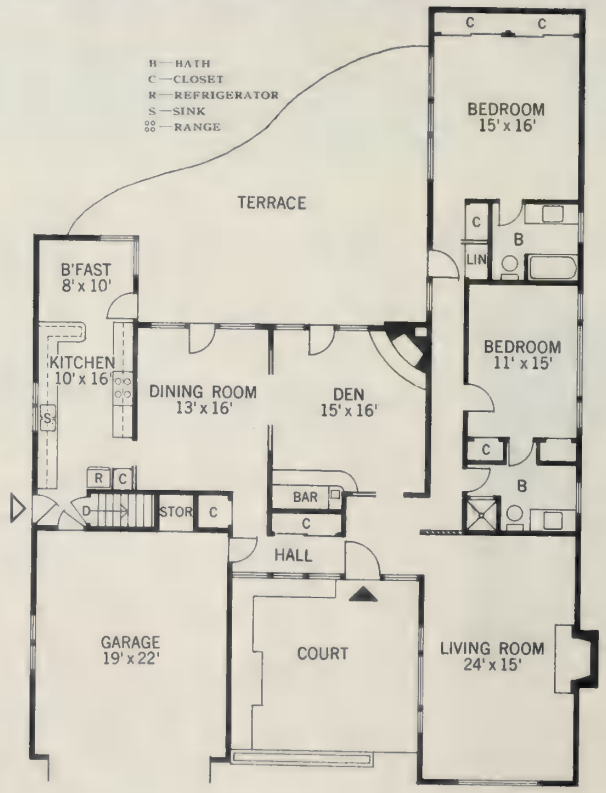
The day the first big piece of news ca through was a Tuesday. And it began just all the other days had. There had been t usual waking up and washing and scrubbi of teeth, and rushing into clothes, and eati breakfast with Mr. Glover in the big kitche

On this particular morning Mr. Glov seemed to be hurrying even more than usu Perhaps, Jonathan thought, he had some re son of his own to be counting the days als

"Are you counting the days?" he ask while he sat waiting at the big table.

"What on earth for? Here's another cup tea. Please put the rest of that milk in it befo Pok gets it."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110



ARCHITECT: RAYMOND PECK; PHOTOGRAPHER: DEARBORN-MASSAR

H is for House

Showing how the shape of the plan can promote special pleasures of living.

This house in the region of Seattle is replete with mouth-watering features that start as you step into the entrance patio off the street. Right away the beauties of the H plan begin to unfold, as you find yourself embraced by the two forward wings appearing in the small inset picture above: the garage on the left, living-room wing on the right. You pardon the picture window facing the street when you see the view it frames! Whereas around back the two rearward wings of breakfast room and master bedroom embrace a paradise of a patio, looking out over one of the luxuriant lawns for which the locality is famous. Part of this terrace is roofed over with translucent plastic, the rest open to the sky. Consider the outlook of the lucky rooms that open out upon this particular pleasance. And before we step inside, note the roof of rough-hewn cedar shakes and the skin-smooth walls of cedar siding, both weathering to rose and silver set off by snow-white trim.

Inside, the house confirms the fact that it was designed for the entertainment of its owners, who have earned it, and whose pleasure is the entertainment of their married children's families and friends. Just picture yourself at a party here, or spending a weekend. It is a fascinating plan to follow through with the point of your pencil and fun to follow through by yourself. You'll see the layout has desirable details which many a big family might borrow. H in this case is the shape of a happy house, and, for what you can get, economical to build. About $25,000.

R. P.

JUST ARRIVED! THE ALL-NEW BEAUTYREST!

New buoyant firmness! 12% greater spring support!
And this newest and most restful of mattresses actually costs least to own!

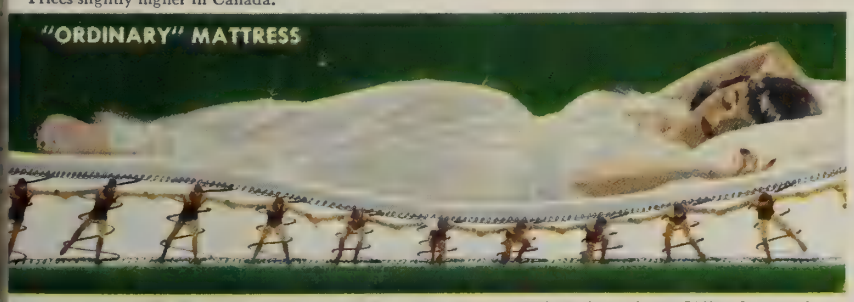
IMPORTANT NEWS for all who treasure their rest, their comfort, their budget: New power-packed springs, coiled under tension, have added 12% more buoyant firmness to the all-new Beautyrest.* Greater comfort—and Beautyrest has been proven to last longer, too!

In torture tests made by the United States Testing Co., Beautyrest lasted 3 times longer than the next best mattress. So, in the long run, this series of tests proved that the best mattress actually costs least to own!

Your choice of firmness! The new firmer Beautyrest now meets all normal requirements. There's the Extra-Firm Beautyrest for those who need added support. Each only $79.50. King-size and extra-wide models also available.

Be sure to get a matching box-spring to bring out the best in your Beautyrest.

New Beautyrest springs are power-packed by compressing each under tension. This adds 12% greater buoyant firmness that pushes up under you.



Single-bed comfort in a double bed! Beautyrest alone has separate springs. The heaviest husband cannot disturb his partner's rest.

Wake up wonderful
BEAUTYREST by SIMMONS

Enter Simmons "Win a Mattress Full of Money" Contest at your dealer's now

Prices slightly higher in Canada.

*Trade-mark Reg. U. S. Patent Office. Copr. 1958, by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.

Ordinary mattress made with about 200-300 springs. Wired together, they sag together. They're not free to push up and correctly support the shape of your body. Bad for your back, comfort and rest.

Beautyrest mattress made with over 800 separate springs. Each is free to push up and firmly support the weight and shape of your whole body. New springs have been power-packed to give 12% more firmness.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

Jonathan looked over the edge of the table and saw the pale blue eyes of Pok eying the milk jug crossly. Pok was a Siamese cat that looked as if he had buried his face in a full tin of coffee that nobody had ever been able to wash off.

Pok made a sound of exasperation.

"He doesn't like waiting either," said Jonathan.

Mr. Glover was about to reply when the house phone rang, and he went to answer it. "Yes, ma'am," he said, and hung the receiver on its hook and turned to Jonathan. "Nurse Fowler wants to see you."

Jonathan slid off the bench and went down the long corridor to Nurse Fowler's office.

She was pinker than ever this morning, and there was the smell of a nice kind of soap that he had known back home in Taishun. "Good morning, Jonny. Come over here and sit down in this chair, will you? I have something to talk to you about."

He did as she told him. She sat on the edge of the desk and tilted her head a little on one side, as if she were studying him.

"We've been trying to trace relatives in your grandmother's family in Yorkshire," she said. "Since the I.C.A. office in England has not been able to find any relatives for you, Jonny, your father's church has offered to find a good home for you."

Something about the words struck a sudden, awful panic into Jonathan's heart. Back in Taishun he had heard exactly the same words used about one of the new white kittens. Nobody had found a good home for it, however. It had been drowned.

He screwed up his eyes at the dreadful memory, and put his tightly clenched hands into them, shaking his head to try and make the picture go away.

"But I don't think it's going to be necessary for them to start finding a home, Jonny—because I also have a good piece of news."

He lowered his fists from his face. "About Mr. Angus?" he asked.

"Yes. I dare say it's seemed a long time to you, but the I.C.A. people in New York had a lot of questions to ask. Getting a new son into a family isn't as easy as you might think. Do you really want to go and live with them, Jonny?"

"Yes, please."

"You know, it's about as important for you to want to go to them as it is for them to want you!"

"Does Mrs. Angus want me too?"

"Yes, of course she does! The I.C.A. people in New York found out all sorts of wonderful things about her—in fact, she's been quite a help to the I.C.A. in years past. But I think she was quite ill a little time ago, Jonny—so you'll have to be very kind to her, won't you?"

He nodded happily. "Perhaps you could tell her I won't bang the piano if she wants me to be quiet. It sometimes used to make father very cross—me playing the piano. I can play with both hands at the same time, now."

"That's very clever. I can't even play with one!"

He shook his head. "I could show you sometime," he offered, "if you wanted me to."

"Someday before you go that would be lovely."

"Will I go by myself?"

"I don't think so. There's a lady called Miss Lunt who looks after a part of our work in New York. She's on her way around the world, visiting our different centers. If your papers get here by the time she does, then perhaps there'll be a way for you to go back to New York together."

When she said it like that, it all sounded so certain that he became suddenly too restless to sit in the chair any more. He slid off it, and came to the edge of the desk.

He stood there and stared at Nurse Fowler and then blushed, remembering something. (Sala had said, "White boys not stare at people, Jonny. Very rude to stare.")

He wondered what Sala would think if she knew about these new and exciting things. He suddenly wanted to tell her about it so badly that his throat ached. I'm going to America, Sala! I'm getting a new father and mother! I'm going to live with a lot of cowboys in a skyscraper! I'm going to have a dog like Bozzy again.

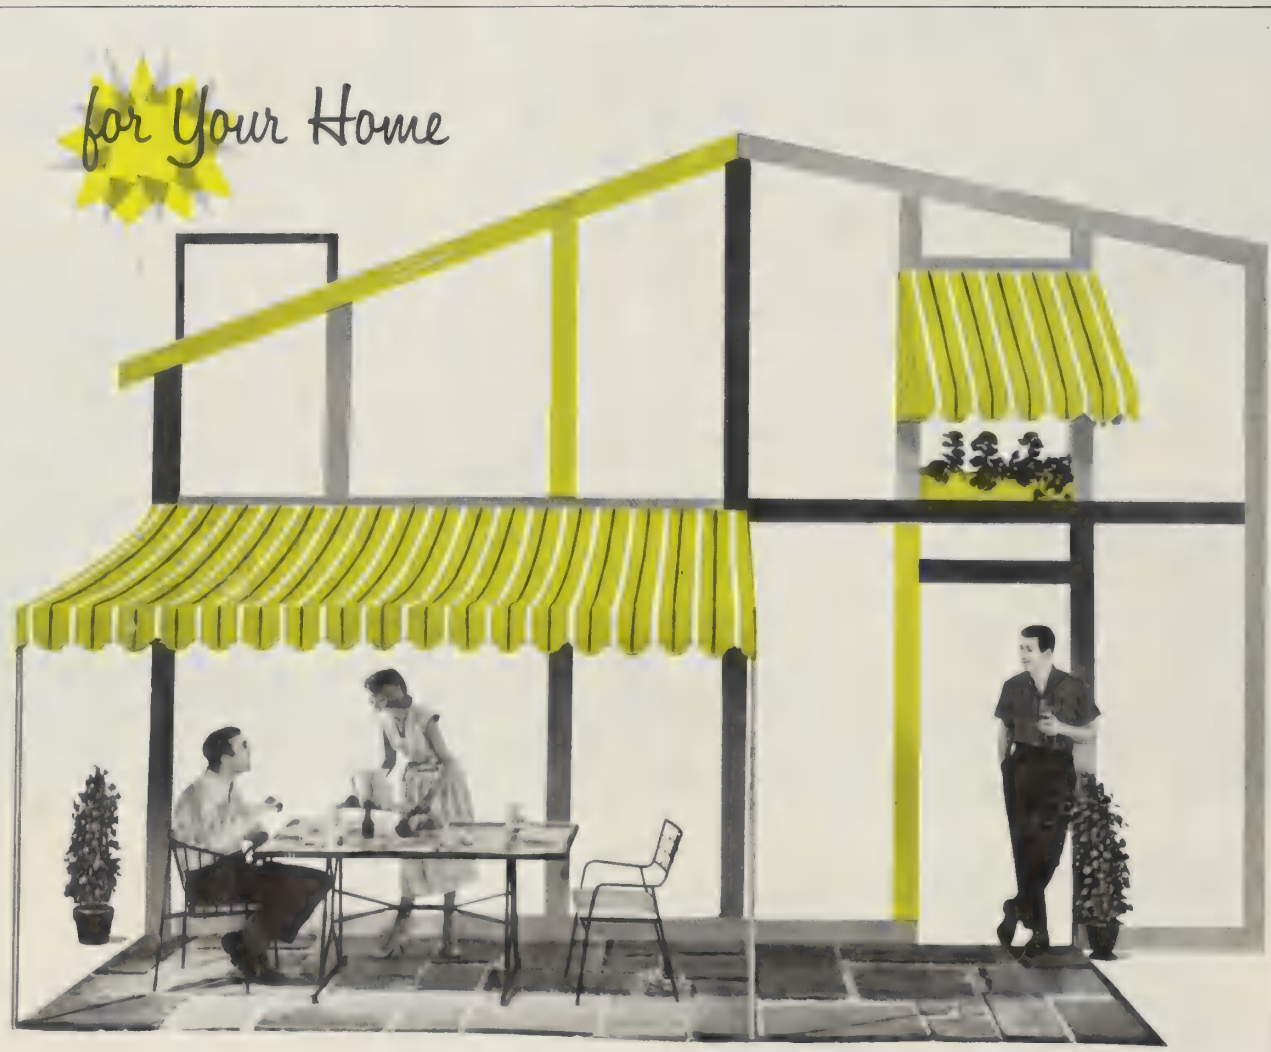
This was the day of days.

Jonathan stood at the door of the I.C.A. building with Mr. Glover, and Miss Lunt's two suitcases, and his own—waiting for the taxi that was to take them to the ship in which they were to leave for America.

He had never owned any luggage before. Now there was a small blue suitcase that definitely and assuredly belonged to him. Mr. Marlowe and Nurse Fowler had taken him out one afternoon and bought him two flannel suits, some new shirts, new underwear, and three ties that he had helped to choose—a red one that looked bright and happy, a green one with gray stripes on it, and a blue one with white spots. Mr. Marlowe had also helped to buy some socks and two pairs of shoes.

While Jonathan was looking lovingly at this luggage, the coffee-colored face of Pok appeared abruptly from behind it.



Mr. Glover, who had been helping with the luggage, saw the cat and looked crossly at him. "Do you want to cost me my job?" he asked. Whereupon Mr. Glover whisked him away, and Pok set up a wail that must have been heard all over the I.C.A. building. The last Jonathan saw of him was an angry tail lashing about under Mr. Glover's arm as he was rushed back to the kitchen.

It was then that the taxi came—and Nurse Fowler and Miss Lunt also appeared.

The driver gathered up all three suitcases and put them in the taxi. Miss Lunt said good-by to Nurse Fowler, and then helped Jonathan inside the cab.

Nurse Fowler continued to stand and wave at the top of the hospital steps until Jonathan could see her no more.

He sat in the back of the taxi then, and looked up at Miss Lunt at his side. She had arrived only two days ago. Instead of being pink and white, like Nurse Fowler, she was mostly navy blue. Miss Lunt had a big croco-a new dimension in beauty and comfort–

CANVAS AWNINGS

Outside, a smart touch of color. Inside, cool shady comfort. You enjoy both when you shade your home with canvas awnings. No more glaring sunlight and sweltering temperatures. With canvas awnings rooms stay 8 to 15° cooler . . . interior furnishings, fresh and unfaded.

Air conditioning units work better at less cost. In fact, your canvas awnings will soon pay for themselves in the savings, comfort, and protection they provide. See your local awning dealer for a wide selection of colors and styles. He's listed in your yellow pages.

Always sturdy and long-lasting, canvas awnings now boast new permanent finishes that assure you years and years of good service and rich colorful beauty.

CANVAS AWNING INSTITUTE, INC.

and NATIONAL COTTON COUNCIL

P.O. Box 9907, Memphis, Tenn.

THE CANVAS AWNING INSTITUTE INC.

Thanks

(perhaps to you too)

FROM ALL OF US AT

PY-O-MY

BAKING MIXES

The best ads our young company has are the enthusiastic users who recommend our Py-O-My mixes to their friends.

If you haven't heard, Py-O-My mixes include:
BLUEBERRY MUFFIN • APPLE THINS
BROWNIE • YEAST COFFEE CAKE
PUDDIN' CAKE • ICE BOX PIE
NEW BANANA-NUT LOAF

SALAD SALUTE

Yours! Easy to make. Fresh salads—French, Russian, Roquefort—with Pompeian Olive Oil. Flavorful, delicious!

2 oz. to 1 gal.

Pure Virgin Imported
POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL
Naturally unsaturated—better for your family recipe book—Dept. L-5, Pompeian, Balto. 24, Md.

MORE PEOPLE USE
Sugarine
SWEETER THAN SUGAR
YET NO FOOD VALUE
Doctors recommend Sugarine for diabetics, overweights, lo-calorie diets. Pure, Harmless, Economical.
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 OZ.—75¢
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

Profits for You!

YOU can profit, as thousands of others, by using our money-making plan. Our subscription commission offer is enthusiastically used by folks in many communities. You can offer and profit from the Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, Holiday, Jack and Jill and many other popular publications. Write today for our easy-to-follow plan and supplies. No obligation. Address your request to

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
630 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

ENJOY "Constant Comment" TEA

fine Ceylon tea with bits of orange and sweet spice added. "Constant Comment" is the richest, liveliest, most deliciously different tea you've ever tasted. With your family, — your friends — enjoy "Constant Comment" daily.

At food & gift Dept. stores

r 6 cup sample, nd 10¢ to C. Bigelow, Inc., Merwin St., rwalk, Conn.

TOGETHER

dile-leather bag on her lap. She snapped it open, and poked about inside it. Then she snapped it shut again—with the kind of satisfied click that made Jonathan feel she rather liked snapping it open and shut.

"Well, young man," asked Miss Lunt, "how does it feel to be setting out for the other side of the world?" She looked down at him, peering through the top of her spectacles.

"Very well, thank you," he replied. He could not even begin to tell her what he was really thinking.

She did not ask him any more, but gave a cheerful little chuckle, and let him look out the taxicab window at the things that went whirling by outside.

They came suddenly out of the narrow streets into a wider one, and now there were people everywhere. Jonathan wondered that some of them did not get run over.

Down at the harbor there were even more people, and even larger numbers of taxicabs.

"Look!" said Miss Lunt. "Over there between that building and the side of the shed."

Jonathan looked, and gave a quick gasp of astonishment.

"That's the ship, Jonathan. It's going to be our home right over the Indian Ocean—and on through the Mediterranean, and then over the Atlantic."

It was a fine sight. The ship had a wide squat funnel with a white eagle on a band of red, and blue stripes above and beneath it—all of them gleaming in the sunshine.

Miss Lunt looked as if she were going to say some more, but at that moment a rush of white steam gushed up at the side of the funnel, and the vast sound of the ship's siren filled

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR MENTAL HEALTH Fight Mental Illness

the air. The noise was frightening, yet it was exciting. It was louder and longer than any gong he had ever heard—and he edged a little closer to Miss Lunt until it stopped.

Perhaps the ship was excited too. Perhaps the ship was shouting with impatience—to be away out of the harbor and off home. Far away in the distance the horizon was shimmering and sparkling in the sunlight. On the other side of it, Jonathan supposed, lay all the rest of the world. The world and Mr. Angus.

The sounds of this strange new world were already close beside him, but beyond the ship's rail he could see nothing but the drift and swirl of the fog. The great ship's engines were silent now. All the throbbing, all the deep-down, faraway clanking that had been with them across the ocean, had ceased.

Miss Lunt had explained that this was because they were off the port—though she could not see this, any more than could any of the other passengers. She had been given the news by one of the ship's officers.

There were sounds that called out of the fog to him. As Jonathan stood at the rail, his coat collar turned up against the cold, he heard these sounds quite clearly—the deep, long calling back and forth of other liners, or the quick, sharp tooting of little tugs. He was not really supposed to be out here on the deck. He was supposed to be within sight of Miss Lunt, who was sitting with a lot of other people just inside the door of the lounge. He fancied, however, that she had done something she called "dozing off." This was a thing she did frequently.

Just as Jonathan was thinking of going back to Miss Lunt, he became aware that two of the passengers farther along the ship's rail were talking excitedly, and one of them was pointing at something out in the fog.

Jonathan ran along the deck toward them, and looked in the direction in which the man was pointing.

"There she is, the old girl!" the man was saying. "Haven't seen her for ten years."

The other man saw Jonathan. He was a gray-haired man who had come with them all the way from Manila. His name was Colonel Sutter.

"Look, my boy!" he said. "What d'you think of that, now?"

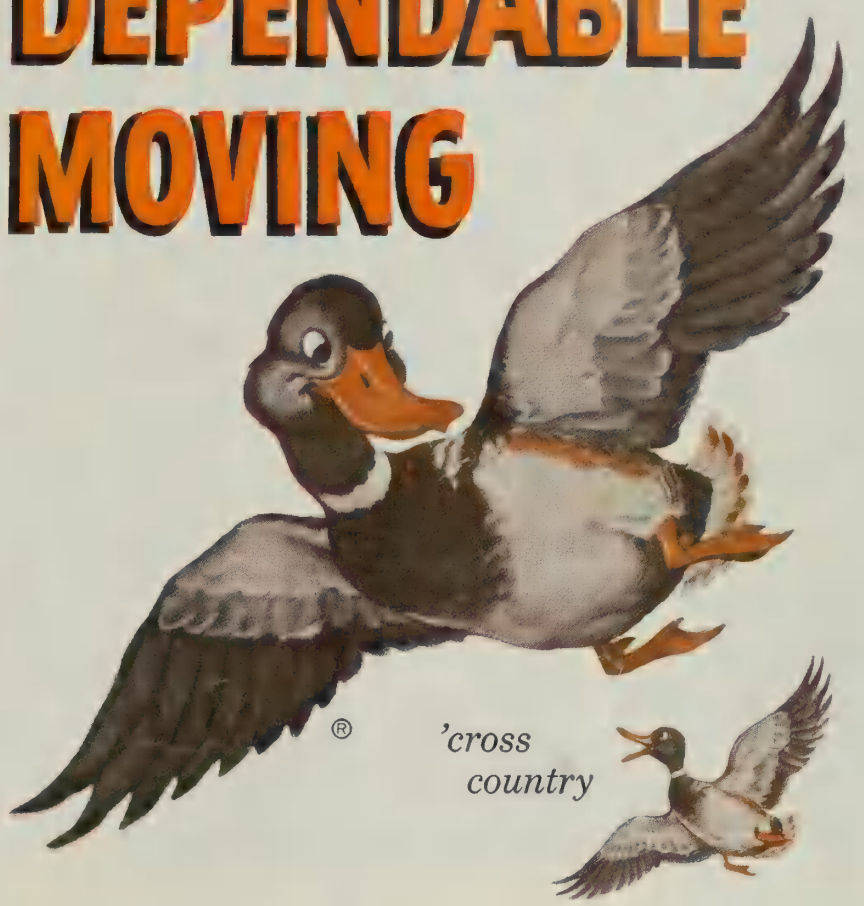
Jonathan looked, then opened his eyes as wide as they would go.

The fog was beginning to clear, and through the middle of the gap came a giant. A lady giant she was—a great, towering one, with a crown on her head and a torch held high in her hand.

"The Statue of Liberty," said Colonel Sutter proudly.

Jonathan ran quickly back along the deck and into the lounge. "Come quick, Miss Lunt!" he said. "Come quick and see!"

She gave a startled blink. "See what?"



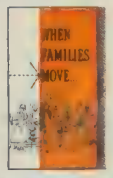
"Statue of Liberty! Quick, please!"

"She'll wait," said Miss Lunt with a smile, but came back with him to the deck.

Other people had heard of the lifting of the fog, too, and there were quite a number of them at the rail. Jonathan led Miss Lunt to an empty space. He had no sooner done so than he realized that the ship was beginning to move again.

He pointed this out to Miss Lunt. "That means we'll be moving into the dock," she

DEPENDABLE MOVING



'cross country

"Allied's sure our good friend"

It's so much easier for you . . . and safer for your things when you move with Allied—the No. 1 specialist in long distance moving (packing and storage, too). He'll handle all the details, from packing bric-a-brac to arranging furniture. Your goods are moved with expert care, and right on time!

FREE BOOKLET—"When Families Move" offers tips on helping the children adjust to the new home. Write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Box 527, Broadview, Illinois.

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

ALLIED VAN LINES, INC. • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

Nothing adds so much to your home... says so much about you... as glowing, beautiful silver on your table. Community is extravagantly plated with purest silver, for a lifetime of lovely wear. Its warmth and sparkle make every meal more inviting... and entertaining truly memorable. The gem-like clarity of Community designs is possible only in silver... crafted by world-famous silversmiths. Best of all, this truly elegant possession costs far less than it looks. Choose your favorite today from the five world-famous patterns in the Community collection at jewelers and fine silverware departments.

South Seas* (above), a striking new idea in silverware design. Daring, different!

(Below, left to right)

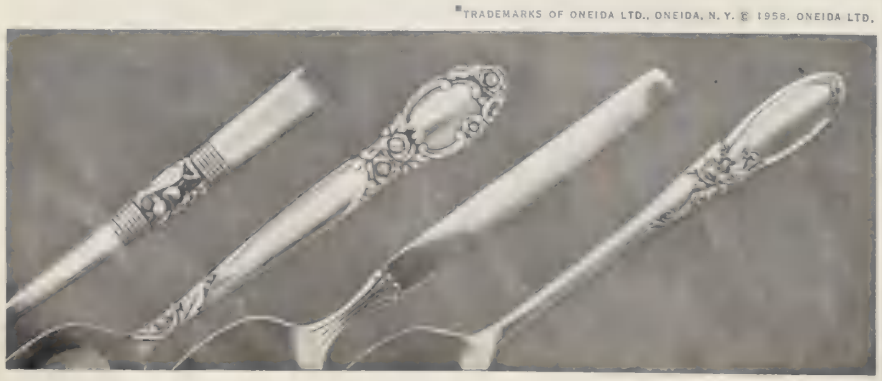
Morning Star*, sophisticated, modern, inspired by a priceless jade carving.

Ballad*, newest pattern in Community. Elegance in today's modern manner!

Twilight* has classic grace, with shell motif, tapered handles, curving tips!

White Orchid* is truly feminine. Perfect with pretty china, crystal, linens.

Sets from $42.50



crafted by

ONEIDA SILVERSMITHS

makers of distinctive tableware for your way of life

HEIRLOOM* STERLING
COMMUNITY* SILVERPLATE
ONEIDACRAFT* STAINLESS

*TRADEMARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N. Y. © 1958, ONEIDA LTD.

said. "We'll have to go back into the lounge to get our papers cleared. But before we go, there's something I can show you, Jonny. There are your first skyscrapers!"

He blinked and stared with wondering eyes. It looked as if there were hundreds of them, all shapes, sizes and colors, with millions of bright windows, glinting in the late afternoon sunshine.

"That's Manhattan," said Miss Lunt, "and that means home."

"Do you live in one of those skyscrapers, Miss Lunt?"

"No, dear. I live in a small apartment not far from the United Nations."

He looked long and hard at the view. He was still doing this when a voice came through an odd-looking box at the top of the wall.

"Passengers not in the lounge" said the voice, "are requested to assemble there at once for United States Customs and Immigration inspection."

"That means us," said Miss Lunt, and she shepherded him round the end of the deck again, and into the lounge.

The ship was already nosing into the dock when they came out into the fresh air again. Jonathan ran to the rail and looked down, seeing that already two of the big cables had been thrown from ship to shore, and there were men carrying them to posts at the dock's edge.

There was an upper level along the dock shed, too, and there was a gap in it, with more men waiting to take in the ship's gangway.

Beyond this gap, behind a wooden barrier, were many people.

With a quick new excitement, Jonathan stared eagerly along the faces over the barrier—faces of young people and old people, fat faces and thin ones. Head and shoulders over a group a man in a greatcoat was standing, his hat off and the sun on his face. Jonathan saw him, and called out, "Mr. Angus! Mr. Angus!" He raised his arm and waved. Then because all the other people around him were waving too (and they were all so much bigger) he waved both arms.

Mr. Angus saw him. He smiled and waved his hat quite high and hard.

The towering, unfamiliar world became suddenly a friendly one. And there was another thing. All the people out there had come to meet somebody special. Jonathan realized, with a strange new certainty, that for the first time he was the somebody special someone had come to meet! He turned to Miss Lunt and wanted to explain this miracle, but at the very moment she led him up to the head of the gangway, and helped him up on it.

It was an exciting, gay tunnel of a gangplank—a tunnel that led from the ship to America! And when he stepped off at the other end, there right in front of him was Mr. Angus.

Jonathan ran across the small intervening space, and Mr. Angus swept him up in two big, strong arms. "Welcome home, Jonny!" he said. "We finally made it!"

Jonathan nodded vigorously, and as Mr. Angus set him down again, turned proudly to Miss Lunt. She seemed very pleased too.

Miss Lunt stretched out her hand to Mr. Angus. "I'm so glad to meet you at last."

They talked a little more—about the journey, and about the papers that had to be signed, and presently they all went into the Customs shed where the luggage was waiting.

"Here, Jonny!" said Miss Lunt, opening the big crocodile bag. "Here's a box of those green peppermints—the kind you like. Don't eat them all at once, now."

"Thank you, Miss Lunt."

"Good-by, Jonny," she said. "I have to go down to where it says L-M-N. Be good to your new father, now!"

"Yes, Miss Lunt."

He watched as she went away and was lost among the many moving people.

QUESTION

By ANNE C. CULBERT

It took but little skill to make
My special brand of hell.
Why won't my heaven shape itself
As easily and well?

"I think by now you'll have your suitcas waiting for you, Jonny. It'll be under the A's. How does it feel to have Angus and Adam with the same initial? You'll be Jonatha Angus from now on, you know."

"Jonathan Angus," said Jonathan unbe lievingly. The words had a strange sounc "Jonathan Angus," he said again, and rathe liked the sound.

The lions had no eyes. That was almost th first thing Jonathan noticed as the taxi drive held open the door and he jumped out ont the pavement.

While Mr. Angus was getting out behin him, and the driver was taking out the blu suitcase, Jonathan stared up at the house an into the unseeing eyes of the stone lions. The were smooth and gray, standing on pillars o either side of the entrance.

There was no time to think about the lion though. Almost before Jonathan could tur his eyes away from them, the big front doo was opened and in the doorway was a ta black man in a white jacket.

Jonathan could not remember meeting an other black people. He had seen pictures an read stories about them. Most of them wer cannibals, but this one did not look like cannibal. He had a high, shiny forehead, an fuzzy gray hair that was white above th ears.

"Whitton, here's our new son at last—Maste Jonathan." Mr. Angus sounded very happy

The tall man looke down at Jonathan, the bowed and smile "Welcome home, Ma ter Jonathan," he sai

Jonathan smiled bac Politely he said, "Goo evening."

The dark man turne to Mr. Angus. "You coat, sir?"

"Don't bother jus now. Is Mrs. Angus i the music room?"

"Yes, sir."

"Good. We'll go i just as we are. Will yo take that suitcase up stairs?"

"Yes, sir."

Jonathan watched the dark man pick u the suitcase and walk away with it toward th bottom of a great flight of stairs.

They were wonderful stairs. They swept i a wide curve from the bottom of the hallwa up and up to the floors above. He caught glimpse of a tremendous shimmering thing: thing with many lights on it, like a kind upside-down fountain, hanging from the cei ing over the hallway. He stared at it in wide eyed wonder, but Mr. Angus began to lea him toward a door on the right.

There was a glow of firelight as the doo opened, and a deep, soft carpet that stoppe your feet from making any noise. There we tall mirrors and high windows, and mar flowers. And Jonathan suddenly realized th there was a big piano in front of him. Despi the thrill of the piano, however, his eyes we quickly and wonderingly to the lady who ro from a silver-green chair to come toward hi She put down on a crystal ash tray a cigaret she had been smoking.

It was queer that for a little moment noboc said anything—not even Mr. Angus. Jonatha wished that somebody would speak. H wanted to say something himself, but th silence seemed too solid for talking.

Mrs. Angus knelt on the carpet in front c him and put both hands on his shoulders. Sh was in a black dress with a little strip moonlike yellow round the top. He decide that she was the most beautiful lady he ha ever been so close to. She had gleaming, dar red hair that shone and glinted in the firelig And she had a smooth, still face with larg brown eyes. She gave him a slow and searc ing look.

"So you're home at last!" she said. And sh smiled, and drew him close to her. For moment she held him very tightly.

Something inside him made him want te ribly hard to say kind things to her. He di not know how you could want so much t comfort somebody and be afraid, at the same time.

"Come on, Jonny!" It was the reassuring voice of Mr. Angus, and he was laughing now. "What are you looking so scared for?"

Mrs. Angus let go of him and stood up. When she spoke to Mr. Angus her voice was curiously crumbly at the edges.

"It's all so new to him," she said, "but he'll soon get used to us. Won't you, Jonny?" She looked down at him, then away, and round the room. "This is a very lovely house," she said, "for a boy who can get used to things."

"Yes, Mrs. Angus," he said.

She looked across at Mr. Angus, but it sounded as if she were really talking to herself. "He isn't quite as tall," she said.

She said it as if it were some kind of mistake that Jonathan had made. He did not know who he was not as tall as.

"I'm very sorry," he said.

Mrs. Angus' eyes filled with tears, but Mr. Angus smiled down at him. "There's nothing to be sorry for, Jonny! Let's take this heavy coat off and come and get warm by the fire."

Mr. Angus helped him off with his coat—but he still clutched the box of peppermints Miss Lunt had given him. He remembered that Miss Lunt had said he must be grateful, and he wanted very much to do what Miss Lunt had said.

He walked over to Mrs. Angus and held out the box of peppermints. "They're green ones, Mrs. Angus," he said encouragingly. "They're not really as hard as they look."

"Thank you, Jonny." She took one of the peppermints, but held it for a moment between her thumb and finger. "Now that you're going to live with us, we'll have to do something about that, won't we?"

He did not know what she meant.

"About me being Mrs. Angus," she said with a smile.

Mr. Angus wrinkled his forehead, but all the same said quite gently, "Not so fast, Vivien. Let's take it as it comes, shall we? After all, he's only just . . . well, isn't it a little early to rush him, don't you think?"

Mrs. Angus turned to her husband, and although her smile did not alter, her voice seemed different, as if he, too, had now said something that was a mistake. "If we don't get things right from the first, John, it'll be just that much harder—later."

Mr. Angus looked at her for a still, long moment, then drew her attention to the peppermint in her hand. "Aren't you going to eat it, darling? They're very good ones."

She put the peppermint in her mouth and sat down on a big, shiny hassock.

For a few minutes Jonathan sat on the edge of the settee by the fireside. It was warm and comfortable there, and it was nice to have Mr. Angus beside him.

"It wouldn't surprise me," said Mr. Angus, "if he's getting hungry."

"I was not forgetting, John," said Mrs. Angus. "I thought you wanted him to sit by the fire for a while." She tapped her cigarette into another small ash tray. "Come with me, Jonny," she said. "Let's go upstairs and look at your bedroom. Everything's ready for you, dear. And there'll be a nice warm bath for you before you change your suit for dinner."

She held out her hand to him. He allowed himself to be led across the room toward the door, and wondered if he would ever be able to say aloud, in this big house, that he did not like to be led by the hand. He glanced around at Mr. Angus, hoping that he was coming too.

At the foot of the staircase Mrs. Angus released his hand, and he followed her up the soft, purple carpet that led around the wide sweep of the staircase. Along the wall were large paintings of angry-looking men, mostly with side whiskers on their faces, and kilts that showed their knees. There was also a picture of a lady in a wide, pale dress, with white hair done up into a high shape with flowers on top.

As they came up to the top of the staircase, they came level with the vast crystal thing with lights on it. It hung from the ceiling over the hallway below, and it sparkled like millions of diamonds. Near to the top of the stairs Jonathan glanced down to look at it—because the sparkles changed with every step he made. He became so fascinated that he walked backward a few steps down the stairs, and then forward again.

"Jonathan! What on earth are you doing that for?" Mrs. Angus' voice came loudly into the game he was playing.

He could not possibly explain the things he had been seeing, so he said nothing at all. She gave an odd little laugh. Then she led the way down a wide corridor.

There were several doors and just as they were getting to one it opened and a dark-colored girl with a black dress and a white apron came out.

"I've just turned down Master Jonathan's bed, ma'am," she said, "I thought perhaps he'd be going to bed early tonight—after coming all that way."

"Thank you, Frankie," said Mrs. Angus. She looked down at Jonathan. "This is Frankie, Jonathan. She takes care of the upstairs rooms, and does a lot of other useful things."

Jonathan smiled and Mrs. Angus ushered him into the big, high room beyond the door.

Once again it was a room into which he could not hear himself walk. It had a brownish carpet on the floor, and a great big bed. There were long curtains in a kind of pale orange velvet. The bed was a four-poster. He had seen pictures of such beds, but never before had he actually set eyes on one. The room had two other doors. Both were closed.

It was a beautifully warm room. It had a fireplace with a real fire in it. While he was looking at the fire, he saw that Mrs. Angus was standing very still. She was looking at something above the mantelpiece.

It was a picture—the painting of a boy about his own age. But the boy in the picture had dark hair, and looked altogether different. He was wearing a kind of brown leather jacket, and was holding a bow and arrow. He seemed to be laughing.

GOWN BY GRENELLE ESTEVEZ

Ring o' Roses pattern

NEW FROM Fostoria

...break-resistant Melmac® quality melamine dinnerware with Fashion Flair styling!

By the makers of famous Fostoria crystal, this exciting dinnerware offers you all the beauty of high-fashion styling plus complete practicality. It has a rich translucent luster. Interesting shapes, smart patterns, new decorator colors: sky blue, fawn, harvest yellow, and white. Makes a lovely complement to your crystal, sterling and other nice things.

Completely practical! It's fade-proof, dishwasher-proof, even husband- and child-proof! And guaranteed against breaking for one full year.

In fine stores only — so write for the name of the store nearest you. We'll also send you free full-color leaflets showing the many serving pieces available in each of these patterns. Prices listed, of course. Write Fostoria Glass Company, Moundsville, W. Va.

Decorative Patterns—5-pc place setting $8.75; 16-pc starter $22.95 . . . Casual Flair in four lovely colors—5-pc place setting $6.50; 16-pc starter $18.95.

Mrs. Angus' voice came across the quietness so suddenly that he was a little startled—"Perhaps you're wondering about the boy in the picture."

"He has a terrific bow and arrow," said Jonathan.

"His name was Robin. He was my son—a wonderful boy, Jonathan."

"Did Robin die, too, Mrs. Angus?" Jonathan asked.

Mrs. Angus turned to him, and for a moment she did not speak. When she did reply, her voice had a quivery sort of sound.

"He was drowned in an accident in a swimming pool . . . at a little school he went to." She drew in her breath and then spoke quickly. "Why did you say 'Did Robin die too?' " she asked.

"In China people die all the time," he replied. "My father said they go to heaven."

"I see," she said.

"You don't really see heaven, Mrs. Angus. But sometimes, if you try very hard before you go to bed, you can dream about it."

He thought that perhaps this was something she would like to know, but she turned away from the painting and said no more about it. Instead, she walked over to the bed, and said, in a colder, faraway voice, "Whitton has unpacked your suitcase, dear, and he's put your other suit out. You can manage everything for yourself, I suppose?"

He nodded vigorously.

She walked away from the bed and opened one of the other doors. "Here's your bathroom, Jonny. Your very own one. Robin used to love it. Look—I'll turn on the water for you, and you can have a bath before you put your suit on."

She turned on the tap. "I'm going to leave you to change, now, dear," Mrs. Angus said. "Don't be long, will you? This other door leads into my bedroom, and your father's room is just beyond that. We're all quite near each other."

She gave him a quick pat on the shoulder, and smiled. Then she went out of the room and closed the door after her.

Suddenly, when she had gone, the room was bigger than ever, and it was full of echoes.

He took off his jacket and started getting undressed. He remembered that he must turn off the water in the bathroom before the bath got too full. And he must turn on the cold water so that it would not be too hot to sit in.

Presently he pulled his gray shorts off. He put his two great treasures on a table by the side of his bed. He put his handkerchief there, and beside it he laid the ball-point pen. And the small red ruby beside that. The ruby did not have much light in it today, and the pen was curiously shabby.

He picked the pen up lovingly, though, and remembering precious things about it, he went into the bathroom to turn off the water.

Perhaps it was not a real sound at all. Perhaps he had dreamed it. Certainly he had been asleep. There was no light in his room—at least, none but the moonlight making a silvery-yellow crisscross on the carpet . . . that crept up and over the edge of the bed.

It was the highest bed that Jonathan had ever known, and also the softest. The sheets had a faint, sweet smell as if they had just been carried through a clover field. He thought the wood of the bedposts smelled good too.

To all these sights and smells he woke again now, but it was not the sights or the smells he thought of. What he thought of was the sound.

The sound was coming from the other side of the closed door that led to Mrs. Angus' room. He sat up in bed and listened. It was a pitiful kind of noise, and Jonathan remembered that it was the sound Sala had made the first night they had run away from Taishun. It was the sound of somebody crying.

He did not know what Mrs. Angus was crying about, but as he sat there, small and still in the great bed, he began to believe that in some way she was crying about him. The fear of her that he had felt before came back, only much more strongly.

At length he heard another door open. Almost immediately the crying sound stopped and Jonathan heard the voice of Mr. Angus.

"Viv—please—what's the trouble, darling?"

Jonathan listened sharply. It seemed a long time before Mrs. Angus replied. "I didn't think you could hear me."

"I'm still within earshot, darling. When you insisted on moving in here, at least you stayed within sound of me. Isn't it some comfort to know I'm in there if you need me?"

"If you should hear me . . . crying, John, it doesn't mean that I . . . that I need anyone."

"This was supposed to be a happy night, Viv. Are you very—are you terribly disappointed?"

"Do we have to do all this probing——"

"In the old days, darling, you used to curl up in bed at times like these and put your head on my shoulder and tell me all about it. Why go on keeping things back like this? Why go on making comparisons with the past when there's such a fine future again—right in the room next door?"

"A future for me—or for him?"

"I hoped for both of you—for all of us, Vivien. Ever since we discovered you couldn't have any more of your own, you've been longing for a boy like Jonathan!"

For a second or two Jonathan heard only the silence. When Mrs. Angus spoke, her voice was far away.

"You still don't really understand, do you, John? For years you haven't."

"I may be a fool when it comes to understanding your wish to do things so much on your own, these days. But having a new son is something altogether different. It can mean a new start for both of us, as well as for him."

"I promised you I'd do my best. He'll have everything he needs—the best of everything."

"Including love?"

There was a pause again. Then Mrs. Angus spoke so much in a whisper—a kind of fierce, quick whisper—that Jonathan could hardly hear at all.

"Isn't he the second chance I've been waiting so long for? Isn't he a chance to put things back as they were again? If that's true, the

Now... sprinkles as you iron!

New General Electric Spray, Steam and Dry Iron

And look for the standard (G-E) Steam and Dry Iron!

With Even-Flow system that gives you just the right amount of steam. Lets you press like a tailor without a damp cloth.

This amazing new iron actually shortens your ironing day!

You just press a button on the handle and your sprinkling is done for you—as you iron! Saves predampening heavy cottons, linens and starched fabrics that no ordinary iron can ever properly moisten. You pre-dampen only your very largest pieces.

Exclusive Even-Flow system gives a steadier flow of steam, lets you iron longer on one filling! Changes instantly to a dry iron.

Visualizer Fabric-dial selects right temperature for every fabric, even synthetics. It's perfect, too, for the touch-up ironing you want to do on "wash and wear" clothing.

It's so easy to use, and it comes complete with a mineral filter for convenient operation in hard or soft water areas. See it now at your General Electric dealer's. General Electric Co., Portable Appliance Dept., Bridgeport 2, Conn.

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL ELECTRIC

don't you see that I've still got all the love that's been locked away inside me since Robin died? That's why—where Jonathan's concerned—I'm going to have to be so terribly careful. I can't afford, not a second time, to take any chances, John. I can't risk ——" Mrs. Angus' voice stopped there, or rather it broke off.

"Can't risk what, Vivien?"

"Risk failing him, as I failed Robin."

"That's a terrible thing to go on thinking. He'll need a lot of love, Vivien, but he has a lot to give. Everything here must seem very strange to him. I think as soon as he starts meeting some boys of his own age ——"

"I—I'm glad you mentioned that, John. It's something we've got to understand each other about."

"What do you mean?"

"You've only got to look at him to see how wrong it would be to expose him to the average group of American boys. I think that for a while it would be better for us to have a tutor for him."

"A tutor?" Mr. Angus sounded startled. Jonathan listened and wondered. He did not know what a tutor was.

"Vivien—will you be absolutely straight with me about this? Is this really why you want a tutor for Jonny? Or is it that you're scared of his going to a school because of what happened to Robin?"

Jonathan heard a small, sharp gasp. Then there was the sound of Mrs. Angus crying again. Yet in spite of the crying she said, "If Robin hadn't been in school that day it couldn't have happened! Nearly all the rest of the school was on holiday. And it was my fault Robin was there—just because it was more convenient for him to be out of the house that week. More convenient!"

A bookie is just a pick-pocket who lets you use your own hands.

HENRY MORGAN
Braude's Second Encyclopedia
© 1957, Prentice-Hall Inc.

"Darling, you really mustn't get hysterical like this. Listen—you've got to get a grip on yourself, Vivien. You've let the thought of school, and everything to do with school, scare the life out of you."

"Please ——"

"Oh, I know that Jonathan's been living in a pretty abnormal background. But that's just one big reason for him to have a normal home, and a normal education with other boys. We've got to behave like rational people, darling, when we decide things like this."

"Are you trying to tell me I'm neurotic again?"

"For pity's sake, Viv!"

There was another silence. Then Mr. Angus said, "If you really feel we'll be protecting Jonathan best for a week or two by having a tutor here ——"

When Mrs. Angus spoke again she spoke more calmly. "There's a man called Philip Wade, John. He tutored those two boys of Barbara Simmons'. I telephoned and asked him to call tomorrow afternoon."

"Did you fix this appointment even before you'd seen Jonny?"

"It's better to be prepared. Will you be here tomorrow afternoon?"

"Of course I'll be here, Vivien. But let's not commit ourselves about this tutor until we've seen what kind of man he is. And until we feel sure they'll get along well together."

"They will, John. He sounds like the kind of man Robin would have liked."

There was a long hush again, then the sound of a door closing.

Jonathan did not understand the meaning of the things that had been spoken in there. Mr. and Mrs. Angus had a way of talking that was not at all like the talk he had listened to at home in Taishun. His father and mother always said what they liked and disliked in simple, easy words.

Either in Mrs. Angus' room or in his own, he heard a clock strike. It struck two. Jonathan looked about him to see if the clock was in his own room. He could not see it. But his eyes did see, once again, the face of the boy in the painting. The room grew bigger and lonelier. It was as if the pattern of the words that he had heard went running up and down the walls of the room. But they always came back to the painting of Robin Angus. And the arrow was pointing straight toward him.

Jonathan was glad that there was only Mr. Angus to have breakfast with. It had been Mr. Angus who had come into his room to make sure he was awake, and to help him get out the clothes he should wear. He had shown Mr. Angus the splendid ties that Mr. Marlowe and Nurse Fowler had bought for him in Hong Kong—especially the green-and-gray one that they decided was the one for this particular day. He was glad Mr. Angus liked it.

When it was time for breakfast, it seemed that Mrs. Angus was still asleep upstairs. It was important for her, Mr. Angus explained, to stay asleep until Frankie took a tray of breakfast to her.

Breakfast was not in the dining room. This was called the brown room, and it was a small, cozy back room that had bright curtains. It was a wonderful breakfast. And the sun was shining brightly even though it was too cold yet, Mr. Angus said, for the windows to be opened.

There were many books along the walls, and as Jonathan sat facing Mr. Angus across the round, polished table, he could see them over the tops of some white flowers. It was while he was staring wonderingly at the books that Jonathan caught a glimpse of Mr. Angus looking very keenly at him—and at the bowl of oatmeal that remained untouched in front of him.

"Better eat your cereal," said Mr. Angus. "Just the thing for . . . Jonathan Angus."

"Jonathan Angus," repeated Jonathan. He decided he liked his new name. He nodded his head. "Does that make me stop being a refugee?"

"Yes. And do you know something?"

Jonathan shook his head.

"We've got a job to do," said Mr. Angus.

Jonathan ate his cereal and watched Mr. Angus expectantly.

"We've got to prove something, Jonny. We've got to prove it was a good idea to adopt each other. We've got to prove that I'm the right kind of father and you're the right kind of son. We want Viv—we want Mrs. Angus to be sure of all this, don't we?"

"She doesn't like me."

Mr. Angus put down the cup of coffee he was lifting from the table. "What on earth makes you think that?"

"I think she'd like to change me."

"What a fantastic notion!"

"Wouldn't she?"

"Of course not. She may not want you to do all the things you'd like to do, but . . . between you and me, she's been wanting a son like you pretty badly."

Jonathan picked up the spoon beside the plate. "Please," he asked suddenly, "what is a tutor?"

Mr. Angus looked startled. "Were you awake in bed last night?" he asked.

Jonathan stared for a moment uncomfortably, then he pressed the spoon in his hand very hard down on the plate. "Yes, sir."

"I don't know how much you heard, Jonny—or how much you understood of what you heard. But you've got to realize that everybody's trying to work out just exactly what's best for you. You've got to trust us about that, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, a tutor is a teacher. Only instead of you going to school to him, he comes to you. Tutors have a way of knowing just what you need to find out about."

"Will he let me draw things?"

"He might even help."

"What's he like?"

Suddenly it was the voice of Mrs. Angus that Jonathan heard. He swung round in his chair to find her standing in the doorway.

"We'll be able to answer that better this afternoon, dear," she said.

She had a hat on, and a little brown fur coat. He realized that he had been right in deciding that she was the most beautiful lady in the world. She came over to him and leaned down to kiss him on the cheek.

"Good morning, Jonny," she said.

"Good morning," he replied shyly. Then he watched her walk over to Mr. Angus and kiss him on the cheek also.

Mr. Angus, who stood up when she came in, put both his hands on her shoulders and said, "Why so early, darling? I thought you were still sleeping."

"I suddenly remembered I'd promised to call for Janet and take her to a committee meeting," she told him. "We've only a short time until the Silver Slipper Ball—and we've hardly done a thing."

"'Silver Slipper Ball'? I'd forgotten about it. What's the good cause this time?"

"The crippled children again—the same as last year," she said, and then, "Can I tell you something, Jonathan?"

She hesitated, and he looked at her expectantly.

"That green tie doesn't really look very right with that suit," she said. "I have a little drawer upstairs that's just about full of ties, Jonny. I haven't time now, but when I come back we'll go through them together and pick out something more suitable, shall we?"

He merely looked at her. Perhaps it was very rude of him not to say anything like this.

When all your shelves wear Royledge, you can open any door wide with pardonable pride. For colorful Royledge looks lovely, stays fresh longer. (Costs just pennies a shelf, too!) Regular or Plasti-chrome Xtra-width (which goes all the way back on the shelf) with regular or narrow edging (for shelves close together). At your Variety, Supermarket or Department Store.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Royledge
Shelf Lining Paper and Edging
All-In-One

DESIGNED FOR Royal LIVING EVERY DAY!

Royal Lace Paper Works, B'klyn 1, N.Y.
(Division of Eastern Corporation) an extra safeguard offered only by

United Van Lines

Your most delicate possessions are kept safe and clean in a United Sanitized van.

Clothing, draperies, rugs, linens, upholstered pieces . . . all your belongings . . . arrive "Daisy Fresh" at destination. And only United Agents provide Sanitized Service—the cleanest, freshest, safest way to move lovely furnishings. It's a regular part of United service . . . no extra cost.

For "Pre-Planned", Sanitized Service call your nearest United Agent. He's listed under "MOVERS" in the Yellow Pages.

For information about the city to which you're moving and handy "Pre-Planned" moving booklet, write moving consultant Bette Malone, Dept. H2, United Van Lines, St. Louis 17, Mo.

United Van Lines

Mrs. Angus said, "I want you to promise me something, dear. I have to be out until early this afternoon. I want you to promise me not to step outside the house—not until you know the neighborhood a little better. Very soon—maybe tomorrow—I'll take you out and we'll start getting to know it. In the meantime, there's lots to keep you interested right here. You've all sorts of picture magazines to look at, and Whitton will turn on the television in the music room if you wish. If you want Whitton, just push this little bell. You understand?"

"Yes, thank you. What is television?"

"D'you mean to say you haven't even heard of it?"

Jonathan nodded his head. He was ashamed that he had not heard of television. "There wasn't anything that sounded like that in Taishun," he said.

Mr. Angus was smiling. "I didn't think there was a boy left in the world who'd escaped it!"

"What is it like?"

"Like radio with pictures. If you've finished that egg, come with me and I'll show you."

He ate the last spoonful of egg and wiped his mouth. He was getting up out of his chair when he saw that Mrs. Angus was walking away from them toward the door.

"You'll both have to excuse me," she said. "I think Lynch has the car ready. I'll be back after lunch. Cook's going to fix you something very nice, Jonny."

Mrs. Angus came back and kissed Mr. Angus very lightly on the cheek again. "Don't forget Mr. Wade's coming at three, dear," she said. "Try to make it."

"Sure I will. Good-by, Viv."

Mrs. Angus hurried out of the room. For some reason Jonathan felt happier again. He looked around him excitedly as Mr. Angus took him into the music room.

The thing to which Mr. Angus led him was a large brown piece of furniture with a window in it. Mr. Angus turned a little knob and after a moment there was a lady's voice talking, and presently there was the lady herself, making cakes.

"I don't suppose you want a cooking lesson," Mr. Angus said. "But I'm afraid there isn't much choice at this time of morning. Get Whitton to try it for you later."

He turned the knob again, and the woman vanished, cake and all. Jonathan wanted to ask questions about her, but he could see that Mr. Angus was in a hurry.

"Don't start feeling lonely, Jonny. If only you were going to school ——" He did not finish what he was going to say, but went out into the front hallway to put his coat and hat on. Jonathan followed, and Mr. Angus stretched out his hand and ruffled his hair a little. "I'm sorry to leave you like this—right on your first morning—but we're awfully busy these days."

"All-in tourists," said Jonathan with a smile.

"For heaven's sake! You remembered that from Hong Kong!"

"I'm one, too, aren't I?"

"You're what?"

"All-in tourist."

"Indeed you are! Even a kind of explorer. You can get on with your exploring right now if you like. Don't be scared about feeling at home here. It is your home, you know."

Jonathan smiled. He stood quietly in the hall as Mr. Angus went out.

The hallway seemed higher than ever when there was nobody in it. He went into the music room. He saw the big piano and realized, with a shiver of excitement, that there was nobody, now, to say that he must not play it. He sat on the piano stool and, using two fingers, played some of the black notes, then some of the white ones. Then he played one of the black notes and one of the white ones together. In the middle of a pause, among the fascinating noises he was making on the piano, Jonathan became aware of another sound. It came from the direction of the window.

It was the soft, exciting sputter of new rain. He slithered off the piano stool and ran over to the window. There was no sunlight any more, and although many of the trees were bare, there were some dark ones that were waving in the wind. The sidewalk was so bright and wet that he could see the trees upside down, and he wondered what it was like to climb up a reflected tree. He was just deciding that this must certainly be the quickest way of getting to the top, when he heard someone coming into the room behind him. He turned to see Whitton looking anxiously up at the windows above him.

"Mrs. Angus doesn't like the rain to get inside," said Whitton. "Sure is blowing up a gale!"

"Sure is," echoed Jonathan.

Whitton went out of the room again, and there was nothing left to watch but things that did not move, and nothing left to listen to but silence.

He got tired, at length, of looking at the objects in the room, and remembered the glittering thing that hung over the hallway. He went tiptoeing over the deep carpet as if going out there were something he should not be doing. Perhaps it was silly to go on tiptoe, but it seemed the only thing to do.

He went slowly up the staircase and sat on the top stair. He clasped his hands round his bare knees and put his head down on them, and looked with determination into the shining thing in front of him.

Just now it was not really shining very much. The countless little shapes of glass that had been so full of fire were just pale and bluey white. He held his head hopefully on one side to see if that would make it any better. He was still in the middle of holding his head on one side when the maid with the white apron came up the stairs.

"Good morning, Master Jonathan."

He remembered both his manners and the name Mrs. Angus had told him. "Good morning, Frankie," he said, and straightened his head up.

Let's go to that house, for the linen looks white and smells of lavender, and I love to lie in a pair of sheets that smell so. IZAAK WALTON

She had a large thing in her hand like a long black drum. It had a pipe attached to it—a kind of wide, bendy pipe with a nozzle at the end of it.

"I wondered what you were looking at," she said, "with your head down like that."

"I was looking at that," he said, "with all those bits of glass in it."

"The chandelier," said Frankie.

"Chandelier," he repeated. He liked the sound of it.

"I thought maybe they didn't have things like that where you came from," she said.

"Not glass ones," he said. "But lanterns. Very big lanterns made of rice paper, in all kinds of colors, with lights in them. They wave in the wind and blink. They have crinkles on them."

"Chinese lanterns," said Frankie. "One time I saw lanterns like them at the Mardi gras, in New Orleans." She looked over his shoulder. "But talking about Chinese lanterns won't get my work done," she added.

It had been nice to have someone to talk to. He watched her walk as far as one of the bedroom doors. Then he suddenly called, "Did Robin have a dog?"

Frankie turned to stare back at him. "I wasn't here in those days," she said, "but I shouldn't think so. She wouldn't like a dog around."

"Do you mean Mrs. Angus?" Jonathan asked her.

She nodded, then disappeared into the bedroom, but she left the door open.

Jonathan stood near the edge of the stairs, and the corridor was wide and empty again. It was sad that Mrs. Angus did not like dogs. Perhaps, someday, if he could find the right kind of dog —— As he thought of the possibility he got a bright new idea, and ran to the door that Frankie had left open.

She was standing in there with the thing that had been in her hand making a great swooshing sound, and she was stroking the carpet with it.

"Please can you tell me," he asked, "where there is a bit of paper—paper to draw on?"

Frankie flicked a little switch on the thing she carried, and the swooshing suddenly stopped. "I know where there are some little bits of papers," she said, and he watched her go to a bedside table. She tore some pages off a message pad and handed them to him.

"Why don't you go downstairs to the brown room?" she suggested. "You could sit at the desk and draw. It's nice and warm down there."

"You don't think Mrs. Angus will be cross?"

Frankie pondered the question. "Why should she be?"

Jonathan did not know why. He only knew that it seemed a likely thing to happen.

"You too?" asked Frankie, with an odd little laugh. "You never know, with Mrs. Angus," she said. "You just have to remember that when she sets her mind on doing something her way there ain't never going to be anything that changes her mind. Nothing!"

"Oh!" said Jonathan.

"She's been a very sick woman," said Frankie, "and you just have to pray she's in the right mood when you ask her for something, or you sure will never get it!"

Jonathan looked at her gravely. She stared at him a moment, then turned on the swooshing sound and went on stroking the carpet.

He ran down the stairs and into the brown room. He pulled out the chair at the desk and spread the paper in front of him, and carefully took out of his pocket the ball-point pen. Then he started to draw.

What he drew was Bozzy. Perhaps, even if Mrs. Angus didn't want a dog of her own in the house, she might like other people's dogs. And maybe, if someday he drew a great many pictures of another dog as brave as Bozzy, Mrs. Angus might think it would be nice to have the picture turned into a real, live dog. The new dog could be called Bozzy too.

"Hello, Jonny. Sorry you were left alone nearly all day!"

He had been so absorbed in what he was doing that he had not even heard Mrs. Angus opening the door.

He gathered together the little bits of paper on which he had been drawing, and held them tightly as he slid off the seat.

He had started his drawing in the brown room, but after Whitton had brought his lunch in there, and left him, he had got tired of the room and come back to finish his drawing in the music room.

It was through the open top of the piano that he saw Mrs. Angus, smiling at him, and holding a big brown paper package.

She set the package on the floor. Something made him want to show her the drawings. But instead of moving, he stood there, a sudden shyness making him slip his hand with the drawings in it behind his back.

"What were you writing so busily?"

"I wasn't writing anything, Mrs. Angus."

"Then what were you doing?" She slipped off the brown fur jacket and the pretty hat.

"Drawing pictures," he said.

She held out her hand. "Can't I see them?"

He brought his hand round from behind his back with a sudden agony of hoping that she would understand what the drawings were all about. "They're pictures of Bozzy," he said, looking over her elbow at them.

"I heard you mention him before," said Mrs. Angus. "But I didn't realize Bozzy was a dog. What kind of dog was he?"

It was sad that the pictures were not good enough for her to have seen this for herself.

"A bulldog," he explained, and added, "Did you ever have a dog?"

She looked over the top of the drawings, and out into the room, but it was as if she did not really see the room. "Yes, once when I was a little girl I had a dog, but now that I have a home of my own I really couldn't do with one. You can't keep a house clean when you have a dog in it."

"Bozzy was clean, Mrs. Angus. He licked his dish and he was neat about everything."

She had no comment to make about that. He looked back at the drawings in her hands.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 118

New Simoniz Floor Wax - childproof because there's vinyl in it!

Vinyl—tough, brilliant vinyl—makes new Simoniz® Floor Wax the toughest, glossiest floor wax ever.

Now, kids can spill on your floors. Romp on them. Track on them. Vinyl, the miracle ingredient, means childproof protection.

Floors never shone so mirror-bright. Never stayed so bright, so long . . . even with frequent damp mopping. Yet, when it comes to re-waxing, new Simoniz Floor Wax removes evenly—no blotching.

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. You don't need to buff. You don't need to rub. Try it.

For all floors—linoleum, rubber, asphalt, vinyl tile and finished wood

SIMONIZ MAKES IT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 116

"Did Robin draw too?" he asked.

She glanced at him in quite a different kind of way, as if she had become mysteriously cross with him.

"No," she said. "It was one of the things he didn't care to do very much. He used to think it rather a waste of time."

"Didn't he like to draw anything?"

"Robin preferred to build things. His father bought him some small building tools and some special wooden things. You'll have to learn to build things, too, Jonny. It's a fine, manly thing to do."

Slowly he nodded his head.

Without seeming to realize what she was doing, she folded up the pictures of Bozzy right in the middle, and then over again, tightly and very firmly. While he stared at the wad of folded paper she got to her feet and walked over to the fire and dropped it into the flames. It unfolded a little, as if the dogs were trying desperately to scramble off the pieces of paper and get out of the fireplace and back to him.

He clenched his fists for them, and turned away from the terrible little extra brightness in the flames, and as he turned he saw that Mrs. Angus had gone back to the chair where the brown paper package was.

She picked it up and smiled just as if the pictures of Bozzy had never been burned.

"I was forgetting all about this, Jonny. It's a surprise for you."

He looked at it, and said, "Thank you, Mrs. Angus," but he did not take it from her.

"Aren't you going to open it?"

He nodded, and stretched out his hands for the package.

"You don't seem very happy about it, Jonny. I thought it might be quite a thrill to get a surprise like this."

He took the paper off the box and opened it. Inside was a great big cowboy hat, and a red shirt, and chaps with twisty white fur on them. It was a cowboy suit.

It was so wonderful that he forgot the thing he was thinking about and grew excited. "Is it all for me?" he asked, and timidly, then quite boldly, put the wide-brimmed hat on, and felt very grand in it. He smiled and said, "Thank you, Mrs. Angus."

She leaned over the box and took something else out of the wrappings. "It even has this!" she exclaimed, and pulled out a shiny holster with an even shinier gun.

He sat instantly still and stared at it.

"It really works," Mrs. Angus said. "Just listen!" She slipped the gun out of its holster and pressed the trigger.

There was a short, sharp crack—and she laughed at the sound. "Isn't it wonderful!"

He closed his eyes and tried not to think of the terrible Taishun sounds that came crackling back at him as he sat there.

He put his hands over his ears, and realized that his fingers were trembling again. He hoped terribly hard that she did not notice this. He hoped, too, that something would happen so that he would not have to talk about it. And something did happen.

While his hands were still over his ears, Whitton appeared at the door, saying, "A Mr. Wade to see you, madam."

Mrs. Angus rose to her feet again. For a moment she seemed very angry. She put the gun back in the box and looked at Jonathan sharply and disapprovingly. Then she turned to the door and said, "Show him in, Whitton."

Jonathan watched Whitton open the door and usher Mr. Wade into the room. Mr. Wade was not so tall as Mr. Angus, but he was thicker. He looked a strong kind of man, and wore a browny-gray suit, and had lion-colored hair that was scribbly at the edges.

Mrs. Angus did not get up from her chair, and Mr. Wade came across the room to shake hands with her. Jonathan was looking at him so intently that he did not hear all Mrs. Angus was saying. But suddenly five of the words seemed louder than all the others.

"This is our son, Jonathan."

"Glad to meet you, Jonathan," said Mr. Wade.

Jonathan shook hands with him, and Mr. Wade's hand was so hard that it hurt a bit. But it was a friendly kind of hand.

Mrs. Angus waved toward a chair, and Mr. Wade sat down in it. "So this is the young man who's ready to start his lessons?" he said. "Have you been to school at all, Jonathan?" he asked.

"Yes, sir. My father had a school at the mission."

"I understood that Mr. Angus ——" Mr. Wade began.

"He doesn't mean my husband," Mrs. Angus explained. "He means his . . . other father. His father was a missionary in China. I'd rather we talked about that some other time if you don't mind."

"Naturally."

"My mother used to teach me things, too," said Jonathan. He said it quite loudly. He wanted them to be sure that he was not a boy who had never learned anything. "My mother used to sit under the cherry tree and spell words out of a blue book. I can read long sentences. I can even read words in Chinese."

"That's something I can't do," said Mr. Wade with a smile.

There was the sound of the front door being opened, and then the voice of Mr. Angus in the hall. Mr. Angus came into the room, and went over to shake hands with Mr. Wade.

"Mr. Wade's only just arrived, darling," said Mrs. Angus. "He was getting acquainted with Jonny. I think they're going to get along beautifully."

Mr. Wade said, "We were just finding out about any previous education."

"I don't think there can have been very much of that."

Jonathan glanced between the two men and saw that Mrs. Angus was looking at him with a faint little smile again. She said, "There are things we have to arrange, Jonny. Suppose you run and play in the brown room for a few minutes. You can come and say good-by to Mr. Wade when he leaves."

He got to his feet and said, "Yes, Mrs. Angus." Then he looked gravely at Mr. Angus

Kitchen Corners

Four families inventively solve space riddles in the kitchen.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

RIDDLE No. 1: How to get the laundry under the counter.

SOLUTION: At the Richard Mack home, the laundry devices fit in a divider between kitchen and dining room. For repairs and service, doors on the dining side open so connections at back are easily accessible (as shown below). Knotty pine encloses the whole length, and with hidden hinges and magnetic catches the paneling looks continuous and unbroken.

● The same divider is now seen (above right) from the kitchen side, where shutter doors are used. The dining room can be glimpsed, mellow with antiques and traditional fabrics. It was once a garage! Now it gives extra space for dinners, homework and even family projects, such as the current one of gluing seeds of different colors and textures into handsome mosaic patterns to be framed.

● The same view has doors open ready for action. Ironer, at far left, rolls out into the room, but the washer and dryer are used where they are. Serving counter is 39″ high over the appliances. Someday the Macks may add folding or sliding doors to close off the kitchen at mealtime. But these days, while the children are so young and active, the open plan works best.

an went over the thick carpet, knowing that evi though he turned his back on them, they we all closely watching him.
e stood outside in the hallway for a mome. He knew very well that the people he ha just left were thinking and talking and de ling about him.
e liked Mr. Wade, so far, but he had ea ed that people could be very kind at in s, and yet be very angry even a few min-te afterward. He became aware that Mr.
Ar us had raised his voice on the other side
f e door.
Ve can't expect so much of him so qu kly, Vivien," Mr. Angus was saying.

"But he has a lot of ground to make up—and the sooner he does it, the better," Mrs. Angus said. "Robin used to be very quick at these things—especially mathematics. I see no reason why Jonny shouldn't have the same sort of lessons."

"If you'll excuse me"—it was the voice of Mr. Wade now—"you hardly ever find two boys responding in quite the same way to these things, Mrs. Angus—especially at Jonathan's age. Some take to arithmetic like ducks to water; some of them find it quite an ordeal."

"It was never like that with Robin."

There was a pause. Mr. Wade's voice spoke next, and he sounded a bit louder this time. "As you explained to me earlier, Mrs. Angus, Robin had advantages that this boy could hardly have been expected to have: your beautiful home, here; a fine school; the privilege of having the best of everything he needed."

"And Jonathan will have exactly the same advantages. That's why, from now on, I shall expect the very best of him."

"Viv, as I keep on saying, darling," Mr. Angus said, "we mustn't be too demanding! After all, a great deal depends on Jonathan himself. We don't know how quickly he can adjust to things."

Again there was a little silence. The realization that he should not be standing there, listening to grown-up people talking about him, made Jonathan's cheeks hot with a quick, new guilt. He wanted to hear what was being said, but, thinking of Mr. Angus, he also wanted to be obedient.

He ran through the hallway into the brown room, as he had been told to do. He ran across to where he could kneel on the window seat and look out into the street again.

The rain had stopped and the pavements were not shining any more. Somewhere beyond the tall buildings far over to his left the sun must be setting, although he could not see it. All he could see was a patch of orange sky with a fierce wall of black clouds across it. There seemed to be more people walking about, and more buses and more taxicabs in the street. There was a big, pale dog on a chain that was held by a fat young man with bright buttons down his coat. Jonathan watched the dog pull the young man over the sidewalk and along by the park railings.

Perhaps it was soon after that—he did not really know how long—that the terrible thing happened.

It began somewhere far away in the distance, but it seemed to grow and grow, until it filled the world itself. It was a kind of scream as if someone were terribly hurt. The scream was not just a sound that came and died. It went on screaming up and down, up and down, getting louder and shriller.

Jonathan clutched the edge of the seat. He was trembling now, and he shut his eyes to see if that would make the screaming go away.

It only grew worse. It grew so much louder that he fancied he saw again the day on which Sala and he had run away. And he fancied he heard again the terrible scream of Mrs. Ho. Jonathan could suddenly bear it no longer, he ran out of the room and across the hallway and into the music room.

They were still talking in there, but all three faces turned as one toward him.

Mrs. Angus stopped in the middle of a sentence. Jonathan ran past her and clung to Mr. Angus, burying his face in the cloth of his suit.

"Why, Jonny —— What on earth —— Listen, son, you're safe here, you know." Mr. Angus knelt down, with one knee on the carpet, and swung Jonathan round to him.

Still burying his face in the suit of Mr. Angus, Jonathan tried to tell them. "It's the screaming! They'll shoot them! That's what they do when they shoot them!"

Mrs. Angus came closer, too, and also knelt at his side. "Jonathan—it's only an ambulance, darling! It's a car that takes sick people to the hospital. It makes that noise so that other cars won't get in the way."

Jonathan shook his head unbelievingly. He did not dare turn and look at Mrs. Angus, for now he was crying, and was already ashamed of himself.

He heard Mrs. Angus say, "You see, Mr. Wade. This is exactly what I've been meaning. School might only make this kind of thing very much worse."

Mr. Angus said, "Listen, Jonny. Let's keep calm, shall we? Mr. Wade's going now, but he's coming back. I think you'll be very happy working together."

Jonathan turned round at last from Mr. Angus, and gave Mr. Wade a slight, wet smile.

"Good night, Jonny," said Mr. Wade.

"Good night, Mr. Wade."

He watched Mrs. Angus leading the tutor to the door. They went out into the hallway together. Mr. Angus looked down at him anxiously, then patted his shoulder. "What say we have a look at a TV program?"

Jonathan looked at him, and nodded. And he did not mind, just for once, that Mr. Angus gripped his hand as they went across the room.

"But I can't get anywhere with him, John. I took him to the park yesterday—and into the zoo. I kept on feeling as if I were walking down one side of a fence, with him on the other side of it."

Jonathan could hear the words quite clearly, even though he was standing on the first landing, looking through the balustrade.

He knew that it was dinnertime, and that they were expecting him down there, but he had begun to hear these words about himself as soon as he opened his bedroom door. And RIDDLE No. 2: How to make a cramped old dinette into a gay, cozy eating nook.

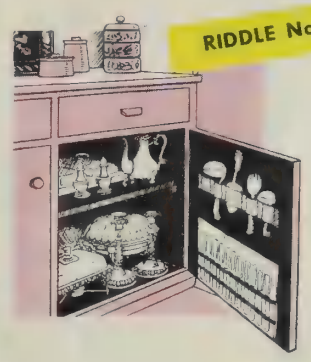
SOLUTION: The Nathan Sullivans put a 30″ range at right angles to the wall, added a partition that hides clutter, gas connection too. Small range has full-width oven with broiler below. When cooking and serving, counters flanking range are a big help. Plastic-coated wallpaper in new dining space is a lollipop design and wainscoting is prescored pressed wood. Ideal for 2 or 3 is 24″-wide table. Bubble light is a plug-in model.

RIDDLE No. 3: Where to put peelings.



TION: As waste con-
r, a deep-well cooker is sed into a circular hole n a counter. It lifts out isposal and cleaning. In its own rim supports it.

RIDDLE No. 4: How to plan for all-season barbecuing.

SOLUTION: In the William Matthews house, chimney in the center holds grill and a built-in electric oven on the kitchen side. Same chimney houses fireplace in the living room and conceals heating equipment. Indoor and outdoor views merge happily in this house with treetop-level windows.

RIDDLE No. 5: How to store silver.

SOLUTION: The Milton Fordes keep their silver bright in a cabinet completely lined with fabric that retards tarnish. Silver in the slots, hollow ware on the shelves, serving pieces in drawer above almost never need polishing.

RIDDLE No. 6: Where to fit marble kneading slab.

SOLUTION: A marble slab is held in slots at top of a cupboard. You can slide it out, put it on counter for kneading bread, making pastry or candy. We recommend it to all good cooks who vow no kitchen is complete without such an aid.

GRAPHS BY STUART SKETCHES BY HARICH

he could not make himself go running down there and into the midst of it all.

"After all"—this was the voice of Mr. Angus—"he's only been here a month, Vivien, darling. We've just got to be patient," he added gently.

"Patient? How could anyone be more so? As I was telling you, I took him to the zoo to see the lions. I thought he'd be thrilled. He just stood there with tears in his eyes, and all I could get him to say was that he wanted to open the doors and let them be free. It's getting impossible to know what to do to make him happy. Robin used to love going to the zoo with me."

"Darling—Jonathan has an altogether different set of likes and dislikes. I don't suppose he's ever seen a wild animal in a cage."

"But Robin ——"

"Please, Viv. Not again, dear. We'll just go on talking in circles if we do this sort of thing."

There was a painful little quietness down there for a while, but the words of Mrs. Angus went ringing through Jonathan's ears.

Always she talked about Robin. Everything that was said led back to Robin. And he began to see that the only things Mrs. Angus really liked about him were the things that were most like Robin. Where he was not like Robin—where he didn't want to eat the same things, or behave in the same way—that was where Mrs. Angus did not like him.

He knew that he must not put off going down the stairs any longer. When he got there he saw that Mr. Angus was standing with his back to the fire, holding a small glass of something goldeny brown, and Mrs. Angus was sitting in one of the big chairs with a glass of the same thing.

Mr. Angus said, "Well, Jonny, I know you haven't been outside the house today, because I met Mr. Wade, and he said it had been raining too hard. Just the same, I hope you've worked up an appetite. Hungry?"

"Not—not specially, sir," Jonathan said.

Mrs. Angus looked at her watch and frowned. "Either Whitton's asleep again," she said, "or that cook's later with dinner than ever. Why they can't be more punctual when they have so little to do out there I can't imagine. Perhaps it's because I rang home and ordered something different for Jonathan. Some kind of sole."

Mr. Angus was pouring some more of the goldeny-brown liquid into her glass.

"That was very thoughtful of you, darling," he said. "Doesn't he like what we're having? Didn't you say something about roast beef?"

"Yes. But after all, he's only ——"

"Did you think of asking him, dear? I've an idea he wants terribly much to feel like one of the family." He looked across at Jonathan. "D'you like roast beef, Jonny?"

"Yes, please. At home my mother used to have Yorkshire pudding with it. Yorkshire's where mother came from."

"Then, Vivien—don't you think he could have some roast beef with us, after all?"

"Next time, perhaps. The sole would be much better for him. Really it would, John. After Robin had been so ill, don't you remember how we put him back on his feet with fish, and chicken, and all those milk things?"

"Darling—Jonny hasn't been ill. He doesn't want to be treated as if he were an invalid."

Mrs. Angus put her glass down again, and got to her feet. She went over to the fire and stared down into it. Without looking round she said harshly, "Perhaps you'd rather look after his diet yourself, John. But remember, I've made some study of these things."

"There isn't any need to get upset, Viv. But I'm desperately anxious for Jonny not to be set apart. He's got to belong, darling."

Mrs. Angus turned back from the fire to Mr. Angus. "I think I'll have Frankie bring my dinner to my room on a tray. I've had rather a trying day, and I'm tired."

"Vivien, I'm sorry you had a bad day. But . . . now that we have Jonathan here, aren't you rather overdoing this charity business?"

"It's only a little more than a week, now, to the Silver Slipper Ball—and Helga's just beginning to work out those details. It has to be a success this year."

"So has . . . Jonny."

Mrs. Angus merely stared at him, then walked toward the door. She reached the door, but turned as she did so. "I can't demoralize the servants by ordering fillet of sole and not having it eaten. Tell Whitton I'll have it—upstairs. You can give Jonathan the roast beef."

Mr. Angus watched her go through the door, and gently close it after her. She closed it as if it were not really a door at all, but a deep, thick curtain that she was pulling back over them.

"Come here, Jonny." Mr. Angus sat down in one of the big chairs, and lifted Jonathan onto his knee. He looked earnestly at him. "There's something I've got to try and explain to you."

"Yes, sir?"

"When I first saw you in Hong Kong, and knew that you needed a home pretty badly, I thought the most urgent thing would be to get a roof over your head and some good food inside you. But that wasn't my only thought about it. My wife and I needed a new son too! Well, I thought there just couldn't be any big problems left for you to deal with when you got here. And that's where I was wrong."

"Yes, sir."

"Try to tell me your problem . . . in your own words."

Jonathan thought for a long moment about it. Then he said, "Having to make my mind up to do something to make everybody happy about me being here—but not knowing what it is I have to do."

"You figure things out pretty well for your size, don't you?"

"Not as well as you do," said Jonathan. "But a lot better than I did long ago."

Mr. Angus looked as if he were about to say some more about it, but there was a sound at the door, and they both glanced back to see Whitton standing there.

"Dinner is served, sir," Whitton said, and he was just going away again when Mr. Angus stopped him.

"Mrs. Angus will have her dinner upstairs, Whitton. Will you have a tray sent up—fillet of sole. Mrs. Angus will have it instead of Master Jonathan."

Whitton raised his eyebrows. Eventually he said, "Very good, sir," and went out.

"Looks as if it's been a trying day for everyone," said Mr. Angus. "Let's not make it worse by being late."

He set Jonathan down, and started walking with him toward the dining room.

Whitton served them, and Jonathan was glad, in spite of the argument there had been about it, that he was having roast beef.

Soon, Whitton was out of the room again, and Jonathan was alone with Mr. Angus.

"What I wanted to say to you was this," Mr. Angus said at last. "If things begin to be too much of a problem for you here, Jonny—at school, why your new mother doesn't like you doing this or that—just remember that she's trying to do what she thinks is best for you."

"Yes, sir."

"There's a special reason for me trying to say these things to you today. I have to go away, Jonny. South America, this time. I'll be away for six weeks or so. I want to know you're going to be all right while I'm gone."

"Can I—can't I go, too, please, Mr. Angus?"

He smiled in a comforting kind of way, but shook his head. "I'm afraid that's something we can't manage this time, Jonny. Some time in the future we will, though —— What are you staring at?"

Jonathan did not reply. He just went on looking at the place where Mrs. Angus' chair had been.

"Start again at the top of the page, Jonathan. If you come to another of those long words, have a shot at it. I'll help you out."

"Yes, Mr. Wade."

Jonathan lifted up his schoolbook again and started reading aloud from the paragraph at the top of the page.

"'As an all-round athlete Paul was getting better. Regular practice and system——'"

"Systematic. Systematic training not methodical training. That's what made him such a fast runner."

"Fast enough to beat the other boys?"

"That's what the book says."

"I can run pretty fast, too, Mr. Wade. Am you good at running?"

"Not too bad. When I was at school we used to have a track meet ——"

"What is a track meet?"

"It's a kind of sports meeting, Jonny. A lot of boys getting together and having races."

Jonathan set the book down and drew his foot up onto the rung of the chair behind him. "Do you think I could go to a track meet, Mr. Wade?"

Mr. Wade looked rather surprised. "Would you like that? Mixing with some other boys, maybe running in some of the races?"

"Yes, please. Can I really, Mr. Wade?"

"You haven't met any other American boys of your own age yet, have you?"

Two watermelons cannot be held under one arm.
TURKISH PROVERB

S.O.S® cleans as it scours as it shines

Teen-agers quickly learn the trick of breezing through the pans: S.O.S., with its creamy, cleansing soap in a sturdy scouring pad. It cleans, scours and shines... does all the pots and pans. Why not make a date with S.O.S. tonight?

creamy, cleansing soap in every pad

© 1958 General Foods Corporation

No, sir."

he tutor looked hard at the floor as if he thinking about something. "I've been with you a month now, Jonny. Perhaps time for us to try and do something ut this. I do know where there's a track . It's in a school not too far away from , the day after tomorrow. If Mrs. Angus agree ——"

Will you ask her, Mr. Wade? Today?"

r. Wade pushed back his sleeve so that ould see his watch. "Let's wait until we feel pretty sure of her saying 'yes,' shall Suppose we get on with the reading."

nathan picked up the book and began n where he had left off. Before they had hed the end of the short chapter, he heard tton opening the front door, and knew Mrs. Angus had come home.

he did not usually come into the brown n, where he did his lessons—so he asked Wade's permission to go and fetch her.

rs. Angus was standing at the bottom of stairs as Jonathan opened the door.

Hello, Jonny!" she said with a smile. "I a cable from your father today. He's ar- in Rio de Janeiro. That's a city in Brazil. ent his love to you."

e nodded. "Is he coming home now?"

e shook her head. "He's only been away w days, Jonny. So I'm afraid he can't be for quite a time. Aren't you glad you Mr. Wade here, though?"

Yes, thank you. Will you speak to Mr. le, please? He wants to tell you about ething. It's something special!"

e smiled down at him. "What have you cooking up in that strange young head ours now, I wonder?"

was glad to get her inside the brown n and to have Mr. Wade stand up in such endly sort of way and say, "Good evening, . Angus."

Do sit down again, Mr. Wade."

Ir. Wade did as she told him, and Mrs. us sat in the low leather chair facing him. glanced at the schoolbooks on the desk.

"How's he coming along?" she asked.

"He's doing fine, Mrs. Angus. I really begin to feel he's making up for lost time at last."

"I'm very glad to hear it. He says you have something to tell me."

Mr. Wade said, "I've been thinking that perhaps it might be good for Jonny to get a little more exercise. I know it's still winter, and that he does get an occasional stretch of walking in the park. But he really needs more than that. There's a junior track meet coming up at a school I know at Oyster Bay. Jonny says he likes racing. I wondered if you'd let me take him over there for the afternoon."

Mrs. Angus seemed to be studying him, and to be thinking deeply about it, but as she did so the kindness went out of her face, and a pale frightened look came into her eyes. "I know it's only a little thing," she said, "but it could be the beginning of ——"

She stopped there and waited for a moment. Then she spoke more loudly, "I thought we'd been very clear about any sort of school activity just yet. After all, it's only a month since we discussed all this."

"A month of being rather alone in a big house can be a long time for a boy like Jonny. He really does need the companionship of other boys his own age."

For a moment she was silent. Then she spoke in an odd kind of way, as if she were standing in a corner, and could not get out of it. "There must be plenty of other ways of his meeting other boys without having to go to school to do so."

"I'm not suggesting his taking part regularly in any school activity."

"Even once might be a mistake under certain circumstances."

Mrs. Angus rose and walked a step or two toward the window. She looked as if she were trying very hard to make up her mind.

Then suddenly she shook her head, as if she were saying a very definite "no" to herself.

"Believe me, Mr. Wade," she said, "I don't want to hurt him. It's because I don't want to hurt him that . . . well, I'd like to let this chance go by, and think about it for a week or two. Let me take him off somewhere exciting on Wednesday. And perhaps you'd like to take the Wednesday off altogether, and come back on Thursday."

Mr. Wade sat very still. Finally, in a flat voice, he said, "Thank you, Mrs. Angus."

"And I do appreciate your motive, Mr. Wade. If any other ideas occur to you along these lines, I hope you won't feel too rebuffed to tell me of them?"

"I'll gladly tell you anything that comes to my mind on the subject, Mrs. Angus."

She gave him a small smile and turned toward the door. Mr. Wade started putting away the schoolbooks from the top of the desk. Jonathan went over to help him.

The door was locked from the other side.

Mrs. Angus had sent a message to him, through Frankie, that she was not feeling very well. It was strange that Mrs. Angus would not even let him go in to say good morning. And this, to make matters worse, was the Wednesday on which she had proposed to take him to see some of the sights of New York—the Wednesday Mr. Wade had taken the day off.

Mrs. Angus had let Frankie into her bedroom, though—taking her breakfast on a tray. Frankie was in there quite a time, and Jonathan was standing just inside the music-room door when she came downstairs again. As she was reaching the bottom, Whitton came across from the brown room.

Frankie saw him, and gave a little jerk of her head in the direction of the upper landing. "It's blowing up a storm in there again. It's too bad Mr. Angus is away, for there sure is trouble coming to this house."

"What trouble?"

"You know what happened last time she had one of these spells? Well—she's got the same look on her face this morning."

"It's a sad business, Frankie." Whitton paused to shake his head, then he disappeared.

She stared after him for a moment, then went off toward the kitchen. Jonathan watched until there was not a sight or a sound of either of them. Then he looked up at the landing, toward the locked door.

It was dark today, and there was no sun. As Jonathan stared out the window, he saw Mr. Wade get off a bus and come striding over the pavement, and up between the stone lions.

Jonathan ran out into the hall to meet him. "Good morning, Mr. Wade," he said in a loud and welcoming voice. Whitton came out, too, and took Mr. Wade's coat and hat.

"Good morning, Jonny . . . 'morning, Whitton. Glad somebody's looking cheerful this cold, gray day!"

"Did you like your day off, Mr. Wade?" Jonathan asked.

Mr. Wade shrugged. "So-so." He walked toward the door of the brown room. "How did you enjoy yours?"

"We didn't go out at all—Mrs. Angus wasn't well enough."

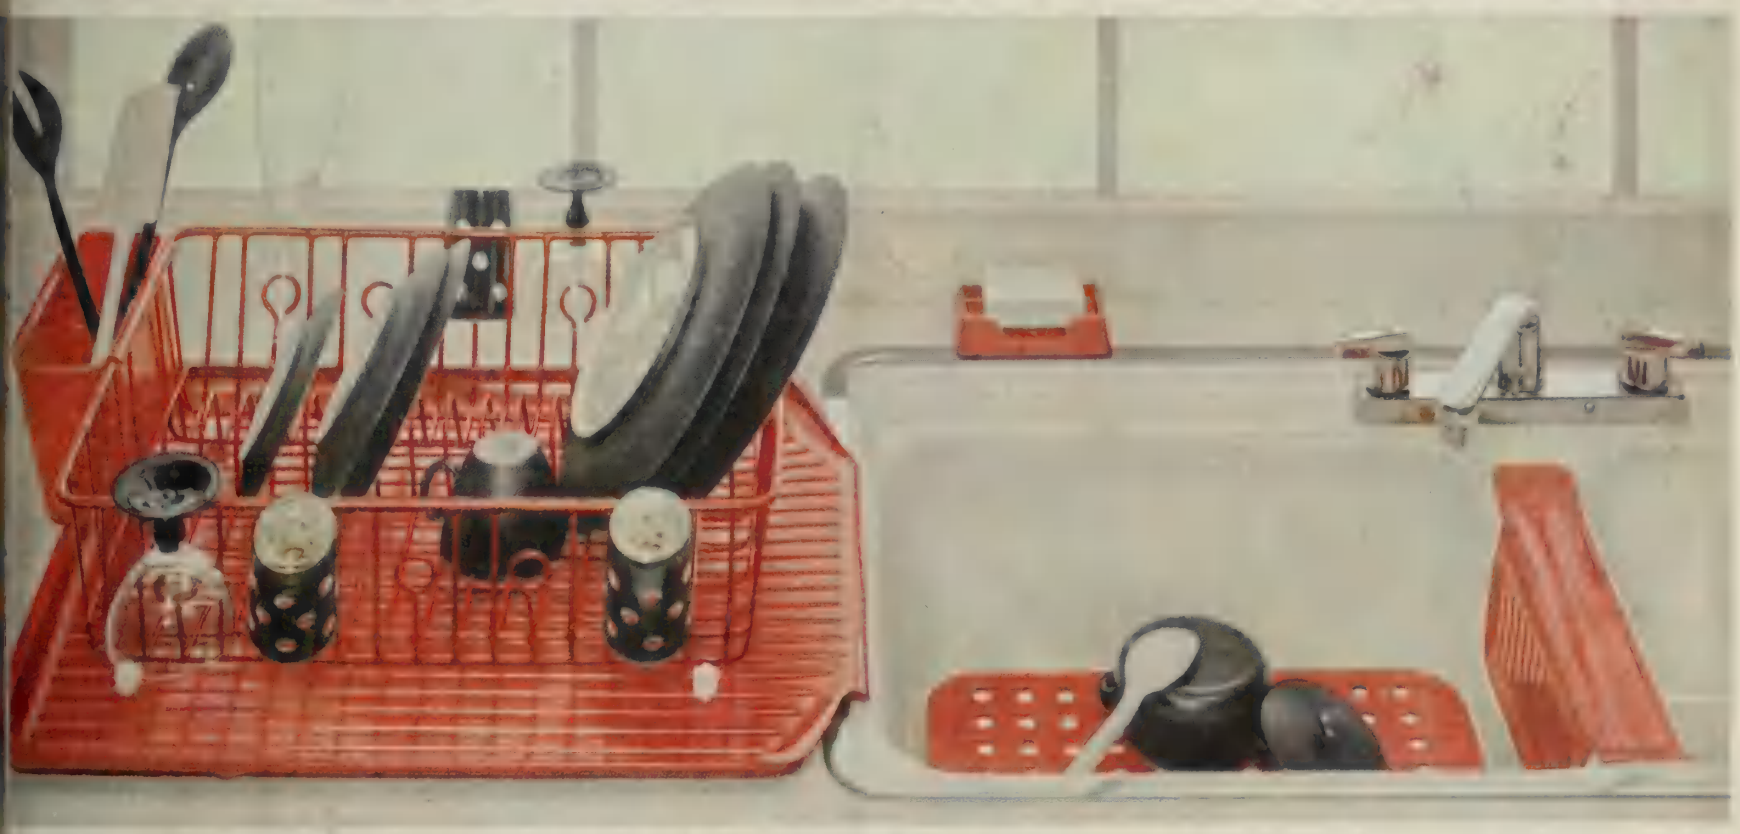
"Too bad."

"Perhaps we could go and see some of the sights, Mr. Wade—you and me?"

Mr. Wade looked across at him thoughtfully. "Don't know how it might work," he said. "But we could have another shot at it."

"Soon?"

"We'll see about that. Yesterday I was talking to a schoolteacher who'd been taking a group of boys round the U.N. Building—that's the United Nations."



Jonathan remembered. The words brought back to his mind a picture of Miss Lunt and how she had told him she lived near to the United Nations Building.

"Yes, I've heard of it. Miss Lunt told me about it. She's the one who brought me on the ship from China."

"Then how about taking a look?" Mr. Wade suggested.

"I'd like it. I'd like it fine."

"Good!" said Mr. Wade. "If we can get Mrs. Angus to agree, there's no reason why we shouldn't go almost any time. There's no need to wait for any group of other boys, either." He stopped, leaning forward and wrinkling his brow. "Now what's wrong?"

Look at what just $11.54 worth of Rubbermaid does for your sink! Cushiony, colorful Rubbermaid protects, beautifies, and adds extra work space, too. And such wonders Rubbermaid performs for you. It ends dish-wiping—air-dries your dishes safely, speedily —gives you time to spare. You can stop worrying about dishes chipping, sinks marring, soon as you start dressing up your sink n sparkling Rubbermaid. The Drainer Tray, Dish Drainer, Sink Mat, Soap Dish and Sink Divider Mat are available wherever housewares are sold. For free folder, write Rubbermaid, Inc., Dept. LJ-18, Wooster, Ohio, or Cooksville, Ontario.

Rubbermaid®

Rubbermaid, Inc., Wooster, Ohio

TASTE BETTER NATURALLY...COOK QUICK NATURALLY

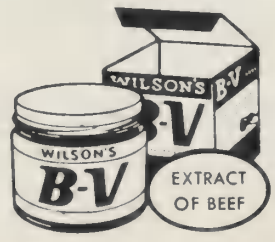
Happy Meals for Everybody Every Time!

Little appetites eat big when you serve natural white River Brand or Carolina Brand Rice . . . rice that is naturally rich in Nature's own delicious flavors. Tops with Mom, too—so fast and easy to prepare.

READY TO EAT in a few minutes!

Fast Cooking Recipes on Every Box.

RIVER BRAND RICE MILLS, INC.



New York, N.Y. · Houston, Texas · Memphis, Tenn. · El Campo, Texas · Eunice, La.

B-V STEW

with the T-Bone Taste

Hearty beef flavor when you make your stew with B-V! You see, B-V gives you all the mouth-watering flavor of rich prime beef in just seconds. B-V in your kitchen puts the famed "T-Bone Touch" at your fingertips!

Also try B-V for:

BURGERS • HOT CUP • SOUP • GRAVY

Wilson & Co., Inc.
Meat Packers, Chicago

"I'd like to wait and go round with the other boys, please."

